[C] Hiero died at the age of ninety.] Livy affirms it as we ſhall ſee in the following remark. Lucian (9) cites Demetrius Caliſtianus, who wrote that Hiero died of ſickneſs at ninety two years of age, having reigned ſeventy. Let us keep to the round number of Livy and Valerius Maximus. Siciliæ rector Hiero ad nonageſimum annum pervenit (10). —— Hiero, the king of Sicily, lived ninety years. Note, by the way, a ſmall miſtake of Father Hardouin. 'Hieron, Siciliæ Rex, quem inter ſcriptores de agricultura memorant Varro, & Columella l. 1. c. 1. cum Attalo Philometore Pergami rege. Multa de eo præclare habet Valerius Max. l. 8. c. 13. p. 405 (11). —— Hiero, king of Sicily, is mentioned by Varro and Columella, among the writers on Agriculture, together with Attalus Philometor, king of Pergamus. Valerius Maximus tells many extraordinary things concerning him.' Conſult Valerius Maximus in the place that Father Hardouin has quoted, and you will find nothing about Hiero but the ſeven words that I have ſet down, but you will there a great many curious things concerning Maſſaniſſa, king of Numidia. I am perſuaded that a falſe glance of the eye was the cauſe of Father Hardouin's miſtake. One line skipped, made him believe that the whole page related to Hiero: that little leap eclipſed Maſſaniſſa in the following line: this is a cauſe of miſtakes that ſpreads itſelf farther than is imagined. A writer, who is to conſult many authors, dwells upon things as little as he can; his eyes run over the pages with great ſwiftneſs; they glance ſometimes ſo lightly upon certain lines, that the mind retains no idea of them, and then the pen joins facts together which it ought to ſeparate. To conclude, Hiero did not reign ſeventy years as Lucian affirms: he was prætor ſeven years before he was proclaimed king (12).

[D] He deſired to reſtore the Syracuſans to their liberty, but his daughters hindered him.] It was becauſe they ſaw that their husbands and themſelves ſhould have the chief management of the kingdom. Livy deſcribes this admirably well. 'In Sicilia, ſays he (13), Romanis omnia mutaverat mors Hieronis, regnumque ad Hieronymum nepotem ejus tranſlatum, puerum vixdum libertatem, nedum dominationem modicè laturum. Læte id ingenium tutores atque amici ad præcipitandum in omnia vitia acceperunt. Quæ ita futura cernens Hiero, ultima ſenecta voluiſſe dicitur liberas Syracuſas relinquere, ne ſub dominatu puerili per ludibrium bonis artibus partum firmatumque interiret regnum. Huic conſilio ejus ſumma ope obſiſtere filiæ: nomen regium penes puerum futurum ratæ, regimen rerum omnium penes ſe, viroſque ſuos, Andronodorum, & Zoilum, nam ii tutorum primi relinquebantur. Non facile erat nonageſimum jam agenti annum, circumſeſſo dies noctesque muliebribus blanditiis liberare animum, & convertere ad publicam privatamque curam. Itaque tutores numero quindecim puero reliquit.

(e) See Polybius, ibid. cap. xvi.

(f) Pauſan. lib. vi, cap, xii, pag 480.

(g) Id. ibid. cap xv, pag. 489. But note, that he ſays, pag 480, that his ſons erected two ſtatues to him, and pag. 489, that they erected but one, and that the Syracuſans erected two.

(h) See Polybius, lib. v, cap. xxxviii.

(i) Concerning the care Hiero took to get Archimedes's Geometrical ſpeculations applied to mechanical uſes. See Plutarch, in Vita Marcelli, pag. 305.

(k) Athen lib, vi, pag. 206, & ſeq See the article ARCHIMELUS.

(l) See the remark [C].

(m) And not 549, as Moreri ſays.

(n) Calviſius ad ann. Romæ 538, ſuppoſes the contrary, and is miſtaken.

(o) Pauſan lib. vi, cap xii, pag. 479.

(p) Polybius, in excerpt Legat. cap i, Titus Liv. lib. xxiv, pag. 382.

(6) Caſaubonus, Commentar. in Polyb. pag. 151, 152.

(7) See Livy, lib. xxii, pag. m. 349.

(8) Livius, lib. xxiv, pag. 381.

(9) Lucian. in Macrobiis, pag. 635, Tom. II. Oper.

(10) Valer. Maxim. lib. viii, cap. xiii, n. 1, in Ext.

(11) Harduin. in Ind Autor. Plin. pag. 115.

(12) See Caſaubon, in Polybii, libr. i, pag. m. 99, 100.

(13) Tit. Livius, lib. xxiv, pag. 381.

great age he had not ſufficient reſolution to reſiſt the careſſes and artifices of theſe two women who beſet him day and night. He was therefore obliged to leave the kingdom to his grandſon, under the tuition of fifteen perſons. What the old man foreſaw happened. There was nothing but confuſion in Syracuſe after his death [E]. Pauſanias is miſtaken in ſaying that Dinomenes killed him (q).

quit. —— In Sicily the Roman affairs were quite changed by the death of Hiero, and the ſucceſſion of his nephew Hieronymus to the crown, a boy, who was not capable of enjoying liberty with moderation, much leſs dominion. His guardians and friends joyfully laid hold of this diſpoſition of his to precipitate him into all manner of vice. It has been related that Hiero, in his old age having foreſeen this, intended to have left the Syracuſans a free ſtate, to prevent the kingdom which he had obtained and eſtabliſhed by his great abilities, to be ſhamefully loſt under the government of a boy. His daughters earneſtly oppoſed this deſign, thinking that though the name of king ſhould be with Hieronymus, yet that the authority would be lodged with them and their huſbands, Andronodorus and Zoilus: for they were appointed his chief guardians. It was too hard a task for him in the ninetieth year of his age, beſet night and day with their female arts, to preſerve a freedom of ſpirit, and to employ it in public and private cares. He therefore left fifteen guardians to him.'

[E] There was nothing but confuſion in Syracuſe after his death.] The firſt thing that was done, was to preſent to the people Hiero's will, and Hieronymus the new king, who was but fifteen years old. Some people hired to make acclamations approved of the will: others were filled with diſquiet, and conſidered the kingdom as an orphan who had juſt loſt his father. A little after they proceeded to the funeral ſolemnity, which if it was conſiderable for the number of thoſe who attended it, it ought rather to be attributed to the love of the people than to the care of Hiero's family (14). After this Andronodorus, ſon-in-law of the deceaſed, and one of Hieronymus's fifteen tutors, declared, that the king was of age to govern, and that the minority was expired. By this he aſſumed to himſelf the power of all the others. Royal equipage was introduced, and whereas Hiero always went in a common dreſs, his grandſon appeared in purple with a diadem and guards. This outward pomp was attended with an equal pride, cruelty, and debauchery; and one would have thought that Hieronymus was at pains to make them lament the loſs of his grandfather. Had he had the qualities of the beſt princes, he would have ſcarce contented the Syracuſans, they ſo adored his predeceſſor. What diſcontent then muſt they have had under a ſucceſſor ſo unlike him? I cannot ſufficiently admire the dignity of the expreſſions that Livy makes uſe of to repreſent it. 'Vix quidem ulli bono, moderatoque regi facilis erat favor apud Syracuſanos, ſuccedenti tantæ charitati Hieronis: Verùm enimvero Hieronymus, velut ſuis vitiis deſiderabilem efficere vellet avum, primo ſtatim conſpectu omnia quàm diſparia eſſent, oſtendit. Nam qui per tot annos Hieronem, filiumque ejus Gelonem, nec veſtis habitu, nec alio ullo inſigni differentes à cæteris civibus vidiſſent, conſpexere purpuram, ac diadema, ac ſatellites armatos, quadrigiſque etiam alborum equorum interdum ex regia procedentem, more Dionyſii tyranni. Hunc tam ſuperbum apparatum, habitumque convenientes ſequebantur mores; contemptus omnium hominum, ſuperbæ aures, contumelioſa dicta, aditus non alienis modo, ſed tutoribus etiam difficiles, libidines novæ, inhumana crudelitas (15). —— It would have been no eaſy matter, even for a good and moderate prince, to have gained the love of the Syracuſans who ſo adored their late king Hiero. But Hieronymus, as if he had deſigned by his vices to make his grandſather's memory more dear to them, all at once ſhowed them how much every thing was altered. They who for ſo many years had ſeen Hiero and his ſon Gelo differing neither in dreſs, nor by any other marks of diſtinction, from the other citizens, now ſaw the purple, the diadem, the armed guards and chariots drawn by white horſes, iſſuing from the palace after the manner of the tyrant Dionyſius. And this pomp and gorgeous dreſs was attended with ſuitable manners: with a contempt of all men, with pride, contumelious ſpeeches, difficulty of acceſs, not only to ſtrangers, but to his guardians themſelves, unheard-of luſts and inhuman cruelty.' This young king preferred the alliance of the Carthaginians to that of Rome (16); but he had not time allowed him to do them ſervice; they conſpired againſt him and killed him (17). Andronodorus fortified himſelf as well as he could in ſome places of Syracuſe; and yet, contrary to the advice of Demarata (18) his wife, Hiero's daughter, he ſubmitted to the new republican government, and was created prætor: but new troubles ariſing, he tried to make an advantage of them, being teized with the continual inſtigations of his wife (19). He concerted his enterprize with Themiſtius, the huſband of Harmonia, Gelon's daughter, and truſted it to a comedian, who betrayed him; ſo that he and Themiſtius were killed as they entered the ſenate (20). To juſtify this murder, it was neceſſary to repreſent to the people the crime of theſe two men. The orator who was appointed to do it, ſaid, amongſt other things, that their wives had filled them with ambition. The people upon this vehemently cried out, that theſe two women ought to die, and the whole race of the tyrants. This was immediately decreed and executed. Livy, in relating this tragical adventure, doth not forget to make a reflexion upon the capricious and changeable temper of the populace. 'Sub hanc vocem ex omnibus partibus concionis clamor oritur, nullam earum vivere debere, nec quenquam ſupereſſe tyrannorum ſtirpis. Hæc natura multitudinis eſt: aut ſervit humiliter, aut ſuperbè dominatur; libertatem, quæ media eſt, nec ſpernere modicè, nec habere ſciunt, & non fermè deſunt irarum indulgentes miniſtri, qui avidos atque intemperantes plebeiorum animos ad ſanguinem & cædes, irritent: ſicut tum extemplo Prætores rogationem promulgarunt. Acceptaque penè prius quàm promulgata eſt, ut omnis regia ſtirps interficiretur. Miſſique à Prætoribus Demaratam Hieronis, & Harmoniam Gelonis filias, conjuges Andronodori & Themiſtii, interfecerunt (21). —— Upon this a cry aroſe from all parts of the aſſembly, that neither of them ought to live, and that none of the race of the tyrants ſhould eſcape. Such is the nature of the populace: they either ſerve meanly or command inſolently: and do not know with moderation, either to deſpiſe or enjoy liberty, which is the middle betwixt theſe two, and there are ſeldom wanting thoſe who, indulging the popular fury, ſtir up their eager and headſtrong paſſions to blood and ſlaughter. And ſo it happened in this caſe, the prætors without delay put it to the vote. And it was decreed, almoſt ſooner than it was propoſed, that all the royal family ſhould be put to death. Accordingly the prætors ſent and ſlew Demarata, daughter to Hiero, and Harmonia daughter to Gelo, and the wives of Andronodorus and Themiſtius.' There remained a daughter of Hiero named Heraclea: when ſhe knew that they were come to kill her, ſhe ſhut herſelf up with her two daughters in the chapel of her houſe, and placed herſelf by her Penates, uſing the moſt pathetical ſupplications and the ſtrongeſt arguments to ſave her life, or at leaſt that of her daughters; but all in vain, ſhe was dragged from the chapel and murdered. Her two daughters who had eſcaped from the houſe, were killed in the ſtreets (22). See the margin (23).

(q) Pauſan. lib. vi, cap. xii, pag. 480.

(14) Funus fit regium magis amore civium & charitate, quam cura ſuorum celebre. T. Livius, lib. xxiv, pag. 381.

(15) Id. ibid.

(16) Id ibid. pag. 381. See alſo Polybius, in Excerpt. Legat. cap i.

(17) Livius, ib.

(18) What ſhe told him may be ſeen in the remark [F] of article PERIANDER, near the end.

(19) Feſſus tandem uxoris vocibus monentis, nunc illud eſſe tempus occupandi res, tum turbata omnia nova atque incognita libertate eſſent, dum regiis ſtipendiis paſtus obverſaretur miles: dum, &c. Livius, ubi ſupra, pag. 391.

(20) Id. ibid.

(21) Id. ibid. pag. 393.

(22) Id. ibid.

(23) I will make ſome reflexions upon this in the remark [C] of the article HOBBES.

HIERO, a great friend of Nicias, and head of the colony which rebuilt Thurium (a), pretended to be the ſon of Dionyſius, ſirnamed Χαλκὸς [A], that is to ſay of braſs, æneus. He was bred up at Nicias's houſe, who himſelf inſtructed him in Literature and Muſic. He in return uſed a great many artifices to recommend Nicias (b). I have found an error in Amiot, and in ſome Dictionaries (c).

(a) A town of Italy.

(b) Taken from Plut. in Vita Niciæ.

(c) See the quotation (5).

[A] The ſon of Dionyſius ſirnamed Χαλκὸς.] This Dionyſius was a poet. Some of his poems were ſtill extant in Plutarch's time (1). His Elegies are cited by Athenæus (2), and by Ariſtotle (3). He was alſo an orator; for he was ſirnamed Χαλκὸς, becauſe the Athenians, being perſuaded by one of his orations, made uſe of braſs money (4). See the margin (5).

---

(1) Plut. in Nicia, pag. 526. (2) Athen. lib. x, pag. 443, & lib. xv, pag. 668. (3) Ariſtot. Rhetor. lib. iii, cap ii. (4) Callimachus, in Tract. de Rhetoribus, apud Athen. lib. xv, pag. 669. (5) Note, That, according to Amiot's tranſlation, this Dionyſius conducted the colony of Thurium; but it was Hiero who did it, according to the true ſenſe of Plutarch. Note alſo, That Charles Stephens, Lloyd, and Hofman ſay, that the poems which were extant in Plutarch's time, were written by Hiero; which is falſe.

HIEROPHILUS, a Phyſician of whom I can ſay nothing elſe but that he taught his art to a certain maid called Agnodice. She was obliged to diſguiſe herſelf in a man's dreſs; for there was a law among the Athenians, which prohibited women and ſlaves to ſtudy Phyſic (a). Agnodice becoming a Midwife, gave occaſion to the repeal of that law. It is too curious a piece of hiſtory not to be related in a remark [A].

(a) Athenienſes caverant ne quis ſervus aut fœmina artem Medicinam diſceret. Hygin. cap. cclxxiv.

[A] It is too curious a piece of hiſtory not to be related in a remark.] Hyginus relates ‘that the ancients having no midwives, abundance of women died in travel, becauſe ſhame hindered them from applying to the Phyſicians; and there was a law among the Athenians forbidding women to practiſe Phyſic. hereupon Agnodice, a young woman, having a great inclination for that ſcience, diſguiſed herſelf in man's apparel, and learned it. After which ſhe uſed to ſeek out women that were in labour, and to take away all ſcruples, ſhe immediately ſhewed them what ſhe was, and ſo brought them to bed. The Phyſicians, obſerving that they loſt their practice with the women, ſued her, accuſing her of an unlawful commerce with the ſex. They complained alſo of I know not what colluſion, and certain pretended illneſſes that they had to countenance the gallant. In a word they cauſed her to be condemned by the Areopagites; but ſhe ſhewed ſo plainly the proofs of her innocence in a full ſenate, that the Phyſicians were forced to change their battery, to wit, to recur to the law that prohibited women the profeſſion of Phyſic. The Athenian ladies interpoſed, and cauſed the law to be reformed; ſo that free women were permitted to learn that art (1).’ The author from whom I borrow theſe words, makes a reflexion againſt Hyginus. ‘There is ſays he (2), but little exactneſs in theſe words of Hyginus: for one might conclude from his diſcourſe, that from the time that Agnodice laid the women, they no longer imployed the Phyſicians in that affair, which would prove againſt this author's own obſervation, that they made uſe of their aſſiſtance in it before. But tho' there be no exactneſs in his words, we may at leaſt ſave him from a contradiction, by ſuppoſing he meant that the women having been aſſiſted in their lyings-in by Agnodice, would no longer make uſe of any body but her in their other indiſpoſitions, wherein they had no ſcruple againſt imploying the Phyſicians.’ This author makes another remark upon Hyginus's obſervation, that before Agnodice practiſed Midwifry, ſeveral women had died, who had not the courage to make uſe of a Phyſician (3). ‘It muſt be confeſſed, ſays the writer of the News from the Republic of Letters (4), that ſhame is no leſs ſubject than other things to the caprice of the faſhion. Time has been that it was the faſhion to be aſhamed to make uſe of a Man-Midwife, and we read in Louiſe Bourgeois a very dexterous Midwife, that Henry IV charged her to do her duty ſo well with queen Mary de Medicis, that it might not be neceſſary to have recourſe to a man; for her modeſty, added he, would ſuffer too much by it. At preſent it is à la mode to be void of that ſhame; our age is much more enlightened than the preceding.’ This raillery againſt the preſent age is not well grounded; for if on one hand there is now leſs ſhame in ſome reſpects, impudence on the other hand is leſs than it was at Athens. Are there any virtuous women at preſent, who would have the aſſurance in a full auditory to take up their peticoats, and demonſtrate to the judges that they are women? Agnodice did ſo in the Areopagus, the graveſt and moſt venerable tribunal that was in the world. ‘Quod cum vidiſſent medici, ſe ad fœminas non admitti, Agnodicen accuſare cœperunt, quod dicerunt eum glabrum eſſe & corruptorem earum, & illas ſimulare imbecillitatem. Quo cum Areopagitæ conſediſſent, Agnodicen damnare cœperunt. Quibus Agnodice tunicam allevavit, & ſe oſtendit fœminam eſſe (5).’ Could there be a more conſummate impudence than this? had ſhe not before given ſufficient proofs of her want of ſhame? could not ſhe have diſcovered her ſex by more modeſt methods than thoſe ſhe uſed to the women? Quæ cum credere ſe noluiſſet, æſtimans virum eſſe, illa tunica ſublata oſtendebat ſe fœminam eſſe (6). Thoſe prelates, who, to purge themſelves of incontinency, have ſhewn their nakedneſs in full councils (7), do not come up to the impudence of this Athenian woman.

I have ſaid elſewhere, that Albertus Magnus practiſed Midwifry, if we may believe ſcandalous report (8). If this be ſo, it is a long time ſince the modeſty of the Athenian women has been gone; and as the reputation of Albertus was very well eſtabliſhed, who knows but that ſome women gloried in being delivered by his hand? juſt as Moliere's preciſe ladies would have every thing, even their under ſtockings, made by the beſt hand.

Since the firſt edition of this dictionary I have ſeen in the journaliſts of Lepſic, an obſervation which will ſerve here for a ſupplement. It can be denied, ſay they, that the French are fitter than any other nation to inſtruct us how women may be aſſiſted in their labour. It is not becauſe they have a more happy genius, but becauſe they have frequent occaſions of being preſent at child-births. It is the faſhion in France, that even new married women, caſting away all ſhame, permit themſelves, without ſcruple, to be ſeen and handled by Chirurgions, and all ſorts of women deſire their preſence and aſſiſtance when they are ready to lie-in. A quite different cuſtom prevails in other nations: for commonly women, and eſpecially thoſe who are newly married, are ſo ſcrupulous, that they can hardly be perſuaded to put themſelves into the hands of the midwives and their particular friends: It is only neceſſity brings them to it, and when the pain is ſo ſtrong as to overcome their repugnance. As I do not tranſlate this word for word, I will inſert the Latin of the Lepſic Journal, to ſhew that I expreſs the ſenſe of it with all the neceſſary faithfulneſs. ‘Non eſt negandum, de adjuvandis parturientibus Gallos præ cæteris nationibus nos inſtruere poſſe, non ingenio, ſed occaſione, qua licet ipſis quam frequentiſſime partui adeſſe, feliciores. Ita enim moris apud ipſos eſt, ut poſito pudore, etiam recens nuptæ ad tactum atque explorationem omnem chirurgos admittant faciles, & partus tempore præſentis atque adjutores fœminæ quælibet eos expetant. Quod longe fit aliter apud ceteras nationes, ubi plerumque vix perſuaderi poſſunt uxorculæ, cumprimis nuper in matrimonium ductæ, ut obſtetricibus propriique ſexus amicis ſui faciant copiam, niſi doloribus ac neceſſitate victæ (9).’ Thus the journaliſts of Leipſic ſpeak at the beginning of the extract of a book publiſhed by a Chirurgion of Paris (10) in the year 1694, and intituled The Practice of Midwifry. That Chirurgion did not print his obſervations, till after a long experience; he had aſſiſted at the deliveries of four or

(1) Nouvelles de la Repub. des Lettres, Jan. 1686, pag. 28, 29.

(2) Ibid. pag. 30.

(3) Antiqui obſtetrices non habuerunt, unde mulieres verecundia ductæ interierant. Hygin. cap. cclxxiv.

(4) January 1686, pag. 30.

(5) Hygin. cap. cclxxiv, pag. m. 329.

(6) Id. ibid pag. 328.

(7) Concerning Dionyſius, Patriarch of Conſtantinople, ſee the New Letters againſt Maimbourg, pag. 686, to which you may add theſe words; Atteſtantibus Nicephoro & Zonara, quum Macedonius Epiſcopus Conſtantinopolitanus, ſub Anaſtaſio, falſo atque factionibus Arrianorum & Manichæorum ab adoleſcentulis, impuræ Veneris; & Methodius Patriarcha, ſub Michaële, ſtupri accuſati eſſent: ambos ut convincerent mendacium, tunicâ ſubductâ oſtendiſſe, virilibus ſe carere: & exinde à criminibus illis liberos atque immunes fuiſſe pronunciatos. - - - Nicephorus and Zonaras relate, that Macedonius, biſhop of Conſtantinople under Anaſtaſius, being falſly accuſed of unnatural luſt, by certain young men, at the inſtigation of the Arrian and Manichean factions; and that Methodius, the patriarch, in the reign of the emperor Michael, being likewiſe accuſed of whoredom, they both, in order to demonſtrate the falſity of the accuſation, put aſide their garments and ſhowed that they were caſtrated, and by that means were declared innocent of the crimes laid to their charge. Salmuth. in Pancirolum, Part. II, pag. 88.

---

(8) See his article, remark [B]. (9) Actor. Eruditor. Lipſ. Supplem. Tom. II, Sect. x, pag. 470. (10) Called Philip Peu.

five thouſand women. Another Chirurgion of the ſame city (11) publiſhed another book the year following intituled, Obſervations upon the pregnancy and and deliveries of women, &c. It contains 700 choice obſervations out of more than three thouſand, which the author has made (12). This is enough to prove that it is the prevailing faſhion at Paris, to make uſe of men and not of women Midwives. The time will come perhaps that the ſame mode will prevail over the greateſt part of Europe; ſhame will underego the fate of a thouſand other things, which are ſubject to the capricious and inconſtant laws of cuſtom.

HILDEBERT, biſhop of Mans, and afterwards archbiſhop of Tours in the beginning of the XIIth century, had led a very ſcandalous life before he attained the mitre [A]. It is in vain they wrangle hereupon with the Annaliſt of the Romiſh church [B], and alledge the diſcoveries of a critic againſt him. Father Maimbourg ſucceſsfully produced an action of this prelate [C], to inſult thoſe few biſhops, who oppoſed the extention

[A] He led a very irregular life before he attained the mitre.] Even after his promotion to the dignity of archdeacon, he kept ſo many concubines, that he had baſtards of both ſexes in abundance. This is what Ivo biſhop of Chartres writ to him (1). ‘Dicunt quidam de majoribus Cenomanenſis Eccleſiæ qui anteactam vitam tuam ſe noſſe teſtantur, quod ultra modum laxaveris fræna pudicitiæ, in tantum ut poſt acceptum Archidiaconatum, accubante lateribus tuis plebe muliercularum multam genueris plebem puerorum & puellularum. —— Some of the rulers of the church of Mans, who pretend to be well acquainted with your paſt life, teſtify that you ſet no bounds to your luſt, in ſo much that even after you arrived at the degree of an archdeacon, you had numberleſs concubines conſtantly with you, by whom you had many, both ſons and daughters.’

[B] It is in vain to wrangle hereupon with the annaliſt of the church of Rome.] Juret (2) cenſures Baronius for having written in Annals upon the authority of this letter of Ivo of Chartres, that Hildebert before he was a biſhop was addicted to women, pretending that this letter was written to one Aldebert, and not to Hildebert. Aldeberto, Cenomanenſis Eccleſia electo. It is thus this letter is intituled at the end of the manuſcript letters of Ivo of Chartres in the library of St Victor. —— But Father Sirmond, in his notes upon Godfrey of Vendôme, has very well juſtified Baronius; theſe are his words. ‘Ildebertus vir in Epiſcopatu eximius, ante illum, vitæ ſolutioris, ut indicat Ivonis epiſtola 277. Quam quidem, qui de Ildeberto, quo de agimus, ſcriptam, pertinaciùs neget, is, opinor, clauſis oculis ſibi credi velit. Ecquæ enim alia Ivonis tempore Cenomanenſis Epiſcopi electio fuit, quàm Ildeberti? Quem prætera ſcimus ex Archidiacono, quod Ivo notat, ad Epiſcopalem Cathedram evectum. Neque tamen hæc ita differo, ut viri docti, qui contra ſenſit, nomini obtrectem: ſed quia immortalis memoriæ Cardinali Baronio me debere judico, ut quæ rectè & verè ab eo dicta ſunt, ea ut pro veris habeantur, enitar quoad poſſum (3). —— Hildebert was a very good biſhop, but before he arrived at that dignity he was guilty of many irregularities, as we learn from Ivo in his 277th epiſtle. They who obſtinately deny that this letter was wrote to this Hildebert, would have us blindly to believe whatever they ſay. For what other election of a biſhop of Mans was there in the days if Ivo, but that of Hildebert? we know likewiſe, that he was advanced from being archdeacon (as Ivo obſerves) to the epiſcopal ſee. I do not ſay this with any intention of leſſening the reputation of the learned man who has mantained the contrary opinion: but becauſe I think I owe ſo much to the immortal memory of cardinal Baronius as to endeavour to the utmoſt my power that what he has juſtly and truly wrote, ſhould be acknowledged to be true.’ Mr Menage adds ſome good things to theſe reaſons of Father Sirmond. ‘Ildebertus, ſays he (4), and Aldebertus is the ſame name: and Ildebert biſhop of Mans calls himſelf Aldebertus in one of his letters printed in the thirteenth volume of the Spicilegium. Ranulfo, Dei gratia, Dunelmenſi Epiſcopo, omni honore & gratia ſublimando, ALDEBERTUS, humilis Cenomanorum Sacerdos. He is thus called in a charter of the abbey of Etival, produced by Mr Pavillon in his obſervations upon the life of Abriſſel. Aldeberto Epiſcopo Cenomanenſi: for thus it ought to be read, and not, Alberto Epiſcopo Cenomanenſi*: there having been no Albert biſhop of Mans. In a charter of Frontevaux, produced by Coſnier, page 131 of his notes upon the life of Arbriſſel, he is alſo called Audebertus; which is the ſame thing as Aldebertus. Courvaiſier in the life of Ildebert, confirms the letter of Ivo of Chartres by this place of the Necrologium of St Peter de La Cour of Mans: Tertio Idus Auguſti, obiit Gervaſius, Hildeberti Præſulis filius; matris Eccleſiæ Canonicus: qui vivens, ad hujus Eccleſiæ ſervitium quandam contulit Bibliothecam; cujus anima quiete fruatur æterna: On the eleventh of Auguſt died Gervaſius ſon to biſhop Hildebert; a canon of the mother church; who in his lifetime left a library for the uſe of this church; may his ſoul reſt in eternal peace. Pretending that this Gervaſius was the natural ſon of Ildebert. Bondonnet pretends he was only his ſpiritual ſon. But in the acts of the biſhops of Mans, publiſhed by Dom Mabillon in the third volume of his Analecta, the delicta juventutis of this biſhop are mentioned, which farther confirms Ivo of Chartres's letter.’ Mr Menage mentions in his additions (5) two charters produced by Father de la Mainferme (6), in which our Hildebert is called Audebertus. Thus Juret's criticiſm (7) falls to the ground, together with the praiſes given him by Father Maimbourg. See the following remark.

[C] Father Maimbourg ſucceſsfully produced an action of this prelate.] He firſt praiſes this prelate. St Hildebert, ſays he (8), biſhop of Mans, and afterwards archbiſhop of Tours, was one of the moſt holy and learned prelates that the Gallican church ever had. ‘We have ſome epiſtles and ſome other fine works of his in the Bibliotheca Patrum. It is he whom St Bernard calls the excellent pontif, and the great pillar of the church; of whom the moſt famous writers ſpeak with the greateſt commendations, and whoſe ſanctity GOD himſelf was pleaſed to declare and honour, by miracles wrought at his tomb. And upon this occaſion I think my ſelf obliged to ſay, that I may give the honour that is due to his memory, that thoſe who have written upon the credit of an epiſtle of Ivo of Chartres, that when Hildebert was made biſhop of Mans, he led a very ſcandalous life, have taken him for another, being miſled by the inſcription of that epiſtle, wherein they have found Hildeberto inſtead of Aldeberto, as it is read in the old copies, as Mouſieur Juret, to whom we owe this important remark, has ſhewn in his learned notes upon Ivo of Chartres.’ After this Maimbourg ſays, that Hildebert was tranſlated from the biſhopric of Mans, to the archbiſhopric of Tours, by Pope Honorius II, in the year 1125, and that having found two canonries in his church which Lewis the Burly had filled during the vacancy of the archbiſhopric, he went himſelf to court to make his his moſt humble remonſtrances to the king (9). He was heard, but being not contented with the ſentence that was pronounced, he demanded a canonical determination; his obſtinacy occaſioned the revenues of his archbiſhopric to be confiſcated. Then he had only recourſe to the moſt ſubmiſſive entreaties, recommending himſelf to a biſhop who was in the king's favour. ‘I do not write to you, ſaid he, * to complain of the king's proceedings, to exaſperate you by my complaints, to raiſe clamours, troubles, ſeditions, and tempeſts againſt the Lord's Anointed, and to demand the rigour and cenſures of the church againſt him. So far from that, I only deſire that you would be ſo kind as to intercede for me, and by your good and charitable offices to prevail with the king, not to exerciſe his anger and indignation againſt a poor biſhop loaded with years, who only deſires to live a quiet life.’ Father Maimbourg does not fail to obſerve, that the king ‘continued in full poſſeſſion and injoyment of his right, and that Pope Honorius, that moſt Holy Pontif and great protector of this archbiſhop, found no fault with it.’ Obſerve how this hiſtorian, in his hiſtory of Lutheraniſm, ſtuffs in an epiſode upon the affair of the Regale, in order to make his court to the king, by decrying the conduct of the biſhop of Pamiers tion of the Regale. The remark I ſhall make upon this ſubject, will contain ſome things relating to our Hildebert's hiſtory. Illyricus has reckoned him among the witneſſes of the truth, becauſe of a very ſmart letter which he wrote againſt the court of Rome [D]. He was of no great birth [E].

---

(11) Called Francis Mauriceau.

(12) See the Leipſic Journal, January 1695, pag. 42.

(1) This letter is 277th. See Menage. Hiſtoire de Sablé, pag. 107.

(2) Notis in Epiſt. 277. Ivonis Carnutenſis.

(3) Menage. Hiſt. de Sablé, pag. 107, 108.

(4) Ibid. pag. 108.

* But perhaps Alberto was put here by contraction for Aldebertus, and perhaps Albertus is the ſame name.

(5) Pag. 310.

(6) In Clypeo naſcentis Fontebraldenſis Ordinis, pag. 62, & 73.

(7) Voſſius, de Hiſtcr. Latin. pag. 404, and after him Moreri, has adopted this criticiſm.

(8) Hiſt. du Lutheraniſme, livr. ii, pag. m. 192.

(9) Ibid. pag. 193.

* Nec tamen hæc loquor tanquam vobis clamorem ſuper Chriſto Domini deponens, tanquam poſtulans Eccleſiaſticæ rigorem diſciplinæ. Subvenire Eccleſiæ & mihi per veſtrum deprecor interventum, & Regi ex charitate ſuggeri, ne ſagittas ſuas in ſene compleat ſacerdote. Hildebert. Epiſt. vi, apud Lucam Dacherium, Tom. XIII, Spicilegii.

miers and Pope Innocent XI. He took the ſame method with reſpect to all the affairs of the time, as he has been upbraided with it in the fourth and fifth letter of the General Criticiſm on his Hiſtory of Calviniſm.

[D] He wrote a very ſmart letter againſt the court of Rome.] It contains a very lively deſcription of the diſorders of that court, and I do not believe that it has loſt any thing of it's ſtrength in Mr du Pleſſis Mornai's French tranſlation of it (10). Hildebert was only biſhop of Mans when he wrote this letter, but when he wrote another to Honorius II, complaining that all cauſes were carried to Rome by way of appeal, he was archbiſhop of Tours. He made a deſcription of Rome in verſe, concluding with theſe words.

Urbs fœlix, ſi vel Dominis urbs illa careret,
Vel Dominis eſſet turpe carere fide.

Happy city, if it had no maſters, or if thoſe maſters were aſhamed of their want of faith. Coëffeteau (11) does not deny that the letter to Honorius is Hildebert's; but he does not think ſo of the other. It is not credible, ſays he, that this epiſtle is his, ſince it is not to be found among thoſe that are printed, nor even among thoſe that are in manuſcript, which we have ſeen amongſt other rare books of Meſſieurs du Puy . . . but alſo becauſe, excepting ſome youthful ſallies of this prelate, we find that he was always very modeſt, and eſpecially very reſpectful to the holy ſee, as we ſhall ſhew by and by (12). And indeed, neither Vignier, nor Illiricus, nor du Pleſſis, mention upon what occaſion it was written. They have only given us a fragment of it without any title or any other marks. It is fit the reader ſhould know what was replyed to this. ‘ If this ‘ will ſerve for a reaſon, we ſhall be double gainers ‘ by it, and ſhall ſhew, by better arguments and teſti‘ monies, the baſeneſs of his party, in forging new ‘ pieces and falſifying old ones. Illyricus finding it a‘ mong others, publiſhed it according to the original, the ‘ ſtyle of which is plainly different from his. If he and ‘ others after him, publiſh it without any title or ar‘ gument, this cannot ſurpriſe thoſe who have ſeen ‘ theſe that are printed, amongſt which there are ‘ many, which it is impoſſible to gueſs to whom they ‘ were written, and to know particularly on what oc‘ caſion (13).’ It is Rivetus who ſpeaks thus: a little after he obſerves that Gretſerus (14) cannot believe that the eighty ſecond epiſtle, wherein he talks of taking away or moderating appeals, could come from Hildebert; though Coëffeteau ſays that is truly his. The curious may conſult Father Hommey's Supplementum Patrum, where there are ſeveral pieces of Hildebert, with notes upon his epiſtles, together with the names of thoſe to whom he wrote them (15).

[E] He was of no great birth.] ‘ There is in the pro‘ vince of Maine, near Montoire, a place called Lavardin, ‘ which has given it's name to a very noble family ‘ of Vendômois . . . . La Croix du Maine in his ‘ Bibliotheque ſays, in the article of James Lavardin, ‘ that Hildebert biſhop of Mans, was of that family; ‘ which is not true. He was born at Lavardin, but ‘ was not of the houſe of Lavardin. He was a man ‘ of a great deal of learning and merit, but of no ‘ birth (16).’ The words of La Croix du Maine are theſe (17), ‘ That houſe of Lavardin (18) has uſually ‘ produced learned men and long ago; for Hildebert, ‘ biſhop of Mans, and afterwards archbiſhop of Tours, ‘ five hundred years ago, was of that houſe, and ſir‘ name, and was reckoned the moſt famous poet and ‘ orator of his time, as his epiſtles and Latin poems ‘ witneſs.’

(10) In the 28oth page of the Myſtere d'Iniquité.

(11) Réponſe au Myſtere d'Iniquité, pag. 757.

(12) He ſays, in the next page, that, in the year 1107, Hildebert, being perſecuted by the king of England, went to conſult Pope Paſchal, and to implore his aſſiſtance, and that having held a ſynod at Nantes, under Pope Honorius, he ſent the acts of that ſynod to the ſaid Pope.

(13) Rivet, Remarques ſur la Réponſe au Myſtere d'Iniquité, Part. II, pag. 240.

(14) In Examine Myſterii Pleſſæani, pag. 376.

(15) See the Acta Eruditor. 1685, pag. 465.

(16) Suite du Menagiana, pag. 103. Dutch Edit.

(17) Bibliotheque Françoiſe, pag. 190.

(18) He ſpeaks of the houſe of Lavardin near Montoire in Vendômois, different from the houſe of Lavardin ſix leagues from Mans, the lords whereof are ſirnamed de Beaumanoir, and are originally of Bretagne.

HILTEN (John) a German Franciſcan pretended to ground ſome predictions upon the book of Daniel in the year 1485 [A]. Melanchthon, who had ſeen the original of that work, ſays, that the author foretold, that in the year 1516 the power of the Pope ſhould begin to decay, and that afterwards it ſhould decline more and more, till it came to it's downfal, and never ſhould riſe again; and that about the year 1600, the Turks ſhould be maſters in Italy and Germany (a) [B]. Some tell us (b) that he foretold that in the year 1600, there ſhould be ſeen a man extreamly cruel, and that in 1606, Gog and Magog ſhould reign over all Europe. After having, with a great deal of

(a) Taken from a letter of Melanchthon to Matheſius. It is the 6th of the 2d book, pag. 259. Edit. London, 1642.

(b) See Paul. Freher. Theatr. pag. 97.

[A] He grounded ſome predictions upon the book of Daniel in the year 1485.] I have met with this date in a paſſage mentioned by Melchior Adam, which teaches us alſo where this fryar had ſtudied. ‘ Ego ‘ olim juvenis, it is Hilten who ſpeaks (1), almæ ma‘ tris Univerſitatis Erphurdenſis alumnus, ardens phi‘ loſophus: nunc ſenex exuli ſolitudini deditus ab an‘ no Chriſti milleſimo quadringenteſimo ſeptuageſimo ‘ primo, in hunc annum milleſimum quadringenteſi‘ mum octogeſimum quintum ejuſdem Domini Jeſu ‘ Chriſti voluntate, qui & me inſtigavit ex ſuo libro ‘ cognoſcere veritatem contra vacuos errores de futuro ‘ tempore nunc volantes. Quam me ſolum ſcire amor ‘ Dei & proximi non finit, ſed & aliis piis & benevo‘ lis impertiri admonet. —— I ſtudied in my youth ‘ in the univerſity of Erfurt, and warmly purſued phi‘ loſophy, but am now in my old age fond of ſolitude, ‘ and retirement, from the year of our Lord 1471, to ‘ this preſent year 1485, it being the will of my Sa‘ viour, who likewiſe excited me to ſeek the knowledge ‘ of the truth from his word, in oppoſition to the vain ‘ errors now propagated concerning future times. ‘ Which truth, the love of GOD, and of my neigh‘ bour, would not allow me to hoard up, but obligeth ‘ me to impart it to the pious and well diſpoſed.’ Notwithſtanding this, Melchior Adam, a few lines before, ſays, that Hilten lived in the XIVth century. This want of attention is very common among writers.

[B] He foretold that the Turks ſhould be maſters in Italy and Germany.] He ſeemed to promiſe that the Turks ſhould be the inſtrument of a wonderful reformation by the ruin of the papacy; but they who ſhould reform, were afterwards to aboliſh Mahometiſm; after which the Roman emperor was to reſign his crown to Jesus Christ never to be reſtored. Ita digerit omnia Calchas (2). It appeared by the event that John Hilten knew no more of the matter than that diviner of the Grecian army. His words are theſe (3) ‘ Plures ‘ gloriantur Romanum Papam eſſe monarcham, quia ‘ Jeſus omnia dedit Petro & ejus ſucceſſoribus. Fa‘ teor, verùm quamdiu ſunt ejus vicarii. Sed legan‘ tur revelationes S. Brigittæ: & videbitur querela ‘ Chriſti de perverſione illius vicariatus. Quapropter ‘ Deus dedit gladium Mahometo, quo monarchiam ‘ illam à vicario ad ejus Dominum Jeſum Chriſtum ‘ compellit, vicariam & omnes Chriſtianos reformando. ‘ Qui plenè reformati exurgent, & delebunt ſectam ‘ Mahometi. Quo facto, ultimus Imperator Romanus ‘ reſignabit cum effectu Jeſu Chriſto coronam regalem ‘ & omne jus Imperiale; non recepturus, ut Conſtan‘ tinus. —— Many boaſt that the Pope is a king, be‘ cauſe CHRIST, gave all things to Peter and his ‘ ſucceſſors. I own this, but this is only while they ‘ are his vicars. Now if we read the revelations of ‘ St Bridget, we ſhall ſee CHRIST's complaints of the ‘ corruption of that Vicar. And for this reaſon GOD ‘ has given the ſword to Mahomet, that he may take ‘ that kingdom from the vicar, and give it back to ‘ it's rightful ſovereign JESUS CHRIST, by re‘ forming his vicar, and all Chriſtians, who being ‘ throughly reformed, ſhall deſtroy the Mahometan ſect. ‘ After this the laſt Roman emperor, ſhall effectually ‘ reſign his royal crown, and imperial title to JESUS ‘ CHRIST never to be reſtored, as did Conſtantine.

[C] Mr du

(1) Apud Melchior. Adam. in Vitis Theol. pag. 3.

(2) Virgil. Æn. lib. ii.

(3) Apud Melch. Adam ubi ſupra, pag. 4.

of pains, endeavoured to find the time of the end of the world (c), he placed it in the year 1651 (d). Mr du Pleſſis Mornai has only taken ſo much of thoſe predictions as ſerved his purpoſe [C]. Hilten was perſuaded that charity did not ſuffer him to ſuppreſs that knowledge which God had given him about things to come (e). It is ſaid that he died in the year 1502 (f).

(c) Multus fuit in exquirendo fine mundi. Melch. Adam. in Vitis Theol. p. 5.

(d) Id. ibid.

(e) See the remark [A].

(f) Freherus, in Theatro, pag. 97.

[C] Mr du Pleſſis has taken only ſo much of thoſe predictions as ſerved his purpoſe.] ‘John Hilten, a monk of Henac in Thuringia, beyond all human foreſight, being put into priſon for having reproved ſome monaſtical abuſes, being very ſick, ſent for the Guardian and told him, I have ſpoke no great matter againſt monkery, but there ſhall come one in the year 1516, who ſhall overturn it, and they ſhall not be able to reſiſt him.’ And in that very year Luther began to preach (4). Du Pleſſis Mornai is miſtaken one year, for the Æra of Lutheraniſm began not till 1517. I believe alſo that he miſtakes the place, and that he ſhould have ſaid Eiſenach inſtead of Henac. He ſhould have added, that the thing happened about the year 1500 according to Melanchthon (5).

(4) Du Pleſſis Mornai, Myſtere d'Iniquité, pag. 573. He quotes Philip Melanchthon, in Apolog. cap. de Votis Monaſticis.

(5) See Micrælius, Syntagma, Hiſt. Eccleſ. pag. 647.

HYPERIUS (ANDREW GERARD) a famous miniſter and profeſſor of Divinity, was born at Ipres in Flanders the ſixteenth of May 1511. He took the name he is known by from the place of his birth (a). His father, who was an advocate, and who had already made him ſtudy in ſeveral places, finding himſelf near his end in the year 1525, recommended it to his wife to ſend him to Paris to continue his ſtudies there. This was done in the year 1528, Hyperius ſtudied Philoſophy there three years together in the college of Calvi; and after a ſhort journey that he made to Ipres, returning to Paris in the year 1532, he ſtudied Divinity till 1535. He afterwards went to Louvain, and made ſeveral journies into ſeveral provinces of the Low-Countries, and into Germany, whereby the attempts his friends had made without his knowledge, to get him a benefice, proved ineffectual; for when it had been repreſented to Carondilet, archbiſhop of Palermo, and chancellor of the emperor, that Hyperius had travelled in Germany, he was ſo ſuſpected of hereſy, that it became neceſſary for him to think of a retreat. He went over into England, and lived above four years with an Engliſh gentleman a lover of learning [A]. He croſſed the ſea again in 1541, with a deſign to ſee the univerſity of Straſburg, and particularly Bucer, who rendered it very famous; but going by the way of the country of Heſſe, he met at Marpurg with Geldenhaur, a profeſſor of Divinity, who was one of his friends, who, to retain him, gave him hopes of an employment in the univerſity of that city. He actually ſtaid there, and a little while after ſucceeded his friend, who died in January 1542. He exerciſed that function ſomewhat more than two years without marrying; but thinking he could not live conveniently without a wife, eſpecially his health being none of the beſt, (a reaſon which would have diſcouraged many others from thinking of it) he married in 1544 (b) a widow, by whom he had ſix ſons and four daughters. He died at Marpurg the firſt of February 1564, having exerciſed the profeſſorſhip in Divinity above 22 years with the greateſt application. He wrote ſeveral books [B], ſome of which were copied by a doctor of Louvian [C]. He

(a) The city of Ipres has been called Hypera by ſeveral authors. Beza, in Iconibus, calls it ſo, and ſays that Andreas Gerardus à patria Hyperius fuit cognominatus.

(b) Animum & matrimonium adjecit quod non putaret ſe commode ſine uxore, maxime cum non ita firmâ valetudine eſſet, vitam tranſigere poſſe. Melch. Adam, in Vitis Theolog. pag. 393.

[A] He lived with an Engliſh gentlemen a lover of Learning.] He was ſon to William Montjoy, whom Eraſmus has ſo much praiſed, and who lay under many obligations to him. ‘In Carolum Montjoium, Guilielmi filium, Baronem incidit (Hyperius) quem Eraſmus Roterodamus ampliſſimè in ſcriptis ſuis ac ſæpè commendat. Is amicè cum Hyperio multis ac variis de rebus collocutus cùm ingenium ejus perſpexiſſet, oblato liberali ſtipendio, domum ſuam eum invitavit, ubi annos quatuor amplius ſuaviſſime Hyperius cum Montjoio vixit in otio literario (1) —— Hyperius accidentally met with Lord Charles Montjoy, ſon to that Lord William whom Eraſmus ſo highly and frequently celebrates in his writings. My Lord having converſed freely with him, and various ſubjects, and ſeeing his genius, invited him to ſtay at his houſe, and offered him very handſome appointments. Here Hyperius continued above four years in the happieſt condition a man of letters could deſire.’ Note that in Freherus's Theatrum (2) we find Monticius inſtead of Montjoius, and that though Eraſmus dedicated his Livy to Montjoy the ſon, and praiſed him in ſome other places, yet thoſe great and frequent praiſes mentioned here can properly belong only to the father. The ſon was very young when Eraſmus died (3).

(1) Melch. Adam in Vita Hyperii, pag. 302, Vitar. Theolog.

(2) Pag. 198.

(3) Vide Eraſmi, Epiſt. xvii, lib. xxvi, & Epiſt. xv. lib. xxviii.

[B] He wrote ſeveral books.] If we may believe Verheiden, Hyperius's writings that are publiſhed would make ſeven volumes in Folio. Some of them concern Rhetoric, Logic, Arithmetic, Geometry, Coſmography, Aſtronomy, Optics, Phyſics, &c. The reſt are either commentaries upon the Scripture, or treatiſes of divinity. His book de recte formando Theologiæ ſtudio, and another, de formandis concionibus ſacris, were ſo well approved by a doctor of Louvain, that he inſerted them almoſt intire in the books he publiſhed upon the ſame ſubject at Antwerp in the year 1565. Hyperius was but a young ſtudent, when he made an oration at Paris (4), which has been ſince printed and which is in praiſe of one of his friends (5).

(4) Quem (Joachimum Ringelbergium) & exquiſita quæ extat oratione ad Senatum Pariſienſem laudavit Hyperius. Verheiden, pag. 95.

(5) Mr Teiſſier, pag. 14, Catalogi Auctorum, ſpeaks of it, as if it was the life of Ringelberg; but he is miſtaken.

[C] Which were copied by a doctor of Louvain.] Valerius Andreas owns it (6). This doctor was a Spaniſh monk of the order of St Auguſtin, named Laurentius à Villavicentio. He is often quoted for a famous plagiary. The firſt author that I have found to take notice of this plagiariſm, was the learned Raynolds; he mentions it in the fourth chapter of the firſt book of his treatiſe de Idololatria Romana printed at Oxford in the year 1516, and he obſerves that this monk corrected in Hyperius's book all that offended the church of Rome. Some time after Keckerman (7) mentioned this ſame theft, owning that Raynolds had obſerved it before. Voëtius (8) ſpoke, of it, quoting Keckerman in a theſis maintained in 1655. But he would have the work which was ſtolen to be Hyperius's method of divinity. Now that method contains only three books, whereas the work that Raynolds, Keckerman, and the bibliographer of the Low-Countries, ſay the Spaniſh monk adopted, contains four, and is commonly quoted by this title de ratione Studii Theologici. Certainly this laſt is not the ſame book with Hyperius's Methodus Theologiæ. We muſt believe that Voëtius has not been altogether exact. Mr Colomiés (9) likewiſe mentons this theft, citing Raynolds. Mr Placius (10) mentions it only upon the credit of one of his friends who wrote to him, that Simon Oomius ſpoke of it in the ſecond preface to a Dutch book; and both he and Mr Konig (11) will have this plagiariſm to relate to the book intituled Methodus Theologiæ. A modern author (12) cites con-

(6) Quicquid boni habent ejuſdem (Hyperii) de formandis ſacris concionibus libri duo, deque rectè formando ſtudio Theologico libri iv. id in ſuos ſimilis argumenti libros tranſtulit Laurentius à Villavicentio ex Ord. Auguſtiniano Doctor Theol. Lovanienſis. Valer. Andr. Bibl. Belg. pag. 49.

(7) In Præcognit. Logic.

---

(8) Diſp. Select. Vol. III, pag. 687. (9) Gall. Oriental. pag. 10. (10) De Pſeudonym. pag. 273. (11) Bibl. pag. 420. See alſo pag. 846, where he quotes Rivetus, Tom. II, Oper. pag. 1095 (it ſhould be pag. 1065), qui vocat Villavicentium Hyperii interpolatorem & expilatorem. (12) Joh. Albertus Faber, Decade Decadum, n. 36. Lipſiæ, 1689.

cerning

He laboured eſpecially to teach the ſtudents in Divinity a good method of preaching. He had a very clear head; and beſides his ſkill in the Languages, Hiſtory, Philoſophy, and Divinity, he had an excellent art of teaching. He had exerciſed that talent very early; for when he ſtudied at Paris, he aſſiſted many other ſcholars. He was modeſt at entertainments, affable and polite in converſation; and as much as he hated immoderate cups [D], and that idle buffoonry, which is too frequent in converſation, ſo he delighted in well ordered entertainments, and agreeable diſcourſe. In a word, he was a man of a very elegant turn of wit, attended with virtue and zeal. Thoſe who would know more of him, may read the writers I quote (c). There is ſome difference between Verheiden's and Melchior Adam's account [E]. I can ſcarce believe that Hyperius had been a monk [F]. Part of his books were not publiſhed till after his death [G], by the care either of Laurence Hyperius, his ſon, or of John Mylius (d).

(c) Wigandus Orthius, in Oratione Funebri Hyperii. Melch. Adam. in Vita Hyperii, which is but an abſtract of the Funeral Oration. Verheiden Præſtant. aliquot Theol. Effig. pag. 95.

(d) Verheiden, Præſtant. aliquot Theolog. Effig. pag. 95.

cerning this plagiariſm, not only Keckerman and Colomiés, but alſo John Heilfeld cap. 25. Sphingis Theologico-Philoſophicæ. It is to be obſerved, that none of theſe authors, except Valerius Andreas, ſpeaks of the double plagiariſm of the Spaniſh monk; they only obſerve that which relates to the book intituled de Studio Theologico. But, on the other hand, Nicolas Antonio does not only ſay, that Villavicentius took all that he thought good in two books of Hyperius, to make two others upon the ſame ſubject; but beſides, aſcribes to him the ſame conduct with reſpect to two other books publiſhed by Proteſtants, one is de Phraſibus ſacræ Scripturæ; the other is, Tabulæ compendioſæ in Evangelia & Epiſtolas. Note, that he has added ſome faults to thoſe of Valerius Andreas. Like him (13) he will have Hyperius to have been a Dominican: To this he has added other errors of his own, I. By giving Hyperius the name of Hiſperius. II. By allowing but three books to the treatiſe de formando Studio Theologico. III. In making his treatiſe de formandis ſacris Concionibus, to contain three book, whereas in contains only two.

[D] He hated immoderate cups.] See what his funeral oration ſays it (14); 'In colloquiis & converſationibus humanus & æquus, & quemadmodum immania 'illa in conviviis hominum pocula, & ſcurriles in colloquiis nugas ex animo fuit averſatus, ita moderatis 'conviviis, jucundiſque amicorum confabulationibus 'nonnunquam interfuit.'

[E] There is ſome difference between Verheiden's and Melchior Adam's account.] Verheiden has given us only a very ſhort elogy; but the account which the other gives is more hiſtorical, and the times more diſtinctly marked. The latter, does not ſay that Hyperius travelled into Spain: he only ſays that he ſaw the provinces of Italy between the Alps and Bologna; and that he ſaw them during his ſtudies in Paris, and before his journey to Louvain. Verheiden, on the contrary, pretends that Hyperius travelled into Spain and Italy, after having ſtudied at Paris and Louvain. He makes him firſt teach Philoſoſophy at Marpurg, and afterwards Divinity. Melchior Adam ſays nothing of his profeſſing Philoſophy.

ERRORS of Moreri and Valerius Andreas.

[F] I can ſcarce believe that Hyperius had been a monk.] The extract of his funeral oration does not ſpeak of it: we may be ſure then that Wigandus Orthius has not ſaid it; for ſuch a fact, good Melchior Adam would not have paſſed over in ſilence, even though he had given but a ſhort extract, and not a long relation filled with a hundred particularities. However I would not truſt to that reaſon; I have ſought and at laſt found Wigandus Orthius's oration, and I can ſee nothing in it that can give me any ſuſpicion that Hyperius was ever of any religious order. Hence I conclude, that he never was a monk. Let it not be objected to me that this is a negative argument: I do not pretend to plead the cauſe of that way of arguing (15); but I dare ſay it appears here concluſive, both becauſe he who compoſed Hyperius's funeral oration, could not be ignorant whether he had been a monk or not, and becauſe if he knew it, all the reaſon in the world obliged him to obſerve it. No body ever thought of concealing theſe ſort of truths concerning Muſculus, Marlorat, Peter Martyr, Zanchius, and many other other pillars of the growing reformation, who came from the cloiſters, and there could not be perhaps a man more incapable of ſilence upon things of this nature than Orthius. He who thought himſelf obliged to tell in a funeral oration, that Hyperius went to wait for his baggage at Marpurg, becauſe he knew he could live cheaper there than in any other place on the banks of the Rhine (16). He tells you a hundred particulars of the ſame importance, which Melchior Adam has faithfully copied. And therefore I do not ſee that Moreri could ſay, without being miſtaken, that Hyperius was a monk of the order of St Dominic, in which he diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his learning; but that he afterwards baſely apoſtatized. In this he has been only the tranſcriber of Valerius Andreas, who had told that lie before. This bibliographer of the Low-Countries, who is beſides miſtaken in placing Hyperius's death in the year 1560, is not excuſable for not having ſaid at leaſt, that Hyperius had been a miniſter at Marpurg; and Moreri who has ſaid this (17) ought to be blamed for his ſilence about his profeſſing divinity. His want of exactneſs appears alſo in this expreſſion. He fell into the errors of Luther which he taught. To what end is this laſt remark expreſſed in an indeterminate manner. Was it not enough for him to have given him the title of a Proteſtant miniſter in the firſt line of the article? Would not this ſufficiently import that Hyperius taught the Proteſtant doctrine? Beſides, it is not true that he followed the reformation of Luther: the Index of prohibited books (18) might have inſtructed Mr Moreri in that point.

[G] Part of his books were not publiſhed till after his death.] Conſult the epitome of Geſner where you will find that ſeveral of Hyperius's works were printed in his life-time; ſo that I do not ſee that he can be alledged as an inſtance of that ſingular modeſty, which makes an author defer the publication of his writings till after his death, that he may not be an ear-witneſs of his own praiſes. This ought to be obſerved by thoſe who read in Mr Selden (19) what I am going to quote. 'Cujus (contemptus famæ vel glo-'riæ propriæ) illuſtre exemplum antehac præbuit 'Theologus ſua ætate celeberrimus Andreas Hyperius, 'de quo teſtis eſt Juſtus Vultejus (20), quod ideo 'poſt mortem demum in lucem prodire ſua voluerit, 'quia gloriam ſibi nullam, nec vulgi applauſus iis cap-'tabat. Hos enim (inquit) ſi tanti faciendos eſſe pu-'taſſet, utique vivo ei frui illis licuiſſet. —— Andrew 'Hyperius a famous divine, in the age in which he 'lived, gave an illuſtrious example of this contempt of 'praiſe and perſonal honours; for, as Juſtus Vulterius 'relates, he deſired that his works might be publiſhed 'after his death, becauſe he did not deſire any glory 'or popular applauſe that might ariſe from them. If '(ſays he) he had put any value upon theſe things, 'he might have enjoyed them during his life.'

(13) Nic. Anton. Biblioth. Hiſpan. Tom. II, pag. 9.

(14) Apud Melch. Adam. in Vitis Theol. pag. 397.

(15) Mr de Launoi has writ ſome books concerning the authority of negative arguments, and Mr Thiers among others oppoſed his opinion.

(16) Sciebat enim minoris ſe apud Cattos interea poſſe vivere, quàm uſpiam ad Rheni ripas.

(17) He has given a falſe name to the town, calling it Marburge.

(18) The following words are to be found in it, pag. 16, of the edition in folio, 1667. Andreas Hyperius, ſeu Hypperius, Theologus Calvino-Zuinglianus, Profeſſor Marpurgenſis. Konig, Bibliotheque, pag. 420, calls him a Reformed Divine; who, according to the ſtyle of the German Proteſtants, is the ſame as Calviniſtical Divine.

(19) De Libris, & eorum Lectione, pag. 47.

(20) Vultej. in Dedic. Oper. Hyper. præfix.

HIPPARCHIA, wife to the Philoſopher Crates, was ſo charmed with the diſcourſes of that Cynic, that ſhe was reſolved to marry him at any rate. She ſaw herſelf ſurrounded by a great many admirers, diſtinguiſhed by their nobility, riches, and the genteelneſs of their perſons. She was preſſed by her family to make choice of a huſband amongſt thoſe rivals; but nothing could bring her off from Crates. She declared that ſhe valued him above all the world, and that if ſhe had him not, ſhe would ſtab herſelf. The family, upon this declaration, addreſſed themſelves to Crates, intreating him to uſe his eloquence and authority with her, to cure her of her paſſion. He did all that was poſſible, without gaining any thing upon her obſtinacy. At laſt when he ſaw all his arguments and counſels were of no weight, he diſplaid his poverty before her [A], he diſcovered his crooked back, he laid his ſtaff, his wallet, and his cloak upon the ground, ſaying to her, See here the man that you will have, and the goods that you will find with him; conſider well of it, you cannot become my wife without leading the life which our ſect preſcribes. He had ſcarce made an end of ſpeaking, when ſhe declared, that condition infinitely pleaſed her. She took the habit of the order, I mean the equipage of the Cynics, and ſtuck ſo cloſe to Crates, that ſhe followed him every where, went to feaſts with him [B], and made no ſcruple to pay him the conjugal duty in the middle of the ſtreets [C]. It was one of the tenets of that ſect that we ought not to be aſhamed of any bodily exerciſe which nature requires of us [D]. Hipparchia being at dinner one day

---

[A] Crates diſplaid his poverty before her.] No body has deſcribed this with ſo much exactneſs as Apuleius: he tells us that Hipparchia anſwered, that ſhe had ſufficiently conſidered that affair, and was perſuaded it was impoſſible to find a handſomer or a richer husband than Crates; and that he might lead her where he pleaſed. He led her to the Portico. It was one of the moſt ſumptuous public buildings, and the moſt frequented of all Athens, and there he conſummated the marriage. All the people might have ſeen it, and the ſpouſe was reſolved to entertain the company with that ſhew; but a friend of Crates ſpread his cloak about them, and by that means made a ſort of a curtain, which skreened them from the view of the ſpectators. To ſhew that I lend nothing to my author, I will ſet down his words. ‘ Adeoque is (Crates) cupiebatur; ut virgo nobilis, ſpretis junioribus procis, ultro eum ſibi optaverit. Cumque interſcapilium Crates retexiſſet, quod erat aucto gibbere, peramque cum baculo & pallium humi poſuiſſet, eamque ſuppellectilem ſibi eſſe puellæ profiteretur, eamque formam quam viderat: proinde ſedulò conſuleret, ne poſt querelæ cauſam caperet: enimverò Hipparche conditionem accipit. Jamdudum ſibi proviſum ſatis, & ſatis conſultum reſpondit: neque ditiorem maritum, neque formoſiorem uſpiam gentium poſſe invenire. Proinde duceret quò liberet. Ducit Cynicus in porticum. Ibidem, in loco celebri, coram luce clariſſimâ accubuit: coramque virginem imminuiſſet, paratam pari conſtantiâ; ni Zeno procinctu palliaſtri, à circumſtantis coronæ obtutu magiſtrum in ſecreto defendiſſet (1). Mr Menage (2) affirms that Clemens Alexandrinus ſays, that the wedding of Crates and Hipparchia was celebrated in the Portico called ποικίλη: but it is certain Clemens does not ſay it: We only can infer it from his words. In honour of Hipparchia, ſays he (3), the Cynogamia were celebrated in the Pœcile. The word Cynogamia ſignified, according to Mr Menage (4), a feaſt which the Cynics kept to the honour and memory of Crates's marriage. He adds, that Mr Petit the Phyſician has made a fine poem upon the amours aud nuptials of this Cynic. The poem is intituled, Cynogamia. Many will call to mind here a French verſe, mentioned by Furetiere, Voulurent chauds de reins faire noces de chien (5).

[B] She went to feaſts with him.] This, and the cuſtom of rambling about with Crates, were two things not practiſed by the other Grecian women. They were ſhut up in the remoteſt part of the houſe, and were viſited by none but their relations, and never went to a feaſt but at the houſes of their relations. Cornelius Nepos, who relates this, obſerves that the Romans had quite contrary cuſtoms. Women lived then at Rome, as they do now at Paris. The mode of Italy has very much changed: it has for a long time reſembled that of ancient Greece. Altri tempi, altri coſtumi. - - - - Different times, different manners. Let us ſee the words of Cornelius Nepos (6): ‘ Quem Romanorum pudet uxorem ducere in convivium? Aut cujus materfamilias non primum locum tenet ædium, atque in celebritate verſatur? Quod multo fit aliter in Græcia. Nam neque in convivium adhibetur, niſi propinquorum: neque ſedet niſi in interiore parte ædium, quæ γυναικωνίτης appellatur: quò nemo accedit niſi propinqua cognatione conjunctus. —— What Roman (ſays he) is aſhamed to carry his wife to a feaſt? Or whoſe wife doth not live in the principal apartment, and in the view of the world? In Greece it is quite otherwiſe. For there a wife is never carried to a feaſt, except in the houſes of her relations: and ſhe never ſits in any other but the remoteſt part of the houſe; to which none approach but near relations.’

[C] She made no ſcruple of paying the conjugal duty in the middle of the ſtreets.] We ſhall not wonder that this philoſophical lady, Hipparchia, ſet herſelf above cuſtom, with reſpect to the two points I have mentioned, when ſhe was able to trample upon decorum with reſpect to the third. The contempt of cuſtom cannot be carried farther. This was a great triumph of love, ſhe ſacrificed to it the virtue that is moſt natural to the fair ſex, that ſhame, or that modeſty, which is a thouſand times deeper rooted in the heart of women, than chaſtity itſelf. And what is more ſtrange, Hipparchia was prepared for this impudence all at once; there was no need of leading her to it by degrees. Juvenal obſerves that when the buſineſs is to ſatisfy love, nothing appears difficult to women. Are they to go on ſhip-board with their husbands whom they do not like, they know not how to reſolve upon it; the dangers and fatigue of the ſea are inſupportable. But are they to embark with a gallant, they have the beſt ſtomach in the world for it, and a Tarpaulin's life is a pleaſure to them.

> Fortem animum præſtant rebus quas turpiter audent.
> Si jubeat conjux durum eſt conſcendere navim,
> Tunc ſentina gravis, tunc ſummus vertitur aër:
> Quæ mœchum ſequitur ſtomacho valet. Illa maritum
> Convomit hæc inter nautas & prandet & errat
> Per puppem, & duros gaudet tractare rudentes (7).

Hipparchia juſtifies this obſervation; ſhe doted upon Crates; he would have her to ſhake off all ſhame, non aliter hæc ſacra conſtant, ſaid he to her in all likelihood: ſhe was ſatisfied to do it to gratify him. Many authors report the fact. Sextus Empiricus (8) and Theodoret (9) witneſs it; I have already cited others But St Auguſtin had a very ſingular thought upon this ſubject; he believed that the Cynics uſed only poſtures and vain efforts. ‘ Illum (Diogenem) vel illos qui hoc feciſſe referuntur, potius arbitror concumbentium motus dediſſe oculis hominum neſcientium quid ſub pallio gereretur, quàm humano premente conſpectu potuiſſe illam peragi voluptatem. Ibi enim Philoſophi non erubeſcebant videri ſe velle concumbere, ubi libido ipſa erubeſceret ſurgere (10) ——— As for Diogenes and ſome others, who are ſaid to have done ſo, I imagine that they rather imitated the motions of lovers, before people who knew not what was tranſacted under the cloak, than that they were able really to conſummate. For here Philoſophers did not bluſh to deſire to be thought to do, what luſt itſelf bluſhed to enable them to perform.’ A modern has ſet up for a Cato againſt this father of the church, and has given him a ſevere reprimand for that thought. ‘ When St Auguſtin adds, ſays he, that he cannot believe that Diogenes and thoſe of his ſect, who are reported to have done every thing in public, enjoyed a true and real pleaſure there; he thinks they only imitated, under the Cynic cloak, the motions of thoſe who lye together, impoſing by that means upon the eyes of the ſpectators. Tho' they in effect were not able to do any thing to purpoſe. I am aſhamed to mention this, and I deſire you to read his own words (11) . . . . . How could ſo great a man allow his imagination the liberty of diving into thoſe Cynical ſecrets? How could St Auguſtin's hand lift up Diogenes's cloak, to let us ſee ſome motions, which ſhame (tho' that Philoſopher profeſſed to have none) made him hide with his own cloak (12).’

[D] We ought not to be ſhamed of any bodily exerciſe which nature requires of us.] See what was ſaid above in the Remark [L] of the article DIOGENES. Some think the Cynics had their name, becauſe like dogs they lay with their wives in the ſtreets: ‘ Nam quid ego de Cynicis loquar: quibus in propatulo day at Lyſimachus's with the Atheiſt Theodorus, made a ſubtle objection to him, to which

---

(1) Apuleius, in Floridis, pag. m. 350.

(2) In Hiſtoria Mulierum Philoſopharum, ad calcem Diogen. Laërt. pag 497.

(3) Ἐφ᾽ ᾗ καὶ τὰ κυνογάμεια ἐν τῇ ποικίλῃ ἐτετέλεστο. Propter quam in Pœcile quoque celebrata fuere Cynogamia. Clem. Alexand. Stromat. lib. iv, pag. 523.

(4) In Laërt. lib. vi, n. 96.

(5) At the word Rein. This is a verſe of Reignier, which relates to the fight of the Lapithæ.

(6) In Præfat.

(7) Juvenal. Sat. VII, ver. 97.

(8) Pyrrhoniarum Hypotypoſeon, lib. i, cap. xiv, pag. m 31, & lib. iii, cap. xxiv, pag 152.

(9) Serm. XII, de Virtute Activa.

(10) De Civitate Dei, lib. xiv, cap. xx.

(11) Here he ſets down the words of St Auguſtin.

(12) La Mothe Vayer, Hexameron Ruſtique, pag. 63, 64, 65.

‘patulo coïre cum conjugibus mos fuit. Quid mirum ſi à canibus quorum vitam imitantur, etiam vocabulum nomenque traxerunt (13)?’ The Cynics pretended they acted agreeably to reaſon, for, ſaid they, if it be lawful to know one's wife, it is lawful to know her in public: but it is lawful to know one's wife, therefore it is lawful to know her in public. ‘Hoc illi canini Philoſophi, hoc eſt Cynici non viderunt proſerentes contra humanam verecundiam, quid aliud quam caninam hoc eſt immundam impudentemque ſententiam, ut ſcilicet quoniam juſtum eſt quod fit in uxore, palam non pudeat id agere, nec in vico, nec in platea qualibet, conjugalem concubitum devitare (14).’ I have obſerved elſewhere (15) a like argument of Diogenes. It is the wretched ſophiſm, a dicto ſimpliciter ad dictum ſecundum quid. It is as if one ſhould ſay; it is good to drink wine, therefore it is good to drink it in a fever. Theſe people did not know that there are many actions that are good only in certain circumſtances, the omiſſion of which may render an action evil, which with them would have been good. To lend money to a friend in order to pay his debts is a very commendable action: but to lend it him to make himſelf drunk, or to game, is an evil action. There are ſome actions eſſentially evil; which cannot be good under any circumſtances whatſoever, but there are ſome things which are good or evil according to the times, and places, and other circumſtances, wherein they are done. I confeſs that this is not ſufficient to non-plus the Cynics; for they might turn their argument thus. When a thing is good and lawful in itſelf, one ought not to be aſhamed of doing it: but the conjugal duty is in itſelf a thing good and lawful; and therefore one ought not to be aſhamed of paying it: and conſequently it may be lawfully paid in public. For if any thing could vitiate that public action, it would be only want of ſhame in circumſtances, wherein men are obliged to have it. The difficulty then is reduced to this one queſtion. Ought one to be aſhamed of paying the conjugal duty in the face of the world? A pretty queſtion, you will ſay; who doubts it? Diogenes would anſwer, I do, and do you prove that I am in the wrong. The anſwer to him would be, that ſhame, with relation to theſe actions is a natural impreſſion, and that therefore it is to offend againſt nature not to be aſhamed in theſe occurrences. But, he would reply, that if it were a natural impreſſion, the animals, which ſo faithfully follow the inſtincts of nature, would ſeek ſhades and dark receſſes for the work of generation. Now nothing is more falſe than this. At leaſt all men would in the like caſes ſeek the darkeſt retreats, which is likewiſe falſe; for many people in the Indies propagate in the ſight of all the world. This is what the famous Pyrrhoniſt Sextus Empiricus obſerves, in order to ſhew, that the common practice is not grounded upon an immutable and eternal law of nature, but upon a meer cuſtom, and the impreſſion of education. Τὸ δημοσίᾳ γυναικὶ μίγνυσθαι καίτοι παρ' ἡμῖν αἰσχρὸν εἶναι δοκοῦν, παρά τισι τῶν Ἰνδῶν οὐκ αἰσχρὸν εἶναι νομίζεται· μίγνυνται οὖν ἀδιαφόρως δημοσίᾳ καθάπερ καὶ περὶ τοῦ φιλοσόφου Κράτητος ἀκηκόαμεν. Publice cum uxore congredi quamvis apud nos turpe eſſe videatur, apud quoſdam ex Indis non videtur eſſe turpe. Congrediuntur enim indifferenter publice, quemadmodum etiam de Cratete Philoſopho accepimus (16). He might have alledged the cuſtom of the MOSYNIANS, whoſe article may be ſeen. A modern author has obſerved, that ſome nations have made love ‘even in the temples, and ſaid, that if that action diſpleaſed the deity, he would not ſuffer it in other animals (17).’ He adds, that ‘a Mahometan ſect practiſes the ſame at this day, and that the new world appeared to us in that innocence.’ It might be replied to Diogenes, that it is enough that the civilized nations are ſubject to ſhame, and that it is nothing to us what the barbarous nations do; but he would reply in his turn, that the people we call barbarous, have leſs departed from the rule of nature, than the people who have ſo much multiplied by their ſubtilties of wit, the laws of decency and civility; and that in fine, natural rights not being ſubject to preſcription, every one may lawfully repoſſeſs himſelf of it in all times and places, without any regard to the arbitrary yoke of cuſtoms, and the opinion of his fellow-citizens.

A Reflexion upon the weakneſs of reaſon.

This ſhews how many different ways human reaſon may lead us aſtray. It was given us to direct us in the right way; but it is a deſultory, wavering, and ſupple inſtrument, which turned every way like a weather-cock. See how the Cynics made uſe of it to juſtify their abominable impudence. I may add, for the honour and glory of the true religion, that it alone furniſhes us with ſtrong weapons againſt the ſophiſtry of theſe people; for though we could not ſhew in Scripture, any formal precept, for hiding the privacies of marriage in the dark, it ſuffices to ſay, in the firſt place, that the ſpirit of the Scripture engages us to avoid whatever may weaken the impreſſions of ſhame; and ſecondly, that there are preciſe texts, forbidding us to do any thing that ſhocks decency, or ſcandalizes our neighbour. I do not know whether any of the Caſuiſts, who have ſo much abuſed their leiſure in examining many caſes of conſcience, in ſome reſpects metaphyſical, have ever thought to what kind of crime the impudence of a Crates, or of a Diogenes, ought to be reduced. They did not believe there was any divine law about it, nor that a man was obliged to conform to municipal cuſtoms. They believed that non-conformity in ſuch caſes would at moſt incur the blame of ruſticity, and want of complaiſance to a received cuſtom: to be incivil, ill-bred, and an ill obſerver of faſhions, is not a criminal or evil action, morally ſpeaking. What then can be ſaid againſt the Cynics, unleſs they be condemned by revealed truth? I have never read any thing whatever upon this point, and I do not know whether any one has ſaid, that at preſent a Cynical action would only be criminal:

1. Becauſe of the ſcandal given to one's neighbour.
2. Becauſe of the contempt of the municipal cuſtoms.
3. Becauſe of the negligence of preſerving the barriers of chaſtity.

I ſuppoſe a man perſuaded that the action in itſelf is not expreſly forbidden in ſcripture, nor contrary to the law of nature. If it was contrary to it, the ſentences that command a congreſs, would be ſo many crimes chargeable upon the judges.

There are, no doubt, ſome Caſuiſts who will take ſelf-pollution which Diogenes was guilty of in the public market-place (18), to be a greater crime than this congreſs of Crates and Hipparchia. It is a very ſtrange and ſcandalous thing, to ſee Chryſippus, that celebrated and rigid Stoic, praiſe that infamous action of Diogenes. Ἐπαινεῖ τὸν Διογένην τὸ αἰδοῖον ἀποτειβόμενον ἐν φανερῷ, καὶ λέγοντα πρὸς τοὺς παρόντας, εἴθε καὶ τὸν λιμὸν οὕτως ἀποτρίψασθαι τῆς γαστρὸς ἠδυνάμην. Diogenem laudat qui in publico maſturbaſſet, dixiſſetque adſtantibus, utinam liceret ſic etiam famem attrito ventre pellere (19). That Cynic could not have juſtified himſelf by his ſophiſm, It is lawful to pay the conjugal debt, therefore it is lawful to pay it in the ſtreet; for his action is bad both in public and private. Sextus Empiricus owns, that it was looked upon as deteſtable, though Zeno, the founder of the Stoics, had approved it, and many others had recourſe to it as a good action. Τότε αἰσχρουργεῖν ἐπόρατον ὂν παρ' ἡμῖν, ὁ Ζήνων οὐκ ἀποδοκιμάζει καὶ ἄλλους δὲ ὡς ἀγαθῷ τινὶ τούτῳ χρῆσθαι τῷ κακῷ πυνθανόμεθα. Quum praeterea deteſtabile ſit apud nos αἰσχρουργεῖν, Zeno approbat & alios quoſdam ut bono quodam hoc uſos malo accepimus (20). Diogenes made uſe of another ſophiſm; he took what is done by ſome fiſh for a dictate of nature (21): but the ſophiſm is no better than what one might draw from the practice of the Lydians. For the reſt, the Cynics in vain ſought out arguments to colour their abominable impudence. They durſt not continue in it. The public indignation was probably a ſtronger bridle for them, than the ideas of virtue. St Auguſtin obſerves, that at laſt natural modeſty got the better of this ſort of people. ‘Vicit tamen pudor naturalis opinionem hujus erroris, nam etſi perhibent, hoc aliquando gloriabundum feciſſe Diogenem, ita putantem ſectam ſuam nobiliorem futuram, ſi in hominum memoriam inſignior ejus impudentia figeretur, poſtea tamen à Cynicis fieri ceſſatum eſt: pluſque valuit pudor ut erubeſcerent homines hominibus, quàm error, ut homines canibus eſſe ſimiles affectarent (22). —— But at laſt natural modeſty got the better of this error, for though we are told that Diogenes ſometimes oſtentatiouſly did ſo, thinking that his ſect which he gave no verbal anſwer [E], but had recourſe to his hands, and whatever he could do and ſay afterwards, he found a woman very reſolute, and afraid of nothing (a). She wrote ſome books, which are not come to us [F]. Mr Moreri has committed ſome faults in her article [G]; and ſo has Lorenzo Craſſo [H]. I forgot to ſay, that Hipparchia

---

(13) Lactantius, lib. iii, cap. xv, Divin. Inſtitut.

(14) Auguſt. de Civit. Dei, lib. xiv, cap. xx.

(15) See, above, remark [E] of the article DIOGENES the Cynic.

(16) Sext. Empiricus, Pyrrhon. Hypot. lib. iii, cap. xxiv, pag. 152.

(17) La Mothe le Vayer, Dialog. d'Oraſius Tubero, pag. m. 156. He quotes Herodotus, lib. ii.

(18) See his article, remark [L].

(19) Plutarh de Stoicor. Repugn. pag. 1044.

(20) Sextus Empiricus, Pyrrhon. Hypoth. lib. iii, cap. xxiv, pag. 153.

(21) See his article, citat. (73).

(22) De Civit. Dei, lib. xiv, cap xx.

(a) Taken from Diogenes Laërt. in Hipparchia, lib. vi, n. 96, & ſeq.

‘ ſect would be more famous by fixing this extraordinary ‘ impudence of his in mens memoirs, yet afterwards the ‘ Cynics laid aſide this practice. And ſhame was of ‘ more force to make men bluſh in the preſence of men, ‘ than error, to make men affect to be like dogs.’ But as there are always ſome exceptions to the moſt general rules, we ſee, in Lucian, the Cynic Peregrinus coming near the conduct of Diogenes. Ἐν πολλῷ δὲ τῶν περιεστώτων δήμῳ ἀναφλῶν τὸ αἰδοῖον, καὶ τὸ ἀδιάφορον δὴ τοῦτο καλούμενον ἐπιδεικνύμενος. Multa autem in corona populi pudenda contrectabat, & hæc indifferentia vocans oſtentabat (23).

(23) Lucian. de Morte Peregr. pag. m. 767, Tom. II.

AN Obſervation for thoſe who may be offended at what I have now related.

They who may think it ſtrange, that I ſhould mention ſuch horrible obſcenities, ought to be reminded of the privileges or duties of an hiſtorian. Whoever at preſent writes the hiſtory, either of an ancient philoſopher, or of any other perſon who has acquired a name in preceding ages, has a right to relate whatever he finds in books concerning them, whether it deſerves the praiſe, or the horror and execration of the reader; and if he ſhould be contented to collect only what is commendable, he would very ill diſcharge the duties which the nature of his work requires of him. In writing the life of a modern, there is more liberty allowed; for if he has committed filthy actions, which are unknown to the world, they may be paſſed over in ſilence, according as one thinks it neceſſary to prevent ſome inconveniencies, that might ariſe from the publication of ſuch things. But when the queſtion is about a fact mentioned by a hundred authors, we are no longer maſters of the like caution; and if one chooſes to ſuppreſs it, it is an uſeleſs ſcruple, ſince the readers will eaſily find ſome other way, what you are ſo induſtrious to conceal from them. The impudence of Diogenes the Cynic, is ſo well known in the world, that ſome jeſts go about of him, which are not founded on the teſtimony of any ancient writer. ‘ Du Mouſtier put me in mind of a book of ‘ the ſame Orleans, intituled, The human plant to the ‘ Queen: it is a ridiculous title, which makes me re‘member Diogenes's Planto Hominem (24).’ Theſe words are cardinal du Perron's. Abundance of people tell the ſame thing in their common converſations. It is found in ſeveral books, where it is ſaid, that Diogenes embracing a woman in the middle of the ſtreets, being asked what he did? anſwered, φυτεύω ἄνθρωπον, I plant a man. No ancient that I know of, tells this ſtory, and Mr du Rondel, whom I have conſulted upon it, anſwered me, that he had never found it but in modern authors. Now when a ſtory ſo ill grounded, about the impudence of this ancient Philoſopher is ſo generally known; it is not likely that people ſhould be ignorant of what has been ſaid of him by the authors whom I quote. To what end then ſhould I ſuppreſs theſe facts? You ought at leaſt, you will ſay, to make uſe of expreſſions which may veil theſe infamous actions. I anſwer, that this would be the way to diminiſh the horror they deſerve; for theſe delicate and diſguiſed phraſes which are now commonly uſed in ſpeaking of impurities, do not give ſo much diſguſt as more natural and ſtrong expreſſions, and thereby more apt to raiſe our indignation, would do; let not an author therefore amuſe himſelf with inventing ambiguous expreſſions, which, properly ſpeaking, are only a covering to the deformity of theſe actions. I add, that it is more uſeful and important than people are aware of, to mention the horrible abominations which the Pagan Philoſophers approved. This may humble and mortify human reaſon, and convince us of the infinite corruption of the heart of man, and teach us a truth, of which we ſhould be always mindful, namely, that man wanted a revealed light to ſupply the defect of the philoſophical; for you ſee, that the Stoics (25), who cultivated morality beyond the other Philoſophers, and had very ſublime ideas of it, did neverthele ſs approve of the impudent obſcenities of Diogenes. To them we may particularly apply the general declaration of St Paul againſt the Heathens, Thinking themſelves wiſe, they became fools (26).

(24) Perronina at the word Orleans, pag. m. 225.

(25) See, above, citat. (19) and (20).

(26) Romans, chap. i, ver. 22.

[E] Hipparchia made an objection to which the Atheiſt Theodorus gave no verbal anſwer.] It was a ſophiſm eaſy to be reſolved and retorted. If I did, ſaid ſhe, the ſame action which you could juſtly do, I could not be accuſed of having done an unjuſt action: Now if you ſhould beat yourſelf, you would do juſtly; therefore if I beat you, I cannot be accuſed of having done an unjuſt action. Theodorus did not ſtand to anſwer her as a Logician; he threw himſelf upon her, and untied her gown. According to the preſent way of dreſſing and ſpeaking, we might ſay, he took up her coats. This is the explication which Mr Menage (27) gives theſe words of Diogenes Laërtius, ἀνέσυρε δ᾽ αὐτῆς θοἰμάτιον. Here is a briſk and gallant way of anſwering the ſophiſtry of a woman. Hipparchia was not out of countenance, and Theodorus having cited a verſe of a tragedy, deſcribing a woman who had quitted the ſpindle and the diſtaff, ſhe anſwered him, I ſee my own character there, I am that woman; but do you think I have made an ill choice, rather to ſpend my time in philoſophizing, than in ſpinning? Let us now ſee what Theodorus might have anſwered her, if he would have given himſelf the trouble. Anſwering directly, he might have ſaid, that the action of Theodorus beating himſelf, and that of Hipparchia beating Theodorus, were two different actions, and not one action of the ſame ſpecies. There were therefore four terms in Hipparchia's ſyllogiſm. To the end that two actions may be alike, it is requiſite there ſhould be the ſame relation in both, betwixt the agent and the patient; but ſuch a relation was not to be found in Hipparchia's hypotheſis. If Theodorus had choſen to anſwer by way of retortion, and puzzle Crates's wife he might have done it thus: If I do the ſame action which your huſband might lawfully do, I cannot be accuſed of an unjuſt action. But your huſband acts lawfully when he kiſſes you, &c. therefore if I kiſs you, &c. I cannot be accuſed of doing an unjuſt action. One might have ſeen whether Hipparchia, who was a brazen faced woman, durſt have anſwered him, before witneſſes, Concedo totum.

(27) Notis ad Laërt. lib. vi, n. 97, pag. 266.

[F] She wrote ſome books which are not now extant.] Suidas ſays ſhe compoſed Hypotheſes Philoſophicas: Epicheremata quædam, & Queſtiones ad Theodorum cognomento Atheum. Mr Menage's conjecture is very probable, that we muſt read in Diogenes Laërtius (28), not Φέρεται δὲ τοῦ Κράτητος βιβλίον ἐπιστολαί, but φέρεται δὲ πρὸς τὸν Κράτητα βιβλίον ἐπιστολαί. According to this conjecture, we muſt ſay, that Hipparchia publiſhed ſome letters which ſhe had written to her huſband, in which ſhe philoſophized nobly, and in a ſtile reſembling Plato's. We muſt likewiſe ſay, that ſhe writ ſome tragedies, in which ſhe employed the elevated philoſophical ſtile. It would be very ſtrange, that Diogenes Laërtius, who wrote the life of Crates, ſhould ſpeak of his writings in the life of Hipparchia. To clear him from ſuch an incongruity, Mr Menage has made the conjecture above mentioned.

(28) In Hipparchia, lib. vi, n. 98.

[G] Mr Moreri has committed ſome faults.] He ſhould not have ſaid, that Hipparchia's love for learning made her prefer Crates before all her other ſuitors. It was Crates's perſon ſhe was in love with, and it was her love for him that made her a Philoſopher. It is true, he had charmed her by his fine and learned diſcourſes; but we cannot from this conclude, that her preference of this Philoſopher, before any other man, was founded upon her love of learning. There have been maids and women, who have fallen in love with miniſters in hearing them preach, and have married them, preferably to more advantageous matches. The learning and eloquence of theſe miniſters was indeed the cauſe of thoſe womens falling in love with them, but it was not the love of ſciences or books that made them marry theſe gentlemen. If Moreri had ſpoke of the correction (29) of the paſſage in Laërtius, he might have ſaid, that according to that hiſtorian, Hipparchia's ſtile reſembled Plato's, and that ſhe wrote tragedies; but not having ſaid that, he had no reaſon to ſay the reſt.

(29) That of Mr Menage, which I have mentioned in the foregoing remark.

[H] And ſo has Lorenzo Craſſo.] He only cites Diogenes Laërtius, he is in the wrong therefore to ſay, I. that Hipparchia ſtudied firſt under her brother

Hipparchia and Metrocles her brother, who was Crates's diſciple (b), were born at Maronea (c). They flouriſhed in Alexander's time. From the marriage of Hipparchia and Crates, was born a ſon called Paſicles (d).

(b) Diog. Laërt. ibid. n. 94, & 96.

(c) A town in Thrace called alſo Hipparchia. Menag. Not. ad Diog. Laërt. lib. vi, n. xcvi.

(d) Diog. Laërt. in Cratete, lib. vi, n. 88.

Metrocles. II. That ſhe was courted by many galants on the account of her youth, her wealth and beauty (30). III. That, in order to follow Crates, ſhe dreſſed herſelf in man's habit. IV. That diſputing with Theodorus, who denied a providence, ſhe convinced him by moſt ſolid proofs, and inconteſtable arguments (31). Read the text of this article, and you will find, that Lorenzo Craſſo has taken Laërtius quite wrong. The riches, beauty, and nobility, which Laërtius ſpeaks of, belong only to her galants. She did not dreſs herſelf as a man that ſhe might follow Crates, but becauſe he declared he would not marry any wife, who would not ſubmit to the Cynical inſtitutes. Laſtly, in the diſpute with Theodorus, we have ſeen, that neither providence nor any point of religion was concerned. It is not to be imagined how much authors deceive their readers.

(30) Quantunque come giovane ricca, è bella deſiderata veniſſe da molti, con tutto ciò ricuſar volle ogni altro per Crate vecchio, povero e mal d'apparenza. Lor. Craſſo, Iſtoria de Poëti Greci, pag. 296.

(31) Riuſci coſi dotta che in diſputa convinſe con ſodiſſime prove e incontraſtabili ragioni, e con ſomma ſua gloria Theodoro che niegava la divina providenza. Id. ibid.

HIPPARCHUS, a great Aſtronomer, a native of Nicæa in Bithynia (a), flouriſhed between the CLIVth and CLXIIId Olympiad [A]. We have ſtill one of his works; it is his commentary upon the phænomena of Aratus [B]. Mr Rohault has committed a great miſtake in ſaying, that this Aſtronomer did not know the particular motion of the fixed ſtars, from the weſt to the eaſt, which varies their longitude. Pliny makes frequent and very honourable mention of Hipparchus. He places him in (a) Suidas, pag. 1264.

[A] He flouriſhed between the CLIVth and CLXIIId Olympiad.] We have the ſtrongeſt argument that can be for it, ſince it is drawn from the aſtronomical obſervations which he made in that interval of time. Ptolomy has related ſome of them (1). Voſſius had reaſon to place Hipparchus under the reigns of Ptolomy Philometor, and Ptolemy Evergetes, and to cenſure Suidas, who contented himſelf to ſay, that this Aſtronomer lived in the time of the Roman conſuls; he ſhould have denoted a more determinate time; that of the third Punic war, and that of the war of Numantia. So far Voſſius goes on ſure grounds; but when he ſays he agrees with Suidas, as to the time of Hipparchus (2), he forgets himſelf, and ſays what is not true; for Suidas no more agrees with Voſſius upon that point, than with an author who ſhould place Hipparchus at the beginning of the IVth century of Rome, or at the end of the Vth. Calviſius (3) erred in ſaying, that Suidas has placed Hipparchus 130 years after the firſt of the Ptolemies. A French author (4) is no leſs miſtaken in affirming, that Hipparchus lived in the time of Plato. Moreri, who had no other reſource but Voſſius upon this article, ought not he to have found there an infallible preſervative againſt the miſtakes he has made? He has placed Hipparchus in the year 570, and 80 of Rome, under the reigns of Ptolomy and Philometor Evergetes, kings of Egypt. Ought he not to have made time betwixt the 589th year of Rome, and the 625th, correſpond to the Olympiads ſet down by Voſſius (5). Beſides, when one ſays barely Ptolomy, it is a ſign one ſpeaks of the firſt prince of that name who reigned in Egypt; and there are few exact writers, who do not more preciſely denote him. It is therefore a groſs fault to uſe the word Ptolomy ſimply, and abſolutely, when one doth not mean that Ptolomy who had Egypt to his ſhare, after the death of Alexander. It is plain, Moreri does not ſpeak of him, or if he doth, he commits a great blunder; for a man who lived in the 570th, and 80th year of Rome, could not poſſibly flouriſh under the firſt Ptolomy, who died in the 468th year of Rome. He is miſtaken in another thing; he ſuppoſes there was a king of Egypt, called Philometor Evergetes.

[B] His commentary upon the phænomena of Aratus is ſtill extant.] It is properly a criticiſm on Aratus; for Hipparchus accuſes him of having ſtole from Eudoxus's writings, and even in thoſe things wherein Eudoxius was miſtaken. He finds the ſame fault with Aratus the grammarian, who had wrote a commentary upon Aratus. The firſt publiſher of Hipparchus's commentary was Peter Victorius. Petavius has given us a more correct edition of it, and has added to it a Latin tranſlation of his own (6). The other works of Hipparchus were de Conſtitutione ſtellarum inerrantium, & ſtatione immota, deque menſtruo lunæ motu ſecundum latitudinem &c (7).

[C] Mr Rohault has committed a great miſtake.] Great Mathematicians, like him, are not commonly well verſed in the knowlege of matters of fact, and hiſtorical blunders frequently eſcape them (8). However, let us ſee what this learned Carteſian ſays, who by the ſole orthography of the word Hipparchus, ſhews that he did not underſtand Greek.

‘ Hyparchus, ſays he (9), lived the greateſt part of of his liſe, without making any other obſervation about the fixed ſtars, than that they had a motion from eaſt to weſt, in circles, which he thought exactly parallel to the equator; which made him conclude, that they were all inchaſed in one and the ſame ſolid heaven, (which is called the firmament) which he placed above all the planets: and becauſe he did not think it was neceſſary that the heaven ſhould borrow this ſimple motion from any other heaven above it; he maintained that it was the laſt of all the heavens, and that it ſerved to draw all the others the way that it turned, and ſo was the Primum Mobile. Hyparchus being then of this opinion, that the fixed ſtars did not change their places in the heaven, he thought they might ſerve to determine the courſe of the planets, juſt as rocks in the ſea may ſerve to point out the courſes of ſhips, which leave no footſteps of their paſſage behind them. He employed therefore his induſtry in meaſuring the diſtance betwixt every fixed ſtar, and the ſun's ecliptic; which is called the latitude of a ſtar; then to determine the number of degrees, and minutes of the ecliptic, which are reckoned from weſt to eaſt, from the firſt point of Aries to the point over againſt which every ſtar correſponds, which is called it's longitude; but death having prevented him, poſterity only could execute his deſigns. Ptolomy, who lived about two hundred years after Hyparchus, propoſed to ſettle the motions of the planets; and having had the curioſity to obſerve, whether his predeceſſor had been exact in obſerving the longitudes and latitudes of the fixed ſtars, he found that their latitudes was juſt as Hyparchus had obſerved it, but that their longitude was augmented two degrees. He concluded from thence, that beſides the motion the fixed ſtars had from eaſt to weſt in twenty four hours, they had another from weſt to eaſt in circles parallel to the ecliptic, by which being advanced two degrees in two hundred years, they would accompliſh their entire revolution in thirty ſix thouſand years. And whereas the firmament could have but one motion, which was properly it's own, he attributed to it that motion of thirty ſix thouſand years, and maintained, that it borrowed it's diurnal motion from eaſt to weſt, from a heaven beyond it. And thus people began to believe, that the Primum Mobile was a heaven, which had no ſtar in it, and which embraced the firmament.’

WHAT the longitude and the latitude of the ſtars are.

Mr Regis (10), another great Carteſian, advanceth the ſame thing in fewer words; but Mr Gadroys, another excellent Carteſian, well knew that the diſcovery of the particular motion of the fixed ſtars towards the eaſt, ought to be aſcribed to Hipparchus (11). Probably he had given greater attention than others to a thing which Gaſſendus has related. It is this. The Chaldeans, Ægyptians, and Greeks, believed that all the fixed ſtars were placed in the concavity of the higheſt heaven, and conſequently of the Primum Mobile, and therefore had no motion, but from eaſt to weſt upon the poles of the equator. But at laſt, Hipparchus, 130 years before JESUS CHRIST, found that this hypotheſis could not ſubſiſt; for having conſidered that

(1) Eight: the firſt in the ſecond book, and the ſeven others in the third book. See Voſſius, de Scient. Mathem. pag. 159.

(2) Convenit de ætate Suidas. Voſſius, ibid.

(3) Ad ann. mundi 3665.

(4) Coutel, du Calcul. Eccleſ. pag. 189.

(5) The 154, and the 163.

(6) Voſſius, ubi ſupra, pag. 160.

(7) Idem, pag. 159, ex Suida.

(8) Compare, above, remark [R] of the third duke of GUISE.

(9) Rohault, Traité de Phyſique, Tom. II, Part II, chap. viii, pag. m. 35

(10) Regis, Syſtême de Philoſophie, Tom. III, pag. 42, & 43, Lyons Edit. 1691, in 12mo.

(11) Gadroys, Syſtême du Monde, cap. ii, pag. 27.

in the number of thoſe ſublime genius's, who by the prediction of the eclipſes ſhowed that men ought not to be ſurprized at theſe phænomena [D], and that the gods themſelves were ſubjected to ſome laws [E]. He admires him for having taken a review of the ſtars, for having counted them, and obſerved their ſituation and magnitudes, which put his poſterity in a capacity of diſcovering not only whether they are born and die, but alſo whether they change their place, and increaſe or decreaſe. We learn from this paſſage of Pliny, that Hipparchus aſcribed to our ſouls a celeſtial original [F].

Strabo

that according to Timocharis's obſervation, made 200 years before, there were eight degrees betwixt the Virgin's Spike towards the weſt, and the point of the autumnal equinox, and that he could find but ſix degrees diſtance betwixt that ſtar, and that point of the firmament, he concluded, that the ſtars muſt have a proper motion from weſt to eaſt upon the poles of the ecliptic; and that, if the obſervation of Timocharis was juſt, the progreſs of the fixed ſtars, by that particular motion, was one degree every hundred years. He wrote ſome treatiſes upon this new doctrine. 'Quare & intellexit ſi Timocharis quidem ritè obſervaſſet, ac Stellæ moveri ſic perſeverarent, peragi hoc motu unum gradum intra annos proximè centum. Intellexit præterea debere hunc motum fieri ſecundum Zodiacum, ſeu ſuper Eclipticæ Polis, idque prodidit tam in Tractatu, quem inſcripſit de tranſgreſſu Æquinoctialium Solſtitialiumque punctorum, quàm in eo, quem conſcripſit de Anni magnitudine, ut apud Ptolomæum habetur (12).' Note that Gaſſendus doth not obſerve exactly the age of Timocharis; for that Aſtronomer flouriſhed about the CXXIſt Olympiad, 130 years only before the firſt obſervations of Hipparchus, of which Ptolomy makes mention. This miſtake of Gaſſendus is much more tolerable than that of Mr Gadroys (13).

[D] Pliny places him in the number of thoſe who, by the prediction of eclipſes, ſhowed that men ought not to be ſurprized at theſe phænomena.] Thales was the firſt among the Greeks, who could foretel the time of eclipſes. Sulpitius Gallus among the Romans, began to be ſucceſsful in that ſort of predictions, and he made a very ſeaſonable trial thereof the night before the battle, in which Perſeus was overcome (14). Hipparchus, after theſe two, extended this ſcience much farther, for he made Ephemerides for ſix hundred years. 'Poſt eos utriuſque ſideris curſum in ſexcentos annos præcinuit Hipparchus, menſes gentium, dieſque & horas, ac ſitas locorum & viſus populorum complexus, ævo teſte haud alio modo quam conſiliorum naturæ particeps (15). —— After them, Hipparchus calculated the motions of both theſe luminaries for 600 years to come, being throughly acquainted with the different computations of the months, days, and hours, ſituations of places, and the different aſpects in the ſeveral nations, in ſuch a manner as if he had been of nature's council.' Pliny calls him, on this account, the confident of nature: the elogies he beſtows upon the Aſtronomers on that occaſion ſeem to be very well grounded. 'Viri ingentes ſupraque mortalium naturam, tantorum numinum lege deprehenſa, & miſera hominum mente abſoluta in defectibus ſtellarum ſcelera, aut mortem aliquam ſiderum pavente . . . . . Macti ingenio eſte cœli interpretes, rerumque naturæ capaces, argumenti repertores, quo Deos homineſque viciſtis. Quis enim hæc cernens, & ſtatos ſiderum (quoniam ita placuit appellare) labores, non ſuæ neceſſitati mortalis genitus ignoſcat (16)? —— Illuſtrious men, nay more than men, who firſt diſcovered the laws by which theſe great divinities are governed, and firſt ſet free the minds of men who uſed before to tremble at eclipſes, fearing that they ſhould occaſion terrible calamities, or the extinction of theſe glorious luminaries . . . . Hail! ye interpreters of heaven, learned in the nature of all things, and diſcoverers of a ſubject whereby you have overcome both gods and men. For what mortal, ſeeing theſe things, and the ſtated labours of the ſtars (ſince we are pleaſed to call them labours) will not be content with the neceſſity to which his own nature is ſubjected.' This elogy in proſe is full as good as that which here follows in verſe.

Felicis animos, quibus hæc cognoſcere primis,
Inque domos ſuperas ſcandere cura fuit!
Credibile eſt illos pariter vitiiſque lociſque
Altiùs humanis exſeruiſſe caput.
Non Venus & vinum ſublimia pectora fregit;
Officiumve fori, militiæve labor.
Nec levis ambitio, perfuſaque gloria fuco;
Magnarumve fames ſollicitavit opum.
Admovêre oculis diſtantia ſidera noſtris;
Ætheraque ingenio ſuppoſuêre ſuo.
Sic petitur cælum: non ut ferat Oſſan Olympus;
Summaque Peliacus ſidera tangat apex (17).

Hipparchus did ſo carefully obſerve what concerns eclipſes, that he found out the proportions of their intervals (18). He obſerved that the eclipſes of the moon might return at five months end, and the eclipſes of the ſun at ſeven, and that the ſun might be eclipſed twice in the ſpace of thirty days with reſpect to different parts of the earth. Intrà ducentos annos Hipparchi ſagacitate compertum eſt & lunæ defectum aliquando quinto menſe à priore fieri, ſolis vero ſeptimo: eundem bis in triginta diebus ſupra terras occultari, ſed ab aliis atque aliis hoc cerni. Theſe words of Pliny have been miſunderſtood by ſome. There is a very learned man, who thought that by intra ducentos annos, was meant that two ages muſt intervene to the end, that an eclipſe of the moon may ſucceed another, at five months end. This is not Pliny's meaning (19): his meaning is that Hipparchus had diſcovered that proportion two hundred years before. Pliny is right in his Chronology, there were two centuries betwixt Pliny and that famous Aſtronomer.

[E] That the gods themſelves were ſubjected to ſome laws.] There is no inconveniency in ſaying that GOD loves order, and good, by a neceſſary and indiſpenſible law; for, on the contrary, it would be an imperfection to be able to violate this law. But it is doubtleſs an imperfection to be ſubject to an order which retards or weakens our functions; and therefore they who pretended the ſtars were gods, were obliged to ſay, if they argued conſiſtently, that the Aſtronomers had diſcovered the weakneſs of the divine nature, and it's dependance on a very burdenſome law, which ſubjected it to a ſort of death, fainting, or ſlavery. To this it may be objected, that the ſun is no leſs luminous in itſelf at the time of an eclipſe, than before, or after; but may not I anſwer, that a courier who is ſtopped, loſes nothing of his vigour, and health? It is neverthеleſs, a proof of his ſubmiſſion to a burdenſome law; it is, in a word, a ſign of weakneſs to ſee that he cannot continue his journey. Apply this to the ſun, and you will find that his eclipſes are a ſign of imperfection. They hinder him from enlightening the earth; he is a prince, whoſe couriers are ſtopped, and whoſe functions are interrupted. If Pliny had purpoſed to reaſon, he had not drawn the conſequence, which he has drawn from that phænomenon: he would not have ſaid that this ought to comfort men on account of their mortality (20), he would have ſaid, that this proves that the ſtars are not of a divine nature.

[F] We learn from a paſſage of Pliny, that Hipparchus attributed a heavenly original to our ſouls.] It is ſo fine, that in giving it intire, I am ſure to pleaſe thoſe, who love not to change books, in order fully to ſatisfy their curioſity. 'Idem Hipparchus nunquam ſatis laudatus, ut quo nemo magis approbaverit cognationem cum homine ſiderum, animaſque noſtras partem eſſe cœli: novam ſtellam & aliam in ævo ſuo genitam deprehendit: ejuſque motu, qua die fulſit, ad dubitationem eſt adductus, anne hoc ſæpius fieret, moverenturque & eæ, quas putamus affixas. Idemque auſus, rem etiam Deo improbam, annumerare poſteris ſtellas, ac ſidera ad normam expangere (21), organis excogitatis, per quæ ſingularum loca, atque magnitudines ſignaret: ut facile diſcerni poſſet ex eo, non modo, an obirent, naſcerenturve, ſed an omnino aliqua tranſirent, moverenturve; item an creſcerent, minuerenturque, cœlo in hæreditate cunctis relicto; ſi quiſquam, qui rationem eam caperet, in-

ventus

(12) Gaſſendus, Phyſicæ, Sect. ii, lib. iii, pag. m. 596, primi Volum. Oper. ex Ptolemæo 7. Almag. 2, & 3.

(13) He reckons but two hundred years between Timocharis and Ptolomy the Aſtronomer, Syſt. pag. 30, but he ſhould have reckoned above four hundred. Robault, who reckons two hundred years between Hipparchus and Ptolemy, Tom. II, Part. II, of his Phyſics, pag. 36, ſhould at leaſt have followed Gaſſendus, who reckons 260 years between thoſe two Aſtronomers.

(14) Plinius, lib. ii, cap. xii.

(15) Id. ibid.

(16) Id. ibid.

(17) Ovid Faſt. lib i, ver. 297, & ſeq.

(18) Plin. lib. ii, cap. xiii.

(19) Neque vero ſenſus eſt, ut exiſtimavit vir alioqui extra ingenii aleam poſitus, expectandos eſſe annos ducentos ut recurrat lunæ defectus quinto menſe, cum vel intra annos decem animadverſum fuerit ætate noſtra geminam ita recurrere. Harduinus, in Plin. lib ii, cap. xiii, pag. 159, 160.

(20) This conſolation would be ſtill ſtronger than that which Lucretius makes uſe of above, citat. (8) of the article BAUTRU (WILLIAM).

(21) In Father Hardouin's edition it is ad nomen expungere.

Strabo (b) accuſes this Aſtronomer of being too critical, and of having made uſe of a manner of criticiſing, which ſavoured more of chicane than accuracy. Pliny judges more favourably of him (c).

' ventus eſſet (22). — The ſame Hipparchus can never be ' ſufficiently praiſed, for no body more clearly proved that ' men are allied to the ſtars, and that our ſouls are a ' part of heaven. He, I ſay, diſcovered a new ſtar which ' was produced in his days; and by it's motion, at it's firſt ' appearance, he began to doubt whether this did not ' frequently happen, and whether thoſe ſtars which we ' call fixed do not likewiſe move. He alſo firſt under- ' took to number the ſtars for the uſe of poſterity, a task ' hard even to the gods, and reduced them to rule, having invented inſtruments by which he marked their ' places in the heavens and their magnitudes: ſo that by ' means of them it might be eaſily obſerved, not only ' whether they die and are born, but likewiſe whether ' they paſs by one another or move; and whether they ' encreaſe or decreaſe, leaving the heavens as an inheri- ' tance to all, if any ſhould be found able to fathom theſe ' myſteries.'

HIPPOMANES. There is in the Project of this Dictionary a long article upon Hippomanes. I do not place it here, having changed the deſign which I had of giving promiſcuouſly, real, and perſonal articles; but I will place this article at the end of this work by way of diſſertation.

HIPPONAX, a Greek poet, born at Epheſus, lived not in the XXIIId Olympiad, as Euſebius ſays [A], but in the LXth, as we are aſſured by Pliny (a). Being baniſhed from Epheſus, by the tyrants Athenagoras and Comas (b), he went and ſettled at Clazomenæ [B]. He was deformed, little, and ſlender (c), but his deformity has by accident been the cauſe of his immortality; for he is ſcarce known but by the ſatirical verſes which he made againſt two Statuaries [C], who had carved him in the moſt ridiculous figures imaginable (d). He diſcharged upon them a thundering legion of Iambic verſes which ſo vexed them, that it has been reported they hanged themſelves. Pliny maintains that this is falſe, and proves it by a great number of ſtatues which they made after that time in the adjacent iſlands. Some authors have written, that they only obliged them to leave Epheſus where Hipponax lived (e). However it be, the humour and ſatirical vein of this poet diſtinguiſhed him [D], and do ſo ſtill in a very particular manner. His ſatire did not even ſpare thoſe to whom he owed his life (f). There are ſome who pretend that he died of hunger [E]. It is obſerved that though he was little and ſlender,

[A] He did not live in the XXIIId Olympiad, as Euſebius ſays.] Scaliger (1) confutes him by the paſſage of Pliny; he believed therefore that Pliny was in the right. So far it is well: but he adds, that Euſebius followed Tatian, and he refers us to his notes number 908, in which we find nothing that relates to Hipponax. In this there is no great exactneſs. Euſebius may alſo be refuted by the teſtimony of Proclus (2), who ſays that Hipponax flouriſhed under the reign of Darius. He means doubtleſs the ſon of Hyſtaſpes, whoſe reign began in the LXIVth Olympiad.

[B] He ſettled at Clazomenæ.] Hence the poeteſs Sulpitia deſcribes him in this manner:

Nec trimetro jambo, nec qui pede fractus eodem
Fortiter iraſci diſcit duce Clazomenio (3).

Nor in that verſe Iambic-like engage,
Taught by the Clazomenian bard to rage,
In daring numbers, thro' the manly page.

If what Tanaquillus Faber ſays be true, namely, that Hipponax lived at Epheſus, when he revenged himſelf on thoſe who had inſulted him upon his deformity; he muſt either have returned into his country, or elſe his baniſhment did not precede that adventure. I have ſeen nothing in Pliny that ſhews that Hipponax was or was not born at Epheſus, or whether he, and the Statuaries whom he ſatirized, lived there or not. And yet Mr Dacier (4) aſſures us, that Pliny is of their opinion, who ſay that our poet's verſes made his enemies quit Epheſus. Lloyd and Hoſman ſay that Bupalus lived at Clazomenæ (5). I believe this is a diſcovery made by reaſoning: they ſaw, on one hand, that Hipponax retired into that city; and, on the other, that Bupalus repreſented him in a groteſque manner, and from theſe two facts they concluded, that Bupalus lived at Clazomenæ.

[C] Againſt two Statuaries.] They were two brothers, one called Bupalus and other Athenis, they were of the iſle of Chios, the ſons of Anthermus, whoſe father's name was Micciades, and the grandfather's Malas. All theſe were Sculptors from father to ſon in that iſland; ſo that this profeſſion might be as antient there as the Olympiads (6). Pauſanias (7) ſpeaks of Bupalus with praiſe, on occaſion of the ſtatue of Fortune, and that of the Graces, which were at Smyrna of his carving. He makes him to have lived before Pindar. Two witneſſes ſuch as he and Pliny, deſerve to be preferred to the ſcholiaſt upon Horace (8), who ſays Bapulas was a Painter, and who has been followed in this by Tanaquillus Faber (9) and Mr Dacier (10), and almoſt all the dictionaries (11). Suidas ſays theſe two brothers were Statuaries; and becauſe he has given the laſt the name of Athenis, he has occaſioned Father Hardouin to think the paſſage of Pliny is corrupted, where this Statuary is called Anthermus. He has therefore put Athenis in the room of that word. See the remark [E] and the article BUPALUS.

[D] His humour and ſatirical vein diſtinguiſhed him.] Hence come thoſe proverbs we find made uſe of by Cicero (12). Eum addictum jam tum puto eſſe Calvi Licinii Hipponacteo præconio. Horace names Hipponax and Archilochus as the two greateſt ſatiriſts (13). Pliny ſays as follows. ' Hipponacti ' notabilis vultûs fœditas erat: quamobrem imaginem ' ejus laſcivia jocorum ii propoſuere ridentium circulis. ' Quod Hipponax indignatus amaritudinem carminum ' diſtrinxit in tantum ut credatur aliquibus ad laqueum ' eos impuliſſe: quod falſum eſt. ——— Hipponax was ' remarkably ugly; they therefore made a ſtatue of him, ' which they ſet up for the diverſion of the public. ' Hipponax revenged this affront by ſuch ſevere ſatires, ' that ſome have wrote, that his enemies hanged them- ' ſelves: but there is no ground for that report.' There is in the Anthologia (14) three or four epigrams, which repreſent Hipponax ſtill terrible after his death. Paſſengers are there adviſed to keep far from his tomb, as being a place that ſends out dreadful hail: Φεῦγε τὸν καλαζετῆ τάφον, τὸν φρικτόν, fuge grandinantem tumulum horrendum (15).

[E] Some pretend that he died of hunger.] I believe all the foundation they have for it are theſe two verſes:

Utque parum ſtabili qui carmine læſit Athenas
Inviſus pereas, deficiente cibo (16).

Hated by all, may famine be thy fate,
Like his, whoſe ſatire laſh'd th' Athenian ſtate.

Some critics pretend that Ovid did not ſay Athenas, but Athenin, whence it would follow, that he ſpeaks here of

---

(b) Lib. i, & ii, paſſim.

(c) Hipparchus & in coarguendo eo (Eratoſthene) & in reliqua omni diligentia mirus. Plin. lib. ii, cap. 108.

(22) Plinius, lib. ii, cap. xxvi, pag. m. 182, 183.

(a) Plin. lib. xxxvi, cap. v.

(b) Suidas, in Ἱππῶναξ.

(c) Ælian. div. Hiſt. lib. x, cap. vi.

(d) Plin. lib. xxxvi, cap. v.

(e) Apud Tanaq. Fabrum. Vie des Poëtes Grecs.

(f) Ὁ καὶ τοκέων ἔο βαΰξας. Qui etiam parentes ſuos allatravit Anthol. lib. iii, cap. xxx, n. 22, pag. m. 655.

(1) Pag. 79.

(2) Apud Photium, Biblioth. pag. 983.

(3) De Edicto Domitiani, inter Catalecta Virgilii, Edit. Ludg. Bat. 1617, pag. 247.

(4) In his notes upon Horace, Tom. V, p. 151.

(5) Charles Stephens ſays ſo too at the word Bupalus.

(6) Si quis horum familiam ad proavum uſque retroagat, inveniet artis ejus originem cum Olympiadum origine cœpiſſe. Plin. lib. xxxvi, cap. v.

(7) Pauſan. lib. iv, pag. 140, & lib. ix, pag. 309.

(8) In Epod. vi.

(9) Vie des Poëtes Grecs.

(10) Rem. ſur Horace, Tom. V, pag. 151.

(11) See the ar. BUPALUS, remark [A].

(12) Epiſt. xxiv, lib. vii, ad Famil.

(13) In Malos aſperimus Parata tollo cornua.
Quales Lycambæ ſpretus infido gener,
Aut acer hoſtis Bupalo.
Horat. Epod. vi. See alſo Cicero, de Natura Deor. lib. iii.

(14) Lib. iii, cap. xxv.

(15) Ibid. n. xxiv, pag. m. 566.

(16) Ovid. in Ibin, ver. 525.

ſlender, yet he had great ſtrength, and could throw an empty veſſel farther than other men (g). He was neither the firſt, nor the only perſon who have forced people to make away with themſelves by their invectives [F].

of Hipponax: ‘ Qui primus jambum claudicare fecit & ‘ ſcazonta in Bupalum & Athenin compoſuit, ut eſt ‘ apud Suidam, ut recte Ovidius, parum ſtabile, id eſt ‘ claudum carmen ei tribuat.’ Theſe are Alciatus’s words in the eighteenth chapter of the fifth book of his Parerga. Turnebus comes pretty near the ſame thought: ‘ Videtur, ſays he (17), de Hipponacte hoc intelligi ‘ qui claudicante & parum ſtabili verſu, id eſt ſcazonte ‘ in Bupalum & Athenin invectus eſt Athenienſes: quo ‘ in carmine ne Athenis quidem pepercerat. Quid ‘ tamen ſi pro Athenas, Athenin ſcribamus, quem ab ‘ eo probris oneratum accepimus! Ne hanc quidem ‘ lectionem improbarem, etſi alteram delere non auſim.’ Mr de Boiſſieu (18) who mentions theſe two paſſages, obſerves that Sanctius and Valerius approve of them. As for him, he is wholly for that conjecture, and finds it very probable, that Ovid has mentioned the two inventers of Iambic verſes one after the other. Now he had been ſpeaking of Archilochus, and we know from Dionyſius Halicarnaſſenſis (19), Clemens Alexandrinus (20), Rufinus (21), and the poeteſs Sulpitia (22), that Hipponax was the inventer of the ſcazons. Mr de Boiſſieu might have criticiſed Turnebus for ſaying that Hipponax’s enemies were Athenians; for Pliny ſays expreſsly they were of the iſle of Chios, and that they expreſſed it ſo in their works: ‘ Quibus ſubjecerunt carmen non vitibus tantum cenſeri ‘ Chium, ſed & operibus Anthermi filiorum (23). — ‘ To which they added a poem wherein they ſaid that ‘ Chios was not only famous for vines, but likewiſe for ‘ the works of the ſons of Anthermus.’ There is no ground for what Turnebus ſays, that Hipponax did not ſpare the city of Athens in the verſes he made againſt theſe two Statuaries; it is a random gueſs. A German miniſter (24), after applying to Hipponax the two verſes of Ovid, goes on thus: ‘ Ex Plinio nimirum compertum eſt Athenim vel Athenam ſculptorem in Hipponactis ſcripta incurreſſe, carmina ejus ‘ ſuſtuliſſe maledica, authorem verò lethali inedia fuiſſe confectum. —— We learn from Pliny, that the ‘ Statuary Athenis, or Athenas, fell under the laſh of ‘ Hipponax’s pen, that he bore with his ſatirical verſes, ‘ but that the author of them died of hunger.’ Pliny ſays nothing like it.

[F] He was neither the firſt nor the only perſon who have forced people to make away with themſelves by their invectives.] Before him Archilochus wrote ſatires which forced two or three perſons to hang themſelves (25). Poliagrus being abuſed in a comedy did the like (26). We need not wonder that a ſatire ſhould caſt men into deſpair, ſince a meer cenſure has ſometimes had that fatal effect. Pythagoras having reprimanded one of his diſciples ſomewhat harſhly in a great company, caſt him into ſo black a melancholy as made him ſtrangle himſelf, and ever after that great Philoſopher took care to cenſure only in private. Πυθαγόρȣ δὲ τραχύτερον ἐν πολλοῖς γνωρίμῳ προσενεχθέντος, ἀπάγξασθαι τὸ μειράκιον λέγȣσιν. ἐκ τȣ́τȣ δὲ μηδέποτε τὸν Πυθαγόραν αὖθις ἄλλȣ παρόντος ἄλλον νȣθετῆσαι. Ferunt, adoleſcentulum quendam à Pythagora, cui operam dabat, multis præſentibus compellatum aſperius ſuſpendio vitam finiiſſe, atque ab eo tempore Pythagoram nunquam alio præſente quenquam corripuiſſe (27). Diodorus Cronus died with vexation for having been inſulted by a king of Ægypt, upon his not being able to ſolve ſome logical difficulties, which Stilpo had propoſed to him at that king’s table (28). Some cenſures, without ccaſioning the death of the the cenſured perſons, have touched them ſo ſenſibly, as to make them attempt upon the life of the perſon who made the cenſure. The architect Apollodorus loſt his life, for obſerving to the emperor Hadrian ſome faults of a temple that prince had built (29). The laſt ages furniſh us with examples of all theſe different effects of cenſure. Muretus knew a man, who fell into ſo ſo deſperate a melancholy on account of ſome verſes made againſt him, that he died of it. And on that occaſion that writer cites Plato, who adviſed all thoſe who loved their reputation to take heed of provoking the poets. ‘ Laceſſiti (Poetæ) ita ſe ulciſcuntur, ut interdum eos à quibus offenſi erant, ad mortem adegiſſe ‘ narrentur. Nam præter id quod de Archilocho accepimus, novi ego qui hac ætate tantum verſibus ſuis ‘ inimico dolorem inuſſerit, ut ex eo ille ſit mortuus ‘ . . . . quo circa Plato in Minoe præcipit iis qui ‘ bonæ famæ ſtudioſi ſunt, ut diligenter caveant, ne ‘ cum poetis inimicitias ſuſcipiant (30). —— Poets, ‘ when provoked, revenge themſelves in ſuch a manner, ‘ that ſometimes they have occaſioned the death of thoſe ‘ who had offended them. For beſides the ſtory we have ‘ concerning Archilochus, I know a perſon, in the age ‘ in which we live, who by his verſes ſtung his enemy ‘ ſo to the quick, that he died of it . . . . . For this ‘ reaſon Plato, in his Minos, adviſed thoſe who love ‘ their reputation, to take care not to provoke the poets.’ It is ſaid that George Trapezuntius died with melancholy, upon ſeeing the errors in his tranſlation of Ptolemy criticiſed by Regiomontanus, and that the ſons of the deceaſed poiſoned the critic (31). I have ſaid in another place (32) that it was thought that Jaſon Denores would have died with grief, upon reading Guarini’s reply, if he had lived long enough to have ſeen that book out of the preſs. Some zealous Calviniſts . . . . publiſhed ſo bitter a libel againſt Quintin . . . . that that doctor being too ſenſible of it, took his bed upon reading it, and never roſe again (33). He had made ſpeech in the name of the clergy in the aſſembly of the ſtates of the kingdom in the year 1560, it was the criticiſms upon his ſpeech which occaſioned his death. Gregory de Valentia having read a paſſage of St Auſtin, otherwiſe than he ſhould, before Clement VIII (34), was convicted of a falſification, upon which the Pope ſaid to him (35). Is it thus you pretend to deceive the church of G O D? ‘ Theſe words, ‘ like a thunderbolt, ſtruck down Valentia, he fainted ‘ away in the preſence of the Pope, and died two days ‘ after.’ See in the article CERASI another blow of the ſame Pope. ‘ Mr de l’Etoile reprehended ſtrongly, ‘ and boldly, and with a ſtrange ſort of ſeverity, what did ‘ not pleaſe him in things ſubmitted to his judgment. ‘ He is accuſed for having cauſed a young man that ‘ came from Languedoc to die with grief and vexation, ‘ who brought him a comedy which he thought a maſter-piece, in which he clearly ſhewed him a thouſand ‘ faults.’ I take theſe words from Mr Peliſſon (36). Philip II king of Spain cenſured in as murthering a manner as the king of Egypt before mentioned. ‘ Cardinal Eſpinoſa died on having heard this reproof uttered by that prince, Cardenal yo ſoy el Preſidente. ‘ Cardinal I am the preſident. And the ſame king ſaying to a ſecretary who had poured ink upon ſome diſpatch inſtead of ſand, Eſte es el tintero, y eſtotra (37) ‘ la ſalvadera. — That is the ink-horn, and this is the ‘ ſand-box. So pierced him with theſe two or three ‘ words that he immediately retired from the king’s ‘ preſence to his death-bed (38).’ We have examples which prove that ſome authors have aſſaſſinated their critics. Murtola, enraged to ſee his reputation ruined by a ſatire of the cavalier Marini, fired a piſtol at him in the middle of the ſtreets of Turin; he miſſed him, tho’ he had five bullets in his piſtol, and ſhot at him very near; he confeſſed that his deſign was not to wound but to kill Marini (39). We find in Mr Baillet (40). ‘ That, Francis Robortellus having cenſured ſome books ‘ of Baptiſt Egnatius, a Venetian, had very near loſt his ‘ life, by a ſtab in his belly, which this Egnatius gave ‘ him in anſwer to his criticiſms.’ He cites Joh. Imperial. Muſæi hiſtor. pag 61. & Theoph. Spizel. de felic. literat. comment. 4. p. 485. Theſe the words of Imperialis: ‘ Cum Alciato pariter, aliiſque clariſſimis ‘ ejus ævi luminibus, internecinas prope ſimultates exercuit (Robortellus) quo factum ut ſemel Venetiis ‘ Baptiſta Egnatius optimus ac doctiſſimus vir crebris ‘ ab eo laceſſitus injuriis, educto ſenili gladiolo in eum ‘ impetum facere non dubitarit. —— Robortellus had ‘ mortal quarrels with Alciatus, and other learned men ‘ of that age, to ſuch a degree, that Baptiſta Egnatius, a good and learned man, whom he had frequently abuſed, meeting him once at Venice, attacked ‘ him ſword in hand, tho’ then far advanced in ‘ years.’

If I had diſperſed this in ſeveral places of my work, I might have avoided their cenſures who will call this remark, meer traſh, and a trifling collection. But as I ſeek more the advantage of my readers than my own, I am willing, tho’ at the expence of cenſure, to ſave them the trouble of gathering together what I might have diſperſed.

(g) Metrodor. Scepſius, apud Athenæum, lib. xii, pag. 552.

(17) Adverſar. lib. ix, cap. xxv.

(18) Comment. in Ibin, pag. 100, 101.

(19) Lib. de Interpret.

(20) Stromat. lib. i.

(21) De Metris Comicis.

(22) See her verſes in the remark [B].

(23) Plin. lib. xxxvi, cap. v.

(24) Spizelius, in Felicit. Literat. pag. 718.

MORTAL effects of detraction or cenſure.

(25) See the article ARCHILOCHUS, remark [C].

(26) Ælian. Var. Hiſt. lib v, cap. viii.

(27) Plutarch. de Diſcrim. Adul. & Amici, pag 70. F.

(28) Diogen. Laërt. lib. ii, n. cxii. See alſo Pliny, lib. vii, cap. lvii.

(29) Xiphilin. in Hadriano, pag. m. 258.

(30) Muretus, Variar. Lect. lib. viii, cap. i.

(31) Naudé, Conſiderations ſur les Coups de Etat. See alſo Thuan. lib xc.

(32) In the article GUARINI, remark [B].

(33) Varillas, Hiſt. de Charles IX, Tom I, pag. m. 18.

(34) Morale pratique des Jeſuites, Tom. III, pag. 122. Where a falſity of the firſt Tome is corrected.

(35) Morale pratique, Tom. I, pag. 268.

(36) Hiſt de l’Acad. Franç. pag. m. 322.

(37) I think it ſhould be eſta era.

(38) La Mothe Vayer, letter liii, pag. 441, of the tenth Tome.

(39) See the Anti-Baillet, Tom. I, n. 95.

(40) Jugemens des Sçavans, Tom. I, pag. 66.

I add a freſh example to the foregoing. A poet having preſumed to preſent to Pope Urban VIII a work, whereof the ſubject, the diſpoſition, and the verſes, were unbecoming a Chriſtian, he reproached him for his impudence, with ſo much paſſion, that the poor wretch died with confuſion and grief. You will find theſe words in the third page of a book publiſhed by Father Menêtrier at Paris 1681, intituled Des Repreſentations en Muſique anciennes & modernes.

HIPSIPYLE, or HYPSIPILE, the daughter of Thoas, king of the iſle of Lemnos, ſaved her father's life when the women of the iſland made a general maſſacre of all the men that inhabited it (a). She did not do it openly; but was forced to make people believe that ſhe had made away with him; upon which ſuppoſition, the other women choſe her for their queen (b). The Argonauts ſome time after landed in the iſle of Lemnos, and were received there with all the teſtimonies of the ſtricteſt friendſhip; for the women of the iſland had not killed the men out of any indifference for the male ſex [A], but rather out of a ſpirit of revenge, which ſhewed they were very ſenſible of the ſoft pleaſures of love. The Argonauts refreſhed themſelves from the fatigues of the ſea in the arms of theſe widows as long as they pleaſed; neither did Hypſipile forget herſelf: She applied herſelf to their leader, and was quickly with child of two boys. If her fate in that reſpect was not like Dido's [B], it was in this, that Jaſon was no leſs inconſtant than Æneas [C]. See in the Supplement to Moreri's Dictionary what became of Hypſipile, when her ſubjects underſtood that ſhe had not killed her father.

[A] The women of the iſle of Lemnos, had not killed the men out of any indifference for the male ſex.] They were induced to that maſſacre, only becauſe the men no longer careſſed them, and diverted themſelves only with the ſlaves which they had brought from Thrace (1). The men uſed this practice becauſe their wives were grown ſo ſtinking, that they could not come near them without the greateſt diſguſt (2). This ſtench was an effect of the anger of Venus; either becauſe this goddeſs was offended at their neglect of ſacrificing to her for ſome years (3), or becauſe ſhe conceived an averſion for the iſle of Lemnos, for having been caught there in the fact (4), for there it was the gods ſaw her lying with Mars. Others (5) ſay, that Medea being jealous of Hypſipile, threw into that iſland ſome drugs, which cauſed the women to ſtink ſo. It is added, that in after ages they ſmelt ſo ſtrong upon a certain day every year, that their huſbands and even their own children could not abide to come near them. It is diſputed whether this ſtink was from their breath, or their arm-pits. Euſtathius (6) is for the firſt opinion, and Dion Chryſoſtome (7) for the ſecond. Here follow ſome verſes of Statius in which Hypſipile repreſents the horrible ſtate of the iſland in the interregnum of love:

Protinus à Lemno teneri fugiſtis amores,
Motus Hymen, verſæque faces, & frigida juſti
Cura tori: nullæ redeunt in gaudia noctes,
Nullus in amplexu ſopor eſt: odia aſpera ubique
Et furor, & medio recubat diſcordia lecto (8).

With torch inverted, Hymen took his flight ——
The rites of wedlock, with the loves, are fled,
And hate and diſcord fill the marriage-bed.

That interregnum ſeemed ſo intolerable, that it moved them to the maſſacre before mentioned.

[B] Her fate in that reſpect was not like Dido's.] For the amours of poor Dido with Æneas were barren, and it was that which grieved her. I have elſewhere (9) obſerved the difference betwixt her taſte, and that of the women of theſe later ages. The ladies now-a-days when they are deſerted by their galants at the opening of a campaign, are over-joyed that the pleaſures of the winter quarter are paſſed over without propagation, I make uſe of this example without excluding thoſe that concern perſons of other conditions; I uſe it, I ſay, becauſe the ſtay of the Argonauts in the iſle of Lemnos, may well be compared to a long winter quarter. I muſt add that Hypſipile proteſts in the work of a Latin poet, that ſhe married the lovely Jaſon againſt her will.

- - - - - Cinerem furiaſque meorum
Teſtor, ut externas non ſponte aut crimine tædas
Attigerim (ſcit cura Deum) etſi blandus Jaſon
Virginibus dare vincla novis (10).

Neither by choice, nor paſſion, was I led
(The gods can witneſs) to this foreign bed;
Tho' lovely Jaſon boaſts the pleaſing art
To captivate each wiſhing virgin's heart.

But a Greek poet repreſents her ſo much in love with him at firſt ſight, as to offer him her kingdom.

Εἰ δέ κεν αὖθι
Ναιετάειν ἐθέλοις, καί τοι ἄδοι, ἦτ᾽ ἂν ἔπειτα
Πατρὸς ἐμοῖο Θόαντος ἔχοις γέρας.

- - - - - Sin vero hic
Sedem figere velis, idque allubeſcat tibi, cauſa nihil erit, quin
Augearis præmio Thoantis genitoris mei (11).

If in this land thou chuſeſt to remain,
Thoas, my ſire, ſhall give thee here to reign.

Valerius Flaccus in like manner repreſents her touched to the quick with the charms of this Hero, and ready to marry him as ſoon as ſhe ſaw him:

- - - - - - - - - - Unius hæret
Alloquio, & blandos paullatim colligit ignes,
Jam non dura thoris, Veneri nec iniqua reverſæ (12).

Faſt, as he ſpeaks, with kindled love ſhe burns,
And Hymen to her conquer'd heart returns.

[C] Jaſon was no leſs inconſtant than Æneas.] He forſook her and his two children, and purſued his voyage; ſo that ſhe is one of the heroins of Ovid, who ſung their ſad complaints, and tender ſighs, upon ſeeing themſelves forſaken by the galants, to whom they had refuſed nothing. Ariadne, grandmother to Hypſipile (13), experienced the ſame fate. See in Ovid her complaints againſt Theſeus. I make a reflexion upon this matter. The mythological authors and modern writers of romances have taken two different roads. The firſt come too near hiſtory, the latter keep too far from it. I only conſider the deſcription of manners, or the character which they give a hero. In Mythology the heroins are not only too amorous, but alſo too laviſh of their favours: the heroes are inconſtant; they get the heroins with child, or do what is neceſſary to it, and then they laugh at them. This looks too much like hiſtory, and affords an ill example to both ſexes (14). It is better to take the oppoſite extreme, as our writers of romances do, and in ſpite of probability to feign heroes and heroins quite faultleſs.

(a) Apollodorus, lib. i.

(b) His mihi pro meritis (ut falſi criminis aſtu Parta fides) regno & ſolio confidere patris Supplicium datur. Hypſipyle, apud Statium, Theb. lib. v, ver. 320.

(1) Apollodor. lib. i.

(2) Id. ibid.

(3) In Inſula Lemno mulieres Veneri ſacra aliquot annos non fecerant. Hyginus, cap. xv. See alſo Apollod. ibid. Statius, Theb. lib. v, and the Scholiaſt upon Euripides in Hecub.

(4) Lactantius, in Statium, lib. v, Thebaid.

(5) Myrtitus Leſbius, lib. i, Leſbiacorum, apud Scholiaſten Apollonii in lib. i, Argonaut.

(6) In Iliad. lib. i.

(7) Oratione 33.

(8) Stat. Theb. lib. v, ver. 70.

(9) In the article GARNACHE, remark [B].

(10) Statius, Theb. lib v, ver. 454.

(11) Apollonius, lib. i, ver. 827.

(12) Val. Flacc. lib. ii, ver. 353.

(13) Thoas, Hypſipile's father, was the ſon of Bacchus and Ariadne.

(14) Horace's Hiſtorias peccare ducentes, Od. vii, lib iii, may be applied to theſe narrations.

HIRPINI, a people of Italy in the country of the Samnites. They were ſo called from a wolf (a), that conducted them when they went to ſettle a colony. Some ſay that upon a certain ſolemn day, they trod upon fire without being burned [A]: but it is probable that this is attributing to them what belonged only to the Hirpi [B], who lived

[A] Some ſay they trod upon fire without being burnt.] Varro, who oppugns ſuperſtition as much as he could, having mentioned an ointment, immediately adds this reflexion; the Hirpini rub the bottoms of their feet with it, when they are to walk upon fire. Varro ubique expugnator religionis, ait, cùm quoddam medicamentum deſcriberet: eo uti ſolent Hirpini ambulaturi per ignem, medicamento plantas ungunt (1). Theſe words give us no light concerning the ſituation of theſe Hirpini; ſo that we cannot tell, whether Varro ſpeaks of a people who were part of the Samnites, or whether with Servius he gives the name of Hirpini to the people who lived near mount Soracte in Tuſcany, and who were properly called Hirpi. Many imagine that Varro meant the Samnites called Hirpini, and if ſo, it is probable that the likeneſs of names miſled him. They who walked upon fire were diſtinct from the Samnites, and lived at a good diſtance from them. They were called Hirpi and not Hirpini; the commentator Servius is miſtaken in the name, and that firſt miſtake has led him into ſome others concerning the ſituation of thoſe who walked upon fire, upon the feſtival of mount Soracte, as we ſhall ſee in what follows.

[B] ... what belonged only to the Hirpi.] Virgil does not name thoſe who walked on fire; he only gives us to underſtand that they bordered on mount Soracte.

Summe Deûm ſancti cuſtos Soractis Apollo,
Quem primi colimus, cui pineus ardor acervo
Paſcitur, & medium freti pietate per ignem
Cultores multa premimus veſtigia pruna.
Da, pater, hoc noſtris aboleri dedecus armis (2).

O patron of Soractes high abodes,
Phœbus the ruling power among the gods
Whom firſt we ſerve, whole woods of unctious pine
Are fell'd for thee, and to thy glory ſhine.
By thee protected, with our naked ſoles,
Thro' flames unſing'd we march, and tread the kindled coals,
Give me propitious power to waſh away
The ſtains of this diſhonourable day.

DRYDEN.

But Servius names them Hirpini; Soractis, ſays he, in commenting on this paſſage of Virgil, mons eſt Hirpinorum in Flaminia collocatus. He adds, that this mountain is conſecrated to the infernal gods, and that one day whilſt they were offering a ſacrifice to Pluto, wolves came upon them which ſnatched the entrails of the victim out of the fire: the ſhepherds purſued them, and engaged them in a den, whence proceeded a mortal vapour. This cauſed a great peſtilence, which the oracle promiſed a ſtop to, provided they ſhould imitate the wolves, that is, ſhould live by rapine. They did ſo, and were thence called Hirpini Sorani, that is, Pluto's Wolves; for in the Sabine language Hirpus ſignifies a Wolf, and Soranus is the name of Pluto. If we conſult Strabo and Pliny, we cannot doubt but Servius has here committed a great blunder. He has confounded the names and hiſtory of two different people. Strabo (3) relates, that becauſe a Wolf in the language of the Samnites is called Hirpus, and becauſe a wolf was a guide to a colony that came to ſettle among the Samnites, this people were called Hirpini. As for Pliny, he affirms that in the country of the Hirpini there was a place that could not be entered without preſent death. In Hirpinis Amſancti ad Mephitis ædem, locum quem qui intravere moriuntur (4). Virgil gives a larger deſcription of this execrable place, and obſerves not only that it ſent out a curſed vapour, but alſo that it was a breathing hole of hell.

Eſt locus Italiæ medio ſub montibus altis,
Nobilis, & fama multis memoratus in oris,
Amſancti valles. - - - - - -
- - - - - - - - - - - - - -
- - - - - - - - - - - - - -

Hic ſpecus horrendum, & ſævi ſpiracula Ditis
Monſtrantur: ruptoque ingens Acheronte vorago
Peſtiferas aperit fauces - - - - (5).

In midſt of Italy well known to fame,
There lies a lake, Amſanctus is the name.
- - - - - - - - - - - - - - -
- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -
Full in the center of the ſacred wood,
An arm ariſeth of the Stygian flood,
Which, breaking from beneath with bellowing ſound,
Whirls the black waves, and rattling ſtones around.
Here Pluto pants for breath from out his cell,
And opens wide the grinning jaws of hell.

DRYDEN.

Mount Soracte had nothing of this nature; the vapour that proceeded from it was only fatal to birds, as Pliny expreſsly aſſures us: Alibi volucribus tantum ut Soracte vicino urbi tractu (6). It is plain then that Servius made this mountain a place conſecrated to Pluto, and placed it in the neighbourhood of the cave which killed men, becauſe he confounded what concerned the Hirpini, with what related to the Hirpi. See Salmaſius upon Solinus page 85.

Any one that has a mind to know what ancient authors ſay of the Hirpi may be quickly ſatisfied. The Hirpi were a ſmall number of families in the country of the Faliſci near Rome, who walked upon fire without harm. This ſpectacle was ſeen every year on mount Soracte, on the day on which they offered a ſolemn ſacrifice to Apollo. The Hirpi walked upon burning piles of wood without being burnt, and on that account obtained many privileges. Haud procul urbe Roma in Faliſcorum agro Familiæ ſunt paucæ quæ vocantur Hirpi: hæ ſacrificio annuo quod fit ad montem Soractem Apollini, ſuper ambuſtam ligni ſtruem ambulantes non aduruntur, & ob id perpetuo Senatus-conſulto militiæ omniumque aliorum munerum vacationem habent (7). Solinus thought he faithfully copied this, and did not perceive that he changed a notable circumſtance. He expreſſes himſelf in a way that ſignifies, that the Hirpi walked a-croſs the flames; Impunè inſultant ardentibus lignorum ſtruibus in honorem divinæ rei flammis parcentibus (8). And yet Pliny has not ſaid this, but plainly inſinuates, that they walked only upon the burning embers, and it cannot be doubted but that they confined themſelves to this, ſince Varro alledged, that they rubbed the ſoles of their feet with an ointment. Conſider alſo the multa premimus veſtigia pruna of Virgil, and the expreſſions of the authors we ſhall quote, and you will agree that Salmaſius juſtly blames Solinus (9). A poet later than Virgil tells us, that they who walked on the fire were three times put to this trial, loaded with the entrails of the ſacrifices, which they afterwards laid on Apollo's altars:

Tum Soracte ſatum præſtantem corpore & armis
Æquanum noſcens, patrio cui ritus in arvo,
Cum pius arcitenens accenſis gaudet acervis,
Exta ter innocuos late portare per ignes;
Sic in Apollinea ſemper veſtigia pruna
Inviolata teras, victorque vaporis ad aras
Dona ſerenato referas ſolemnia Phœbo (10).

Knowing Æquanus, from Soracte ſprung,
For ſtrength renown'd, and hardy deeds of arms,
Who, on Apollo's feaſts, the entrails bears
Thro' harmleſs flames: ſo may'ſt thou ever tread
The burning coal, and, victor o'er the heat,
Offer the ſolemn gift at Phœbus' ſhrine.

(a) Hirpus was the word for Wolf in the language of the Samnites. Strabo, lib. v, pag. 173.

(1) Servius, in Æneid. lib. xi, ver. 787.

(2) Virg. Æneid. lib. xi, ver. 785.

(3) Lib. v, pag. 173.

(4) Plin. lib. ii, cap. xciii, pag. 240.

(5) Æneid. lib. vii, ver. 563.

(6) Plin. ubi ſupra.

(7) Plin. lib. vii, cap. ii, pag. m. 10.

(8) Solin. cap. ii.

(9) Sed is eſt Solinus: verba tantummodo curat rerum ſecurus quas digerit, miræ ubique ablepſiæ incuſandus. Salmaſ. Exercitat. in Plin. pag. 86.

(10) Silius Italicus, lib. v.

lived in another place of Italy. There were antiently other feaſts, wherein the ſame ſpectacle was ſeen [C].

We have ſeen that the feaſt of mount Soracte, where the walkers on fire plaid their part ſo well was dedicated to Apollo; we now ſhall ſee it conſecrated to another deity. Strabo (11) obſerves that at the foot of this mountain there was a town called Feronia. This was alſo the name of a goddeſs who was mightily worſhipped in that diſtrict, they celebrated an admirable ſacrifice in the lucus or grove of this goddeſs. Some men who were ſeized with the ſpirit of that divinity, walked bare-foot upon a heap of burning coals and were not harmed by it. Ἧς (Φερωνίας) τέμενός ἐστιν ἐν τῷ τόπῳ θαυμαστὴν ἱεροποιίαν ἔχον· γυμνοῖς γὰρ ποσὶ διεξίασιν ἀνθρακίαν καὶ σποδιὰν μεγάλην οἱ κατεχόμενοι ὑπὸ τῆς δαίμονος ταύτης ἀπαθεῖς. Ibi eſt lucus Feroniæ, in quo ſacrificium perpetratur mirabile: correpti enim ejus numinis afflatu homines nudis pedibus prunarum ardentium ſtruem illæſi perambulant (12). There was every year a ſolemn aſſembly in that place, wherein people were diverted with that ſight. It is not for the glory of the ancients to ſee them ſo little conſiſtent one with another upon matters of fact, which muſt have been known to all people.

[C] There were antiently other feaſts wherein the ſame ſpectacle was ſeen.] There was at Caſtabala in Cappadocia a temple of Diana called Peraſia. The prieſteſſes of it walked bare-foot upon burning coals without being hurt. Strabo ſpeaks of it by hear-ſay. Ὅπου φασὶ τὰς ἱερείας γυμνοῖς τοῖς ποσὶ δι' ἀνθρακιᾶς βαδίζειν ἀπαθεῖς. Ubi aiunt ſacrificas mulieres illæſis pedibus per prunas ambulare (13). There have been mountebanks in theſe latter ages, who have done things much more ſurpriſing (14), than what is told of the Hirpi and theſe prieſteſſes. But the better to ſhow the great conformity of the ancient and modern abuſes in religion, I will here ſet down what I have heard related by the late Mr Fremont d'Ablancourt, who being a zealous Huguenot, during his ſtay at Lisbon, was a moſt exact obſerver of the tricks of the monks. He told me that there is a certain convent in Spain (15) that every year furniſhes a monk, who ſhuts himſelf up in a hot oven, and continues there ſome hours, being only cloathed with linnen. He comes out in the ſight of a multitude of people who look upon it as a great miracle. This ſhow brings in a good income to the convent, and makes it worth while to harden a monk by degrees to bear the heat. I do not reckon all the artifices that may be uſed in it.

(11) Strab. lib. v, pag. 156.

(12) Id. ibid.

(13) Ibid. lib. xii, pag. 370.

(14) See the Journal des Sçav. 1677, pag. 54, & 222. Dutch Edit.

(15) He named the place; but I have forgot it.

HOBBES, (Thomas) one of the greateſt genius's of the XVIIth century, was born at Malmeſbury in England the fifth of April 1588 [A]. He had made great progreſs in the languages [B], when at fourteen years of age he was ſent to Oxford, where he ſtudied Ariſtotle's Philoſophy five years. Afterwards he went to William Cavendiſh, baron of Hardwic, who a little after was made earl of Devonſhire, in order to be governour to his eldeſt ſon. He travelled into France and Italy with his pupil; and finding that he remembered but little, either of his Greek or Latin, and that Ariſtotle's Philoſophy, in which he had made a great progreſs, was deſpiſed by the wiſeſt heads, he applied himſelf wholly to Literature when he returned into his own country. Thucydides appearing to him to be preferable to all the Greek hiſtorians, he tranſlated him into Engliſh, and publiſhed his tranſlation in the year 1628, in order to ſhew the Engliſh, in the hiſtory of the Athenians, the diſorders and confuſions of a democratical government [C]. In [A] Was born at Malmesbury . . . the fifth of April 1588.] His mother, frighted with the reports that were current of the approach of the Spaniſh Armada, was delivered of him before her time; it is a wonder therefore that he lived ſo long. Hobbes's father was a miniſter (1).

[B] He had made great progreſs in the languages.] Before he went from Malmesbury ſchool to Oxford, he tranſlated Euripides's Medea into Latin verſe Tantos autem jam adhuc in ludo literario degens in literatura tam Latina quàm Græca progreſſus fecit, ut Euripidis Medeam ſimili metro Latinis verſibus eleganter expreſſerit (2).

[C] The diſorders and confuſions of a democratical government.] I have known men of ſenſe who have wondered, that in kingdoms where the authority of the prince is almoſt boundleſs, the inſtructors of youth are ſuffered to read the antient Greek and Latin authors, which contain ſo many examples of the love of liberty, and ſo many antimonarchical maxims. But this is no more ſurprizing than to ſee republican ſtates ſuffer the profeſſors of Law to explain the Code and the Digeſts, where there are ſo many principles which ſuppoſe the ſupreme and inviolable authority of the emperor. Here are therefore two things which ſeem equally ſurprizing, and which at the bottom ought to be no matter of ſurprize; for ſetting aſide many reaſons that might be offered, may we not ſay that the ſame works which contain the poiſon, either with reſpect to monarchies or republics, contain alſo the antidote? If you ſee on one hand the great maxims of liberty, and the noble examples of courage, with which it has been maintained or recovered; you ſee on the other, factions, ſeditions, and tumultuous freaks, that have troubled and at laſt ruined innumerable little ſtates, which ſhowed ſo great an averſion to tyranny in antient Greece. Does it not ſeem that this picture is a leſſon very capable of undeceiving thoſe, who are ſcared at the bare idea of monarchy? Hobbes believed ſo (3), ſince he, with that view, publiſhed a tranſlation of an Athenian hiſtorian. Turn the tables, and you will find that this picture will give a very different inſtruction from that before, and fortify the averſion to monarchy: for it will be asked, whence comes it that the Greeks and Romans choſe rather to be expoſed to theſe confuſions than to live under a monarch? Was it not from the hard condition to which tyrants had reduced them? And muſt it not be a very ſevere, intolerable, and deplorable evil, which they would deliver themſelves from at ſo high a price? It is certain, that the deſcription which hiſtory gives us of the conduct of ſeveral monarchs, frights us and makes our hair ſtand an end. Object not to me that generally ſpeaking, more confuſion has been occaſioned by the conſpiracies which have put an end to tyranny, than there would have been by patiently enduring it. Do not urge what I have ſaid above in the article of HIERO II (4). The Syracuſans, who had enjoyed a wonderful happineſs under the long reign of that prince, quickly loſt patience under his ſucceſſor, who governed tyrannically. They killed him at the beginning of the ſecond year of his reign; and a little after they put to death the two daughters of Hiero, and his three grand-daughters. Of theſe five ladies, there were three, againſt whom they had not the leaſt ground of complaint, and who took ſanctuary, as we may ſay, at the foot of the altars. Was not this deſtroying one tyranny to eſtabliſh a greater (5)? Has not Livy (6) juſtly obſerved upon this ſubject, that the populace is unable to keep within bounds; being humble even to baſeneſs, when they obey, and inſolent to the higheſt degree when they command? The maſſacre of theſe five ladies was not the raſh action of ſome private men; it was commanded by the ſenate and the people of Syracuſe, even whilſt the memory of Hiero was ſtill freſh in their minds, a prince whom they had ſo tenderly and ſo juſtly loved. The iniquity of their barbarous decree was ſo viſible, that they quickly perceived it, and revoked it; but to no purpoſe; it was already executed. Tandem vulneribus confectæ, cum omnia repleſſent ſanguine, exanimes corruerunt, cædemque per ſe miſerabilem, miſerabiliorem caſus fecit; quod paulo poſt nuntius venit, mutatis repente

(1) Vita Hobbeſii, pag. 32.

(2) Ibid. pag. 33.

(3) See the article PERICLES, remark [O].

(4) Remark [E].

(5) Ne tyrannos ulciſcendo, quæ odiſſent ſcelera ipſi imitarentur. T. Livius, lib. xxiv, pag. 393. This is what Heraclea, Hiero's daughter, repreſented to thoſe who murdered her.

(6) See his words above, citat. (21), of the article HIERO II.

In the year 1629, he travelled into France with an Engliſh gentleman (a), in quality of his governour, and applied himſelf to the ſtudy of the Mathematics during that journey [D]. In the year 1631, he was invited by the counteſs of Devonſhire (b), to be tutor to her ſon, who was thirteen years of age, and three years after he travelled with him into France and Italy. During his ſtay at Paris, he applied himſelf to the ſtudy of Natural Philoſophy, and eſpecially to the inquiring into the cauſes of the ſenſitive operations of animals. He daily diſcourſed with Father Merſennus, upon that ſubject. He was recalled into England in the year 1637, but having foreſeen the civil war from the time that he had obſerved what happened in the firſt ſeſſion of the parliament in the year 1640, he ſought out an agreeable retreat at Paris, where he might quietly philoſophize with Father Merſennus, Gaſſendus, and ſome other great men. There he compoſed his treatiſe de Cive [E], of which he publiſhed only a few copies in the year 1642.

(a) His name was Gervas Clifton. The father of his firſt pupil died in 1626, and his pupil in 1628.

(b) Widow of the earl of Devonſhire, father of his firſt pupil.

pente ad miſericordiam animis, ne interficerentur. Ira deinde ex miſericordia orta, quod adeò feſtinatum ad ſupplicium, neque locus penitendi aut regreſſus ab ira relictus eſſet. Itaque fremere multitudo (7). The factions did not ceaſe by the intire extirpation of the royal family, they increaſed from day to day, and in a little time ſubverted the liberty and ſovereignty of the country. They unſeaſonably expoſed Syracuſe to the enmity of the Romans, who beſieged and ſubdued it. Silius Italicus very well deſcribes the confuſion that city fell into after they had put the tyrant Hieronymus, and all his family, to death. It was a chaos from which the Romans knew how to draw a famous conqueſt. The diſcord of the city encouraged them to beſiege it.

> Sævos namque pati faſtus, juvenemque cruento
> Flagrantem luxu, & miſcentem turpia duris,
> Haud ultra faciles, quos ira metuſque coquebat
> Jurati obtruncant, nec jam modus enſibus, addunt
> Fœmineam cædem, atque inſontum rapta ſororum
> Corpora proſternunt ferro, nova ſævit in armis
> Libertas, jactatque jugum: pars Punica caſtra,
> Pars Italos & nota volunt: nec turba furentum
> Deſit, quæ neutro ſociari fœdere malit (8).

> Impatient of his luxury, and pride,
> United in conſpiracy, they ſlay
> The cruel tyrant, and avenge their wrongs.
> Nor ſtop'd the bloody vengeance of the ſword,
> Till, in his fate involv'd, his guiltleſs ſiſters fell.
> Recover'd liberty now ſtalks in arms,
> And ſhakes the galling yoke: ſome wou'd ſubmit
> Their city freed to Carthaginian ſway;
> From Italy a maſter ſome require,
> And madly ſome a neutral ſtate demand.

Repreſent all this never ſo well, you will never convince thoſe, who are prejudiced againſt monarchy: they will anſwer you, that ſince it's diſorders are not to be remedied but by ſo horrible miſeries, you ought to conclude that is a great evil.

[D] He applied to the ſtudy of the Mathematics during that journey.] It is a misfortune that he applied himſelf to it ſo late (9), he was above forty years old when he began that ſtudy, which was the reaſon that he could not perfect himſelf in it ſo much as was neceſſary, not to give a handle to his critics. His fate reſembled Scaliger's. For the reſt, he knew perfectly well on what account one ought to ſtudy Mathematics; which is not to know the properties of angles, numbers, lines, or ſuperficies; but to accuſtom one's mind to a ſolid method of reaſoning and of proving. ‘Euclidi operam dare cœpit, non tam demonſtrationum materiâ allectus, quam perſpicuitate, certitudine & indiviſa rationum ſerie delectatus. Non enim Mathematicas artes admiratus eſt vir perſpicaciſſimus, ob laterum & angulorum affectiones, aut numerorum, linearum, ſuperficierum, corporumve mutuas inter ſe proportiones (de homogeneis intelligo quantitatibus) ſubtiliter indicatas; quippe iſtiuſmodi omnia à communi vita remotiora facilè animadvertit; licet ad praxin relata uſus non adeo contemnendi; ſed quòd methodo ipſis propriâ intellectus ad rerum cognitionem optimè duceretur, atque difficilia inveniendi, vera aſſerendi, falſa redarguendi certiſſimâ ratione imbueretur (10). —— He began to ſtudy Euclid, not ſo much on account of the demonſtrations, as of the perſpicuity, certainty, and uninterrupted ſeries of the reaſoning. For this great man did not admire the Mathematics, becauſe of the ſubtile inveſtigation of the properties of ſides and angles, or of the mutual proportions of numbers, lines, ſuperficies, and bodies (I mean homogeneous quantities); for he eaſily ſaw that theſe things were not neceſſary for the common uſes in life, though when reduced to practice they be of no mean uſe. But that the underſtanding was thereby, in a method peculiar to them, led to the knowledge of things, and furniſhed with the moſt certain means of diſcovering difficult truths, of proving what is found to be true, and refuting what is falſe.’

[E] He compoſed his treatiſe de Cive at Paris.] He printed but a few copies of it at Paris in 1642. He reviſed it a little after, and enlarged it, as it came out in the Amſterdam edition in 1647. It was Sorbiere who procured that ſecond edition. He did more, for he tranſlated this book into French, and publiſhed it in that language (11). Hobbes got many enemies by that work; but he obliged the beſt judges to own, that the foundations of Politics had never been ſo well diſcovered before. I doubt not but he carried many things too far, which is uſual with thoſe who write in oppoſition to a party, againſt which they have conceived a great averſion. Hobbes was enraged againſt the principles of the parliamentarians (12), their conduct was the cauſe of his living out of his own country, and he learned every day in the place of his exile, that their rebellion triumphed over the royal authority. He went into the other extreme, and taught that the authority of kings ought to be abſolute, and that in particular the externals of religion, as being the moſt fruitful cauſe of civil wars, ought to depend upon their will. Some people are of opinion, that if we conſider only the theory, his ſyſtem is well connected, and very ſuitable to the ideas that may be formed of a ſtate well ſecured againſt commotions. But becauſe the moſt reaſonable notions are ſubject to a thouſand inconveniencies, when they come to be reduced into practice, that is, when they are ſet in oppoſition to a horrible multitude of paſſions, which prevail amongſt mankind, it was no difficult thing to find many faults in the political ſyſtem of this author. He might have anſwered, that the oppoſite ſyſtem, even in the theory, includes a neceſſary principal of confuſion and rebellion. However it be, it is ſaid that the love of his country inſpired him with the deſign of that work, and that he intended by it to undeceive his countrymen with reſpect to the falſe principles, which produced there an horrible contempt of the royal authority. ‘Graſſante interim per Angliam civili bello, Hobbius pro ſummo in patriam amore, quod bonum & fidelem ſubditum maximè decuit; populares ſuos ſanioribus quam quæ hactenus obtinuerant principiis imbuere, exacerbatos hominum animos ad pacis & concordiæ rationes revocare, & in ſummæ poteſtatis obſequium addictiores præſtare anniſus eſt. Quare reliquis poſthabitis ſtudiis, quantum ipſi ſuppetiit tempores Politicæ ſcientiæ impendens, Librum de Cive (cujus pauca duntaxat Exemplaria Pariſiis 1642, evulgaverat) reviſit, & notis utilibus addauxit, in quo ſubditorum contra ſummum imperatorem conjuratione, rebellioneſque, & immanes illas de principe regnis vitaque exuendo opiniones penitus damnavit: poteſtati Civili jura ab Eccleſiaſticis caliginoſorum temporum beneficio prærepta reſtituit, & diram ſectariorum hydram effrœnem nempe conſcientiæ libertatem, heroico auſu perdomuit (13). —— While the civil wars raged in England, Hobbes, out of his great love to his country, and as became a good and loyal ſubject, endeavoured to teach his countrymen

---

(7) Tit. Liv. lib. xxiv, cap. xxvi.

(8) Sil. Italicus, lib. xiv, pag. m. 589.

(9) Dolendum nobile hoc ingenium eodem quo & magnum Scaligerum infortunio laboraſſe, quod Mathematicis ſtudiis ſerius paulo animum adjecit. Vita Hobbeſ. pag. 40.

(10) Ibid. pag. 39.

(11) At Amſterdam 1649.

(12) Tum pro ſuo in Regem officio atque obſequio, tum pro decumano quo ſemper in Democraticos odio laboravit, libellum ſcripſit juris regii aſſerendi gratia, qui poſtea in librum de Cive, & tandem in Leviathan excrevit. Vita Hobbeſii, pag. 45.

(13) Ibid. pag. 45.

1642. He taught Mathematics to the prince of Wales, who was forced to retire into France; and he beſtowed all his leiſure hours in compoſing his Leviathan [F], which he cauſed to be printed in England in 1651, being ſtill at Paris. Though he had given proofs of his faith according to the rites of the church of England [G], yet he was made

'men ſounder principles than had as yet obtained among them, to ſooth their heated minds into a love of peace and concord, and to inſpire them with more ſubmiſſion to the ſupreme powers. To this end, laying aſide all other ſtudies, he employed all his time in the ſtudy of politics, he reviſed his book De Cive (of which he had only printed a few copies at Paris in 1642), and enlarged it with uſeful notes, and therein for ever deſtroyed the doctrine of the lawfulneſs of ſubjects conſpiring and rebelling againſt their ſovereigns, and the monſtrous opinions of dethroning and executing of princes: reſtoring to the civil powers thoſe rights of which they had been robbed by Eccleſiaſtics in the ages of ignorance, and heroically ſubduing that cruel hydra of the ſectaries, I mean the boundleſs liberty of conſcience.' I am perſuaded none will be diſpleaſed to ſee here Mr Des Cartes's judgment concerning this work of Hobbes's. 'I believe, ſays he (14), that the author of the book De Cive, is the ſame who wrote the three objections againſt my Meditations (15). I find him much better ſkilled in morality, than in Metaphyſics or Phyſics: tho' I can by no means approve his maxims and principles, which are very bad, and dangerous, in as much as he ſuppoſes all men wicked, or gives them occaſion to be ſo. His whole deſign is to eſpouſe the cauſe of monarchy: which might be done to much better advantage, by going upon more virtuous and more ſolid maxims: he writes alſo very much to the prejudice of the church and the Romiſh religion; ſo that if he is not particularly ſupported by ſome powerful intereſt I do not ſee how his book can eſcape being cenſured.' Mr Des Cartes had reaſon to diſapprove of Hobbes's ſuppoſition, that all men are wicked: which puts me in mind that Montagne, notwithſtanding he ſo well underſtood the imperfections of humane kind, doth not approve of Guiciardin's attributing to wicked motives, all the actions he relates in his hiſtory (16). It is certain that there are ſome men who govern themſelves by the ideas of virtue, and the deſire of a noble glory, and that the generality of men are but moderately wicked. This mediocrity, I confeſs, is ſufficient to fill the train of human actions with inquities, and to leave almoſt every where marks of the corruption of the heart; but it would be much worſe (17), if the greateſt part of men were not capable of giving on many occaſions a check to their evil inclinations, through the fear of diſgrace, or the hopes of commendation. Now this is a ſign that depravation is not arrived to the higheſt point: I do not conſider here the good influences of the true religion; I conſider man in general.

POLITICAL ideas fail in practice.

As to the inconveniencies that might ariſe from the practice of Hobbes's ſuppoſitions, I ſay once more, that this is not the part on which he ought to be attacked, for has not the oppoſite ſyſtem many great inconveniencies in the practice? let a man do the beſt he can, let him build better ſyſtems than Plato's republic, More's Utopia, or Campanella's Common-wealth of the Sun, &c. All theſe fine ideas will be found ſhort and deficient, when they come to be reduced to practice. The paſſions of men, that ariſe from one another in a prodigious variety, would preſently ruin the hopes we had conceived from theſe fine ſyſtems. See what happens when Mathematicians attempt to apply their ſpeculations, about lines and points, to matter: they do what they pleaſe with their lines and ſuperficies, which are only meer ideas of our mind; they ſuffer us to diveſt them of their dimenſions, and by this means we demonſtrate the fineſt things imaginable concerning the nature of the circle, and the infinite diviſibility of matter. But all tihs is found defective when applyed to that matter which exiſts out of our minds, that is to hard and impenetrable matter. This may ſerve for an image of human paſſions, compared with the ſpeculations of a man, who forms a notion of a perfect government. You will find ſolid animadverſions upon Hobbes's Politic Syſtem in the author that I cite (18).

[F] He beſtowed all his leiſure hours in compoſing his Leviathan.] By that great beaſt he means the body politic. The divines of the church of England, who were in France with Charles II, made great out-cries againſt this work, ſaying that it contained many impieties, and that the author was not of the royal party (19). Their complaints were heard: Hobbes was ordered to come no more to court; and as he had extreamly provoked the Papiſts, he thought it was not ſafe for him to be in France, after he had loſt the protection of the king of England. 'Hoc tanto præſidio orbatus Hobbius, Romanæ Eccleſiæ, Spiritualis Monarchiæ ſatellitum metu correptus eſt quorum odium implacabile ſeſe merito incurriſſe ſenſerat, ob detectas in Levithane Eccleſiaſticorum technas, regni tenebrarum dolos, Pontificis Romani poteſtatum malis artibus occupatam, quà in civilis Poteſtatis jura involando, quà ſimplici ac imperitæ plebeculæ ſanctis præſtigiis illudendo; quare Pariſiis ſe minus tutum judicans, mediâ Hyemis tempeſtate aufugiens, in patriam ſe contulit (20). —— Hobbes being deprived of this great protection, became afraid of the emiſſaries of the church of Rome, that ſpiritual monarchy, whoſe implacable hate he knew he had incurred, by detecting, in his Leviathan, the frauds of the Eccleſiaſtics, the deceits of the kingdom of darkneſs, the authority of the Pope of Rome, acquired by wicked arts, viz. either by ſeizing on the rights of the civil powers, or by deceiving the ſimple and ignorant populace by holy cheats; therefore not thinking himſelf ſafe at Paris, he retired from thence in the middle of winter, and came over into England.' He tranſlated his Leviathan into Latin, and printed it with an appendix in the year 1668 (21). Ten years after it was printed in Dutch. The ſummary of this work is this, that without peace there can be no ſecurity in a ſtate; and that peace cannot ſubſiſt without command, nor command without arms; and that arms are of no uſe, unleſs in the hand of a ſingle perſon; and that the fear of arms cannot induce ſuch perſons to peace who are carried to war by an evil more terrible than death, that is, by diſſenſions about things neceſſary to ſalvation. Ejus autem ſumma hæc fuit, ſine Pace, impoſſibilem eſſe incolumitatem, ſine Imperio Pacem, ſine Armis Imperium, ſine opibus in unam manum collatis nihil valere Arma, neque metu Armorum quicquam ad pacem profici poſſe in illis, quos ad pugnandum concitat malum morte magis formidandum; nempe dum conſenſum non ſit de iis rebus, quæ ad ſalutem æternam neceſſariæ creduntur, pacem inter cives non poſſe eſſe diuturnam (22). The Leviathan has been much written againſt, eſpecially in England (23).

[G] He had given proofs of his faith according to the rites of the church of England.] Being very ſick near Paris, he was viſited by Father Merſennus, who had been adviſed not to let him die out of the pale of the church. That good father ſitting near the ſick man, after the common preambles of conſolation, began a diſcourſe about the power of the Romiſh church to pardon ſins; Father, replyed Hobbes, I have long ſince examined all theſe things, and it would be uneaſy to me to diſpute about them at preſent; you can entertain me in a more agreeable manner. When did you ſee Mr Gaſſendus? The good monk eaſily underſtood what he meant by that queſtion, and turned his diſcourſe to another ſubject (24). Dr Coſins (25) a few days after offered to pray with Hobbes, which he agreed to, provided he made uſe of the prayers of the church of England (26). After prayers he received the ſacrament. Cum non amplius cuiquam relictus eſt fucum faciendi locus eo momento ſe Religioni patriis legibus ſtabilitæ addictiſſimum oſtendit, & precibus juxta Eccleſiæ Anglicanæ ritus præmiſſis ſupremum Viaticum recepit (27). Being returned into England in the year 1651, he found the churches in the poſſeſſion of the rebels, as he ſaid, who had no liturgy, and he was three months without knowing with whom to communicate. 'Concionantes quidem invenit in Eccleſiis, ſed ſeditioſos: etiam preces extemporarias, & illas audaces, & nonnunquam blaſphemas, Symbolum autem fidei nullum, Decalogum nullum: adeo ut per tres primos menſes non invenerit quibuſcum in ſacris communicare potuerit (28). —— He found preachers indeed in the made odious to the epiſcopal party, and with ſuch ſucceſs as to be ordered to appear no more about the king (c). This occaſioned his return into England, where conſidering his great merit, he lived but in an obſcure manner with the earl of Devonſhire [H]. He drew this advantage from his obſcure condition, that he had more leiſure to compoſe his book de Corpore, and ſome others [I]. He received great marks of eſteem from Charles II at the reſtoration in 1660 [K]. From that time to his death, he applied himſelf to his ſtudies, and to defend himſelf againſt his adverſaries, who were very numerous. He retained the uſe of his underſtanding till his laſt ſickneſs [L], though he had lived more than ninety one years. His long life was conſtantly that of a perfectly honeſt man; he loved his country, was faithful to his prince, a good friend, charitable, and obliging: notwithſtanding all this, he has paſſed for an Atheiſt; but they who have written his life, maintain that he had very orthodox opinions about the nature of God [M]. It

---

(14) Tom. III, of his Letters, pag. 104, apud Baillet, Vie de Des Cartes, Tom. II, pag. 174.

(15) He was not miſtaken.

(16) See the article GUICCIARDIN, remark [E].

(17) The reaſon why innocence is not oppreſſed on many occaſions, is the mediocrity I ſpeak of here. See, above, remark [A] of the article EDWARD IV.

(18) Galeottus Galeatius Karlſbergius, apud Deckherum de Scriptis adeſpotis, pag. 328.

(19) Hobbium tanquam partibus regiis minus addictum tum ut novarum impiarumque in religione opinionum authorem criminabantur. Vita Hobb. pag. 61.

(20) Ibid. pag. 62.

(21) At Amſterdam for J. ln Blaeuw with his other philoſophical works, in two volumes, in 4to. He could not get a licence to have his books printed in England. Ibid. pag. 70.

(22) Ib. pag. 45.

(23) The Catalogue of the books printed againſt the Leviathan, and the other works Hobbes, are to be found at the end of his Life.

(24) Ib. pag. 20.

(25) He was afterwards biſhop of Durham.

(26) Obtulit ſe illi comprecatorem ad Deum. Cui ille cum gratias reddidiſſet, ita inquit ſi precibus præiveris juxta ritum Eccleſiæ noſtræ. Ibid.

(27) Ib. pag. 59.

(28) Ib. pag. 21.

' churches, but ſeditious ones; extemporary prayers alſo, but theſe irreverent and ſometimes blaſphemous, no creed, no decalogue; ſo that he was three months without knowing with whom to communicate.' But at three months end he was carried to a congregation, where the Lord's Supper was celebrated according to the church of England, and he communicated there. The author of his life makes this a characterſtic of his adherence to the epiſcopal party, and of the ſincerity of his Chriſtianity, ſince no man was then obliged to join with any particular communion. Alterum hoc ſignum erat non modo hominis partium Epiſcopalium, ſed etiam Chriſtiani ſinceri; nam illo tempore ad Eccleſiam quamcumque legibus aut metu cogebatur nemo (29).

[H] He lived in an obſcure manner with the earl of Devonſhire.] Not but that he had powerful friends; but as he had great enemies, all that could be done for him was to hinder his being oppreſſed. So his condition was the effect of an æquilibrium betwixt his friends and enemies(30). He lived the reſt of his days with the earl of Devonſhire.

[I] He compoſed his book de Corpore, and ſome others.] This book came out at London in 1655, intituled Elementorum Philoſophiæ ſectio prima de corpore. The year following Hobbes publiſhed Prælectiones ſex ad Profeſſores Savilianos. His book de Homine, ſive elementorum Philoſophiæ ſectio ſecunda, was printed at London in the year 1658. And his Queſtions concerning Liberty, and Neceſſity, and Chance, clearly ſtated and debated between him and Dr Bramhall biſhop of London-Derry in 1656 in 4to. He had a diſpute upon the ſame ſubject with Benjamin Laney, biſhop of Ely, which he did not publiſh till 1676 (31). Dr Wallis, profeſſor of Geometry at Oxford, having publiſhed his Elenchus Geometriæ Hobbianæ in the year 1655, raiſed a war which laſted till Hobbes's death, and had been carried on with a great deal of bitterneſs on both ſides. ' Diuturni illius belli Mathematici claſſicum cecinit, quod acerrimo Marte, adhibitis quadra & circino, intervolantibus nonnunquam acutiſſimis convitiorum telis, utrinque geſtum vicennium & amplius perduravit, nec tandem niſi Hobbiana morte conquievit (32). ' He ſounded the charge to that long mathematical war, which was carried on with great vigour with ſquare and compaſs, and ſometimes with great vollies of invectives on both ſides, for above twenty years, and which only ended by Hobbes's death.' Sorbiere hath mentioned this diſpute (33).

[K] He received great marks of eſteem from Charles II] Hobbes left the country to come to London, as ſoon as he had notice of the king's arrival. This prince paſſing in his coach by the houſe where Hobbes lived, perceived him, and deſired him to come to him. He gave him his hand to kiſs, and inquired about his condition and health. Some time after he gave him a particular audience, aſſured him of his affection, and promiſed him an eaſy acceſs to him (34). He cauſed his picture to be drawn by an excellent Painter, and placed it in his cloſet (35), and which was a more ſubſtantial mark of his affection, he gave him an annual penſion of (36) a hundred jacobus's (37).

[L] He retained the uſe of his underſtanding till his laſt ſickneſs.] He was not only capable of ſtudying Mathematics, when above eighty ſix years old, but alſo of writing very long poems. ' Quod autem inter rara fœlicitatis exempla numerandum eſt, ſummo ingenii vigore & ſenſibus integris ad obitum uſque in Philoſophia & Matheſi ſe aſſiduò exercitavit, & quod magis mirum, Poëſin exercuit, quâ propriis animi conceptibus exprimendis, quâ aliorum transferendis (38). ——— He had the rare good fortune to enjoy an entire vigour of mind, and the uſe of all his ſenſes till his death, which he employed in the ſtudy of Philoſophy and Mathematics, and which is ſtill more extraordinary in poetry, ſometimes compoſing, at other times tranſlating.' He tranſlated into Engliſh verſe, ſome books of the Odyſſeys in the year 1674, and becauſe that Eſſay had the appobation of the learned, he publiſhed a like verſion of the Iliads, and the whole Odyſſeys a little after, with a diſſertation upon the excellencies of heroic poetry (39).

[M] The writers of his life maintain that he had very orthodox opinions about the nature of GOD.] Of all the moral virtues there were hardly any but religion, that could be a matter of diſpute in the perſon of Hobbes. He was frank (40), civil, and communicative of what he knew (41), a good friend, a good relation, charitable to the poor (42), a great obſerver of equity (43), and was not at all ſollicitous about gathering wealth (44). This laſt quality is a favourable prejudice for the goodneſs of his life. For there is not a more copious ſource of bad actions than avarice. So that they who knew Hobbes, had no occaſion to aſk him whether he eſteemed and loved virtue; but one might have been tempted to put this queſtion to him:

Heus age, reſponde, minimum eſt quod ſcire laboro,
De Jove quid ſentis (45)?

But prithee tell me, 'tis a ſmall requeſt,
What ſort of thoughts of Jove has you poſſeſs'd.

The anſwer he might have ſincerely made, if we believe thoſe who wrote his life, had been this; that there is one God who is the origin of all things, but who ought not to be circumſcribed in the ſphere of our narrow reaſon (46). He would have added, that he embraced Chriſtianity as it was by law eſtabliſhed in England (47), but that he had an averſion to theological diſputes; that he chiefly eſteemed what tends to the practice of piety and good manners, and that he was uſed to blame the prieſts, who corrupted the ſimplicity of religion, by the mixture of a ſuperſtitious worſhip, or of many vain and profane ſpeculations. Quicquid autem ad pietatis exercitia, aut bonos mores conferret, plurimi fecit. Sanctius illi, & reverentius viſum, de Deo credere quam ſcire. Sacerdotes interim inculpare ſolitus eſt, qui Chriſtianam Religionem abſolutam ac ſimplicem, vel ſuperſtitione macularent, vel inanibus interdum profanis ſpeculationibus implicarent (48). They conclude, that perſons who accuſe him of Atheiſm, are horrible ſlanderers, who could alledge no other pretence for doing ſo than perhaps this, which was, that he had rejected many ſcholaſtic doctrines, by which certain attributes are aſcribed to God, the model of which are taken from our narrow genius. Quare fortiter calumniati ſunt, qui ipſum Atheiſmi reum detulerunt; quod inde forſitan profectum quia Scholaſticorum aliorumque iſto de grege morem rejecerat, qui otioſi in Muſæis ſuis ſedentes, juxta imbecillem ingenioli ſui captum, Naturæ Divinæ incomperta affingunt attributa (49). It is certain there is no accuſation, that is fallen into greater abuſe than that of Atheiſm. Abundance of narrow ſouls, or ill-natured people, fix it upon all thoſe, who, in their affimations on this ſubject, confine themſelves to the great and ſublime truths of ſolid Metaphyſics, and the general doctrines of ſcripture. They would fain oblige them, beſides theſe, to adopt all the particular articles which they are uſed to recommend

---

(c) See the remark [F].

(29) Ibid.

(30) Stantem inter amicos & inimicos quaſi in æquilibrio, fecerunt illi ne ob doctrinam opprimeretur, hi ne augeretur. Ibid. pag. 22.

(31) Ib. pag. 99.

(32) Ibid pag. 64, 65.

(33) Sorbiere Relation d'Anglet. pag. 78, Dutch Edit.

(34) Vita Hobbeſii, pag. 66.

(35) Ibid pag. 28. & 103. See Sorbiere, Relation d'Anglet. pag. 79.

(36) Vita Hobb. pag. 53.

(37) Sorbiere, ubi ſupra.

(38) Vita Hobb. pag 98, 99.

(39) Ib. pag. 99.

(40) Ib. pag. 30, & 111.

(41) Ib. pag. 111.

(42) Ib. pag. 108.

(43) Juſtitiæ erat cum ſcientiſſimus tum tenaciſſimus. Ibid. pag. 30.

(44) Cum eſſet pecuniæ negligentiſſimus. Ib.

(45) Perſius, Sat. II. ver. 17.

(46) Deum agnovit eumque rerum omnium originem, intra anguſtos tamen humanæ rationis cancellos nullatenus circumſcribendum. Vita Hobb. pag. 105.

(47) Religionem Chriſtianam quatenus in Eccleſia Anglicana, refectis ſuperſtitionis ineptiis regni legibus ſtabilitur, ex animo amplexus eſt. Ibid. pag. 106.

(48) Ibid. pag. 107.

(49) Ibid.

It has been ſaid alſo, that he was afraid of apparition and ſpirits [N]; but they maintain that this is a fable. They honeſtly confeſs, that in his youth he was a little given to wine and women (d); but that nevertheleſs, he lived a bachelor, that he might not be diverted from his ſtudy of Philoſophy. He had meditated much more than he had read [O]; and he never cared to collect a great library. He died the fourth of December, 1679, at the earl of Devonſhire's, after a ſickneſs of ſix weeks (e).

(d) Ætate adhuc intra juventutis terminos conſtante (liceat verum fateri) nec abſtemius fuit, nec μισόγυνος. Vita Hobbeſ. pag. 104.

(e) Taken from his Life, printed in 1682.

over and over to the people. All who dare deviate from that road, are Infidels and Libertines, if you will believe ſome doctors. It was on this account that Monconys incurred this bad imputation. He diſputed ſometimes very freely againſt thoſe who debaſe the greatneſs of God, by the conduct which they aſcribe to him, and by the weak reaſons they alledge; and he was unjuſtly called a Libertine, tho' he had the ſublimeſt idea of God that can be imagined. Read what follows: ‘ that agreeable way which he took ſometimes ‘ of contradicting ſome narrow-minded people, who, ‘ by their arguments, weaken the truths they would ‘ confirm, occaſioned theſe prejudiced perſons to take this ‘ effect of his openneſs and candour for a criminal li‘ cence. But his ſolid virtue, and ſincere piety, were ‘ every where conſpicuous, and he gave teſtimonies of ‘ it, which you may ſee in theſe travels. In his laſt ‘ ſickneſs he confeſſed to one of his friends, that he ‘ had always preſerved in his heart a profound ſub‘ miſſion, and an infinite reverence for the Deity, of ‘ whom he had a more exalted idea, than all that ‘ men have conceived of him. When he was at A‘ lexandria, at a time when he ſeemed to deny nothing ‘ to his curioſity, being alone one night, upon one of ‘ the terraſſes, which ſerve for a roof to the Buildings ‘ of the Levant, he found himſelf ſuddenly ſo filled with ‘ a ſenſible knowledge of the Deity, that he ſpent part ‘ of that night with unſpeakable conſolation, in a con‘ tinual adoration of the principle of all beings (50).’

[N] It has been ſaid alſo that he was afraid of apparitions and ſpirits.] His friends call this a fable. ‘ Nec minus falſo à nonnullis inſimulatus eſt, tanquam ‘ ſolitudinem fugeret, ſpectra metuens & phantaſmata, ‘ vana ſtultorum terriculamenta, quæ Philoſophiæ ſuæ ‘ lumine diſſipaverat (51). —— He was as falſly accuſed ‘ by ſome of being unwilling to be alone, becauſe he was ‘ afraid of ſpectres and apparitions, vain bugbears of ‘ fools, which he had chaſed away by the light of his ‘ Philoſophy.’ But it ſeems they do not deny, that he durſt not be alone, they only inſinuate, that the reaſon of it was his fear of being aſſaſſinated. If his Philoſophy freed him from the other fear, and not from this, it did not hinder him from being miſerable, and a thought of Horace might be applied to him.

Somnia, terrores magicos, miracula, ſagas,
Nocturnos lemures, portentaque Theſſala rides?
- - - - - - - -
Quid te exempta juvat ſpinis de pluribus una?

To ſay this by the by, his principles of Philophy were not proper to rid him from the fear of the apparitions of ſpirits: for to reaſon conſequentially there are no Philoſophers who have leſs right to reject magic, and ſorcery, than thoſe who deny the exiſtence of a God. But you will ſay Hobbes denied the exiſtence of ſpirits; ſay rather, that he believed there are no ſubſtances diſtinct from matter. Now, as that did not hinder him from believing, that there are many ſubſtances, which deſign, and do good or ill to others, he might and ought to believe, that there are beings in the air, or elſewhere, as capable of miſchief as the corpuſcles which, according to his ſyſtem, form all our thoughts in our brain. How come theſe corpuſcles to be better acquainted with the means of doing miſchief than thoſe other beings? And what reaſon is there to prove, that theſe other beings are ignorant of the manner of acting upon our brain, in order to make us ſee an apparition?

Let us conſider the matter in another light. A man would not only be very raſh, but alſo very extravagant, who ſhould pretend to prove that there never was any perſon that imagined he ſaw a ſpectre; and I do not think that the moſt obſtinate and extravagant unbelievers have maintained this. All that they ſay comes to this, that the perſons who have thought themſelves eye-witneſſes of the apparition of ſpirits, had a diſturbed imagination. They confeſs then, that there are certain places in our brain, that, being affected in a certain manner, excite the image of an object which has no real exiſtence out of our ſelves, and make the man, whoſe brain is thus modifyed, believe he ſees at two paces diſtance, a frightful ſpectre, a hobgobling, a threatning phantome. The like happens in the heads of the moſt incredulous, either in their ſleep, or in the paroxyſms of a violent fever. Will they maintain after this, that it is impoſſible for a man awake, and not in a Delirium, to receive in certain places of his brain, an impreſſion almoſt like that which by the laws of nature is connected with the appearance of a phantome? if they are forced to acknowledge that this is poſſible, they cannot promiſe, that a ſpectre will never appear to them, that is, that they ſhall never, when awake, believe they ſee either a man, or a beaſt, when they are alone in a chamber. Hobbes then might believe, that a certain combination of atoms, agitated in his brain, might expoſe him to ſuch a viſion, though he was perſuaded, that neither an angel nor the ſoul of a dead man was to be concerned in it. He was timorous to the laſt degree, and conſequently he had reaſon to diſtruſt his imagination, when he was alone in a chamber in the night; for in ſpite of him, the memory of what he had read, and heard concerning apparitions would revive, though he was not perſuaded of the reality of theſe things. Theſe images, joined with the timorouſneſs of his temper, might play him an unlucky trick. And it is certain, that a man, as incredulous as he was, but of greater courage, would be aſtoniſhed to think he ſaw one whom he knew to be dead enter into his chamber. Theſe apparitions in dreams are very frequent, whether a man believes the immortality of the ſoul or not. Suppoſing they ſhould once happen to an incredulous man awake, as they do frequently in his ſleep, we allow that he would be afraid, tho' he had never ſo much courage. And therefore for a ſtronger reaſon we ought to believe, that Hobbes would have been terribly affrighted at it.

[O] He had meditated much more than he had read.] It is ingenuouſly confeſſed in his life, that for a man who lived ſo long, his reading was inconſiderable. Nay he was uſed to ſay, that if he had beſtowed as much time on reading, as other men of letters, he ſhould have been as ignorant as they (53). He conſidered another thing, which induced him to make no great account of vaſt libraries; which is, that moſt books are extracts, and copies of others. ‘ Lectio ejus ‘ pro tanto ætatis decurſu non magna; Authores verſabat paucos, ſed tamen optimos. Homerus, Virgilius, ‘ Thucydides, Euclides, illi in deliciis erant. Ingentem ‘ Librorum ſuppellectilem, quâ ſuperbiunt Bibliothecæ, ‘ non magnifecit, cum Mortales plerumque pecorum ‘ ritu antecedentium inſiſtentes veſtigiis, vix extra tri‘ tas calles, & ſemitas ab ipſis quorum Tutelæ & Re‘ gimini ſubſunt, præſtitutas, evagari audeant (54). ‘ —— His reading, for a man of his years, was not ‘ great; he was well acquainted with a few, and thoſe ‘ the beſt authors. He was a great admirer of Homer, ‘ Virgil, Thucydides, and Euclid. He made no great ‘ account of large libraries, obſerving that men for the ‘ moſt part following one another's ſteps like ſheep, have ‘ ſeldom the courage to go out of the trodden paths and ‘ roads, which are preſcribed to them by their guides.’

(50) Preface to the Voyages of Monconys, pag. 7.

(51) Vita Hobb. pag. 106.

(52) Horat. Epiſt. ii. lib. ii, ver. 208.

(53) Quin & illud ſæpe dicere ſolitus eſt, quod ſi tantum libris incubuiſſet, quantum alii è Literatis vulgo faciunt, eâdem cum illis ignorantiâ laboraſſet. Vita Hobb. pag. 112.

(54) Ibid.

HOCHSTRATUS, or HOCHSTRATANUS, (James) took his name from the village where he was born (a). He ſtudied Philoſophy at Louvain, and took his maſter of arts degree there in 1485. He became a Dominican friar, and was made prior of the monaſtery of Cologne, doctor and profeſſor of Divinity, and inquiſitor in the three eccleſiaſtical electorates (b). Never was a man more worthy to be honoured

(a) Hooghſtraten in Brabant, between Antwerp and Bergopzoom.

(b) Valer Andr. Biblioth. Belg. pag. 412.

honoured with this laſt employment, for he was amply provided with all the ill qualities that are neceſſary to inquiſitors and informers. He was violent: he accuſed upon the ſlighteſt pretences; he would be both judge and party [A], he produced very unfaithful abſtracts (c), and would never own himſelf a ſlanderer; he advanced hereſies with impunity in the writings, wherein he pretended to confute heretics [B]. He once was

(c) See the remark [A].

THE diſpute between Reuchlin and Hochſtrat.

[A] He would be both judge and party.] This manifeſtly appeared in the buſineſs of Reuchlin. A Jew (1) converted to the Chriſtian religion, had defamed him in a book, intituled Manuale Speculum. Reuchlin juſtified himſelf by a book, intituled, Speculum Oculare, in which, he ſhewed, that his enemies had vented againſt him above thirty four calumnies (2). Hochſtratus, the principal abettor of the converted Jew, intereſted the divines of Cologne in that affair, and made them draw ſome extracts from the Speculum Oculare, which were publiſhed with artful notes, to defame Reuchlin every where as a favourer of Judaiſm. Nothing could be more unfaithful than theſe extracts. ‘Has propoſitiones . . . . . ubi vidit Reuchlinus peſſimè ac non ſine crimine falſi ex Oculari Speculo excerptas . . . . rogat theologos illos &c. . . . . Erupit tota Theologorum concio ſuppetias Chriſti ſacris recens initiato Judæo latura duce Tungro, qui articulos ſeu propoſitiones de Judaico favore nimis ſuſpectas ex Speculo Oculari extruxit, adjectis annotationibus & animadverſionibus: atque hoc omne non vernacula lingua, qua utrinque hactenus certatum fuit, adornat, ſed Latina; eo haud dubiè conſilio, ut apud exteras gentes nationeſque nomen Capnionis inviſum redderet, & cum perverſa interpretatione, cum mutila dictorum citatione ſecurius falleret (3). Reuchlin anſwered this work by a Latin apology addreſſed to the emperor. Hereupon a proceſs in form was entred againſt him before the elector of Mentz. His great age not permitting him to appear in perſon, he ſent thither a proxy, who offered very juſt cauſes of exceptions againſt our James Hochſtratus; but they were not heard. ‘Cum propter ſenium & imbecillitatem corporis tantum iter tam brevi temporis ſpacio conficere non poſſet, mittebat eò curatorem Petrum Staffelium Nurtingenſem, qui actorem Hochſtratam tanquam inimicum ſibi infenſiſſimum & meritò ſuſpectum recuſabat, ob eas cauſſas, quas publice allegabat . . . . . Tametſi vero nil obtineret Reuchlinus (4).’ Hochſtratus would not ſuffer himſelf to be accuſed (5). Hereupon Reuchlin's proxy ſued him by an appeal the court of Rome. Hochſtratus however cauſed the ſentence to be paſſed; and without waiting till the fifteen days, before which it ought not to be promulged, were expired, he ordered all the curates of Mentz to give notice to the people, that all thoſe who had Reuchlin's book, ſhould bring it immediately to the commiſſioners, on pain of excommunication. ‘Interea Hochſtratus quaſi jam acturus triumphum omnibus per Moguntiacum ſacerdotibus mandat, ut publice populum ſub proſcriptionis pœna monerent, ſi qui Oculare Speculum haberent, illud quantocyus eam in rem delegatis traderent (6).’ Reuchlin appealed to the Pope. Hochſtratus did the ſame. The biſhop of Spire, who was commiſſioned by the Pope to judge of that cauſe, (7), named judges, who cited the parties. Hochſtratus did not appear, and was ſentenced for contumacy to pay all the charges; he was forbid, under great penalties, to continue his proceedings, and the accuſation of the divines of Cologne was declared null. ‘Hochſtratus licet more conſueto per intervalla citatus, tamen non comparuit. Cauſſa nihilo ſeciùs diſcutitur & ſecundum Reuchlinum pronunciator: nullum errorem ab Eccleſia damnatum in libro ſæpiùs commemorato reperiri, nec plus eum favere Judæis, quam religio & jura ſinant, injuſte ergo ac præter veritatem eum delatum à Colonienſibus eſſe. Hochſtratus autem contumaciæ criminis reus, &c (8).’ However, the latter burnt John Reuchlin's book. ‘Hæc dum aguntur Spiræ, Colonienſes nefario auſu librum Reuchlini damnant, citra tamen contumeliam ut ajebant, & Februario deinde menſe anno ſupra milleſimum quingenteſimum decimo quarto exurunt, approbantibus factum Lovanienſi, Erphordenſi, Moguntina & Pariſienſi Univerſitatibus (9). —— While theſe things are tranſacting at Spire, they of Cologne, had the boldneſs to condemn Reuchlin's book, but without reflecting contumely on him as they pretended, and in the month of Febuary 1514, burnt it, which action was approved by the univerſities of Louvain, Erford, Mentz, and Paris. But I ſay this only occaſionally; the main thing I am to prove is, that this monk would be both judge and party. It is this he is accuſed of more than once in a poem intituled, Triumphus Doctoris Reuchlini (10).

Accuſat Capnionem & judicat idem
Acer Hogoſtratus (11). - - -
- - - - - - - -
Sed neque perditior neque flagitioſior alter
In Capniona fuit, tunc, cum tu perdite judex
Lectus, & abſurdis in litibus arbiter eſſes
Idem accuſator. Dic quo veſane pudorem
Fert omnem tibi livor edax (12).

Hochſtrat wou'd both accuſe, and judge, his foe,
- - - - - - - - -
Yet againſt Capnio did'ſt thou vent thy rage,
With unexampled ſpleen, when choſen judge
In conteſt moſt abſurd, you firſt accus'd,
Then ſentence paſs'd: ſay, madman that thou art,
Has malice robb'd thee of all modeſty?

[B] He advanced hereſies with impunity. In the writings wherein he pretended to confute Heretics.] We might ſee the catologue of them, if we had the book with which Agrippa threatened the Jacobins (13). For ſee what he repreſents to the migiſtrates of Cologne: ‘Unum tamen illorum excipio, Jacobum Hoſtratum, tunc Prædicatorum ordinis hæreticorum Magiſtrum, vulgo & veraciter dictum, qui taliter ſcripſit contra Lutheranas hæreſes, ut ipſe ſe proderet hæreticorum omnium peſtilentiſſimum. Sed ne quis veſtrum illius olim amicus, aut illius hypocriſi excæcatus, vel aliter deceptus, me non favore veritatis, ſed aut invidia aut alia offenſa iſta dicere putet rem ipſam digito monſtrabo. Nam in libro ſuo contra Lutheranos, quem Reverendiſſimo Cardinali ac Illuſtri Principi & Epiſcopo Leodienſi dedicavit, in illius lib. 2. diſp. 3. paulo ante finem 1. cap. ſic ait: Scimus enim conſecratione ſuper debitam materiam ritè facta, Chriſtum eſſe in Sacramento, non autem quòd ſub hac vel illa determinata hoſtia Chriſtus contineatur (§ α). Neque tamen putetis, hunc ſolum articulum apud illum reperiri hæreticum, ſed alii multi: quos cùm hic nimis longum, vobiſque tædioſum foret referre, enumerabo alibi, in eo ſcil. libro, quem de Fratrum Prædicatorum ſceleribus (14) —— I except one of them, to wit James Hochſtratus, who was then commonly and juſtly ſtiled maſter of the preachers of the order of the Heretics, who wrote in ſuch a manner againſt the Lutheran Hereſies, as to ſhow himſelf the moſt peſtilent of all Heretics. But leſt any of you, who are his old friends, or blinded by his hypocriſy, or otherways deceived, ſhould imagine that I ſay this rather out of envy or revenge, than out of a love to truth. I ſhall demonſtrate it. For in his book againſt the Lutherans, which he dedicated to the moſt reverend cardinal and illuſtrious prince and biſhop of Liege, Book 2. Diſp. 3. near the end of the firſt chapter he writes thus. We know that when conſecration is rightly performed over a proper matter, CHRIST is in the ſacrament, but not that CHRIST is contained under this or that particular hoſt. But do not think that this is the only heretical propoſition, that is to be found in his writings, there are many more, which it would be tedious to repeat here, I ſhall therefore enumerate them elſewhere, I mean in that book, which I have wrote concerning the vices of the preaching friars.’ See the ſequel of theſe words in the remark [S] of the article AGRIPPA.

[(§ α) Mr Bayle has not remarked all that is in Agrippa, concerning the Hereſies with which he charges his adverſaries, particularly Hochſtratus. He ſpeaks as follows in the ſecond chapter of his apology, againſt the the divines of Louvain: ‘Jam vero etiam noſtro ſeculo dogmatiſarunt Colonienſes Theologi, Ariſtotelem ſic eſſe præcurſorem Chriſti in naturalibus, quemadmodum Joannes Baptiſta in gratuitis. Jacobus Hochſtratus was obliged to make ſatisfaction to a worthy man whom he had ſlandered; but to bring him to it, they were forced to make uſe of a remarkable expedient, which was to take from his convent the privilege of begging [C]. He had not all the advantage he promiſed to himſelf in the troubles which he ſtirred up againſt Reuchlin; he was obliged to go Rome on account of that proceſs; and notwithſtanding the ſums of money wherewith he provided himſelf, he had much ado to avoid being condemned [D]. Beſides, he

---

(1) Called Johannes Pfefferkornius.

(2) Dilucide & quod dicimus ad oculum ibi oſtendit, adverſarios pluribus quam triginta quatuor mendaciis ad ſui contumeliam uſos eſſe. Jo. Henricus Majus, in Oratione de Vita Reuchlini, fol. D 3, verſo.

(3) Majus, ibid. fol. D 4.

(4) Id. ibid. fol. D 4, verſo.

(5) Reuchlin. Epiſt. ad Wimphelingum, apud Majum, Not. in Vitam Reuchlini, pag. 391.

(6) Majus, ibid. fol. D 5.

(7) Cauſſa ad Leonem X, devoluta, qui eam Spirenſi Epiſcopo, Georgio Palatino Duci penitus committit. Id. ibid. verſo. In the Bibliotheque univerſelle, Tom. VIII, pag. 501, theſe words have been underſtood ſo, as if they mentioned two men, the biſhop of Spire, and the elector Palatine; but the biſhop only is meant by them.

(8) Majus, ubi ſupra.

(9) Majus, ibid.

(10) Mr Majus has inſerted it in his Notes upon Reuchlin's Life, pag 480, & ſeq. The author took the name of Eleutherius Byzenus.

(11) Annot. in Vitam Reuchlini, pag. 485.

(12) Ibid pag. 491.

(13) See the article AGRIPPA, remark [S].

(14) Agrippa, Epiſt. xxvi, lib. vii, Oper. Tom. II, pag 1037, that Letter is dated the 11*th of January* 1533.

'ſtratus in ſuo de invocatione Sanctorum libello, hæreticum pronunciavit ad Scripturam confugere: & alius quidem Theologus palam concionari non erubuit, conſuetudinem potius ſequendam eſſe quàm Scripturam divinam, adhuc prænominatus Hochſtratus Hæreticorum (ut vocant) Magiſter in opere ſuo contra Lutheranos, inquit in hæc verba: Scimus enim conſecratione ſuper debita materia facta Chriſtum eſſe Sacramento, non autem quod ſub hac vel illa determinata hoſtia Chriſtus contineatur, quia, ut ſubdit, hæreticum eſt fidem infallibilem & infuſam ad taliæ particularia per certitudinem extendere, eademque ratione concludit, credendam eſſe remiſſionem peccatorum in generali, neminem autem in particulari ſibi eſſe peccata dimiſſa. An non eſt hoc vere magiſtrum Hereticorum eſſe? — Now even in our age the divines of Cologne have taught, that Ariſtotle was the forerunner of CHRIST in natural as John the Baptiſt was in ſpiritual things. James Hochſtratus, in his book concerning the invocation of ſaints, has pronounced it heretical to appeal to ſcripture: and another divine was not aſhamed to preach, that cuſtom was rather to be followed than the holy ſcriptures, moreover the ſaid Hochſtraten, maſter of the Heretics (as he is commonly called) in his book againſt the Lutherans, has the following words: We know that conſecration of fit matter being performed, CHRIST is preſent in the ſacrament, but not that CHRIST is contained under this or that particular hoſt; becauſe, adds he, it is heretical to extend an infallible and infuſed faith to ſuch particulars, with certainty; and for the ſame reaſon concludes, that we are to believe the remiſſion of ſins in general, but no particular perſon ought to believe that his ſins in particular are forgiven. Is not this to be really the maſter of Heretics? REM. CRIT.]

[C] They took from his convent the privilege of begging.] It is in Eraſmus's letters that we read this curious particular. The count of Nevenar, a lord of extraordinary merit, a learned man, and patron of the learned, was very much touched with the calumnies which James Hochſtratus had publiſhed againſt him. He omitted nothing to oblige him to make him reparation; he made uſe of the moſt ſolid reaſons, he had recourſe to advice, hard words, and menaces; all this was to no purpoſe; but at laſt he and his relations forbad all their vaſſals to give any eggs or cheeſe to the Jacobins. Theſe believed they were only vain threatnings, and continued their trade of begging in the territories of thoſe gentlemen; but they were repulſed in a terrible manner, ſo that for a year together they were deprived of the ſubſiſtence they uſed to have from thence. They then obliged Hochſtratus to give the count ſatisfaction, by a ſolemn recantation, ſome copies whereof were diſperſed abroad. Eraſmus, who had one them, found ſomething comical in it; for the monk reciting in expreſs words, the ſlanders he had publiſhed againſt the count of Nevenar, proteſted at the ſame time, that he had always had a very good opinion of him. The reader will be glad to ſee this in Eraſmus's Latin (15). 'Hermannus Comes à Nova Aquila indigne tulerat ſe notatum ab Jacobo Hochſtrato Dominicano. Is erat Rabinus, Prior Monaſterii quod Coloniæ ſanè quàm magnificum eſt & opulentum. Non potuit hominem compeſcere, donec illius cognati denuntiarint Dominicanis, ne poſthac colligerent caſeos in ulla ditione vel Comitis vel cognatorum illius. Illi rati minas eſſe inanes, clam tentarunt ſolito more venire ad ova & caſeos. Factus eſt in illos impetus terribilis. Hoc damno totum annum mulctati ſunt; itaque factum eſt, ut Jacobus à ſuis coactus pacis leges acceperit. Habeo illius palinodiam in qua cum recitet verba plena contumeliæ quæ ſcripſerat in comitem, tamen affirmat ac propemodum dejerat, ſe ſemper de Comite præclare ſenſiſſe (16). Bella palinodia (§ β) ſcurrâ quam Theologo dignior. He ſays in another place, that it is in vain to diſpute againſt the perſecutors of polite learning. He principally meant the monks and their favourers; theſe ſort of people, adds he, have inexhauſtible reſources in their factions, clamours, and tricks: nothing but the baſtinado and hunger can ſubdue them (17), and he brings as an inſtance of this, the count of Nevenar's conduct towards James Hochſtratus. 'Iſti numero, phalangibus, ſyncretiſmo, improbitate, clamoribus, adde ſi libet, fucis ac malis artibus, prorſus invicti ſunt: Nec alia re quàm fuſtibus ac fame domari queunt. Sic vir clariſſimus Hermannus à Novaquila Comes, adegit Jacobum Hogeſtratum ad abjectam & ſcurrilem palinodiam, cujus exemplar apud me eſt. Quibus, inquies, præſidiis? Non argumentis, non æquis rationibus, non monitis, non minis, non conviciis; nihil enim horum non fruſtra tentatum fuit: Sed quibus præſidiis? Caſeis & ovis quorum in ditione Comitis colligendorum jus illis ademptum fuerat (18).' Eraſmus has reaſon to ſay, that count Nevenar tried what hard words would do; for what can be more ſevere than the following words: 'Unica, crede mihi, peſtis eſt in Germania Jacobus Hochſtratus, quam ſi reſtrinxeris ἔςαι πάντα καλῶς. Homo præter ingentem ſuam audaciam inſigniter impudens atque temerarius. Omnes interroga, ſi libet, per Germaniam doctos viros. Omnes læſit, omnibus æque infeſtus eſt (19) — I beg your Excellency will believe me, that James Hochſtraten is the only plague of Germany, if you ſilence him all will be well. He is not only bold beyond expreſſion, but remarkably impudent and furious. If your Excellency will enquire of all the learned men in Germany, you will find that he has injured them all, and is equally an enemy to them all.' This is what the count of Nevenar repreſents to Charles V, in an oration, wherein he congratulated him in the name of the ſtudents of Germany, on his being elected king of the Romans. He had been exhorting him to give order that the monks ſhould concern themſelves only with the rules of their order. Fraterculos quoſdam magnis titulis inſanientes, jube ſuorum Cœnobiorum curam gerere, jube domi Fratribus ſuis regendis operam impendere, ſacris faciendis invigilare (20).

[(§ β) Above, citation (9), the Faculty of Theology of Cologne, in their condemnation of a piece of Reuchlin, inſert in their judgment the following clauſe. Citra tamen Autoris contumeliam. — Without pretending, by this judgment, to mark the perſon of the author with infamy. And here Hochſtratus, one of the members of this Faculty, giving ſatisfaction to the count of Nevenar, whom he had ſlandered in ſeveral libels, declares, that he doth this the more willingly, becauſe he always had a great reſpect and veneration for the count. According to the principles of theſe divines of Cologne, and of Hochſtratus, his conduct is no more contradictory than theirs. It is founded on an antient cuſtom eſtabliſhed in all the courts of Germany, wherein if the clauſe Salvo honore, is added to a penalty, of whatever kind that penalty be, it doth not render the ſufferer infamous. REM. CRIT.]

[D] He was obliged to go to Rome on account of that proceſs againſt Reuchlin; and notwithſtanding his money he had much ado to avoid being condemned] I have ſaid above (21), that the commiſſioners of the Pope's ſubdelegate paſſed a ſentence very diſadvantageous to our Dominican. The commiſſioners, which the Pope appointed to the parties in Rome itſelf, where Hochſtratus was in perſon, would not have given a leſs favourable ſentence for Reuchlin, had they had time to pronounce a deciſive decree; but when they were met to put an end to the affair, they received an order from the Pope to ſuſpend the judgment (22). Each of the judges gave in writing their ſuffrage with the reaſons of it, it is known, that they gave it to the diſadvantage of the Dominican, who, to ward off that terrible blow, extorted an order from the Pope for a demurrer, and to leave the ſuffrages in the ſecretary's hands (23). This is an authentic example of the immenſe power of theſe ſort of men: if they cannot gain their cauſe, if it is too apparently bad to obtain a favourable ſentence, they have at leaſt intereſt enough to avoid condemnation; they obtain all the neceſſary delays, and they make the he ran a great danger of his life in his return [E], for Reuchlin's party began already to make uſe of violent means. He perhaps deſerved that kind of death, which, Paul Jovius ſays, carried him off; but it is not true, that he had the deſtiny which that hiſtorian mentions [F]: for he did not die with grief to ſee himſelf ridiculed in the ſatires of

---

(15) Eraſm. Epiſt. xxix, lib. xix, pag. 841.

(16) This is more expreſly deſcribed in the thirty firſt letter of the twenty ſecond book, pag. 1196.

(17) We muſt not ſay of theſe devils, that they only go out, by prayer and faſting: take away prayer; faſting alone will do the buſineſs.

(18) Eraſm. Epiſt. I, lib. xx, pag. 958.

(19) Hermannus Nuenarius dum ann. 1519, in Comitiis Francofurtenſibus Carolo Auſtriaco electo Romanorum Regi, nomine ſtudioſorum Germaniæ adgratulatur, apud Valer. Andream, Bibl. Belg. pag. 413.

(20) Apud eumd. Valer. Andr. ibid.

(21) In the remark [A].

(22) The twentieth of July, 1516, Not. in Vitam Reuchlin. pag. 474.

(23) Majus, Notis in Vitam Reuchlin. pag. 474, 475.

the world believe, that this is an advantage; for they will never confeſs, that they have had the worſt of it. But yet every body knows, that they are in the wrong. In this affair John Reuchlin's friends thought they had obtained a victory, and they compoſed many inſulting poems (24).

Hochſtratus made a journey to Rome with a ſumptuous equipage, and provided with large ſums of money. 'Huic igitur edicto morem gerens Jacobus Romam contendit, multis magniſque ſuarum aliarumque Univerſitatum, Principum item & aliorum ſummorum virorum commendationibus, pulchro equitatu, &, qui rerum gerendarum, ut & olim fuerunt, & nunc quam maxime ſunt corrupti hominum mores, nervus eſt, ingenti pecuniæ vi inſtructus, qua Capnionis juſtam cauſſam, famam fortunaſque omnes facile ſe ſubverſurum, jactitavit (25). —— Hochſtratus obeyed this ſummons, and went to Rome, well provided with many and great recommendations from his own, and from other univerſities, and from princes and other great perſonages, with a handſome equipage, and above all, with (what in the preſent corruption of manners is, and always was, the ſinews of buſineſs) an immenſe ſum of money, by which he boaſted that he would eaſily ruin Capnio's juſt cauſe, fame, and fortune.' He who ſuſpected that this money was deſigned for the purchaſe of ſome voices, knew well enough how matters go at theſe courts (26). His words are theſe (27): 'Item Theologiſtæ, ut etiam comperi, Jacobo Hochſtraten proximis diebus mille quingentos aureos per Trapezitas Romam miſerunt, non ad victum, qui Monachis tenuis eſſe debet, nec ad neceſſarias impenſas litis, nam minore ſummula, ut reor, hæc adminiſtraretur. Sed quod vehementer ſuſpicor & illis male vertat, ad faciendas largitiones, pro obtinendis auro ſuffragiis quæ jure non ſperat (28). —— The divines likewiſe, as I am informed, have lately ſent James Hochſtraten 500 golden crowns, by the Bankers, to Rome, not for his ſuſtenance, for monks ought to live at ſmall expence, not for the neceſſary expences of his proceſs, for that I believe, may be carried on at a ſtill ſmaller charge. But I grievouſly ſuſpect what I hope ſhall not profit them, that it was ſent to buy voices with gold, which he deſpairs of obtaining by right.' What he adds, is more ſurprizing. Theſe ſame divines threatened to make a ſchiſm, if Reuchlin was not condemned, and ſpoke with the utmoſt contempt of Leo X. 'Nam modo reverendiſſimum Cardinalem Grimanum (29) ut indoctum cavillantur, modo ut ſemper ſuſpectum infamant. Præterea audent aperte jactare perverſiſſimi homines, niſi ſecundum ſe pronunciatum in urbe fuerit, ab Eccleſia & ſummo ejus Pontifice ſe defecturos, & ſchiſma novum ſuſcitaturos. Alii ad futurum Concilium provocaturos ſe minantur. Alii dicunt, quicquid contra ſe ſtatuerit Papa, nullius momenti eſſe, neque pro Papa habendum eum, qui ab ſe ſuaque ſententia diſſentiat. Tam cœca, tam præceps eſt arrogantia iſtorum, ut non pudeat etiam poſtulare obnoxium ſibi Summum Pontificem eſſe, ſe palam omnibus Eccleſiam eſſe dictitant, ſine ſe in rebus fidei Papam nihil decernere nec poſſe, nec debere, conclamant. Nihil hercle ſecius aut honorificentius de ſummo Pontifice loquuntur, quam de puero ſub ferula adhuc vivente, cui nihil niſi ad pædagogi ſui nutum integrum ſit aut liberum loqui (30). —— For ſometimes they reproach cardinal Grimani with ignorance, at other times they ſlander him as one they always ſuſpected. Beſides, theſe ſeditious men have the boldneſs openly to boaſt, that unleſs this cauſe is decided in their favour, they will make a defection from the church and it's head, and raiſe a new ſchiſm. Others threaten that they will appeal to a general council. Others ſay, that whatever the Pope decides againſt them will ſignify nothing, and that he is not to be acknowledged as Pope, if he diſſents from their opinions. So blind and furious is their arrogance, that they are not aſhamed to pretend that the Pope is inferior to them, and proclaim that the Pope neither can, nor ought to decide any thing in matters of faith without them. And indeed they ſpeak of the Pope with no more reverence, than of a ſchool-boy, who is not at liberty either to ſay or do any thing, but by his maſter's direction.'

[E] He ran a great danger of his life in his return.] If he had not had notice of the ambuſcades that the Reuchliniſts laid for him in the way from Nuremberg to Cologne, he had infallibly fallen into them; and even after he had intelligence of them, he could not have avoided the ſnare, had not he been preſerved from the danger by the paſſport he obtained from the marquis of Brandenburg. Mr Majus acknowledges all this. Non tantum honorum odium, ſays he (31), ſed ingens præterea periculum ſibi accerſivit, quod vix ac ne vix quidem evaſit. Nam cum Roma diſcedens Noribergam iter feciſſet, Coloniam inde perrecturus, inſidiæ ipſi à Reuchliniſtis parabantur, quas, ſi præmonitus non fuiſſet, certe haud effugiſſet. Ac ne ſic quidem exceſſiſſet, evaſiſſet, erupiſſet, niſi Marchionis Brandeburgenſis ſalvo conductu à perſequentibus tutus fuiſſet.

[F] It is not true that he had the deſtiny which Paul Jovius ſpeaks of.] He pretends, that the ſatires publiſhed by Reuchlin, againſt the barbarous ſtile of the monks, killed James Hochſtratus with vexation, and obliged the fraternity of this inquiſitor to have recourſe in their diſtreſs to the court of Rome, to obtain a prohibition of printing and ſelling theſe ſatires. Paul Jovius means the Obſcurorum Virorum Epiſtolæ: He will have Reuchlin to be the author of them, and he gives us an idea of them, which is very diſobliging to the monks in general, and to Reuchlin's perſecutors in particular. 'Admirabili facetiarum lepore conditæ, quibus ad excitandum riſum, cucullatorum Theologorum ineptiſſimè, atque ideo ridiculè Latina lingua ſcribentium, ſtylus exprimitur. Ulciſcebatur enim infeſtam nomini ſuo turbam, jucundiſſimo ſatyræ illudentis genere, quum maligna cucullatorum conſpiratione tanquàm Judæis parum æquus hoſtis, ac ex animo planè recutitus impietatis accuſaretur (32). —— They are full of humour, and by imitating their Latin ſtile, expoſeth the barbarous dialect of the monkiſh divines. He wrote this elegant ſatire againſt them, in revenge of their ſpiteful rage againſt him, they having accuſed him of favouring Judaiſm.' The way to convict this hiſtorian of falſity, is to ſay, that James Hochſtratus ſurvived Leo X and Reuchlin, and therefore it is not true, 1. that the Obſcurorum Virorum Epiſtolæ, having been the cauſe of that inquiſitor's death, his friends and accomplices ſupplicated Leo X to condemn the book. 2. That Reuchlin, to elude the prohibitions of Leo X, compoſed a ſecond volume, under another title more ſatirical than the former. Thus here are two falſhoods of Paul Jovius. 'Hic liber avide coemptus & evulgatus adeo graviter calumniatores ejus ordinis perculit, ut conjurationis princeps Hochſtratus letali dolore ſauciatus interierit; & reliqui æſtuantes à Leone ſuppliciter impetrarint, ut edicto divendi, atque imprimi vetaretur; ſed edicti majeſtatem Reuchlinus falſo ingenio ludificatus, ſecundum Epiſtolarum volumen, tanquam ex titulo minimè vetitum, altero quidem aculeatius impreſſoribus tradidit, ita ut cucullati miſere cum Hydra luctantes, animos in ea lite deſponderint (33). —— This book was greedily bought, and by it's publication, ſo mortified the malicious ſlanderers of that tribe, that Hochſtraten, the head of the cabal, ſickened upon it and died; and the reſt, boiling with rage, obtained, by their humble applications to Leo, an order againſt the ſale and impreſſion of it; Reuchlin however eluded the prohibition by an ingenious artifice, giving a ſecond volume to the preſs more ſevere than the former, under a name not included in the prohibition. So that the monks having to fight with this Hydra, were entirely defeated.' It will be objected perhaps, that notwithſtanding theſe two chronological faults, it may ſtill be true at bottom, that the letters Obſcurorum Virorum, occaſioned the death of James Hochſtratus. I anſwer, that it is abſolutely falſe that they had that effect; for they appeared at leaſt ten years before the death of that monk. He died in the year 1527, and I have read in a letter written the ſixteenth of Auguſt 1517, that Eraſmus very much diſapproved

(24) Ibid. pag. 478, & ſeq.

(25) Ibid. pag. 417.

(26) See the article FOULQUES, remark [L].

(27) Hermannus Buſchius Paſiphilus, in Epiſt. ad Reuchlinum, apud Majum, ibid. pag. 464.

(28) In the dialogue intituled Hochſtratus Ovans, he is brought in ſpeaking thus: Neceſſe habui vulgatam incedere viam, agere literis commendatitiis, pecuniis niti, & largitionibus immodicis, ut magnæ ſunt opes nobis mendicis, atque mendacia ſtruere contra inſontem, quæ non inſolens, neque imperite confinxi. atque haud difficulter credita ſunt Romanenſibus. Apud Majum, ibid. pag. 465.

(29) He was the preſident of the commiſſion.

(30) Idem, Buſchius, apud Majum, ibid.

(31) Annotat. in Vit. Reuchlini, pag. 477.

(32) Jovius in Elogiis, cap. cxliii, pag. m. 285.

(33) Id. ibid.

of his adverſaries. He was one of the firſt who wrote againſt Luther [G], and one of the perſecutors of Eraſmus [H]. In a word, whoever was an enemy to the ſcholaſtic barbarity, could not fail to be expoſed to his anger. He died at Cologne in the year 1527 (d). We have ſeveral books of his, which for the moſt part relate to his diſputes with Reuchlin and Luther. There was a cutting epitaph made upon him [I].

He did not do much honour to the divines at Paris, in publiſhing at Cologne, the judgment they paſſed upon Luther in 1521, upon the ſubject of the pretended Dionyſius the Areopagite [K].

diſapproved of thoſe letters (34). This criticiſm might be carried further; for it is very probable that they were written by Hutten (35), and not by Reuchlin.

I am leſs ſurprized at theſe faults of Paul Jovius, than to ſee them inſerted as matter of fact in the life of Reuchlin, by Mr Majus, and that he did not perceive that he contradicted himſelf. He ſuppoſes, that after the Speculum oculare was burnt at Cologne, Reuchlin ſeeing himſelf attacked by ſeveral ſatires, publiſhed the Epiſtolæ obſcurorum virorum, to revenge himſelf, which quickly cauſed James Hochſtratus's death. Hic liber adeo graviter calumniatores Colonienſes perculit, ut conjurationis caput Hochſtratus PAULO POST letali dolore confectus ſauciatuſque interierit (36). He afterwards relates that Reuchlin brought the cauſe before the Pope, and that James Hochſtratus made a voyage to Rome upon it, and had like to have fallen into an ambuſh of his enemies, as he returned to Cologne.

[G] He was one of the firſt who wrote againſt Luther.] He went the wrong way to work, if we believe Father Maimbourg, who ſays, ' that what made ' Luther's cauſe ſtill more plauſible was this, that ' James Hochſtratus, a Dominican inquiſitor, writing ' againſt him, exhorted the Pope to treat ſuch a wicked fellow only with fire and ſword, that the world ' might be rid of him as ſoon as poſſible (37).' I will now ſet down a paſſage of Valerius Andreas, which affords me at once a proof of my text, and an occaſion for a critical reflexion. ' Primos inter in Lutherum ' calamum ſtrinxit: ob id tum ab hæreticis quos in ' primis oderat, tum etiam ab aliis vitæ atque ingenii ' liberioris, ut tunc tempora ferebant, ſcriptis laceſſitus, & nominatim à Joan. Reuchlino ſive Capnione ' epiſtolis quas obſcurorum virorum titulo vulgavit (38). ' —— He was one of the firſt who wrote againſt Luther: and on that account was ſeverely handled not ' only in the writings of the Heretics, whom he mortally ' hated, but likewiſe by others of a more liberal genius, ' and way of living, as times then went, particularly ' by John Reuchlin or Capnio, in the Epiſtolæ Obſcurorum Virorum, as he called them.' The war of the monks againſt Reuchlin, began before Luther attacked the indulgencies, and dropped of itſelf when Luther raiſed his ſtandard. Reuchlin continued with the ſtrongeſt ſide all his life, and never concerned himſelf with the Lutheran diſputes. It is therefore very falſe, that he teized Hochſtratus with ſeveral ſatirical pieces to puniſh him for being one of the firſt that wrote againſt Luther. The Epiſtolæ obſcurorum virorum, preceded the birth of the Proteſtant Reformation. Valerius Andreas is thereby fully convicted of an Anachroniſm. For the reſt, the counſel which James Hochſtratus gave to the Pope againſt Luther, plainly ſhews the violent temper of the man. Eraſmus wrote a letter to him (39) in the year 1519, full of good advice, upon the inexcuſable bitterneſs he had ſhewn in his writings againſt Reuchlin. See Eraſmus's letters concerning Hochſtratus's proceedings with reſpect to Martin Luther (40).

[H] And one of the perſecutors of Eraſmus.] This we learn from theſe words (41): ' Aliquot ex hoſtium ' numero perierunt: Lovanii Ecmondanus Carmelita ' vomitu præfocatus . . . Coloniæ periit Jacobus Hogheſtratus coryphæus hujus tragœdiæ, qui tamen in ' morte dicetur nonnullis verbis prodidiſſe parum ſinceram conſcientiam. — Some of the enemies are dead. ' At Louvain Ecmond the Carmelite was ſuffocated by ' a vomit . . . At Cologne died James Hochſtratus, the ' principal actor in this tragedy, who notwithſtanding is ' ſaid on his death-bed to have ſpoke ſome things ' which argued no very ſincere conſcience.' In the letter wherein Eraſmus, gives ſo good advice to the inquiſitor, he complains of his having been ill uſed by him, for his opinion upon the diſſolubility of marriage (42).

[I] There was a cutting epitaph made upon him.] We find it in Paul Jovius: ' Hoſtrati autem tumulo, ' ſays he (43), hoc nobile carmen, Capnionis puer af' fixit (§γ).

Hic jacet Hoſtratus, viventem ferre patique
Quem potuere mali, non potuere boni.
Creſcite ab hoc taxi, creſcant aconita ſepulchro:
Auſus erat ſub eo, qui jacet, omne neſas.

Here Hochſtrat lies, whom, breathing vital air,
Shunn'd by the good, the bad alone cou'd bear.
Grow yew, and aconite, upon this tomb,
Which ſuch a wretch incloſes in it's womb.

[(§γ) Reuchlin, as it is well known, died in the year 1523. Now if, as we are told, the author of theſe verſes was actually a ſervant of Reuchlin when he died, theſe verſes could not be compoſed on the real death of Hochſtratus, which did not happen till 1527. But the truth of the matter is this. About the year 1515 the firſt volume of the famous Epiſtolæ obſcurorum virorum appeared in 4to, to the number of forty one only. The ſecond edition likewiſe in 4to, contains no greater number; but the third alſo in 4to, which, if we may judge by the character, was publiſhed ſoon after the two others, contains an Appendix of eight epiſtles, the laſt of which in the name of Hochſtratus, and dated from Rome, contains four Paſquinades in form of epitaphs upon himſelf; the firſt in four verſes, the ſecond and third contain each a diſtich, and the fourth four verſes as the firſt. Now the pretended epitaph, recited by Paul Jovius, is nothing but the ſecond of theſe Paſquinades, preceded by the firſt diſtich of the fourth.

Some unknown perſons, as Hochſtratus relates in this epiſtle, meeting him one day in the ſtreets of Rome, dropt a paper at his feet, he took it up, and found in it ſeveral ſatirical epitaphs on his pretended death, and out of this was formed that mentioned by Paul Jovius. So that this epitaph, far from being compoſed upon, and after the death of Hochſtratus, is only an imitation of the following, which Politian compoſed on the death of the poet Mabile (Marullus) his enemy:

Flecte viator iter, fœtet * nam putre Mabili
Hac fovea corpus conditur atque animus.

This epitaph of Mabilus, who nevertheleſs ſurvived Politian, is to be found among his poems; and the account Mr Bayle give of this is, that one may ſay ſuch bitter things in an epitaph; and find ſo fruitful a field by turning this way, that many poets have falſly ſuppoſed the death of their adverſaries, to have the advantage of this common-place. This reflexion in the remark [O] of the article POLITIAN, is the true key to this pretended epitaph, Hic jacet Hoſtratus, &c. compoſed, as we ſee, about ten years before Hochſtratus's death, in the height of his proceſs againſt Reuchlin. REM. CRIT.]

[K] He publiſhed at Cologne the judgment of the divines at Paris . . . concerning the pretended Dionyſius the Areopagite.] It was in the year 1521. You will find this judgment in the ſecond tome of Luther's works, in the Jena edition. You will find alſo other editions of it, and therefore Father Nourri had no reaſon to believe, that he firſt brought it to light by publiſhing it in his Apparatus ad Bibliothecam maximam veterum Patrum in 1694 (44).

(d) Valer. Andr. ubi ſupra, pag. 413. See the paſſage of Eraſmus, remark [H].

(34) Magnopere mihi diſplicebant Epiſtolæ obſcurorum Virorum. Eraſmus, Epiſt. ad Joann. Cæſarium, inſerta lamentationibus obſcurorum virorum, citante Majo, Not. in Vitam Reuchlin. pag. 425.

(35) Jacob. Thomaſius in præfatione ad Pauli Manutii Epiſtolas, certa fidei exploratum ſe habere affirmat, Huttenum eſſe earum autorem Id. Majus, ibid.

(36) Majus, in Vita Reuchlini.

(37) Maimbourg, Hiſt. du Luther lib. i, pag. 30, ad. ann. 1518. He quotes Luth. contra Jac. Hoſtra. Tom. I.

(38) Valer. Andr. Bibl. Belg. pag. 412.

(39) It is the laſt of the ſixteenth book.

(40) The eighteenth of the twenty ſixth book, pag. 1249.

(41) Eraſm. Epiſt. xiii, lib. xix, pag. 829. It is dated in May, 1527.

(42) See the 740th page of Eraſmus's Letters, publiſhed at London.

(43) Jovius, ubi ſupra, pag. 286.

* Fœtens.

(44) See the Acta Eruditorum, in the ſecond Tome of the Suplements, pag. 737.

HOE (Matthias) a famous Lutheran miniſter, was born at Vienna, in the year 1580. He was ſent ſo ſoon to the Proteſtant colleges (a), that he found himſelf a Lutheran before he had made reflexion that he was born in the Romiſh communion. He ſtudied Divinity at Wittemberg; and in the year 1602, he was invited to the court of Saxony, to preach before the Elector. In the year following he was made director of ſome churches in Voightland; and after having diſcharged that employment eight years, he was ſent to Prague in the year 1611, to be ſuperintendant of the German churches. Two years after he was recalled to the court of Saxony, where he was promoted to the degree of eccleſiaſtical counſellor, and firſt preacher to his highneſs. He enjoyed thoſe poſts all the reſt of his life, and died the fourth of March, 1645. He was admitted doctor of Divinity at Wittemberg in the year 1604. His marriage, which laſted forty three years, and which gave him ſix ſons and four daughters, made ample amends for all the troubles that could ariſe from other circumſtances in life [A]. He was born a gentleman (b), and he had ſo warlike a pen, as proved he did not degenerate. He publiſhed a great number of books (c), ſome in Latin, and others in High-Dutch. He was a man who would not hear of the re-union of the Proteſtant churches [B]: but he was accuſed of having been bribed to endeavour a re-union of certain princes of the empire with the emperor [C], to the great prejudice of the Proteſtants. What he has publiſhed upon the Revelation, looks like the work of a man of a turbulent ſpirit [D].

I fancy he was more troubled to ſee the elector Palatine in poſſeſſion of the crown of Bohemia, than to ſee him a fugitive after the battle of Prague; for the letter which he wrote to a nobleman of that country, ſhews that he did not approve the deſign of giving this

[A] His marriage . . . . made amends for all the troubles that could ariſe from other circumſtances in life.] I have given the moſt favourable conſtruction to the Latin words of the Sieur Witte; for as they are ſomewhat obſcure, one might think, that he meant, that Hoe's marriage was ſo happy, as to have leſs evil than good in it (1). This would be leſſening the joys of that marriage; wherefore I chuſe the other interpretation, which is, that thoſe advantages being put in the ſcale with all the evil the husband was expoſed to, weighed them down. Thus his dear ſpouſe agreeably comforted him for all the troubles and fatigues he had to go through. He would therefore have had reaſon to complain, if he had lived a bachelor.

[B] He would not hear of the re-union of the Proteſtant churches.] Guſtavus had a little before he died, called an aſſembly at Leipſic, of Lutherans and Calviniſts, in order to endeavour at an accommodation. His authority cauſed them to ſeparate like good friends, and with mighty hopes of peace; but they vaniſhed away by his death. Nevertheleſs, Dury did not deſiſt from the undertaking, and he came to Francfort, where the Proteſtants were aſſembled. A moſt ſevere letter of Hoe againſt the Calviniſts came hereupon, and did a great deal of miſchief. We have all this from Grotius. ' Rex Sueciæ magnus Guſtavus . . . non multum ante mortem Lipſiæ conventum inſtituerat utriuſque ſententiæ proteſtantium . . . Effecit ſua auctoritate ut amice diſcederetur cum magna ſpe reſtituenda unitatis. Sed triſtis exitus tanti Regis ſalubre hoc cœptum interſcidit. Neque tamen defuit ejuſdem negotii commendator ex Anglia Duræus, multorum Angliæ antiſtitum inſtructus literis, qui francofurtum ad Mœnum venerat eo ipſo tempore, cùm ibi conventus Ordinum Proteſtantium haberetur. Sed rem per ſe difficilem implicatiorem etiam reddidit doctoris Hoii ex Aula Saxonica reſponſum immite in eos quos Calvinianos vocat (2).' The doctors of the Augsburg Confeſſion, extol to the skies, the vigilance with which he oppoſed the ſmalleſt innovations. They even ſay, that on this account he expoſed himſelf to great dangers. ' In ſolis radiis pridem ſcriptum arbitror quos ille tuendæ fidei gratia pertulerit labores, quibuſcum difficultatibus ſit conflictatus, quæ ſubierit pericula, dum quidvis ſatius cenſebat, quam ut quicquam in Germania de Evangelicæ Religionis integritate (quam adverſarum partium promachi contaminare ſunt auſi,) decederet ac minueretur (3).'

[C] He was accuſed of having been bribed to endeavour a re-union between certain princes of the empire with the emperor.] In the year 1635, the elector of Saxony and the landgrave of Heſſe, made a treaty with the emperor at Prague, and engaged themſelves in his intereſts againſt the crown of Sweden, which was the way to deſtroy whatever Guſtavus had done in Germany for the advantage of the Proteſtant religion. It is believed that the emperor, by a good ſum of money, engaged Dr Hoe to remove all the ſcruples which might have perplexed the elector of Saxony. Mr Puffendorf, whoſe words I quote, is my warrant for it. Arguebatur quoque Saxonicus Theologus Matthias Hoeus decem uncialium millia à Cæſare accepiſſe, eximendis Principis ſui animo ſcrupulis, quos alias facile iſta pax generare poterat (4).

[D] What he has publiſhed upon the Revelation looks like the work of a man of a turbulent ſpirit.] According to the humour that he was of, it cannot be doubted but his Commentaries upon the Revelation, tended to raiſe a general war againſt the church of Rome, that is, to fill Europe with the moſt dreadful miſeries that it could fall under. However it be, the biſhop of Meaux reckons him amongſt the interpreters of the Revelation, who do nothing but ſound an alarm for war. The Lutherans, ſays he (5), were not more moderate than the Calviniſts; and the principal miniſter of the court of Saxony, Matthias Hoe by name, diſperſed a book at Francfort intituled, The judgment and total extirpation of the Whore of the Romiſh Babylon, or the ſixth Book of the Commentary upon the Revelation. ' The book is no leſs extravagant than the title, and this is what was written in Germany, and in the North. The biſhop of Meaux has taken this from a letter of an Arminian miniſter, I will ſet down the paſſage entire, becauſe it contains ſome other matters, relating to this article. ' I have ſeen the catalogue of this laſt fair of Francfort, which contains abundance of polemical books againſt Popery, amongſt others, one with this inſcription. Judicium & excidium Meretricis Babyloniæ Romanæ, ſeu Commentariorum in Apocalypſin S. Johannis liber ſextus, authore Matthia Hohe Doctore Theologo, Lipſiæ in 4to. This Hoe is the principal miniſter of the court of Saxony, of noble extraction in Auſtria, and who for a long time has been ſuſpected to be a ſecret Papiſt. I wonder that in ſuch a conjuncture of time and affairs, he thinks fit to write againſt Popery in ſo ſatirical and odious a ſtyle, eſpecially ſince the elector of Saxony has always earneſtly endeavoured to preſerve the emperor's favour towards his family (6).' Hoe began his work upon the Revelation in the year 1610 (7), and finiſhed it in the year 1640. It contains eight books, which have been reprinted in folio at Leipſic, in 1671. Factious and turbulent men will never be hindered from abuſing the obſcurity of the Revelation, in order to ſtir up war. Peace doth not pleaſe them; it is war which they wiſh for, in which they run no hazards, and find a way to make themſelves neceſſary. It is probable, that ſovereigns are not diſpleaſed to entertain ſuch pragmatical people they look upon them as fit perſons to ſpread confidence among their people, by turning the prophecies, ſometimes one way, ſometimes another, according to the current of affairs. Such ſort of people make themſelves feared; and for that reaſon their maſters keep fair with them.

[E] The

(a) Poſtea orthodoxa id ſibi vindicavit Eccleſia, ſiquidem parentum cura frugis bonæ adoleſcens purioris aëris, hoc eſt fidei hauriendæ gratia, ad loca evangelica ablegatus. Spizelius, in Templ. Honoris, Reſerat. pag. 165.

(b) Taken from Henning. Witte, Memor. Theol. Renovat. pag. 1014, & ſeq.

(c) See the catalogue of them, ibid. pag. 1021.

(1) Illius amore & convictu ſuaviſſimo totis uſus eſt noſter tribus & quadraginta annis, ut multo plura haberet de quibus gaudium quam dolorem conciperet. Hen. Witte, Memor. Theol. Renovat. pag. 1018.

(2) Grotius, Epiſt. ccccxliv, Part. I, pag. 165.

(3) Spizelius, in Templo Honoris reſerato, pag. 165, 166 Henning. Witte, ubi ſupra, pag. 1016.

(4) Puffendorf. Rerum. Suecicar. lib vii, pag 123. See the Biblioth. Univerſelle, Tom. III. pag. 458.

(5) In his Explication of St John's Revelation, pag. 2, of the advertiſement, Dutch Edit.

(6) Charles de Nielles in his letter to Uyttenbogard, dated from the caſtle of Louveſtein, the third of June, 1628. It is the 638*th, in the folio edition of the* Epiſt. Eccleſ. & Theolog.

(7) He publiſhed then the firſt book; the laſt was printed in 1640. See Spizelius, ubi ſupra, pag. 171.

this kingdom to that elector, and that he looked upon Calviniſm as an Antichriſt, that was not much better than the Popiſh Antichriſt [E].

[E] The letter which he wrote . . . . ſhews that he looked on Calviniſm as an Antichriſt, which was little better than the Popiſh Antichriſt.] That letter has been printed. Read this paſſage of the Memorabilia Eccleſiaſtica of the XVIIth Century (8). ‘ Cùm in eo ‘ eſſent occupati Bohemiæ Proceres, Legatis Moraviæ, ‘ Sileſiæ & Luſatiæ præſentibus, ut Fridericum quin‘ tum, Electorem Palatinum, ſacris Calvinianis addict‘ um, in Regem ſuum eligerent, Matthias Hoe t. t. ‘ Concionator Aulicus Dreſdenſis, Epiſtolam ſub 23. ‘ Aug. ſcripſit ad Joachimum Andream Slikium qua ‘ (poſtmodum typis excuſa) vir celeberrimus fideliſſimè ‘ monuit, ut quid, præſertim intuitu religionis, Or‘ dines iſti facerent, facere ſaltem deberent, probè ‘ perpendant ? Inter alia ſpiritum Calviniſticum appel‘ lans Anti-Chriſtum Orientalem atquè componnes ‘ cum Occidentali, ut non multò meliorem, allegante ‘ Hornbekio in ſumma Controverſiarum religiones ; ‘ libro nono de Lutheranis p. m. 699. —— ‘ When the nobles of Bohemia were deliberating ‘ concerning the election of Frederic V, Elector Palatine, ‘ a Calviniſt, to be their king, the deputies from Mo‘ ravia, Sileſia, and Luſatia, being preſent, Matthias ‘ Hoe, court-preacher to the Elector of Saxony, wrote ‘ a letter dated Auguſt twenty fourth, to Joachim An‘ drew Slikius (which was printed afterwards) wherein ‘ that famous man faithfully admoniſhed, that the ſtates ‘ ſhould carefully weigh what they were about to ‘ do, at leaſt what they ought to do, eſpecially as ‘ to what concerned religion. And among other things, ‘ he called the Calviniſtic ſpirit, the eaſtern Antichriſt, ‘ and comparing it with the weſtern, declares it not much ‘ better. This letter is quoted by Hoornbeeck, in his ‘ Summa Controverſiarum Religionis.’ Probably the author I quote had not ſeen this letter ; for he only ſpeaks of it upon the credit of Hoornbeeck.

(8) Andreas Carolus, Memor. Eccleſ. pag. 482, ad ann. 1619.

HOELZLIN (a) (JEREMIAH) profeſſor of Greek in the univerſity of Leyden, was born at Nuremberg. He made ſo great a progreſs in his claſſical learning, at Augſburg, that he excelled all his ſchool-fellows, both in the Greek and Latin tongues. After which he ſtudied Philoſophy in the univerſity of Altorf. His method of ſtudying it, was not like that of others ; he little regarded what was dictated by the profeſſors ; as he was a good Grecian, he read the originals, and the ancient interpreters of Ariſtotle, Themiſtius, Alexander Aphrodiſienſis, Simplicius, and Ammonius. He was not contented with Ariſtotle alone ; he ſtudied Plato likewiſe, and was a great admirer of the Stoics. After having ſpent eight years in this ſort of ſtudy, he was admitted doctor of Philoſophy, and applied himſelf to the Scriptures, and to Hebrew. He was afterwards rector of the college at Amberg, in the Upper Palatinate. The war drove him thence, and obliged him to retire to Bremen, after having loſt the beſt part of his effects. The count of Bentheim deſigned to make him head of his college of Rhede ; but the count died preſently after, and then the town of Ham offered our Hoelzlin a like employment. The ſoldiers of the emperor made ſuch ravages in that country, that he did not care to be expoſed to their violences. He therefore ſought a ſafe retreat, and found it in Holland ; he retired to Leyden, and there publiſhed a tranſlation of the Pſalms, which was judged to be exact. The univerſity did him the honour to retain him, when he was invited to Middleburg, and to the Brill [A]. He was thought worthy to appear on a greater ſtage, and had the Greek profeſſorſhip given him, which Voſſius had juſt laid down. He undertook the tranſlation of Apollonius Rhodius [B], and notwithſtanding his diſtempers, he accompliſhed it, and put his laſt hand to it, ſix days before he died. He was dropſical, and ſo weak, that at laſt he could not hold his pen in his hand, and yet he had this work ſo much at heart, that he dictated what he thought neceſſary to be added to it. He died the twenty fifth of January, 1641. He had been married a long time (b), but had no children. His happineſs on that account is taken notice of in his funeral ſermon, becauſe of the troubles he was expoſed to, when the rage of war forced him to leave his own country (c).

(a) He is always called Hoeſlinus in his Funeral Oration.

(b) He married the daughter of a miniſter of Nuremberg.

(c) Taken from his Funeral Oration, ſpoken by Antony Thyſius.

[A] He was invited to the Brill.] He was actually rector of the college of the Brill, if we may believe Voſſius, whoſe words I ſet down the more willingly, becauſe they have need of correction, ſince the proper name of our Hoelzlin is there miſerably mangled, not without a groſs ſoleciſm. Voſſius had been ſaying, that Antony Æmilius had refuſed the Greek profeſſorſhip, which the curators of the univerſity of Leyden had offered him, and then he ſays : ‘ Arbitror profeſſionem ‘ eam deinceps offerendam Mag. Jeremiæ Hoelellus ‘ quondam correctori Ambergenſis Gymnaſii Electo‘ ralis Collegæ Beckmani : nunc Brillanæ eſt Scholæ ‘ Rector. Vir eſt moribus ſimplex, ſed trium lin‘ guarum & Philoſophiæ admodum gnarus (1). —— ‘ I am of opinion that this profeſſion ought next to be ‘ offered to Jeremiah Hoelellus, formerly co-rector of the ‘ Electoral College at Amberg, and colleague to Beck‘ man. He is now rector of the ſchool at the Brill. He ‘ is a man unpoliſhed in his manners, but well verſed ‘ in Philoſophy and the three learned languages.’

[B] He undertook the tranſlation of Apollonius Rhodius.] The edition of this poet, with the verſion and commentary of Hoelzlin, was publiſhed in the year 1641, at Leyden ex officina Elzeviriana. Mr Menage ſpeaks very diſadvantageouſly of it (2). Firſt, he relates theſe words of Mr Baillet. ‘ We have ſome antient ‘ Scholia upon Apollonius . . . . . The new edition ‘ which Jeremiah Hotzlin hath given of it, is eſteemed ‘ by ſome, but others value it no more than many of ‘ thoſe which are called Variorum :’ and then having anſwered to what concerns the Scholia, he thus goes on. ‘ As for Jeremiah Hotzlin, he is a wretched wri‘ ter, he is wholly wrapped up in Hebraiſms, he af‘ fects old words that are out of date, and invents ‘ new ones. I will here obſerve, by the by, that he ‘ ſpeaks of Conradus Riterſhuſius as of his patron. ‘ Conradus Riterſhuſius ſanctiſſimus ille juris interpres ‘ & vindex, idemque patronus olim meus, inſigniter ‘ pius & conſtans animus (3). —— Conrad Riterſhuſius ‘ that upright interpreter and reſtorer of the law, and ‘ formerly my patron, a man of diſtinguiſhed piety, and ‘ my conſtant friend. It is at the 115th page. There ‘ are at the end of his edition of Apollonius, ſome ‘ notes of Holſtenius, which are very judicious.’ The Funeral oration tells us, that while Hoelzlin was at Altorf, he had an intimate friendſhip with Scipio Gentilis, Michael Picardus, Conrad Ritterſhuſius, and Daniel Swenſerus, and that they mutually wrote Greek and Latin verſes to one another, and that part of them has been publiſhed : Cum quibus Græcis Latinisque carminibus certabat, quorum non pauca in lucem venerunt.

(1) Voſſius, Epiſt. cxlviii, ad Joann. Meurſium, pag. 181, Londini 1693. That letter is dated the 30th of Auguſt, 1631.

(2) Anti Baillet, Tom. I, pag. 389, 390.

(3) It ſhould be amicus.

HOESCHELIUS (David), born at Augſburg in the fourteenth of April, 1556, was a very learned man. The public is indebted to him for the edition of ſeveral Greek authors [A]. He ſpent all his life in the inſtruction of youth in St Anne's college, of which at laſt he was made rector by the magiſtrates of Augſburg in the year 1593. They alſo made him library-keeper, and he cannot be ſufficiently praiſed for the pains he took to enrich their library [B]. He was very well acquainted with good manuſcripts, and good editions; and he took care that the manuſcripts which were bought for the ornament of that library, ſhould not lie buried like a treaſure hid under ground, but he publiſhed the moſt curious of them, with notes of his own. He made good ſcholars, and many reſorted to Augſburg upon his account (a) [C]. He died there in 1617. I will mention what Scaliger ſaid of him [D]. Mr Huet has not only commended his diligence in finding out old manuſcripts, but alſo his ſkill in tranſlating (b).

(a) Taken from Spizelius in Templo Honoris reſerato, pag. 328, & ſeq. & ex Theatro Freheri, pag. 1511, 1512.

(b) Huetius, de claris Interpretibus, pag 229. See alſo Colomiés, Biblioth. Choiſie, pag. 194.

[A] The public is indebted to him for the edition of ſeveral Greek authors.] He publiſhed the eight books of Origen againſt Celſus, in Greek and Latin, at Augſburg 1605 in Quarto. The wiſdom of Jeſus, the ſon of Sirach, or Eccleſiaſticus, in Greek and Latin, with notes, at Antwerp, in the year 1604. The Bibliotheca of Photius in Greek, with notes, at Augsburg in the year 1601, in Folio. The Hiſtory of Procopius, in Greek, with notes, in the ſame city, in the year 1607, in Folio. Theſe two laſt books had never been printed. Geographica aliquot excellentiſſimorum authorum Marciani, Scylacis, Artemidori, Dicæarchi, at Augsburg, in the year 1600. in Quarto. Three or four treatiſes of Philo. Eclogæ legationum Dexippi Athenienſis, Eunapii, P. Patricii, Priſci Sophiſtæ, Malchi Philad. Menandri cum excerptorum corollis è libris Diodori Siculi amiſſis, at Augsburg, 1603, in 8vo. Some treatiſes of the ancient fathers, &c.

[B] He cannot be ſufficiently praiſed for the pains he took to enrich their library.] Spizelius acquaints us with it: his words ſhew, that Antony Eparchus, biſhop of Corfu, had collected excellent manuſcripts, which fell into Hoeſchelius's hands. ‘Cum inſuper celebratiſſimæ Bibliothecæ Auguſtanæ adminiſtratio ipſi eſſet demandata, omni virium niſu ejus procuravit incrementum, nec ulli parcens labori, libros excuſos pariter ac manuſcriptos, maximè Græcos, melioris item notæ authores, ac librorum editiones conquiſivit, ſicque Bibliothecam Auguſtanam veluti publicum aliquod Ærarium inſtruxit ad omnium promiſcuè indigentiam ſublevandam. Et cum rariſſimorum Codicum MSS. Græcorum, magno ære ab Antonio Eparcho Epiſcopo Corcyrenſi coemptorum copiam eſſet conſecutus, maximam curam adhibuit, ne theſaurus iſte librarius in arcanis Bibliothecæ hujus receſſibus veluti in perpetuo quodam cuſtodiretur carcere, ſed in publicam etiam lucem magno cum totius Republicæ literariæ bono & commodo prodiret (1). ——— Being appointed keeper of the famous library at Augsburg, he ſpared no pains to encreaſe it, and to ſeek out both books and manuſcripts, eſpecially of the Greek authors, and in general, all authors and editions of any note. And by that means made it a noble treaſury to ſupply the wants of the learned in every ſcience. And having got a large collection of very rare Greek manuſcripts, bought at a great price from Antonius Eparchus, biſhop of Corfu, he took effectual care that this precious treaſure of learning ſhould not lye hid in the corners of this library, as in a kind of perpetual confinement, but that it ſhould appear in public to the great advantage of the learned world.’ The Catalogue of the Greek manuſcripts of that library, compoſed by Hoeſchelius, and publiſhed in the year 1595, is a maſter-piece (2).

[C] He made good ſcholars, and many reſorted to Augsburg on his account.] I will make uſe again of Spizelius's words. ‘Quam præclare, ſays he (3), quamque feliciter demandatæ ſibi functioni ſatisfecerit, plurimi teſtari poſſunt viri eruditi qui è variis Germaniæ, Italiæ, Belgiique civitatibus Hoeſchelii gratia Auguſtam ſe contulerunt, quibus viri hujus inſtitutione uti, inque lingua Græca proficere curæ & cordi fuit. Vere de illo dici poteſt quod

Mille foro dedit juvenes, bis mille miniſtrûm
Adjecit numero purpureæque togæ.

How ſucceſsfully he performed the duties of his profeſſion, many learned men can teſtify, who came from ſeveral cities of Germany, Italy, and Holland, to Augsburg, that they might be under Hoeſchelius's tuition, and make progreſs in the Greek language. It may be truly ſaid of him, that thouſands came from under his tuition who were ornaments to all the three learned profeſſions.’ Colomiés names ſome travellers, who mightily praiſed Hoeſchelius (4).

[D] I will mention what Scaliger ſaid of him.] ‘Hoeſchelius a Lutheran, but a learned man: if Velſerus did not ſupport him, he had been expelled before now. He is a great pedant, but a good man. Scaliger ſent him his Procopius, but he had one more compleat from the library of Bavaria. Hoeſchelius, in his Procopius, has printed ſome fragments of my letters, and of thoſe of Caſaubon. He is now printing Origen . . . . . Hoeſchelius non eſt magnus Græcus, ſed diligentiſſimus (5) —— Hoeſchelius is no great critic in the Greek language, but very diligent.’

(1) Spizelius, in Templo Honoris reſerato, pag. 330.

(2) See Colomiés, Biblioth. choiſie, pag. 194.

(3) Spizelius, in Templo Honoris, pag. 329, 330.

(4) Ubi ſupra, pag. 195.

(5) In Scaligeranis ſecundis, pag. m. 112.

HOFFMAN (Daniel) ſuperintendant and profeſſor at Helmſtadt (a), was the head of a theological faction [A], which raiſed ſome diſturbances towards the end of the XVIth century. He raiſed ſome difficulties upon the Formulary of Concord which was to be ſubſcribed; and inſtead of concurring with Dr John Andreas, for the defence of that Formulary, he made uſe of captious diſtinctions. He would not admit the Ubiquity, but only the preſence of Jesus Christ in many places. That quarrel, which laſted not long, left peoples minds diſpoſed to diviſion [B]. So that afterwards other

(a) He ſucceeded Tilemannus Heſhuſius in the year 1588. Melch. Adam. in Vit. Theol. pag. 622.

[A] He was head of a theological faction.] This was the thirteenth ſchiſm that happened in the Lutheran church. ‘Decimi tertii ſchiſmatis autores Helmſtadienſis, interque eos præcipuus Heſhuſius & Hoffmannus, peſſimo exemplo extiterunt. Formulæ enim concordiæ cum ſubſcribendum, & apologia conficienda eſſet, illi, livore dicam an protervia, pium J. Andreæ conatum ſpernentes, cum Chriſtum exaltatum omnibus rebus ob realem idiomatum communicationem deberent dicere præſentem, multipræſentiam ejus ſaltem defendebant (1) ——— Heſhuſius and Hoffman were the heads of the thirteenth ſchiſm at Helmſtadt. For when the Form of Concord was to be ſubſcribed, and an apology to be compoſed, whether led by envy or obſtinacy, deſpiſing the pious endeavours of John Andreas, inſtead of owning as they ought, that CHRIST now exalted, is preſent with all things, becauſe of the real communication of the idioms, only maintain his multipreſence.’ The Jeſuit Adam Contzen obſerves under the year 1584, that Hoffman's antagoniſt was preacher to Henry Julius, duke of Brunſwic (2), and that this prince, in the quality of adminiſtrator of the biſhopric of Halberſtadt, impoſed ſilence on the parties. See alſo what he ſays under the year 1592.

[B] That quarrel . . . . left peoples minds diſpoſed to diviſion.] The firſt author that I quote in the preceding remark, goes on thus. ‘Sed in cineribus ſuffocata eſt

(1) Micrælius, Syntagm. Hiſtor. Eccleſ. lib. iii, ſect. ii, pag. 871. Edit. 1679.

(2) Hinc factum ut Daniel Hoffmannus Superintendens & Profeſſor Helmſtadienſis, & Baſilius Staterus Henrici Julii Ducis Brunſwicenſis concionator aulicus, graviter inter ſeſe de hoc dogmate contenderent. Adam. Contzen, in Jubilo Jubilorum, pag. 234. See alſo pag. 286.

other matters were diſputed with great heat, Hoffman being ſtill head of a party. The queſtion was, amongſt other things, what uſe ought to be made of philoſophical principles in Divinity; and it is to be obſerved, that the profeſſors of Philoſophy took that ſide which was moſt favourable to the orthodox [C]. Daniel Hoffman and Theodore Beza wrote againſt one

‘eſt controverſia, cui utinam fomes novus poſtea non eſſet quæſitus! Sopita jaceat cum altera illa, qua de reſurrectione impiorum quærebatur, an virtute meriti Chriſti futura ſit, necne? ut & cum illa, qua quærebatur, an ſemper in forma ſyllogiſtica diſputari debeat: & cum aliis quæſtionibus vexatis, de philoſophiæ uſu & abſu (3). —— But this controverſy was buried in it's own aſhes, I wiſh that new fuel had not afterwards been ſought for to it! let it reſt forever together with that concerning the reſurrection of the wicked, to wit, whether it would be by virtue of the merits of CHRIST? And this whether we ought always to diſpute in the ſyllogiſtic form? and with many other queſtions, which were much toſſed concerning the uſe and abuſe of Philoſophy.’

[C] The profeſſors of Philoſophy took that ſide which is moſt favourable to orthodoxy.] This is the teſtimony James Thomaſius gives them in one of his prefaces. ‘Celebris eſt, ſays he, quæ parentum noſtrorum memoriâ Juliam concuſſit Academiam, Hofmanniana controverſia, finiente ſeculo proximè præterito cœpta, ineunte hoc noſtro ſeculo non ſine Philoſophorum, qui tum ab ὀρθοδοξίας partibus ſtabant, laude ſopita. De quâ nihil addam, tùm quòd ob recentiorem memoriam nemini res eſt ignota . . . . . tùm maximè, quòd in perſonâ Theologi unius alteriuſve inconſiderati, ſanctiſſimæ ſcientiæ parcendum eſſe omninò exiſtimo (4). — The famous Hoffmannian controverſy, which, in the days of our fathers, ſhook the Julian academy, aroſe about the end of the laſt century, and ended in the beginning of the preſent, much to the honour of the profeſſors of Philoſophy, who maintained the orthodox ſide. I ſhall add no more concerning it, becauſe the affair is ſo recent that no body is ignorant of it, but eſpecially becauſe I think the ſacred ſcience of Theology ought not to ſuffer on account of the raſhneſs of a few divines.’ He examines in that diſcourſe, whether a thing can be true in Philoſophy, and falſe in Divinity, as ſome have pretended; and he obſerves, that amongſt thoſe who have ventured to maintain ſuch a paradox, ſome have been induced to it by an exceſſive reſpect for Ariſtotle, and others by an inordinate hatred to that philoſopher. Theſe laſt were the divines. ‘Ad Theologos venio, è diverſo planè affectu idem dogma defenſantes. Non enim amore, ſed odio Ariſtotelis; non veneratione, ſed dedignatione Philoſophorum, in iſtam temeritatem, ne quid gravius dicam, præcipitati ſunt (5). —— I come now to the divines, who defended the ſame opinion from quite contrary motives. For they fell into that raſh ſtep, to ſay no worſe of it, not from their love but from their hatred to Ariſtotle, not from their veneration, but from their contempt of Philoſophers.’ That the readers may the better underſtand what was Daniel Hoffman's opinion, I will add another paſſage of Thomaſius. It contains a thing which deſerves on it's own account to be related (6). ‘Niſi enim fallor, infelix illud & ſcandalo plenum certamen, quod noſtrâ memoriâ ſuper Quæſtione, ſitne DEUS peccati cauſa per accidens? certatum fuit, è ſepultæ Hofmannianæ controverſiæ cineribus aut propullulavit, aut videri ſaltem voluit propullulaſſe. Non planè abludere à vero quæ dixi, facile (opinor) perſpiciet, qui CL. Viri, Pauli Slevogni Pervigilium de diſſidio Theologi & Philoſophi in utriuſque principii fundato, (hoc enim libello nomen eſt) pervolutaverit *. Enimverò hic inter primos fuit, qui quæſtionem modo dictam in iſthoc ſcripto, quod vigeſimus tertius hujus ſeculi annus produxit in ſcenam, excitaret, hujuſque negativam in Scholis Theologorum, affirmativam inter Philoſophos veram eſſe † defenderet. Cui anno ſtatim ſequente Vir non minori eruditionis laude clarus Andreas Keſlerus diſcurſuum Theologicorum quadrigam ‡ oppoſuit. —— If I am not miſtaken that unfortunate controverſy, which lately gave ſo much offence about the queſtion, Whether GOD be the accidental cauſe of ſin? aroſe or would ſeem to have ariſen from the aſhes of the Hoffmannian controverſy. That I am not entirely miſtaken in judging ſo, I believe any body may perceive who will read the Pervigilium de diſſidio Theologi & Philoſophi in utriuſque principiis fundato, of the learned Paulus Slevogtus. For he was one of the the firſt who revived that queſtion in that book which appeared in the year 1623, and therein maintained that the negative of it was true in Theology, and the affirmative true in Philoſophy. It was anſwered the year following by the no leſs learned Andreas Keſlerus in his Quadriga Diſcurſuum Theologicorum.’ Thomaſius is in the right to ſay, it was a very ſcandalous thing to ſee people maintain, that it is true in Philoſophy, that GOD is the author of ſin by accident, but that it is not true in Divinity. And he is in the right to approve of Caſmannus, who ſaid that ſuch a diviſion of truth gives a handle to maintain the moſt impious errors (7); for indeed nothing is more proper to introduce Scepticiſm, becauſe by ſuch ſort of reaſoning, we reduce truth to the condition of corporal qualities. From the ſame body appearing little or big, according as we ſee it with glaſſes, or without, we have reaſon to conclude, that we are ignorant whether it be great or ſmall, abſolutely ſpeaking, and that the abſolute littleneſs or greatneſs of bodies, is unknown to us If therefore the ſame propoſition was true and falſe, according as it is conſidered either in Divinity or Philoſophy, it would neceſſarily follow, that we could not know truth in itſelf, and that it conſiſted only in a mutable relation to the diſpoſitions of our mind; as the pleaſantneſs of foods conſiſts only in a certain relation to the diſpoſitions of the tongue; which when they happen to change the foods which were agreeable are no longer ſo. I am going to cite an author, who will tell us, that our Hoffman, and his party, maintained, that Philoſophy ought to be baniſhed the univerſities, as a moſt pernicious diſcipline, according to which many theological truths are falſe. The oppoſers of this faction were excluded from the miniſtry. At laſt, by the authority of the prince, thoſe diſputes were quieted, and Hoffman was obliged to ſubmit. ‘Contendebant Hoffmannus & ipſius aſſeclæ Philoſophiam pugnare cum Theologia: multa eſſe vera in Theologia quæ ſint falſa in Philoſophia, & contra; exterminandam Chriſtianis Academiis ut noxiam, ut toties etiam graviter ab antiqua Eccleſia damnatam. His ſe initio ſtatim oppoſuerunt ejus Academiæ Philoſophi, Duncanus Liddelius Scotus Med. D. Corn. Martini, Joh. Caſelius & alii, rati ad ſe pertinere ejus defenſionem, cujus profeſſores eſſent. Res contentionibus diu acta eſt, ita ut Hoffmannus eos tandem à Miniſterio excluderet qui contrarium ſentirent. Habitæ ſæpius diſputationes & magni fluctus in illo ſimpulo excitati. Extant ejus tamen aliquam multa acta. Tandem lis ſopita eſt authoritate Principis: reſtitutus honos ſuus Philoſophiæ ejuſque Doctoribus eſt. Hoffmanniani ceſſerunt (8). —— Hoffman and his party maintained, that Philoſophy was repugnant to Divinity: that many things are true in Divinity, which are falſe in Philoſophy, and contrarywiſe: that Philoſophy ought to be baniſhed from Chriſtian univerſities, as pernicious, and as a thing which has been frequently, and ſolemnly condemned by the antient church. The profeſſors of Philoſophy in that univerſity, viz. Duncan Liddal a Scotchman Med. D. Corn. Martini, John Caſelius, and ſome others, oppoſed themſelves to theſe opinions, thinking it their duty to defend Philoſophy of which they were teachers. The contentions continued fierce a long while, to ſuch a degree that Hofman at laſt excluded thoſe from the miniſtry, who maintained the contrary opinion. Many diſputations were had and great diſſenſions raiſed. Some of the deciſions are ſtill extant. At laſt the controverſy was ended by the authority of the prince: Philoſophy and it's profeſſors were reſtored to their honours, and Hofman and his partiſans were obliged to ſubmit.’

To ſay that what is true in Philoſophy, is falſe in Divinity, is a pernicious error.

Henry Julius, duke of Brunſwic, ordered that Daniel Hoffman ſhould publickly acknowledge his error, and make a public recantation of it. That order was executed the ſeventh of March, 1601. See the Memorabilia Eccleſiaſtica ſeculi a nato Chriſto decimi ſeptimi, pag. 23, and 24 (9), and Grawerus in his book De unica veritate.

---

(3) Micrælius, ubi ſupra.

(4) Thomaſius, Præfat. xlii, pag. 244.

(5) Id. ibid.

(6) Id. ibid. pag. 245.

* Confirmant ſuſpicionem, quæ leguntur in veſtibulo dicti Pervigilii: aperta enim ibi litis, Helmſtadii ab Hofmanno agitatæ, mentio. Faciunt huc & quæ leguntur in controverſia Crameriana Magdeburgenſi, nam & huic aliquid affinitatis cum Hofmanniana conſtat interceſſiſſe. —— This ſuſpicion is confirmed by what we read in the preface to the Pervigilium, where he plainly mentions the Helmſtadian controverſy, which was begun by Hoffman This is likewiſe confirmed by what we read in the Cramerian controverſy at Magdeburg, for it is plain, that this had ſome affinity with that of Hoffman.

† Vide ibi Diſcurſum IV, pag. 64, & ſeq.

‡ Pro defendenda (quod ipſum quoque legiter in titulo) Philoſophi ac Theologi concordia.

(7) Non erubuerim dicere, duplicem illam veritatem eſſe pſeudariſtotelicum figmentum ad omnes errores & atheiſmos excuſandos & defendendos. Caſmannus Coſmopœia, cap. i, q. 6, apud Thomaſium, Pref. xlii, pag. 243.

(8) Georgius Hornius. Hiſtor. Philoſoph. lib vi, cap. xii, pag. 321, 322. See Nibuſius, remark [C].

(9) That book, compiled by Andreas Carolus, abbot of St George, in the duchy of Wirtemberg, was printed at Tubingen, in 1697.

one another, upon the controverſy of the Euchariſt. See the remark, where I give the titles of ſome of Hoffman's works [D].

It was not only upon the Ubiquity that our doctor quarrelled with the other miniſters, but alſo about Predeſtination; for he accuſed Hunnius of explaining it contrary to the intent of the book of the Concord. Nay, he accuſed him of having vented in Luther's chair, a more pernicious doctrine than that of the Papiſts. The book of the Concord, ſaid he, teaches, that the cauſe of election is wholly out of ourſelves; but Hunnius and Mylius teach, that election is founded on the foreſight of faith. Hunnius and Mylius cauſed Hoffman to be condemned in an aſſembly of divines in the year 1593, and threatned him with excommunication, if he did not ſubſcribe to their opinion. He publiſhed an apology againſt them in the year following (b). Hoſpinian relates this more exactly. He ſays (c), that ſome divines of Leipſic, Jena, and Wittemberg, having aſſiſted at the ſecond marriage of Samuel Huber, in 1593, met at Polycarp Lyſerus's houſe; and that ſome of them were of opinion, that it ought to be declared in a public and authentic form, that Daniel Hoffman was a Calviniſt, and of the number of thoſe Heretics, who ought to be avoided: but the greater number of them were for writing to him to exhort him to conform to their doctrine, under the penalty of excommunication, if he neglected to do ſo. Hunnius, in the name of the reſt, wrote a long letter to him to that purpoſe. It was againſt this letter that Hoffman publiſhed an apology in the year following (d), in which he declared the reaſons that hindered him from conforming to the divines of Wittemberg. He declared that he had found in their books above a hundred errors, quite contrary to the articles of the Chriſtian faith (e).

(b) Taken from Henry Alting. Theolog. Hiſtor. pag. 302.

(c) Hoſpinian. de Origini & Progreſſu Libri Concordiæ, cap li, pag. 429.

(d) Id. ibid. pag. 431, & ſeq.

(e) Id. ibid. pag. 434.

[D] I give the title of ſome of Hoffman's works.] He publiſhed at Helmſtadt in 1583. Quæſtionum & reſponſionum in graviſſima controverſia de ſacroſancta cœna pars prima, in 8vo. Theodore Beza refuted it in the year following; but preſently after came out (10), Danielis Hofmanni Apologia miſſa ad Theodorum Bezam, qua τὸ ῥητὸν in verbis cœnæ dominicæ immotum, Bæza autem demonſtrationes falſiſſimæ demonſtrantur. Beza publiſhed in 1585, Reſponſionis pars altera contra Danielem Hofmannum; and in the year 1586 Conſpicillum ad Danielis Hofmanni demonſtrationes, &c. Theſe are ſome other books of Hofman; Reſponſio ad rationes & ſigna Chriſtophori Pezelii, &c. quibus docuit veros ſacramentarios agnoſcere: De 17. erroribus craſſioribus Jacobi Andreæ. Thoſe two are in High-Dutch. Theſe which follow are in Latin. De uſu & applicatione notionum Logicaram ad res Theologicas, & de inuſitatarum prædicationum reductione contra Goclenium, at Francfort, 1596. Liber apologeticus reſpondens chartis Miniſtrorum Eccleſiæ Bremenſis, at Helmſtadt 1585. Officina locorum Theologicorum. Explicatio ſententiæ in Epiſt. Canonica Joh. Apoſtoli, ſanguis Jeſu Chriſti Filii Dei mundat nos ab omni peccato, Helmſtadt 1581.

(10) At Helmſtadt, in 1585.

HOFMAN (MELCHIOR) from a ſimple mechanic, ſet up for a preacher, and fell to dogmatiſing in Livonia, and elſewhere, without any ſort of call from any perſon whatever (a). He left Saxony in great diſcontent, and went from thence into Holſtein, in the year 1527. He was appointed miniſter at Kiel, by the king of Denmark, and he kept that poſt near two years, notwithſtanding Luther's oppoſition [A]. He preached up I know not what medley of Zuinglianiſm and Fanaticiſm; and hardly explained any thing to his auditors, beſides the conſtruction of the Moſaic tabernacle, the viſions of the Apocalypſe, and ſuch like things. He pretended the day of judgment would be in the year 1534. They who confuted him upon that or other points, met with their match; for, as he was a brawler, he anſwered them with the greateſt fury [B]. He loaded Marquardus Schuldorpius with reproaches, and accuſed him of the crime of inceſt [C]. To prevent the diſorders, that might ariſe from theſe diſputes, the king of Denmark appointed a conference in the year 1529 (b), in which Hofman was confounded: and whereas he perſiſted in his opinions, he was baniſhed out of Holſtein. From thence he went (a) Ex pellione in Theologaſtrum tranſmutatus. Mollerus, ubi infra, citat. (c).

(b) It was held at Flenſburg.

[A] He maintained himſelf . . . . notwithſtanding Luther's oppoſition.] See what Luther wrote to a miniſter of Kiel (1): ‘A Melchiore pellifice velim cavere ‘vos omnes, ac curare apud Magiſtratus ne ad con‘ciones admittatur, etiamſi literas Regis oſtentet. A ‘nobis enim receſſit indignabundus, dum non volui‘mus ejus ſomnia probare. Ad docendum neque ‘valet, neque vocatus eſt. Hæc dicito nomine meo ‘omnibus veſtris, ut ipſum vitent ac tacere cogant. — ‘I would have you all beware of Melchior the Tan‘ner, and apply to the magiſtrates to get him hinder‘ed from preaching, tho' he ſhould ſhow the king's ‘letters. For he went from me full of rage, be‘cauſe I would not approve of his dreams. He has ‘neither abilities nor a call to teach. Acquaint every ‘body with my deſire in this matter, that they may ‘ſhun him, and force him to ſilence.’ Luther would have no body to hear this man who thruſt himſelf into the miniſtry, without any call or capacity. And Francis Burchard, counſellor of the dukes of Saxony, did alſo give notice to beware of him (2).

(1) Luther. Epiſt. ad Wilh. Praveſt, anno 1528. See Tom. II, Epiſt. Lutheri à Joh. Aurifabro Francofurti ad Viadrum ann. 1597, editarum, pag 371. Mollerus, Iſagoge ad Hiſtor. Cherſon. Cimbricæ, Part. III, pag. 129.

(2) In Epiſt. ad Petrum Suavenium Conſil. Danicum A. 1528, ſcripta, quam exhibet J. Manlii Farrago Epiſtol. Melanch. Part. III, pag. 493, 494. Moler. ibid.

[B] He anſwered them with the greateſt fury.] All his books were written in the vulgar language: His apology againſt Nicholas Ambſdorf, firſt miniſter at Magdeburg, was printed in the year 1528. This miniſter had confuted him, concerning the time of the world's end. ‘Oppoſuit ei Hofmannus apologiam a‘marulentiſſimam . . . . in iſta convitiorum plauſtra in ‘Adverſarium evomit (3). —— Hofman wrote an apo‘logy, wherein he pours out all manner of reproaches ‘againſt his adverſary.’

(3) Moler. ibid. pag. 130.

[C] He reproached Schuldorpius with the crime of inceſt.] The accuſation was founded upon Schuldorpius's marrying his niece. Marq. Schuldorpio, Ki‘lonienſi, Parocho Sleſvic. qui ſuam de S. Cœna ſen‘tentiam impugnarat, duobus itidem ſcriptis, Kilonii ‘ann. 1528 impreſſis . . . . . reſpondit & hominem, ‘cum alias ob cauſas, tum ob matrimonium cum filia ‘ſororis, ope eloquentiæ ſuæ caninæ, miſere exagita‘vit (4). —— He anſwered Marquardus Schuldorpius ‘of Kiel, miniſter of Sleſwic, who had impugned his ‘doctrine concerning the Euchariſt, by two pieces, print‘ed at Kiel, anno 1528, and in his cynical ſtile hand‘led him very roughly on ſeveral heads, and particular‘ly on his having married his niece.’ Schuldorpius alledges in his defence, among other reaſons, the authority of Luther, whoſe letter he produced, wherein he confeſſes, that he adviſed that marriage, and maintains, that it is lawful. ‘Utrique Schuldorpius mox ‘repoſuit Epiſtolam ad Fideles civitatis Kilonienſis ‘Saxonicam, went to Straſburg, where he publiſhed a falſe relation of the conference [D]. He was imprisoned there in the year 1532, after a publick diſpute, wherein he engaged with the miniſters. This loſt his reputation with his followers. He died in the year 1533, or thereabouts (c). He was not of Holſtein as ſome have affirmed [E].

(4) Id. ibid.

Several writers ſay, that Hofman began to diſtinguiſh himſelf in Straſburg (d), and was followed by a crowd of diſciples, and that removing to Embden in the year 1528 [F], he there vented his viſions with ſo aſtoniſhing a ſucceſs, as to paſs for the firſt Patriarch of the Anabaptiſts of the Netherlands and the Lower Germany [G]. He ſo infatuated his followers, that they took him for that Elias, whom God is to ſend upon earth before the day of judgment. He returned from thence to Straſburg, with hopes of ſeeing the accompliſhment of a prophecy, that concerned him [H], and which had been delivered by a good old man of Frieſland. He there preached up Anabaptiſm openly. The diſturbances he raiſed, occaſioned the calling of a ſynod in June, 1532, where he was permitted to diſpute with the miniſters. He was ſolidly confuted, but he continued, notwithſtanding, to dogmatize, and it was thought neceſſary to impriſon him [I], the people thinking themſelves upon the brink of great troubles, becauſe his followers

'Saxonicam, eique adjecit Lutheri ad ſe literas, in eandem Dialectum transfuſas, in quibus ille conjugio huic, cujus ſe ſuaſorem fuiſſe fatetur, ingenti cum παῤῥησίᾳ patrocinari, ac Abrahami, Saram ducentis, exemplo defendere iſtud non dubitat (5).'

[D] He publiſhed a falſe relation of the conference at Flensburg.] He maintained, that he had ſtopped Pomeranus's mouth (6), and that the ſecretaries of the conference were forgers (7). Pomeranus, to refute theſe vauntings, publiſhed the acts of the conference with the moſt authentic formalities. He added to them a refutation of Hofman's writing, and the converſion of Heggius (8), which was one of the fruits of that diſpute: Heggius had been one of Hofman's ſeconds in it, and he gained ſo much knowledge by it, as induced him to renounce his ſect (9). The other of Hofman's ſeconds had done the ſame thing. Pomeranus did not appear at the conference as a diſputant, but as one of the directors under the eldeſt ſon of his Daniſh majeſty (10). He ended the conference with an oration, in which he confuted Hofman's arguments. Finem Colloquio oratione Bugenhagii adverſus argumenta ipſius ἀνασκευαστικῇ impoſitum (11).

[E] He was not of Holſtein as ſome have reported.] See the words of Mr Mollerus (12): 'Suevus ortu fuit, non autem Holſatus, uti Conrad. Dietericus † & Sebaſtianus Schmidius ‡ falſo ſibi perſuadent. —— He was originally of Suabia, and not of Holſtein, as Conradus Dietericus and Sebaſtian Schmidius falſely affirm.'

[F] Several authors affirm that he removed to Embden in the year 1528.] After Mr Mollerus's proofs, it cannot be doubted that Hofman was at Kiel in the year 1528, and 1529, and that he had retired thither upon his leaving Saxony in diſcontent (13), and therefore we may believe they are miſtaken, who make him remove from Strasburg to Embden in 1528. Mr Ottius obſerves, that many ſay this; and he doth not criticiſe them. 'Embdam Argentorato abiſſe Melchiorem Hoffmannum plures ajunt. Ergo non demum anno 1531 eò conceſſit niſi forte redierit, vel diutius ibi commoratus ſit (14). Theſe words inform us, that ſome ſay, Hofman went to Embden in 1531. This ſeems to be the true epoch of his miniſtry at Embden: for ſince he publiſhed in Strasburg a relation of the conference of Flensburg (15) in the year 1529; it is a proof that he went to Strasburg as ſoon as he was expelled from Holſtein. It is very probable that from Strasburg he went to Embden, and that he returned again to Strasburg: he was there in the year 1532. Note, that Mr Mollerus promiſes a relation of the tumults he raiſed in Strasburg and Embden, after he left Holſtein (16). Is not this to tell us, that he went to Embden after he had divulged his dreams in Strasburg, in the year 1529? Mr Hoornbeeck has reaſon for ſaying, that he returned from Embden to Strasburg, but not for ſaying, that he went from Straſburg to Embden in 1528 (17). This author obſerves, that at his going from Embden, he left there one Trypmaacker, who quarrelling with his colleagues, retired into Holland, and became the firſt apoſtle of the Anabaptiſts. Caſſander is leſs miſtaken about the date of this fanatic's miniſtry. 'Donec tandem, ſays he, ſub ann. 1532 Melchior quidam of Hmannus, arte pellio, hanc novam contagionem cum aliis quibuſdam non minus pernicioſis erroribus in Germaniam hanc inferiorem & Belgicam invexit (18). —— Till at laſt, about the year 1542, one Melchior Hofman, a Tanner, brought this new contagion, together with ſome other no leſs dangerous errors, into the Netherlands, and into Holland.'

[G] He paſſed for the firſt patriarch of the Anabaptiſts of the Netherlands, and Lower Germany.] The above-cited words of Caſſander prove this. Here follow two other witneſſes. 'Huic Patriarchæ etiam eorum qui in inferiori Germania ſuccreverunt, Anabaptiſtarum tradux adſcribi ſolet. —— The origin of the Anabaptiſts in Lower Germany, is likewiſe uſually aſcribed to this patriarch.' It is thus, Frederic Spanheim ſpeaks (19). 'Qui huc Anabaptiſtica deliria attulit ex Germania ſuperiore primus fuit Melchior Hofman. —— Melchior Hofman was the firſt who introduced the dreams of the Anabaptiſts into this country from Germany.' Hoornbeeck ſays this (20).

[H] He hoped to ſee the accompliſhment of a prophecy that concerned him.] Whilſt he was planting his goſpel at Embden with great heat, and ſtoutly re-baptizing people, there was a good old man there, who poſſeſſed him with a deſire of returning to Strasburg. This old man was of that party. He propheſied, that the magiſtrates of Strasburg ſhould impriſon Hofman, but that at ſix months end the priſoner ſhould be delivered, and ſhould go and preach the goſpel over all the earth, as another Elias, having with him a great train of prophets, and the one hundred and forty four thouſand ſealed perſons, mentioned in the Revelation (21). Hofman having publickly diſputed with the miniſters the eleventh of June, 1532, and not ceaſing to ſpread his enthuſiaſms, after he had been confounded in that diſpute, was put in priſon. When he ſaw that part of the prophecy was accompliſhed, he became more inſolent. He ſhook off the duſt from his feet, he threw his hat upon the ground, and proteſted before God, that he would feed upon nothing but bread and water, till he ſhould point out with his finger him that ſent him. His hopes were confounded, for he died in priſon (22). A hundred inſtances ſhew, that the moſt chimerical predictions have had ſome parts of them confirmed by the event: which has given ſtrength to the error; nothing contributing more to the drawing in of theſe viſionaries and their adherents. It is eſpecially with relation to theſe matters, that it may be ſaid, The end crowns the work. Men ſhould be very cautious of judging of the whole by a part, ex ungue leonem. The concluſion is to be waited for, and the firſt ſucceſs ought to be diſtruſted; for this is a ſnare, and a dangerous allurement.

[I] They found it neceſſary to impriſon him.] Spanhemius, Hoornbeeck, and many others, affirm, that Hofman diſputed in June 1532, and was not impriſoned till after the obſtinacy with which he ſtill continued to dogmatize after the diſpute. But I will here produce an author, who places that conference in June 1533, and aſſures us, that this enthuſiaſt was brought out of priſon to diſpute with the miniſters. 'Anno 1533, Menſe Junio die 11, Hofmannus Argentorati è vinculis ad publicam diſputationem productus & admiſſus fuit: à quo tempore inſtaurationem Regni DEI ortam eſſe ſui affirmabant. Iſdem Hoffmannus Authoritate prædictionum cujuſdam verè deliri Leonardi Joeſt civis Argentinenſis, & aliorum ſimilium fanaticorum hominum, multa vana de urbe Argent. prædixit, &c. quæ tamen ab urbe non recepta,

(c) Taken from the Iſagoge ad Hiſtoriam Cherſoneſi Cimbricæ of John Molerus, Part. III, pag. 128, & ſeq.

(d) Argentinæ inclareſcere cœpit. Frider. Spanhemius, de Origine & Progreſſu Anabaptiſt. n. 22, pag. m. 211.

(5) Id. ibid. pag. 131.

(6) His name is Joh. Bugenhagius: but he is commonly called Pomeranus, from his native country.

(7) Idem, Mollerus, pag. 133.

(8) Ibid.

(9) Paraſtatæ Hofmanni fuere Johan. à Campen & Jac. Hegge Dantiſcanus, ad ſaniorem in colloquio hoc mentem reducti. Id. Moller. pag. 131, 132.

(10) Mollerus, ibid. pag. 131.

(11) Id. ibid.

(12) Idem. pag. 127.

† In Analyſi Periochæ Evang. Dom. II. Adventus.

‡ In Diſſ. de Chiliaſmo Apocalyptico, pag. 9.

(13) An. 1527. Magdeburgo in Holſatiam delatus. Mollerus, ubi ſupra, pag. 128. Seckendorf, Hiſt. Lutheran. lib. ii, pag. 122, ſays he departed from Wittemberg.

(14) Johan. Henricus Ottius, Hiſtor. Anabapt. ad ann. 1528, n. 1, pag. 45.

(15) It was held a little after Eaſter, in the year 1529. See Mollerus, ubi ſupra, pag. 131.

(16) Tumultuum, quos Hofmannus poſt abitum ex Holſatia, Argentinæ & Embdæ concitavit Anabaptiſtico-Enthuſiaſticorum. Id. ibid. pag. 133.

(17) Hoornb. ſumma Controverſ. pag. m. 362.

(18) Caſſander, Epiſt. Dedicat. Tractatus de Baptiſmo.

(19) Spanh. de Orig. & Progreſſu Anabapt. n. 22, pag. m. 211.

(20) Hoornbeeck, ſumma Controv. pag. m. 361.

(21) Chap. vii, and xiv.

(22) Taken from Hoornbeeck, ubi ſupra, pag. 362.

followers ſaid that the town of Straſburg was to be the New Jeruſalem, where the new kingdom of CHRIST ſhould be eſtabliſhed, and that as Hofman was the Elias that was to come, Polterman was the Enoch who was to ſecond him. When they ſaw Hofman in priſon, they gave out, that he ſhould come out with one hundred forty four thouſand ſealed people, who ſhould anathematize the earth, and break through all the obſtacles which ſhould be oppoſed to them. Our Elias, and our Enoch, ſaid they, are the two olives, and the two candleſticks in the Revelation (e), which no body can hurt, and if any one attempt it, fire ſhall come out of their mouth, and devour their enemies. When they ſaw Hofman did not come out of priſon at the time foretold by certain prophets, they were in a great conſternation; but to amuſe them, he ſent them word, to reſt for two years, after the example of Eſdras and Haggai, who were forced for a like ſpace of time to interrupt the building of the temple. He died in priſon, and fruſtrated the hopes of his diſciples (f). I will mention ſome of his Hereſies [K]. Some ſay that he began to preach near the Rhine, after the defeat of the peaſants in 1525 (g).

(e) See Revelation, chap. xi, ver. 4, 5.

(f) Taken from Frederic Spanheim, de Orig. & Progreſſu Anabaptiſt. pag. 211.

(g) Joh. Henricus Ottius, Hiſt. Anabapt. ad ann. 1525, n. 21, pag. 36.

' cepta, ſed aquâ & igni interdicebatur omnibus, qui ' eam ſectam publicè privatimque tuebantur (23). —— ' In the year 1533, June 11, Hofman was taken out of ' priſon, and admitted to a public diſpute: and from ' this period his diſciples date the inſtauration of the ' kingdom of GOD. The ſame Hofman likewiſe, on the ' authority of the prophecies, of one Leonard Joeſt, a ' delirious man, and citizen of Strasburg, and of other ' fanatics of the ſame ſort, predicted many vain things ' concerning that city, &c. which were not received by ' it; but, on the contrary, all who either publickly or ' privately embraced that ſect, were baniſhed from ' thence.' Ottius (24) follows this chronology; which ſhews that many faults have crept into the narratives of the hiſtorians of Anabaptiſm. He quotes a paſſage of Henry Urſinus (25), where we learn that Hofman that year propheſied, that Strasburg ſhould be the New Jeruſalem, as Rome was Babylon; that Strasburg ſhould be beſieged the ſame year, and that there ſhould be a great ſlaughter in it; and that this man preferred his predictions before thoſe of Iſaiah and Jeremiah; and that Matthias and his favourers applied to Munſter all theſe fine prerogatives of Strasburg, which diſpleaſed Hofman when he knew it.

[K] I ſhall mention ſome of his hereſies.] He taught, I. that the word was not united to the fleſh taken from the Holy Virgin: his reaſon was, that all humane fleſh is defiled with ſin, and conſequently curſed. II. That JESUS CHRIST has but one nature. III. That the obtaining of Salvation depends on ourſelves, and that we are only ſaved or damned according to the uſe that we make of our free-will. IV. That the baptiſm of infants proceeds rather from the enemy of GOD and men, than from GOD (26).

(23) Ottius, Hiſt. Anabapt. ad ann. 1533, n. 6, pag. 61. He quotes Revius in Hiſtor. Georgii. But he ſhould have quoted Nicolaus Bleſdikius; for it is he who wrote the Hiſtory of David George, and Revius did but publiſh it.

(24) Ottius, ibid.

(25) Henr. Urſinus, Præf. in Apocalyp. in fine.

(26) Taken from Spanheim, ubi ſupra, pag. 211.

HONORIA, ſiſter of Valentinian III, incurred the indignation of that emperor by her leudneſs, and endeavoured to revenge herſelf by another crime. She ſollicited Attila to undertake the conqueſt of the empire, and promiſed to marry him. Authors vary a little about this. Some pretend that ſhe preſerved her chaſtity till ſhe ſaw her deſign of marrying the king of the Huns miſcarry [A]: others ſay that before ſhe had that intention, ſhe had led a diſorderly life [B].

[A] Some pretend that ſhe preſerved her chaſtity till ſhe ſaw her deſign of marrying the king of the Huns miſcarry.] A modern author, who quotes Sigonius and Marcellinus, ſays that Honoria, devoured with a luſtful flame, ſent an eunuch to Attila, to offer herſelf in marriage to him with the empire; that Attila ſent ſome embaſſadors to the emperor Valentinian to ask Honoria of him; but that before their return he fell ſo much in love with a young lady of his own nation, that he married her, and died on his wedding-day by too much drinking and careſſing his ſpouſe: that upon this, Honoria, being diſappointed of her hopes, gave up herſelf to ſome galants, who got her with child, after which ſhe was ſent to Conſtantinople. ' Hæc ' libidine inflammata Eunuchum legatum ad Attilam ' Hunnorum regem miſit, conjugium & regnum ei offerens. Miſit igitur Attila legatos ad Valentinianum, qui ſuaſionibus minas adjicientes, Honoriam ' petebant, ſed priuſquam legati Roma reverterentur, ' Attila . . . . . puellæ cujuſdam . . . . . amore captus ' . . . . . nuptias cum ea celebravit . . . . . Honoria igitur cum ſpe ſua fruſtaretur, aliis ſe ſubſternit: inde ' gravida facta, Conſtantinopolim mittitur (1).'

[B] Others ſay, that before ſhe had that intention, ſhe led a diſorderly life.] ' Honoria, ſiſter of the emperor Valentinian, giving herſelf up to the ſteward ' of his houſhold, was diſgracefully driven out of her ' brother's palace, and afterwards forced to retire into ' the eaſt to Theodoſius. This inſpired her with ſo ' furious a paſſion for revenge, that finding no other ' way to ſatisfy it, ſhe ſecretly ſent to Attila, to perſuade him to undertake the conqueſt of Italy, repreſenting to him, that the weakneſs of Valentinian, ' and the confuſion of the affairs of the empire, would ' make it very eaſy for him (2).' According to Bonfinius's account (3), ſhe was in a convent when ſhe ſent to ſound Attila, who perceiving that the affair did not go on, fancied that they made a jeſt of him; and that this induced him to marry the daughter of the king of the Bactrians. If Honoria was in a cloyſter, it is a ſign ſhe had behaved herſelf ill.

(1) Chriſtian. Matthiæ Theat. Hiſtor. pag. m. 733.

(2) Maimbourg, Hiſt. de l'Arian. Tom. III, livr. ix, pag. 6, & 7, Dutch Edit.

(3) Hiſtor. Hungar. Decad. I, lib. vii.

HONORIUS, a Roman emperor, ſon of Theodoſius. Not to repeat what is to be found in Moreri, I ſhall only ſpeak of his marriages. He married ſucceſſively Stilico's two daughters [A], who both died, as is ſaid, virgins. Zoſimus relates hereupon ſome very ſingular circumſtances [B], not to be found in other hiſtorians; but he

[A] He married Stilico's two daughters..] The firſt was called Mary, and the other Thermantia. Their mother Serena, fired with ambition, did not ſtay till Mary ſhould arrive to the age of marriage, in order to give her to the emperor; and after Mary's death, ſhe was in as great haſte to marry Thermantia to the ſame prince. The words I am going to quote, prove that they died maids. Stilico Comes, cujus filiæ duæ Maria & Thermantia, ſingulæ uxores Honorii principis fuerant, utraque tamen virgo defuncta (1). And yet the poet Claudian tells us, that Honorius and Mary lay together (2). See what Zoſimus tells us below.

[B] Zoſimus relates hereupon ſome ſingular circumſtances.] Serena, not being able to reſolve upon deferring the marriage of her daughter Mary with the emperor, nor to conſent that nature ſhould be forced by the conſummation of the marriage with Mary, who was not yet ripe for it, reſolved on a medium, which was to debilitate Honorius. She found out a woman experienced in this ſort of charms, who contrived the matter ſo, that Honorius when he went to bed to his young ſpouſe, had neither inclination nor power to pay what is called the conjugal duty. Mary died ſoon after with her virginity. Honorius ſome time after courted Thermantia, Mary's ſiſter: the father

(1) Marcellinus Comes in Chron. apud Barthium in Claudian. pag. 766. Edit. in 4to.

(2) Tyrio qua fuſus Honorius oſtro, Carpebat teneros Maria cum conjuge ſomnos. Claudian. de Bello Gildonico, ver. 327.

he is accuſed of a groſs contradiction [C], which every reader muſt perceive at firſt ſight.

ther was not inclined to that marriage; but Serena paſſionately deſired it, in order to maintain her authority. Ὁ δὲ βασιλεὺς Ὁνώριος ἀπὸ πολλοῦ Μαρίας αὐτῷ τελευτησάσης τῆς γαμετῆς τὴν ταύτης ἀδελφὴν Θερμαντίαν ᾔτει οἱ δοθῆναι πρὸς γάμον. Imperator autem Honorius, Maria conjuge jampridem rebus humanis exempta, ſororem ejus Thermantiam ſibi matrimonio jungi petebat (3). The marriage was concluded, but was but of ſhort continuance; Thermantia ſoon dying with the ſame fate as her ſiſter. That is to ſay, ſhe lay with a man who neither had the deſire, nor the power to know her: the ſorcereſs, whom Serena had made uſe of, renewed the operation of her charms. Zoſimus doth not expreſsly ſay this. It is only a conſequence I draw from his words. I will ſet them down at length; they deſerve it, as containing a very ſingular fact. Τοῦ γάμου πρὸς τὴν Μαρίαν Ὁνωρίου ἐνισταμένου, γάμων ὥραν οὔπω τὴν κόρην ἄγουσαν ἡ μήτηρ ὁρῶσα, καὶ οὔτε ἀναβαλέσθαι τὸν γάμον ἀνεχομένη, καὶ τὸ παρ' ἡλικίαν εἰς μίξιν ἐκδοῦναι, φύσεως ἀδικίαν καὶ οὐδὲν ἕτερον εἶναι νομίζουσα, γυναικὶ τὰ τοιαῦτα θεραπεύειν ἐπισταμένῃ περιτυχοῦσα, πράττει διὰ ταύτης τὸ συνεῖναι μὲν τὴν θυγατέρα τῷ βασιλεῖ καὶ ὁμόλεκτρον εἶναι. Τὸν δὲ μήτε ἐθέλειν μήτε δύνασθαι, τὰ τῷ γάμῳ προσήκοντα πράττειν. Ἐν τούτῳ τῆς κόρης ἀπείρου γάμων ἀποθανούσης, εἰκότως ἡ Σερήνα βασιλείου γονῆς ἐπιθυμοῦσα δέει τοῦ μὴ τὴν τοσαύτην αὐτῇ δυναστείαν ἐλαττωθῆναι, τῇ δευτέρᾳ θυγατρὶ συνάψαι τὸν Ὁνώριον ἔσπευδεν· οὗ δὴ γενομένου τελευτᾷ μὲν ἡ κόρη μετ' οὐ πολὺ ταυτὰ τῇ προτέρᾳ παθοῦσα. Quum Honorius matrimonium cum Maria contraheret, mater ejus Serena quæ puellam necdum nubilem ætatem attigiſſe cerneret, ac neque ſibi poſſet imperare ut nuptiæ differentur, & immaturam maritali conſuetudini tradere nihil eſſe arbitraretur aliud quam injuriam naturæ facere; nacta mulierem quæ rebus hujuſmodi remedium adferre ſciret, ejus opera perfecit, ut filia cum principe quidem viveret, ac tori conſors ejuſdem eſſet, verum ille nec vellet nec poſſet, ea quæ matrimonium requireret, implere. Interim puella virgine mortua, non abs re Serena quæ ſobolis imperatoriæ conſequendæ percupida eſſet, ob metum ne quid ſibi de tanta potentia decederet, id operam dabat ut Honorium alteri filiæ copularet. Quo facto, puella non multo poſt vitam cum morte commutat, quum idem ei quod priori accidiſſet (4).

[C] He is accuſed of a groſs contradiction.] We have ſeen, that he ſays, that Thermantia died a little after her marriage; yet he aſſures us in the ſame book, that Honorius having put Stilico to death, ſent back Thermantia to her mother. Ὁ δὲ βασιλεὺς Ὁνώριος τὴν μὲν γαμετὴν Θερμαντίαν παραλυθεῖσαν τοῦ βασιλείου θρόνου τῇ μητρὶ προσέταττε παραδίδοσθαι μηδὲν διὰ τοῦτο ὑφορωμένην. Imperator autem Honorius uxorem Thermantiam auguſtali dejectam ſolio matri ſuæ reddi juſſit, nulla tamen idcirco ſuſpicione gravatam (5). Stilico was killed the ſame year in which Honorius married Thermantia, that is, during the conſulſhip of Baſſus and Philip in the year 408. As to the other daughter of Stilico, ſhe was married to the emperor in the year 398, in which year was the war againſt Gildo. See the paſſage of Claudian (6).

(3) Zoſimus, lib. v, pag. m. 333.

(4) Id. ibid.

(5) Ib. pag. 346. At pag. 350, he ſpeaks of the rewards beſtowed upon the Eunuchs who brought Thermantia to Serana.

(6) In the remark [A].

HOORNBEEK (JOHN) profeſſor of Divinity in the univerſities of Utrecht and Leyden, was one of the moſt famous divines, who appeared in Holland in the XVIIth century. He was born at Haerlem (a), in the year 1617, where he performed his ſtudies till he was fifteen or ſixteen years of age; after which he was ſent to Leyden, where he made great improvement under the learned profeſſors of that univerſity. Having ſtaid two years there, he went to ſtudy at Utrecht, in the year 1635, from whence he returned to Leyden the year following. He was ordained miniſter in the year 1639, and went to exerciſe his office ſecretly at Cologne. He diſcharged all the duties of it, with a great deal of piety and prudence, and was not diſcouraged by the dangers he was expoſed to in that city which is ſo much addicted to the Popiſh religion. He returned to Holland in the year 1643, and was promoted (b) to the degree of doctor of Divinity with great applauſe, the twenty firſt of December the ſame year. He gave ſuch proofs of his great capacity, that he was looked upon as a man ſufficiently qualified for the profeſſorſhip of Divinity, which was vacant at Utrecht by the death of Schotanus. He accepted that imployment preferably to all others, which were offered him in other towns [A]. He was inſtalled profeſſor of Divinity at Utrecht in July 1644. He was choſen one the ordinary paſtors of the ſame town the year following, and notwithſtanding the difficulty of diſcharging the duties of thoſe two imployments, he acquitted himſelf of them with great exactneſs [B], whereby his excellent talents became ſo uſeful to the public,

(a) John Hoornbeek his grandfather, retired thither with his wife in the year 1548, when he left Flanders his native country on account of religion.

(b) In the univerſity of Utrecht.

[A] Poſts were offered to him in other towns.] In February 1644, the church of Maeſtricht deſired to have him for their miniſter. That of Graft in North Holland invited him in March in the ſame year, and he was offered a profeſſorſhip of Divinity in the illuſtrious ſchool at Harderwic (1) in May following (2). It is a very glorious thing to be thus courted at twenty ſeven years of age.

[B] He diſcharged the duties of theſe two imployments with great exactneſs.] I have reſerved the particulars of it for this remark, in which I make uſe of the words of him who wrote our Hoornbeek's life. ' In utraque autem Statione (3) per decennium fere ' perſeveravit, tanta eruditionis, eloquentiæ, pietatis ' & diligentiæ fama, omnibuſque ordinibus adeo gratus, ut nullus in majori fuerit exiſtimatione, non Ultrajecti ſolum, ſed in toto Belgio. Nempe aſſiduus erat ' in docendo, precando, concionando, legendo, diſputando, regendo, præſidendo, catechiſationibus habendis, membris Eccleſiæ, imprimis ægris viſitandis. Quibus artibus optimis certe, Magiſtratus Trajectini gratiam adeo meruit & inivit, ut Magiſtratus optimus ſuo ' proprio motu, non petentem, nec forte cogitantem, ' liberaverit dimidia parte oneris Paſtoralis, ſervato tamen integro honore & honorario. — In both theſe ſtations he continued near the ſpace of ten years, in ſo great ' reputation for learning, eloquence, piety, and diligence, ' and ſo acceptable to people of all ranks, that none ' had a greater ſhare of the public eſteem, not only at ' Utrecht but in all Holland. For he was aſſiduous in ' teaching, praying, preaching, reading, diſputing, preſiding, catechizing and viſiting the members of the church, ' and eſpecially the ſick. By this excellent conduct, he deſerved and obtained the favour of the magiſtrates of ' Utrecht to ſuch a degree, that they of their own ' accord, without his asking, and poſſibly without his ' knowledge of it, freed him from one half of his paſtoral ' charge, preſerving his rank and ſalary.' Would you have a notion of a good paſtor, read in what manner Hoornbeek performed his viſits. ' Membra Eccleſiæ ' frequenter inviſebat, pios animabat, ignaros docebat, ' malos corrigebat, hæreticos confutabat, afflictos ſolabatur, ægros recreabat, infirmos roborabat, dejectos ' erigebat, pauperibus ſubveniebat, omnes denique juvabat pro eorum ſtatu & conditione, omnibus, aderat in omnibus, omnibus ſe omnia faciebat, gravibus gravem, hilaribus hilarem, afflictis condolentem ' doctis doctum & Doctorem, plebi Paſtorem, errantibus ducem, ut in viam reduceret veritatis. —— ' He frequently viſited the members of his congregation, ' encouraged

(1) A town in Guelderland.

(2) Taked from John Hoornbeek's Life prefixed to his book De Converſione Indorum.

(3) That is the place of profeſſor and that of paſtor.

public, that he got the love and eſteem of every body. But that he might not ſink under ſo many labours, the magiſtates exempted him from part of his miniſterial functions. He was invited to Leyden, to the ſame imployments that he had exerciſed at Utrecht; and he accepted of that invitation in the year 1654. He was a great ornament to that famous univerſity, till his death, which happened the firſt of September 1666. He deſerved a much longer life; but it is more to be wondered that a man ſo laborious as he was [C], ſhould live forty nine years, than that he lived no longer. The many books he publiſhed [D], are a ſpeaking proof of his application, and of the vaſt extent of his knowledge. He underſtood ſeveral languages [E], and enjoyed the friendſhip of the greateſt divines of his age (c). He never deviated from the moſt rigid orthodoxy, and and was no leſs valuable for the qualities of a moral and virtuous man, than for the talents of his mind, and of a learned profeſſor. This we may ſee at large in his life (d). He left children worthy of him [F], and one needs ſay no more in their commendation.

(c) See the catalogue of them in his Life.

(d) It is prefixed to h's treatiſe De Converſione Indorum & Gentilium, and it was written by David Stuart. I have taken this article from it.

‘ encouraged the pious, taught the ignorant, reproved the wicked, confuted the Heretics, comforted the afflicted, refreſhed the ſick, ſtrengthened the weak, raiſed the dejected, relieved the poor, and, in fine, aſſiſted every perſon according to his ſtate and condition; was helpful to all in all things, made himſolf all things to all men, grave with the grave, gay with the gay, ſorrowful with the afflicted, learned with the learned, a ſhepherd to the people, and a guide to thoſe that wandered, in order to bring them back to the ways of truth.’ As to his vigilance in the functions of his profeſſorſhip, this is the teſtimony that is given of him. ‘ Studioſos vero Theologiæ velut filios omni cura complectebatur, laboreſque ſuos præcipuos iis impendebat; non lectiones ſolum in eorum gratiam habebat, ſed frequentia Collegia omnis generis, atque Diſputationes ordinarias & extraordinarias, ex quibus reſultarunt tot vaſta & egregia volumina ad inſtitutionem juventutis imo ad uſum omnium, ſed imprimis ad converſionem Hæreticorum (4). —— He was as a father to the ſtudents of Divinity, and on them he beſtowed his chief labours; he not only gave them lectures in Divinity, but frequent courſes in all kinds of learning, as alſo diſputations ordinary and extraordinary, which produced many and excellent books, for the inſtruction of youth, nay for the benefit of all, but eſpecially for the converſion of Heretics.’

[C] So laborious as he was.] This may be known from the particulars contained in the preceding remark; but we ſhall know it ſtill better by the words that follow. They relate to the time that he was profeſſor of Divinity and paſtor at Leyden. ‘ Curam Eccleſiæ ſuo jure poterat in Collegas derivare, quia primario Paſtori (5) ab ea immuni adjunctus, cum eo labores, honores, præmia & privilegia omnia ex decreto ſapientiſſimi Magiſtratus æqualiter diſtribuebat. Sed ab Eccleſiæ cura, membrorumque & ægrorum viſitatione diſpenſari noluit, contra vero, cum dimidias tantum Paſtoris vices demandatas haberet, integras voluit implere, zelo & diligentia ſtupenda in homine alias occupatiſſimo, imo non tam onerato quam oppreſſo, & tantum non fatiſcente ſub multiplici onere, cui plures ſimul juncti vix eſſent pares. Concionabatur in Templo, legebat in Academia, præſidebat in Conſiſtorio, Catechiſationes inſtituebat in Choro, Collegia habebat in domo, ſcribebat in muſæo, ſæpe in lecto, membra Eccleſiæ viſitabat in ædibus, ægros etiam & peſtiferos, curam ad omnes & ad omnia extendebat (6). ——— He might have juſtly thrown his paſtoral charge upon his colleagues, becauſe he was put upon the ſame foot with the firſt miniſter, who was exempted from that charge; and by the decree of the magiſtrates was to ſhare all labours, honours, emoluments, and privileges with him. But he would not be exempted from the paſtoral office, and viſiting of the ſick, on the contrary tho' he was only charged with one half of the duty he would perform the whole; a zeal and diligence prodigious in a man, who had ſo much other buſineſs, who was not only loaded but oppreſſed, and ſcarce able to ſuſtain the various burthen for which the joint force of many would hardly have ſufficed. He preached in the Church, read in the Univerſity, preſided in the Conſiſtory, cathechized in the Choir, gave lectures at home, wrote in his cloſet, and many times in his bed, viſited his pariſhioners in their houſes, as alſo the ſick and thoſe infected with the plague. His care extended to all things, and all perſons.’

[D] The great number of books he publiſhed.] They may be divided into five claſſes, Didactica, Polemica, Practica, Hiſtorica, Oratoria. Thoſe of the I. are, Inſtitutiones Theologicæ in 8vo. Irenicum de ſtudio pacis & concordiæ, in 4to. De conſociatione Evangelica inter Reformatos, & Evangelicos, in 4to. Thoſe of the II. are, Socinianiſmi confutati tomi tres, in 4to. Pro convincendis & convertendis Judæis, l. 8 (7) in 4to. De converſione Gentilium, libri duo in 4to. Examen Bullæ Urbani VIII. de Jeſuitiſſis, Imaginibus, & Feſtis, in 4to. Examen Bullæ Innocentii X, de pace Germaniæ, in 4to. Epiſtola ad Duræum de Independentiſmo, in 8vo. Commentarius de Paradoxis Weigelianis, in 12mo. Apologia pro Eccleſia Chriſtiana hodierna, contra Libellum, ad Legem & Teſtimonium, &c. in 8vo. De obſervando à Chriſtianis Præcepto Decalogi quarto, in 12mo. De Epiſcopatu, in 8vo. Thoſe of the III. are, Theologiæ practicæ tomi duo, in 4to. De Peſte, in 12mo. Thoſe of the IV. are, Summa controverſiarum, in 8vo. Miſcella vetera & nova. I put in the V. Orationes variæ Inaugurales, Valedictoriæ, Rectorales & Funebres. I do not give the titles of his Dutch works, which contain ſeveral tracts.

[E] He underſtood ſeveral languages.] Here follow the words of the author of his Life. ‘ Linguas ſi ſpectes novit plurimas doctarum & vulgarium, Latinam, Græcam, Hebraicam, Chaldaicam, Syriacam, Rabinicam, Belgicam, Germanicam, Anglicam, Gallicam, Italicam, Arabicæ & Hiſpanicæ Rudimenta attigit (8). —— He underſtood many of the learned and modern languages, the Latin, Greek, Hebrew, Chaldaic, Syriac, Rabinic, Dutch, German, Engliſh, French, Italian, and had attained the elements of the Arabic and Spaniſh.’

[F] He left children worthy of him.] He married at Utrecht Anne Bernard in the year 1650. By this marriage he became related to ſeveral famous men, as to Conſtantine l'Empereur (9), profeſſor of Divinity (10), and Jodocus Hondius (11) a famous Geographer, grandfather to Henry Hondius, who was killed in fighting valiantly for the ſervice of his country, in the ſhip of admiral Van Tromp which he commanded. Mr Hoornbeek left two ſons, ISAAC HOORNBEEK formerly an eminent advocate at the Hague, and at preſent penſionary of the city of Rotterdam (§α); and HENRY EMILIUS HOORNBEEK, a commiſſioner of the impoſts in the province of Holland.

[(§ α) He was made in 1720 counſellor-penſionary, keeper of the ſeals, and Stadtholder of the Fiefs of Holland and Weſt-Frieſland, &c. and he died at the Hague, the ſeventeenth of June 1727, in the ſeventy firſt year of his age. REM. CRIT.]

(4) Ex Vita Jo. Hoornbeeki.

(5) It was the profeſſor Heidanus.

(6) Ex eadem Vita.

(7) This book is without doubt the ſame that Mr Baillet, Tom. II, of his Anti, pag. 38, calls Diſp. Anti-Judaëques, but it is certain, that this is not the title of it. It is likely that Mr Bailet was deceived by ſomebody, who quoted it thus for brevity ſake.

(8) In Vita Hoornbeeki.

(9) The grandmother, by the father's ſide, of Anne Barnard was called Jacqueline l'Empereur, and was the aunt of Conſtantine l'Empereur, and of John l'Empereur, miniſter at the Hague.

(10) At Harderwic, and afterwards at Leyden.

(11) He was Anne Bernard's grandfather by the mother's ſide.

HORATIUS (PUBLIUS) ſirnamed Cocles, did a glorious action, whilſt the city of Rome, his native country, was beſieged by king Porſenna. His article being very good, and large enough in Moreri's Dictionary (a), mine ſhall be very ſhort, and I ſhall inſiſt only on the diſagreement that is to be found among the ancient hiſtorians, with with reſpect to a circumſtance, that ſhould have been related without any variation [A].

(a) In the Paris, edition 1699.

[A] I ſhall only inſiſt on the diſagreement that is to be found . . . . . with reſpect to a circumſtance which ſhould have been related without any variation.] Some hiſtorians ſay, that throwing himſelf into the Tyber, after having repulſed the enemy till the bridge was broken behind him, he ſwam to the other ſide of the river, notwithſtanding the weight of his arms, without receiving any wound; but others affirm, that he received ſo great a wound in his thigh, that he continued lame of it all his life. Livy manifeſtly ſuppoſes that he was not wounded. ‘ Cunctati aliquandiu ſunt ‘ (Hetruſci) dum alius alium ut prælium incipiant, circumſpectant. Pudor deinde commovit aciem & clamore ſublato undique in unum hoſtem tela conjiciunt, quæ cum in objecto CUNCTA ſcuto hæſiſſent, neque ille minus obſtinatus ingenti pontem obtineret gradu, jam impetu detrudere conabantur virum, cum ſimul fragor rupti ponderis, ſimul clamor Romanorum alacritate perfecti operis ſublatus pavore ſubito impetum ſuſtinuit. Tum Cocles, Tyberine pater, inquit, te ſancte precor, hæc arma & hunc militem propitio flumine accipias. Ita ſic armatus in Tyberim deſiluit: multiſque SUPERINCIDENTIBUS TELIS INCOLUMIS ad ſuos tranavit, rem auſus plus famæ habituram ad poſteros quam fidei (1).’ We may be ſure that all thoſe who do not expreſsly obſerve his receiving of a wound, are of Livy’s opinion; for their deſign is to raiſe our admiration of the great courage of this Roman. Now that action is more admirable and glorious if he was wounded, than if he was not. We muſt conclude then, that if Florus (2), and Seneca (3) make no mention of the wound, it is becauſe they were perſuaded he received none. Valerius Maximus has ſo poſitively denied that he received any, that this ought to induce us to believe, there was a tradition for the negative. ‘ Ut patriam periculo imminenti liberatam vidit, armatus ſe in Tiberim miſit: cujus fortitudinem Dii immortales admirati, INCOLUMITATEM SINCERAM ei præſtiterunt. Nam neque altitudine dejectus, quaſſatuſve, neque pondere armorum preſſus, nec ullo vorticis circuitu actus: nec telis quidem, que undique conjerebantur, LAESUS, TUTUM natandi eventum habuit (4). —— As ſoon as he ſaw his country delivered from this imminent danger, he threw himſelf armed into the Tyber: the gods, admiring his valour, ſaved him FROM ANY HARM. For he did ſwim SAFE to ſhore without being either ſtunned by the height, from which he leaped, or oppreſſed by the weight of his arms, or carried down by the rapidity of the ſtream: or WOUNDED by the darts which were thrown at him from all quarters.’ But here are three famous hiſtorians, who go upon another tradition. Dionyſius Halicarnaſſeus gives a long account of this fight, and aſſures us, in expreſs words, that Horatius received a wound with a lance that pierced his thigh, and put him to ſuch torture that he could ſcarce ſtand, when he underſtood the bridge was broken (5). This hiſtorian adds, I. that it was believed, he would ſoon die of his wounds: II. That when it was known he would recover, he had noble rewards given him; but that he could not arrive at the conſulſhip, nor any military command, becauſe he halted ever after that fight. Plutarch ſays that a ſtatue of braſs was erected to him in the temple of Vulcan, to comfort him upon the misfortune of his becoming lame by that wound (6). He had ſaid before, that he had entered the city by ſwimming, being wounded in his hip: Δύρατι θυῤῥηνικῷ βιβλημένος τὸν γλουτὸν. Jaculo Hetruſco in natibus ictus (7). Dion Caſſius affirms, that Cicero declaiming againſt Marc Antony before the ſenate, ſwore by Horatius’s thigh, and Mutius’s hand (8). I am not ignorant that that direct oration which he ſpeaks of, is not like any of Cicero’s Philippics (9). But Dion who forged it, would not have uſed ſuch an oath, had not there been a tradition that Horatius was wounded in the thigh, in defending his country againſt Tarquin’s friends. We will produce a fourth witneſs viz. Servius. ‘ Solus Cocles hoſtilem impetum, ſuſtinuit, donec à tergo pons ſolveretur à ſociis, quo ſoluto ſe cum armis præcipitavit in Tyberim, & licet LAESUS eſſet in coxa, tamen ejus fluenta ſuperavit. Unde eſt illud ab eo dictum, cum ei in comitiis coxæ vitium objiceretur, per ſingulos gradus admoneor triumphi mei. (10) —— Cocles alone ſuſtained the ſhock of the enemy, till the bridge behind him ſhould be broke down by his companions, which being accompliſhed, he threw himſelf all in armour into the Tyber, and tho’ he was WOUNDED in the thigh, ſwam over. This made him ſay to thoſe who reproached him in the comitia with his lameneſs, every ſtep that I make reminds me of my triumph.’ You ſee that the tradition about Horatius’s wound was ſupported by the circumſtance of a witty ſaying which he made uſe of when he was reproached with his lameneſs: Every ſtep, ſaid he, that I make, puts me in mind of my triumph. It is ſaid that Alexander made uſe of that thought to comfort the king, his father, who was afflicted on the account of his lameneſs occaſioned by a wound which he had received in a battle (11).

If we have reaſon to wonder that in an event ſo remarkable as this of Horatius, the traditions for and againſt his being wounded, ſhould have had each their partiſans and followers, even among the moſt famous writers, what ſhall we ſay of Polybius (12) who ſuppoſes that this brave and undaunted Roman loſt his life in the Tyber? Shall we ſay that he likewiſe had a tradition for it? Shall we conclude from hence, that antient hiſtory is ſo dark, that we know not generally what ſide to take amongſt thoſe who deny, and thoſe who affirm the ſame things? And that the yea and the no ſeeming to be equally authorized in matters, wherein it was the eaſieſt thing in the world to know the truth, we may well doubt of the leſs notable events which the hiſtorians have mentioned? ſhall we, I ſay, infer ſuch concluſions? I ſhould rather adviſe the reader to make uſe of theſe obſervations to fortify his judgment againſt the cuſtom of reading without attention, and of believing without examination. Note, that the difference of opinions about Horatius’s face, is not ſo much to be wondered at; it is however a ſign of hiſtorical uncertainty. Some affirm that Horatius was a very handſome man (13), others ſay, ‘ that he was ſirnamed Cocles. . . . becauſe he was extreamly flat-noſed, and that the upper part of his noſe was ſo ſunk into his head, that there was no diviſion betwixt his two eyes, and that his eyebrows joined; ſo that the people deſigning to call him Cyclops, miſtook and called Cocles (14).

(1) Titus Livius, lib. ii, Dec. I, cap. x.

(2) Florus, lib. i, (and not lib. v, as in Moreri. Florus’s Hiſtory is only divided into four books) cap. x.

(3) Seneca, Epiſt. cxx, pag. m. 464.

(4) Val. Maxim. lib. iii, cap. ii, n. 1, pag. m. 241, 242.

(5) Dion. Halic. lib. v, cap. xxiii, xxiv.

(6) Plutarch. in Valerio, pag. 106.

(7) Id ibid. pag. 105.

(8) Οὐ μὰ τὸ σκέλος τοῦ Ὁρατίου καὶ τὴν χεῖρα τοῦ Μουκίου. Non per crus Horatii & manum Mutii. Dio, lib. xlv, pag. m. 325.

(9) See, above, remark [E] of the article FULVIA.

(10) Servius. in Æneïd. lib. viii, ver. 646.

(11) Plut. de Fortuna Alex. Orat. II, pag. 331. B.

(12) Polyb. lib. vi, cap liii.

(13) Dion. Halic. lib. v, cap xxii.

(14) Plutarch. in Valerio, pag. 105.

HORSTIUS (JAMES) profeſſor of Phyſic in the univerſity of Helmſtadt, was born at Torgau, May 1, 1537 (a). He was admitted maſter of arts in the univerſity of Francfort on the Oder, in the year 1556 (b), and doctor of Phyſic in the year 1562 (c). He was invited to the poſt of public Phyſician in ſeveral cities, and exerciſed it ſucceſſively at Sagan and Suidnitz in Sileſia, and at Iglaw in Moravia, till he was called, in the year 1580, to be Phyſician in ordinary to the archduke of Auſtria (d). He continued in that poſt four years, after which he was called to be profeſſor of Phyſic in the univerſity of Helmſtadt. His inaugural oration De remoris diſcentium Medicinam & earum remediis, concerning the obſtacles to the ſtudy of Phyſic and their remedies, is exceeding good (e). He acquitted himſelf worthily in that profeſſion, and publiſhed ſome books [A], which ſupported his reputation. I have not been able

(a) Jacobi Horſtii, Epiſt. Philoſoph. & Medicinal. pag. 41.

(b) Ibid pag. 48.

(c) Ibid. pag. 77.

(d) Ib. pag. 199.

(e) It is to be found, pag. 530, & ſeq. of the book above quoted.

[A] He publiſhed ſome books.] The firſt, if I do not miſtake, is a Commentary on Hippocrates’s book concerning the heart, in Librum Hippocratis de Corde, which appeared in the year 1563 (1). He publiſhed in 1576 a Treatiſe qualem virum Pharmacopolam eſſe conveniat, concerning the qualifications of an Apothecary (2). He had before publiſhed (3) in the German language, A Deſcription of the Qualifications of a good Phyſician. He publiſhed likewiſe a deſcription of the ſame kind in Latin, in the year 1580, which he dedicated to

(1) Epiſt. Philoſoph. & Medicin. Jacobi Horſtii, pag. 79.

(2) Ib pag. 153.

(3) In the year 1570. Ibid. pag. 129.

able to diſcover in what year he died; I only know that he was alive in the year 1595, and was then dean of the faculty of Phyſic at Helmſtadt, and vice-rector of that univerſity. I learn this from the Latin verſes which wete made upon his Anagram, and are to be found at the end of a book intituled, Jacobi Horſtii Epiſtolæ Philoſophicæ & Medicinales, printed at Leipſic in 8vo, in the year 1596. We muſt obſerve to his praiſe, a thing which will be thought very ſingular, though perhaps without reaſon; viz. that he joined devotion to the knowledge and practice of Phyſic. He always implored the bleſſing of GOD upon his remedies, and publiſhed a book of prayers for that occaſion [B]. He to the biſhop of Olmutz (4). He put out a German tranſlation of Lemnius's book De occultis naturæ Miraculis, concerning the hidden wonders of nature, in the year 1579, and added many things to it (5). In 1580 he publiſhed a book De morbo epidemio febri Catharrali per totam Europam graſſante. Concerning an epidemic catarrh and fever raging over all Europe (6), and in 1583, a Treatiſe, in German, of Remedies for the Plague (7), in 1587 he publiſhed a book de Vite Vinifera (8), and in 1593, another De Noctambulonibus, concerning thoſe who walk during their ſleep (9), and in 1595, a Diſſertation concerning the Golden Tooth of a Child in Sileſia (10). You will find in Lindenius renovatus (11) that his Diſputationes Catholicæ de rebus ſecundum & præter naturam, General Diſſertations concerning things Natural and Preternatural, were printed at Wittemberg in the year 1630, with the Compendium Medicarum Inſtitutionum, of Gregory Horſtius, and that the abridgment of his Herbarium, ſeu de ſelectis Plantis & Radicibus libri duo, by the ſame Gregory, was printed at Marpurg in the year 1630.

Let us obſerve that he ſuffered himſelf to be groſsly deceived concerning the pretended golden tooth. It was a meer impoſture, if you deſire to know how it was diſcovered, you need only read Van Dale de Oraculis, book I. Chap. ult. (12) He obſerves that our James Horſtius diſcovered a great prodigy in this golden tooth, which, according to him, ought to give comfort to the Chriſtians under the Turkiſh yoke, that is to ſay, that it was a happy preſage of the fall of the Ottoman empire. I have ſeen a letter which this Phyſician wrote to David Chytræus, dated February 7, 1595, in which he treats of the preſages of meteors. He ſays that the comet which appeared in the year 1556, and which was ſeen at Conſtantinople after it diſappeared in Germany, might well produce it's bad effects in the year 1596, and that then likewiſe the new ſtar in Caſſiopæa, would be not idle (13), and that the golden tooth alſo would not fail to act it's part. ‘Dens Aureus, dens pueri Sileſii molaris, quem ipſe vidi, tetigi & declarandum duxi, non prædictione atque effectu carebit. ô miſeros nos, qui adeò ſtupidi & ſecuri ad hæc ſimus! Deus noſtri & eccleſiæ ſuæ miſereatur. Nos pio ſtudio preces, votáque conjungamus (14). ——— The golden tooth, the cheek tooth of the Sileſian boy, which I myſelf ſaw and felt, and thought deſerved to be made public, will not be without prediction and accompliſhment. Oh wretched we, who are ſo ſtupid and ſecure as to this matter! GOD have pity on us and his church! Let us piouſly unite our prayers and vows.’ You ſee he doth not conclude without condemning the ſecurity of the world, and without putting up earneſt prayers.

[B] He implored the bleſſing of GOD upon his remedies, and publiſhed a book of prayers for that occaſion.] It was by this book that he ſignalized his admiſſion to the the place of profeſſor of Phyſic in the univerſity of Helmſtadt. This was the firſt preſent he made to the univerſity. ‘Helmſtadium ubi veniſſet, publicè librum, dictum Precationes medicorum, promulgat, & in præfatione cauſas neceſſitatis hujus libri reddit (15). —— When he came to Helmſtadt, he publiſhed the book called the Prayers of Phyſicians, and gave the reaſons, why he was obliged to publiſh it, in a preface.’ I muſt obſerve to the honour of Phyſicans, that many of them thanked him for publiſhing theſe prayers, and acknowledged that their art had a very particular need of the divine aſſiſtance (16). See what the Phyſician of the city Ratisbon wrote to him. ‘Mittis ad me libellum medicarum precationum nuper à te editum, unà cum tabula, in quæ methodum inventionis, qua in conficiendo illo opuſculo uſus es, eruditè exponis. Quam tuam operam non poſſum non vehementer probare, ut qui reipſa quotidie experior, nulli hominum generi in hac vita imploratione divini auxilii magis opus eſſe, quàm ipſis medicis; Qui etiamſi omnia ex præſcripto artis rectiſſimè agunt, malevolorum tamen calumnias ingratiſſimo hoc ſeculo evitare nunquam poſſunt. Id ne fiat, utque actiones illorum Deus Opt. Max. fortunet, precibus à Deo impetrent, neceſſe eſt (17). —— You ſend me the book of the Prayers of Phyſicians, which you lately publiſhed, together with a table, in which you learnedly explain the method you followed in writing that piece. Which work of your's I cannot but greatly approve, as I daily experience in fact, that no men in this life have more occaſion to implore the divine aſſiſtance, than Phyſicians: who, though they do every thing according to the exacteſt rules of their art, cannot eſcape, in this moſt ungrateful age, the cenſure of the ill-natured. To prevent which, and to obtain a bleſſing from heaven on their endeavours, they muſt neceſſarily have recourſe to prayers.’ Among the letters which were wrote to him on this ſubject, there is one which tells him, that very few of the Phyſicians in Bohemia followed his advice of praying to GOD; but that many old women there made uſe of charms and incantations. ‘Cum paucis, optime Horſti, habes hoc commune, ut non tantum ſequaris Hippoc. & Galenum, qui gemino medicam crure miniſtrat opem: ſed etiam ſanctos Patres & Prophetas, qui ſupra ægrotos invocabant nomen Domini vulnerantis & ſanantis. Rara ſunt hæc exempla in noſtra Bohemia, utpote ubi plures ſunt inſanæ & incantatrices vetulæ: quæ miſcuerunt herbas & non innoxia verba (18). ——— This, my beſt Horſtius, you have in common with a few, that you not only follow Hipprocrates and Galen, the great maſter of Medicine, but the holy fathers likewiſe and the prophets, who called over the ſick on the name of the Lord, who both wounds, and heals. Theſe are uncommon examples in our Bohemia, where there are ſo many ſilly, quackiſh, old-women, who deal in potions and charms.’ Matthew Dreſſerus, profeſſor of Eloquence at Leipſic, praiſeth him highly on account of his piety and of his prayers, and informs him that he knew a Phyſician, who never undertook any cure, nor gave any medicine without reciting the Lord's-Prayer. ‘De precum medicarum formulis à te editis, quid ſentiam aut ſcribam aliud, niſi videri mihi eas ad pietatem medico dignam, maximè eſſe compoſitas? Si enim Hymnus eſt Deo gratus, Medicina noſtra & medicamenta Dei munus ſunt: Num dubitare poſſumus, quin religioſè tota ars atque profeſſio tractanda ſit? noveram præclarum medicum, amicum meum integerrimum, qui nullam morbi curationem attingebat, aut ſuſcipiebat, nullumque medicamentum ægroto propinabat, niſi prius recitata oratione Dominica, & piis votis adjunctis. Quod cum laude & prædicatione dignum ſemper judicarim, ne nunc quidem hoc quod in pietate ponis ſtudium improbare poſſum. Sed opus dignum tua profeſſione atque perſona judico (19). ——— As to the Formulary of Prayers for Phyſicians, publiſhed by you, I can only ſay, that they conduce greatly to that piety, which is worthy of a Phyſician. For if an hymn be acceptable to GOD, our medicines are the gift of GOD. Can we doubt, that the whole art and profeſſion is to be carried on religiouſly? I knew an excellent Phyſician, my very ſincere friend, who never undertook a cure, or adminiſtered Phyſic, without repeating the Lord's-Prayer, and adding pious wiſhes. Which as I always thought praiſe-warthy, I cannot now diſapprove your labours in the cauſe of piety, but think it a work worthy your profeſſion and character.’ Compare with this remark [C] of the KIRSTENIUS, and read (20) the pious letter which James Horſtius wrote to a miniſter of Berlin. He appears there to have reſolved to ſet about a Chriſtian Phyſic. ‘Binis literis tuis, quibus me de medicina corporis ſacro-ſancta ex fragmentis Bibliorum ſacrorum excolenda etiam atque etiam mones, ita ſum adfectus, ut ad iſta perficienda, quæ cupis, vim mihi illatam eſſe putem

---

(4) It is among his Letters, Philoſoph. & Medic. pag 209, & ſeq.

(5) Ib. pag. 189.

(6) Ib. pag. 203.

(7) Ib. pag. 257.

(8) Ib. pag. 354.

(9) Ib. pag. 435.

(10) Ib. pag. 523.

(11) Pag. 485. of the edit. 1686.

(12) Pag. 423. Edit. 1700.

(13) Stella prope Caſſiopeam nec tunc feriabitur. Jac. Horſtius, Epiſt. Philoſoph. & Medic. pag. 521.

(14) Id. ibid.

(15) Ibid. pag. 282.

(16) See Jacobi Horſtii, Epiſt. Philoſoph. & Medic. pag. 283, & ſeq.

(17) Ibid. pag. 284.

(18) Ibid. pag. 290.

(19) Ibid. pag. 292.

(20) Ibid. pag. 194, & ſeq.

He married his firſt wife in the year 1562, and ſhe died in the year 1585 (f), after bearing him ten children (g). He married again in the year 1587 (h). He was brother to GREGORY HORSTIUS, who died May the 10th, 1592; and had been ſeven times Burgo-maſter of the town of Torgau, a man of great merit, as his elogy compoſed by Reineccius informs us (i). The book that I have quoted contains a thing which I think is worthy of being related [C].

(f) Ibid. pag. 77.

(g) Ib. pag. 330.

(h) Ib. pag. 363.

(i) It is publiſhed in the beginning of Jacobi Horſtii Epiſt. Philoſoph. & Medicinales.

‘ putem. —— I am ſo affected by your two letters, in which you again and again put me in mind of cultivating the ſacred medicine of the body, out of the fragments of the ſacred books, that I find my ſelf as it were compelled to do what you deſire.’ I muſt likewiſe add, that the program by which he exhorted the ſtudents to celebrate devoutly the feaſt of St Michael, in honour of the angels (22), is a very devout piece.

For the reſt, I do not believe that there are any books of devotion, which have not had a better ſale than theſe Prayers for the uſe of Phyſicians.

[C] His letters contain . . . . . a thing worthy to be related.] Jerom Nymnan, a miniſter and brother-in-law to Horſtius (23), wrote a letter to him dated from Torgau, March 10, 1556, in which he deſires him (24) to acquaint him whether a ſtory which Sabinus had lately told at Wittemberg was true. It was that a gentleman of the March of Brandenburg, near Standel, had harſhly rejected the requeſt of a poor woman, who deſired him in the name of GOD to abate ſomething of the price of the corn, that ſhe wanted to buy of him, and that the piece of money which ſhe gave him, was changed into a ſerpent by an unknown perſon whom he met on the road, and that this ſerpent had wreathed itſelf about that gentleman's neck, and could not be removed from thence. Horſtius, who was then at Francfort on the Oder, anſwered (25) to his brother-in-law, that he had heard nothing of all this, but that if he ſhould hear any thing about it he would inform him. We have here an example of the caprices of common fame. Prodigies frequently make more noiſe in remote countries than in that where it is pretended that they happen. This is a character of falſhood; for things that are true, are more certainly known in the places where they have happened than any where elſe. People who have a mind to tell lies ought to take care not to lay the ſcene too near. They do not always obſerve this precaution, and yet they are believed, but ſtill they run a greater hazard by doing ſo.

(22) Ibid. pag. 493, & ſeq.

(23) Ib. pag. 11.

(24) Ib. pag. 53.

(25) Ib. pag. 54.

HORSTIUS (GREGORY) nephew (a) to the former, acquired ſuch a reputation by the practice of Phyſic that he is uſually named the Æſculapius of Germany (b). He was born at Torgau in the year 1578, and received the degree of maſter of Philoſophy at Wittemberg, in the year 1601 (c), and of doctor of Phyſic at Baſil, in the year 1606, and in the ſame year was advanced to the poſt of profeſſor of Phyſic in the univerſity of Wittemberg. He reſigned it a year after, and went to Soltwedel, in the territory of Brandenburg, to be Phyſician of that city. He made no long ſtay there, for he accepted of the place offered to him by the Landgrave of Heſſe, of profeſſor of Phyſic in the univerſity of Gieſſen in the year 1608. He was appointed firſt Phyſician to that prince the year following, and being at laſt weary of a ſingle life (d), he married in the year 1615. The reputation which he had acquired, made the magiſtrates of Ulm offer him the poſt of firſt Phyſician of their city: He accepted of it, and exerciſed it with great reputation from the year 1622 to 1636, which was the year in which he died. He left by his firſt wife four ſons [A] and two daughters. She died in the month of November 1634; and he being by that means encumbered with domeſtic affairs, married a ſecond time in the month of June 1635. He was exceedingly happy in this ſecond marriage [B], but the gout, which he had more than once vigorouſly reſiſted before, having attacked him again, and that being attended by many dangerous ſymptoms, brought him to his end on the ninth of Auguſt 1636. He poſſeſſed in the higheſt degree, the three qualities

(a) He was ſon to George Horſtius, counſellor in the town of Torgau.

(b) Konig. Bibl. pag. 413.

(c) Lindenius, Renovat. pag. 359.

(d) Solitariæ vitæ pertæſo ſibi privato quoque invigilare curatio fuit. Job Daniel Dietericus in Oratione funebri Gr. Horſtii, apud Witte Memor. Medicor. pag 67, & ſeq.

[A] He left four ſons by his firſt wife.] Three of them were Phyſicians, and the fourth an Apothecary (1). JOHN DANIEL HORSTIUS, the eldeſt, was born at Gieſſen and was profeſſor of Phyſic in the univerſity of Marpurg, and afterwards in that of his own country; and Phyſician to the Landgrave of Heſſe Darmſtadt, and laſt of all to the city of Francfort. He was admitted into the academy of the Curious Inquirers into Nature, by the name of Phœnix. He publiſhed ſeveral books, and died January 27, 1685, aged ſixty eight years (2). Here follow the titles of ſome of his works: Phyſica Hippocratea, Takenii, Helmontii, Carteſii, Eſpagnet, Boylei, aliorumque recentiorum Commentis illuſtrata, Francfort 1682, in 8vo. Decas Obſervationum & Epiſtolarum Anatomicarum, quibus ſingularia ſcitu digna, lactearum nempe thoracicarum, & vaſorum lymphaticorum natura, embryoniſque per os nutritio, atque alia rariora exponuntur, Francfort 1646 in 4to. Pharmacopœa Galeno-Chemica Catholica, Francfort 1651, in Folio. He procured a new edition corrected and augumented of Pauli Zachiæ Queſtiones Medico-Legales, at Francfort 1666, in Folio, and of Lazari Riverii Opera Medica Univerſa, in the ſame city in 1674 in Folio (3). GREGORY HORSTIUS, the youngeſt of theſe brothers, was born at Ulm, September 20, 1626. He received the degree of Doctor of Phyſic at Padua, Fortunius Licetus being Præſes May 11, 1650. He was admitted a member of the college of Phyſicians at Ulm, and declared public profeſſor of Phyſic in the year 1653. He died the thirty firſt of May 1661, and left children (4). He is author of a Treatiſe de Mania and promiſed Hiſtoriam Zibethi (5).

(1) Paul. Freher. in Theatro, pag. 1366.

(2) Witte, in Diario Biographico, ad ann. 1685.

(3) Taken from Lindenius renovatus, pag. 564, 565.

(4) Paul. Freher. in Theatro, pag. 1389.

(5) Witte, in Diario Biograph. ad ann. 1661.

[B] Being encumbered with domeſtic affairs, he married a ſecond time . . . . . He was exceedingly happy in this ſecond marriage.] He had been no leſs ſo in the firſt, if we believe the author of his Funeral Oration. ‘ Huic optimi conſorti ſuæ, dum fata Deuſque ſinebant, ex veteri formula, feliciſſime convixit, & optimè cohabitavit. Quid autem hic Archiater noſter glorioſus, conceſſit ne illorum in numerum, qui blandâ venere detenti, omnem Muſis remittunt nuntium? Nullatenus, ſed potius domeſticis, privatiſque omnibus ſcitè adornatis, famæ ſuæ gloriam & calamo, & ore, & praxi expandere, & diffundere ſategit (6). —— With this his excellent conſort he lived in the ſweeteſt ſociety imaginable, while heaven ſpared her with him. But did this famous Phyſician imitate thoſe who being ſlaves to the blandiſhments of Venus, quite neglect the Muſes? quite the contrary, for having wiſely ſettled his private and domeſtic affairs, he ſpared no pains to encreaſe his fame, both by his writings, diſcourſes, and practice.’ The latter part of this paſſage acquaints us, that Horſtius did not do as a great many who abandon themſelves ſo entirely to the nuptial pleaſures, that they quite neglect the Muſes. As to the happineſs of his ſecond marriage, the ſame author gives us the following account of it. ‘ Is . . . . . poſteaquam ſecunda, quæ vocant, expleſſet vota, ... jamque conjugalem lineam ex animi ſententiâ duceret, amantiſſimè ab amantiſſima marita habitus, domique ac foris felix, optatâ

(6) Joh. Daniel Dietericus, apud Witte, Memor. Medicorum, fol. (e) 4.

ἐυπϱωξια

qualities of a good Phyſician, probity, learning, and good fortune (e) [C], as we ſee at

(e) Taken from his Funeral Oration ſpoke by John Daniel Dietericus apud Witte Memor. Medicor. pag. 67, &c.

‘εὐπραξίᾳ gauderet: ecce! malo arthritico, quod multò ante non ſemel fortiter ſuſtinendo repulerat, invaditur (7). —— After his ſecond marriage in which he enjoyed all the charms of reciprocal love, being happy both at home and abroad, while he rejoyced in his wiſhed for happineſs, lo! he was ſeized with a violent fit of the gout, which he had frequently before repulſed by his heroic conſtancy.’ What I am now to quote, relates to both his marriages (8). ‘Quando autem factum ut Anno 1634: ſuaviſſimam hanc ipſius tori ſociam maligna febris deartuaret, in hoc infelix fuit, quod ſævam illam declinare neſciens, menſe Novembri miſeram viduitatem colere fuerit coactus: quâ in cum ſex Liberorum Pater & occupatiſſimo functionis muneri & moleſtiſſimæ rei familiaris curæ vix non ſuccumberet, divinâ adlucente gratiâ, ad vota ſecunda accedens, Præclariſſimi Medici Fingerlini p. m. relictæ viduæ (9), matrimonialem addixit fidem hoc ipſo iterum titulo felicitatis privatæ redonatus, quod hæc caſtiſſimis illius amoribus mirâ morum amabilitate reſpondebat: ita ut charitate Conjugem, ſedulitate Miniſtram præſtaret. —— His beloved wife was ſeized with a malignant fever in the year 1634, he was ſo unfortunate as not to be able to cure it, and in the month of November was obliged to ſubmit to a melancholy widowhood: being left with ſix children, and ready to ſink under the weight of the laborious duties of his profeſſion, joined to a load of domeſtic cares, he being guided by the divine favour made choice of the widow of the famous Phyſician Fingerlinus for his ſecond wife. By whom he was again reſtored to all manner of domeſtic happineſs, ſhe anſwering his love with a wonderful ſweetneſs of manners, ſo that he found in her the affection of a wife and the aſſiduity of a ſervant.’

[C] He poſſeſſed in the higheſt degree the three qualities of a good phyſician, probity, learning, and good fortune.] I ſhall paſs over what relates to the firſt, and I ſhall only obſerve that, with regard to the third, the panegyriſt obſerves, that the good ſucceſs of Horſtius's preſcriptions, did not proceed from chance, but from the attention with which he conſidered the nature of diſtempers, &c. He, by the by, gives ſevere ſtrokes to thoſe quacks, who boaſt of the vaſt numbers of cures which they have performed, and by their impudence wheedle people out of a great deal of money. He applies to them what a poet ſaid of a man who was both Chirurgeon and Phyſician, I do not doubt it, ſaid the poet, for you kill abundance of people both by ſteel and poiſon. ‘Ea eſt Empiricorum, Thalmudicorum, & Bullatorum Medicorum indoles & natura, ut mucoſam ſuam praxin pro admiranda felicitate venditantes, ſæpiſſime animos Magnatum & Divitum (utpote hoc cenſu facile ſe defraudari patientium) à verò Medicorum vultu & cultu abalienent, egregiam ſpem, & vere prodigioſæ ſuæ curæ (quippe illâ ipſâ excidium denunciant) expectationem concitando: quâ ſuperſtitioſâ, ſplendidiſque ſtrophis ſuffultâ infeliciſſimâ felicitate Microcoſmum argento ſimul, & ſanguine emungere ſceleratiſſime norunt: quibus Plagiariis interim illud Poëtæ apprime adaptari convenit.

Es Medicus, ſimul Chirurgus,
Cur? mittis ſtygiam, viros ad Orcum,
Et manu ſimul, & ſimul veneno:

‘Nequaquam autem hujuſmodi felicitatis exceſſum in Defuncto noſtro, velut abſoluto Practici Exemplo, quæremus: quin Potius fortunam illius in Praxi integram & illibatam, cumulatiſſimo rationis & experientiæ inſtructu partam demirabimur, &c (10).’

Since this occaſion offers, I ſhall obſerve, that ſome people are of opinion, that the ſucceſs of a Phyſician, doth not at all depend upon his skill in his profeſſion. This is the opinion of Joubert. ‘If a perſon recovers ſays he (11), we are ready to commend the skill of his Phyſician: tho' he has done nothing to contribute to it. And on the contrary a Phyſician is accounted ignorant, if his patient dies or lanugiſhes a long time in thoſe diſtempers, which are thought the moſt ſlight by the vulgar. Modeſt people will not ſay that he is more or leſs skillful, if he has the character of a learned man, among men of learning: but they will ſay that he is not happy in his practice, and conſequently is not a good Phyſician, always judging by the ſucceſs. It is certainly true, that in every thing there is a good and a bad fortune, and (as the Italians ſay) la buona e la mala ſorte. And the good fortune of a Phyſician conſiſts in his not being called to thoſe who are to die. For there he will acquire neither reputation, honour, nor friendſhip, notwithſtanding the Phyſician ought not in this caſe to be blamed, if he has done his duty; nor ought he to be leſs eſteemed than if the patient had recovered . . . . . It is indeed a great happineſs to be fortunate in our affairs, but good fortune doth not depend upon knowledge, or abilities: it is a ſpecial gift of God to be called to the aſſiſtance of thoſe who are to recover: with regard to whom he is pleaſed to make effectual, and continue the virtues beſtowed on medicines: and likewiſe not to be called to thoſe who are to die, whom nothing can avail or profit. It is therefore quite wrong to judge of the abilities of Phyſicians by their ſucceſs, which is more owing to good fortune, and the grace of God, than to the skill of man (12).’ A Flemiſh Phyſician who has tranſlated into Latin, and commented upon the firſt book of Joubert, concerning Vulgar Errors, has not adopted this opinion; he has maintained that the good fortune of Phyſicians flows only from their skill, and their bad fortune from their ignorance. He cites on this occaſion a paſſage of Crato, a famous Phyſician. Huic equidem Jouberti ſententiæ non ſubſcribam; quin potius ad Cratonis, &c (13). He alſo quotes a paſſage of Paracelſus, affirming the ſame thing. In my opinion he carries the matter too far, I believe there are Phyſicians who ſometimes kill or cure their patients, without deſerving either praiſe or blame on that account. However skillful they may be, they do not always know the true cauſe of diſtempers, and they preſcribe a medicine, according to the rules of their art, which proves very pernicious, becauſe there is ſomething in the conſtitution of the patient which they cannot diſcover. The particular diſpoſitions of the machine, the imagination of the patient affected in a particular manner, the ſecret paſſions may produce effects, which the skill and moſt conſummate experience of Phyſicians could never have expected. The efficacy of theſe unknown cauſes, will occaſion a medicine given raſhly, ignorantly, and fooliſhly, to drive away a diſtemper: and another medicine given according to the rules of Phyſic to kill the patient. There is therefore good and bad fortune here, independant on skill or ignorance, and one cannot be ſaid to be ignorant becauſe he doth not know the ſecret paſſions of the heart, or the odd properties of a particular conſtitution, and becauſe he could not foreſee the obſtacles they would make to the virtue of the medicine. A Phyſician is not thought to fail through ignorance, except he be ignorant of what he might have learned from ſtudy and practice. The queſtion is, if there be Phyſicians, who, by a prerogative attached to their perſon, fall by chance, and frequently, upon the remedy which cures, and if there are others who, by a perſonal deſtiny, do quite the contrary: or the queſtion is this, are there ſome Phyſicians, who are called preciſely when it is predeſtinated, that the ſick perſon ſhall recover? and are there others who are called preciſely, when it is predeſtinated that he ſhall die? It would ſeem that Joubert has pretended this, and called it a particular favour of heaven, or a privation of that divine favour. Crato laughs at this conceit. This diſpute is the ſame with that which I have treated at large in another place (14), whether there is a good or bad fortune attached to certain perſons, or if good and bad fortune is always the conſequence the one of prudence and the other of imprudence? The antients did not pretend this; for when they enumerated the qualifications of a great general, they gave his fortune a particular rank, diſtinct from his skill in the art of war. ‘Ego ſic exiſtimo, ſaid Cicero, in ſummo Imperatore quatuor has res ineſſe oportere, ſcientium rei Militaris, virtutem, auctoritatem, felicitatem (15). —— I think a great general ſhould be poſſeſſed of theſe four qualities, skill in the art of war, valour, authority, and good fortune.’ He afterward ſhows, that Pompey poſſeſſed theſe four qualities in an eminent degree, and owns that the

---

(7) Id. ibid. pag. 67, 68.

(8) Id. ibid. pag. 5, before the end. I cite it in this manner, becauſe the moſt part of the pages of this Funeral Oration are not numbered.

(9) This author had obſerved, that Horſtius had married a maid in his firſt marriage. Interea, ſays he, pag. 69, & maritalem conditionem exoſculatus, Hedwigem Stammiam, Virginem lectiſſimam confarreatione ſibi ſacroſanctâ copulat.

(10) Dieterici Oratio funeb. Gr. Horſtii, apud Witte, Memor. Medicor. page which follows the leaf (e) 5.

(11) Joubert, Erreurs Populaires, livr. i, chap. vii, pag. m. 33, 34.

(12) Ib. pag. 35.

(13) Joannes Bourgeſius, in Scholiis ad cap. vii, Jouberti de Erroribus Vulgi, pag. 105, 106.

(14) See remark [K] of the article TIMOLEON.

(15) Cicero, pro Lege Manilia, cap. x, pag. m. 32, Tom. III.

at large in his funeral oration. He publiſhed ſeveral books [D] which were very much eſteemed. Two of his ſons were likewiſe authors.

laſt of them depends on GOD, and not upon man. 'Reliquum eſt ut de felicitate quam præſtare DE SE 'IPSO nemo poteſt, meminiſſe, & commemorare de 'altero poſſumus: ſicut æquum eſt homini de poteſta'te deorum, timide & pauca dicamus. Ego enim ſic 'exiſtimo: Maximo, Marcello, Scipioni, Mario, & 'ceteris magnis imperatoribus, NON SOLUM propter 'virtutem, ſed etiam propter fortunam, ſæpius impe'ria mandata atque exercitus eſſe commiſſos. Fuit 'enim profecto quibuſdam ſummis viris quædam ad 'amplitudinem, & gloriam, & ad res magnas bene 'gerendas divinitus adjuncta fortuna (16). —— It re'mains that we ſhould with caution and brevity, as be'comes men when they ſpeak of the power of the gods, ſay 'ſomething concerning good fortune, which though no 'man can ſecure to himſelf, yet we can remember and 'relate it of others. For I am of opinion, that Maxi'mus, Marcellus, Scipio, Marius, and the other great 'generals, were frequently entruſted with the higheſt 'dignities, and the command of armies; NOT ONLY 'on account of their valour, and other great qualities, 'but likewiſe on account of their good fortune. For cer'tainly ſome great men have been bleſſed by the gods 'with good fortune, to guide them to grandeur, glory, 'and the performance of heroic actions.'

[D] He publiſhed ſeveral books.] I believe the firſt was his Inſtitutiones Logicæ, which he publiſhed while he gave private lectures of Philoſophy in his chamber at Wittemberg, about the year 1601 (17). He printed in the ſame city, in the year 1607, his treatiſe de Natura Humana, On human nature (18). His Diſſertatio de natura Amoris additis Reſolutionibus de cura Furoris amatorii, de Philtris, atque de pulſu Amantium, at Gieſſen in 4to, in the year 1611. He publiſhed there in 1615, his book de teunda Sanitate Studioſorum & Literatorum, in 4to, and in 1619 his treatiſe de cauſis ſimilitudinis & diſſimilitudinis, in fœtu, reſpectu parentum &c. cui annexa eſt Reſolutio Quæſtionis de diverſo partus tempore, imprimiſque quid de ſeptimeſtri & octimeſtri partu ſentiendum in 4to. I refer you to Lindenius renovatus (19), where we find the titles and editions of all the works of this Phyſician particularly ſet down; and I ſhall only obſerve, that after his death they were publiſhed in one volume in folio at Nuremberg, in the year 1660, and in three volumes in 4to, at Torgau, in the year 1661.

HORTENSIA, ſiſter of the orator Hortenſius. Thus it is a modern author names her (a); but as he himſelf acknowledges in another place (b), the name which Plutarch gives Hortenſius's ſiſter is Valeria. Turn therefore to VALERIA, for there is no reaſon to give Hortenſius two ſiſters of different names.

HORTENSIA, daughter of the orator Hortenſius, ſhewed herſelf worthy of ſuch a father, by her eloquence, when ſhe pleaded the cauſe of the Roman ladies before the Triumviri, who had decreed that fourteen hundred of them ſhould declare what eſtates they poſſeſſed, intending after that to tax them according to their fancy for the expences of the war. Thoſe Triumviri were Mark Antony, Octavius, and Lepidus. They had at firſt ſignified that thoſe who ſhould not give in a true valuation of their eſtates, ſhould be fined; and that a reward ſhould be given to thoſe who ſhould diſcover their deceit. The ladies had recourſe to the interceſſion of thoſe amongſt them, who might have intereſt with the Triumviri, and were civilly received by the ſiſter of Octavius, and the mother of Marc Antony; but Fulvia, Marc Antony's wife, ſhut the door againſt them; inſomuch that they reſolved to preſent themſelves before the Triumviri. Hortenſia was their ſpeaker, and made a moſt excellent ſpeech. Quintilian has mentioned it with praiſe (a). The Triumviri were ſo unkind as to cenſure the boldneſs which the ladies had expreſſed, and they commanded their officers to turn them out [A]. That order made all the company murmur, which hindered the officers from executing it. Whereupon the Triumviri put off the buſineſs to the next day. The iſſue was, that only four hundred women were obliged to give an account of their eſtates (b). By this we may form a better judgment of that event than by Moreri's account of it, or even by Valerius Maximus's words, which will be ſeen below [B].

[A] The Triumviri commanded their officers to turn them out.] Inſtead of this, James Philip de Bergamo, whom Proſper Mandoſius (1) follows, ſays that Hortenſia's eloquence was ſo admired by the auditory, that they thought they had heard her father, and that ſhe obtained of the Triumviri whatever the ladies deſired, beſides great praiſes. He has committed two other faults; 1. That Hortenſia writ many things. 2. That the Roman ladies were taxed, becauſe the public neceſſities required it. It was rather from the tyrannical avarice of the Triumviri. How many faults does the deſire of praiſing people, occaſion!

[B] Moreri's account . . . . or even by the words of Valerius Maximus.] He ſays, that the ſenate had laid a ſevere tax upon the women of Rome . . . . and that Hortenſia alone undertook the cauſe of her ſex. I. The Triumviri and not the ſenate laid this ſevere tax, as he calls it. II. They did not lay it on all the women of Rome, but only on the rich: it was a tax on thoſe that could well bear it. III. Hortenſia was indeed the only ſpeaker, but not the only actor or interceſſor for her ſex; for all that were concerned, went in a body to ſollicit the mothers, ſiſters, and wives, of the Triumviri; and afterwards they came to an audience; where, as in all ſorts of deputations, one ſpoke for the reſt. I ſay nothing of Moreri's omiſſions, nor of his wrong citation of Appian of Alexandria, which has been transferred into the Dutch edition with a little change, that may deceive the reader. That fault proceeds from the preſs: Moreri doubtleſs writ, li. 4. belli civil. Inſtead of which the Printers of Lyons put in li. 4. b. li civil. and thoſe of Holland li. 4. b. li. civil. Such a ſmall miſtake has been ſufficient upon many occaſions, to make people believe that an author had wrote books which he never thought of. Who would not believe, ſeeing Ovid quoted in elog. at the end of the article HORTENSIUS the orator, both in the Dutch and the preceding editions, that Ovid wrote a poem intituled Elogies? Every body doth not find out that inſtead of in elog. it ſhould be in eleg. a citation ſomewhat too general, by Voſſius's leave who has uſed it (2), but yet true at the bottom. There are many other wrong citations in this article of Moreri's Dictionary; Pliny is there cited twice; the firſt time falſly. The fifth chapter of the third book of Varro de re ruſtica, and the thirteenth of the third book of Macrobius's Saturnalia, are quoted wrong, and ſhew that Moreri did not verify whether Voſſius's Printers had put one figure for another.

Here are the words of Valerius Maximus which I have promiſed. 'Hortenſia Q. Hortenſii filia cum 'ordo Matronarum gravi tributo à Triumviris eſſet 'oneratus, nec quiſquam virorum patrocinium eis ac'commodare auderet, cauſſam fœminarum apud Trium'viros conſtanter & fœliciter egit. Repræſentata enim 'patris facundia impetravit ut major pars imperate pe-

(16) Cicero pro lege Manilia, cap xvi, pag. 53, Tom. III.

(17) Dieterici Oratio, &c. ubi ſupra, folio (e) 2.

(18) Id. ibid. folio (e) 3.

(10) Pag 359, & ſeq.

(a) Glandorpius, Onom. pag. 406.

(b) Idem. pag. 865.

(a) Quinti Hortenſii filiæ oratio apud Triumviros habita legitur non tantum in ſexus honorem. Quintil. Inſtit. lib. i, cap i.

(b) Ex Appiano, lib. iv. Bell. Civil.

(1) In Biblioth. Rom. Cent. II, n. 88.

(2) De Hiſt. Lat. pag 48, de Poeët. Lat. pag. 15.

‘ cuniæ his remitteretur (3). ——— The Triumviri ‘ having loaded the Roman ladies with a grievous tax, ‘ and no man daring to appear in their favour, Hortenſia, daughter to Q. Hortenſius, pleaded their cauſe ‘ before the Triumviri with great conſtancy and ſucceſs. ‘ For being miſtreſs of all her father's eloquence, ſhe ‘ obtained a remiſſion of the greateſt part of it.’

HORTENSIUS, the name of a Plebeian family of Rome, taken probably from their application to gardening, as that of Fabius and Lentulus, &c. came from a like original. Antonius Auguſtinus had no reaſon to rank this family among the Patrician [A], ſince we find in the Faſti one LUCIUS HORTENSIUS, tribune of the people in the year of Rome 331. He accuſed Sempronius Atratinus, the conſul of the foregoing year, of having raſhly attack'd the Volſci: But his four colleagues who were preſent at the battle, ſo earneſtly deſired him to drop the accuſation, that after having done all that was poſſible on his ſide to perſuade them to allow him to proceed in it, at laſt, when he ſaw them reſolved to quit the enſigns of their dignity all the time that the tryal ſhould laſt, he complyed with their deſire. He would not ſuffer the people to ſee their tribunes in ſuch a condition, nor puſh a conſul to the laſt extremity, who had at leaſt gained the love of his ſoldiers (a). Above a hundred years after, we find one QUINTUS HORTENSIUS, Dictator [B]. He brought back the people, who had retired to the Janiculum, and made a law, that thenceforth all the Romans ſhould be obliged to obey the ordinances of the people [C]. He died in his office (b) which had never happened before (c). Moreri is ſtrangely miſtaken concerning this Dictator [D]. Of all the Hortenſius's, he that made himſelf the moſt famous, was the orator, who is the ſubject of the following article.

[A] Antonius Auguſtinus had no reaſon to rank this family among the patrician.] The tract of Antonius Auguſtinus de Romanorum gentibus & familiis, which I make uſe of, was printed at Lyons in 1592, in 4to. We there find word for word upon the Familia Hortenſia, what Richard Streinnius ſaid of it in a book he publiſhed upon the ſame ſubject in 1559. They both go upon a very falſe foundation, in placing this family among the Patrician; namely, that Cicero gives the title of nobilis to Hortenſius, in his orations againſt Verres. Who knows not that nobilis and plebeius were not inconſiſtent words in antient Rome?

[B] Above a hundred years after .... Q. HORTENSIUS, the dictator.] It is hard to fix the preciſe year of our Quintus Hortenſius's dictatorſhip. I believe Sigonius was right in placing it in the year 467. Father Hardouin (1) doubtleſs approved that opinion; but his Printers by omitting a letter, make him ſay, that the ſedition of the people, which was ſuppreſſed by the dictator Hortenſius, happened in the year CCCLXVII. St Auſtin will have it, that Hortenſius was created dictator by reaſon of the retiring of the people to the Janiculum, which is very probable. ‘ Poſt graves & longas Rom. ſeditiones quibus ad ultimum plebs in Janiculum hoſtili diremptione ſeceſſerat, cujus mali tam dira calamitas erat, ut ejus rei cauſa quod in extremis periculis fieri ſolebat, & Dictator crearetur Hortenſius, qui plebe revocata in eodem Magiſtratu expiravit, quod nulli Dictatori ante contigerat (2). ——— After grievous and long ‘ diſſentions in Rome, the commons at laſt retired in a ‘ hoſtile manner to the Janiculum, which produced ſuch ‘ dreadful calamities, that on this account, as was ‘ uſual in the moſt extream dangers, they choſe Hortenſius dictator, who, having appeaſed the people, died in ‘ that office, which had never happened to any dictator ‘ before him.’

[C] ... and made a law, that thenceforth all the Romans ſhould obey the ordinances of the people.] An author cited by Aulus Gellius teaches us, that the ordinances made by the report or at the requeſt of the tribunes of the people, were not properly called laws, but plebiſcita, and that before Hortenſius's dictatorſhip, the patricians were not ſubject to ordinances of this ſort. Ne leges quidem proprie ſed plebiſcita appellantur quæ Tribunis plebis ferentibus accepta ſunt, quibus rogationibus ante Patricii non tenebantur, donec Q. Hortenſius Dictator eam legem tulit ut eo jure quod plebs ſtatuiſſet, omnes Quirites tenerentur (3). Livy tells us the quite contrary; for he ſays, that Lucius Valerius, and Marcus Horatius, who were made conſuls in the year of Rome 305, began to ſhew their complaiſance to the people by making a law, which left it no longer in doubt, whether the laws eſtabliſhed by the people obliged the ſenate. That law decided this matter in favour of the people. ‘ Omnium primum cum veluti in controverſo jure eſſet tenerenturne Patres Plebiſcitis, legem centuriatis comitiis tulere, ut quod tributim plebes juſſiſſet populum teneret, qua lege Tribunitiis rogationibus telum acerrimum datum eſt (4). —— Firſt of all, it having been ‘ controverted, whether the ſenators were bound by the ‘ ordinances of the commons, they made a law in the ‘ Comitiæ Centuriatæ, that whatever the commons de- ‘ creed in their tribes ſhould bind the whole Roman peo- ‘ ple, by which law a dreadful force was given to the ro- ‘ gations of the tribunes.’ They had juſt deſtroyed the power of the Decemviri, and recalled the mutinous populace that had withdrawn to mount Aventinus. The new conſuls omitted nothing to make themſelves popular. The conſul Quintus Capitolinus acknowledged the force of this new law three years after; when repreſenting to the people the advantages that the ſenate had yielded to them, he brings into the account Scita plebis injuncta patribus (5). This law was renewed in the 415th year of Rome; the dictator Publius Philo having ordained that the plebiſcita ſhould oblige all the Romans (6). The author alledged by Aulus Gellius was not therefore well informed. If he had ſaid that the ſenators had found the art of evading this deciſion, ſo that it was neceſſary to renew it authentically in Quintus Hortenſius's dictatorſhip, he would been above our criticiſms: but this he has not done. Pliny (7) ſpeaks of what was enacted by this dictator to the peoples advantage, without ſaying, whether there was any ſuch law before or not. Sigonius did not know what was done under the conſuls Valerius and Horatius; for he ſays (8), that the law of Hortenſius had been already made by the dictator Publius Philo in the year of Rome 414.

[D] Moreri is ſtrangely miſtaken concerning this dictator.] Two groſs blunders in a few words: one in ſaying, that he was a famous civilian and law-maker; the other in ſaying, that the orator Hortenſius was his grandſon. Did ever any one call the magiſtrates of the Roman common-wealth legiſlators, becauſe they procured the enacting ſome laws? In that caſe the number of the Roman legiſlators would be very great. Neither are they the perſons called Juriſconſulti. But it is very probable, that Moreri had no other knowledge of Q. Hortenſius the dictator, but his paſſing a law which ſubjected the ſenate to the plebiſcita. Beſides, ſince Moreri obſerves that the dictatorſhip of this Hortenſius fell in the year of Rome 468, how could he take him for the grandfather of the orator Hortenſius, a military tribune, according to him, in the year of Rome 664? What want of attention! What negligence is this!

---

(3) Val. Maxim. lib. viii, cap. iii. Moreri quotes lib. iii. Hofman, lib. ii.

(a) Non videbit plebs Romana ſordidatos Tribunos ſuos. C. Sempronium nihil moror quando hoc eſt in imperio conſecutus ut tam carus eſſet militibus. Livius, lib. iv, Dec. I, cap. xlii. See alſo Valer. Maxim. lib, vi, cap. v.

(b) Livius, in Epit. lib. xi.

(c) Auguſt. de Civit. Dei, lib. iii, cap xvii.

(1) In Plin. lib. xvi, cap x, pag. 239. Tom. III.

(2) Auguſtin de Civit. Dei, lib. iii, cap. xvii.

(3) Lælius Felix, apud A. Gell. lib. xv, cap. xxvii.

(4) Liv lib iii, Dec. I, cap. lv.

(5) Id. cap. lxvii.

(6) Ut plebiſcita omnes Quirites tenerent. Livius, Dec. I, lib. viii, cap. xii.

(7) Lib. xvi, cap. x.

(8) In Faſt. ad ann. 467.

HORTENSIUS (QUINTUS) cotemporary with Cicero, and almoſt as great an orator as he, was born in the 639th year of Rome (a). He pleaded his firſt cauſe at nineteen years of age, and ſucceeded ſo well in it, that he had not only the approbation of the auditory, but alſo that of the two conſuls, who were beſt judges of that age [A]. This was the cauſe which he pleaded for Africa before the ſenate under thoſe two conſuls. Some time after he pleaded for the king of Bythynia, and had ſtill better ſucceſs. The Social war ariſing in the 663d year of Rome, the proceedings of juſtice were ſo interrupted in the city, that Hortenſius betook himſelf to arms (b). In the ſecond campaign he was made a military tribune; but I believe that he ſtopped there, and that thoſe who pretend that he was lieutenant-general under Sylla, in the war with Mithridates, take him for another [B]. He went ſucceſſively through all the honours of the republic; he was queſtor, ædile, prætor, and then conſul with Q. Cecilius Metellus, in the year of Rome 684. The lot fell upon him to go into Crete, to reduce the inhabitants of that iſland; but as he triumphed at Rome by his eloquence (c), he choſe rather to ſhine at the bar, than in the field. He therefore yielded up that poſt to his colleague, who gained thereby the honour of a triumph, and the ſirname of Creticus. Hortenſius had the happieſt memory in the world [C]. He uſed many geſticulations in pleading [D], which drew upon him a very blunt raillery before the judges; for L. Torquatus called him Dionyſia, who was a famous dancer. You may ſee in Aulus Gellius, what Hortenſius anſwered him. It cannot be denied that he had a great deal of affectation in his manner; or at leaſt, that he was exceſſively nice in his cloaths [E]. He carefully conſulted his glaſs as he dreſſed himſelf, and it

(a) See the remark [B].

(b) Cicero in Bruto.

(c) Xiphilin. ex Dion. lib. xxxv. init.

[A] He had the approbation of the two conſuls, who were the beſt judges of that age.] Theſe were Lucius Craſſus and Quintus Scævola, the firſt whereof was one of the greateſt orators, and the latter one of the greateſt lawyers that had ever appeared in Rome (1). This conſulſhip fell in the year 658: ſo that Hortenſius being then but nineteen years old, it is a neceſſary conſequence that he was born in the year 639: which we may likewiſe gather from Cicero's being eight years younger than he (2). Cicero, I ſay, who was born in the year 647. Here is the proof of what I have ſaid concerning the firſt cauſe which Hortenſius pleaded (3). 'Q. Hortenſii admodum adoleſcentis ingenium, ut Phidiæ ſignum, ſimul aſpectum & probatum eſt. Is L. Craſſo, Q. Scævola Coſſ. primum in foro dixit, & apud hos ipſos quidem Conſules, & cum eorum qui affuerunt, tum ipſorum Conſulum qui omnes intelligentia anteibant, judicio diſceſſit probatus; undeviginti annos natus erat eo tempore. —— Hortenſius's genius, while he was very young, like Phidia's ſtatue, was no ſooner ſeen than admired. He firſt appeared at the bar in the conſulſhip of L. Craſſus and Q. Scævola, and pleaded before the conſuls with the approbation, not only of all preſent, but of the conſuls themſelves, who were the beſt judges of that age; he was at that time eighteen years old.' Cicero (4) makes this L. Craſſus ſpeak thus: 'Ego eſſe jam judico (omnibus iſtis laudibus quas oratione complexus ſum, excellentem Hortenſium) & tum judicavi cum me Conſule in Senatu cauſam defendit Africæ, nuperque etiam magis cum pro Bithyniæ rege dixit. —— I now think (that Hortenſius deſerves all the praiſes I have beſtowed upon him) and I was of the ſame opinion, when, during my conſulſhip, he defended the cauſe of Africa in the ſenate, and ſtill more when he lately defended the king of Bithynia.'

[B] They who pretend that he was lieutenant-general under Sylla in the war againſt Mithridates, take him for another.] What makes me believe that our orator is not the Hortenſius, who had that poſt in Sylla's armies, is on one hand Cicero's ſilence, and on the other the character which Plutarch gives to that lieutenant-general. Plutarch repreſents him as a man who perfectly underſtood the art of war, and who never yielded (5); and relates ſome actions of him, which ſavour of an old experienced officer, and which concern the 667th year of Rome. Where ſhould the orator Hortenſius have got that experience; he who began to bear arms but in the year 663? And if he had acquired it, and ſignalized himſelf under Sylla, how comes it that it was not mentioned in thoſe paſſages where his praiſes are enlarged upon, and where it is obſerved that he was military tribune in his ſecond campaign? Judicia intermiſſa bello ..... Erat Hortenſius in bello primo anno miles, altero Tribunus militum (6). Doubtleſs Glandorpius (7) was miſtaken in taking him for Sylla's lieutenant-general. But what need is there to take advantage of Cicero's ſilence? What he ſays, is much more favourable to me. Do not the three years in which Hortenſius was the chief man at the bar, by reaſon of the death or abſence the moſt famous orators (8), coincide with the time that Sylla had the other Hortenſius in his army?

[C] He had the happieſt memory in the world.] He pronounced his pleadings juſt as he had meditated them, without writing one word, and forgot nothing that was ſaid by his adverſaries. 'Primum memoria tanta quantam in viro cognoviſſe me arbitror, ut quæ ſecum commentatus eſſet, ea ſine ſcripto verbis iiſdem redderet quibus cogitaviſſet. Hoc adjumento illo tanto ſic utebatur, ut ſua & commentata & ſcripta, & nullo referente omnia adverſariorum dicta meminiſſet (9).' What Seneca ſays of him, is much more remarkable. Upon a challenge that was given Hortenſius, he ſtaid a whole day at a public auction, and repeated in order what had been ſold, to whom, and at what price. His recital was compared with the clerk's account, and his memory was found to have ſerved him faithfully in every particular. 'Hortenſius à Siſenna provocatus in auctione perſedit diem totum, & omnes res, & pretia, & emptores ordine ſuo argentariis recognoſcentibus, ita ut in nullo ſalleretur, recenſuit (10).'

[D] He uſed many geſticulations in pleading.] Tho' his geſtures were fine enough to make the two beſt actors of that time ambitious of imitating them on the ſtage (11); it is certain they exceeded the juſt bounds of the art of oratory. 'Vox canora & ſuavis, ſays Cicero in his Brutus, motus & geſtus etiam plus artis habebat quam erat Oratori ſatis.' Moreri doth not give an exact account of the jeſt of Torquatus: 'He uſed ſo many motions in declaiming, that they gave him the name of Graſhopper, Dionyſia Saltatricula.' Who would not believe from theſe words, that Hortenſius had this nick-name given him all over the city? And yet there was but one man, who upon one ſingle occaſion, gave him not the name of Graſhopper, but of Dionyſia, a woman who was a celebrated dancer. The word Saltatricula is very ill rendered Graſhopper. Here is the paſſage of Aulus Gellius, in the fifth chapter of the firſt book: 'Cùm L. Torquatus, ſubagreſti homo ingenio & infeſtivo, gravius acerbiuſque apud conſilium judicum, cùm de cauſa Sullæ quæreretur, non jam hiſtrionem eum eſſe diceret, ſed geſticulariam Dionyſiamque eum notiſſimæ Saltatriculæ nomine appellaret; tum voce molli atque demiſſa Hortenſius, Dionyſia, inquit, Dionyſia malo equidem eſſe quam quod tu Torquate, ἄμυσος, ἀγεοδίαιτος, καὶ ἀπρόσιτος. —— Lucius Torquatus, a rude and unpolite man, having ſaid in a very bitter and ſevere manner before the judges, in the cauſe of of Sylla, that Hortenſius did not now as formerly behave like a player, but like the dancer Dionyſia, Hortenſius replied in a ſoft and low voice, I would rather be Dionyſia, than be void of all taſte, elegance, or humanity, as you are.'

[E] He was exceſſively nice in his cloaths.] This paſſage of Aulus Gellius, that I am going to quote, and which goes before the words you have juſt now read, will ſerve both to prove Hortenſius's geſticulations,

(1) Eloquentium juriſperitiſſimus Craſſus, juriſperitorum eloquentiſſimus Scævola putaretur. Cicero in Bruto, cap. xxxix.

(2) Me adoleſcentem (Hortenſius) nactus octo annis minorem quam erat ipſe. Id. in Bruto.

(3) Id. ibid. cap. lxiv.

(4) De Orat. lib. iii, ſub fin.

(5) Στράτηγικὸς ἀνὴρ καὶ φιλόνεικος. Vir rei bellicæ peritus & pervicax. Plut. in Sylla, page 461.

(6) Cicero in Bruto.

(7) Onomaſt. pag. 404.

(8) Triennium fere fuit urbs ſine armis, ſed oratorum aut interitu aut diſceſſu, aut fuga —— Primas in cauſis agebat Hortenſius, magiſque quotidie probabatur. Cicero in Bruto.

(9) Cicero in Bruto. See alſo Tuſcul. 1, & Academ. 2. init.

(10) Senec. Præf. lib. i, Controv.

(11) Neſcires utrum cupidius ad audiendum eum, an ad ſpectandum concurreretur, ſic verbis oratoriis aſpectus, & rurſus aſpectui verba ſerviebant. Itaque conſtat Æſopum & Roſcium ludicræ artis peritiſſimos viros illo cauſas agente in corona frequenter aſtitiſſe, ut foro petitos geſtus in ſcenam referrent. Val. Maxim. lib viii, cap. x.

it is ſaid that he commenced a ſuit againſt his colleague, who paſſing through a narrow place, had ruffled the ſymmetry of his gown (d). He had heaped up great riches, and uſed them plentifully to live an eaſy life in the city and in the country. He had ſeveral country-houſes [F]; and as he was very ſumptuous, he oppoſed the ſumptuary laws (e), which the conſuls had a mind to enact in the 699th year of Rome. He praiſed them ſo cunningly for their magnificence in their houſes, that they durſt not inſiſt upon a thing which did not agree with their own conduct. He was the firſt that eat peacocks (f), it was to furniſh a diſh in an entertainment he gave to the college of the Augurs. He was very curious and magnificent in parks and fiſh-ponds (g), and was as careful of the health of his fiſh [G], as of that of his ſervants. He muſt needs have been a great lover of plane-trees, ſince he watered them with wine; which he made ſo little a ſecret of, that he one day deſired Cicero to change with him his hour of pleading; for, ſaid he, I muſt go and pour ſome wine upon a plane-tree I have at one of my country-houſes (h). Whoever knows the heart of man never ſo little, will much more wonder that thoſe two great orators ſhould have given one another many marks of affection upon ſeveral occaſions [H], than that they ſhould not always have been perfectly good friends; for after all, Cicero was the cauſe that Hortenſius did not preſerve the glory which he had long enjoy'd of being the firſt orator in Rome; and Hortenſius was the cauſe of Cicero's having a dangerous rival, who came cloſe to his heels. Hortenſius publiſhed not only ſome orations, and ſome tions, and his great niceneſs in his cloaths. ‘Hortenſius omnibus fermè Oratoribus ætatis ſuæ niſi M. Tullio clarior, quod multa munditia & circumſpectè compoſitèque indutus & amictus eſſet, manuſque ejus inter agendum forent argutæ admodum & geſtuoſæ, maledictis compellationibuſque probroſis jactatus eſt, multaque in eum quaſi in hiſtrionem in ipſis cauſis atque judiciis dicta ſunt. — Hortenſius who next to Cicero was the moſt celebrated orator of his age, being very nice and curious in his dreſs, and in pleading, making uſe of a great deal of action, was much ridiculed and abuſed, and was frequently even at the bar twitted with being a comedian rather than an orator.’ As for the ſuit he entered for diſordering the folds of his gown, here is a proof or a teſtimony for it. ‘Hortenſius vir alioquin ex profeſſo mollis & in præcinctu ponens omnem decorem; fuit enim veſtitu ad munditiem curioſo, & ut bene amictus iret, faciem in ſpeculo ponebat; ubi ſe intuens togam corpori ſic applicabat, ut rugas non forte ſed induſtria locatas artifex nodus conſtringeret, & ſinus ex compoſito defluens nodum lateris ambiret. Is quondam cum incederet elaboratus ad ſpeciem collegæ de injuriis diem dixit; quod ſibi in anguſtiis obvius offenſu fortuito ſtructuram togæ deſtruxerat, & capitale putavit quod in humero ſuo locum ruga mutaſſet (12). —— Hortenſius was a man profeſſedly effeminate, and placed all decency in outward ſhow; he was curious in his dreſs even to nicety, and to adjuſt it the better made uſe of a looking-glaſs, by help of which he tricked up his gown in ſuch a manner, that the folds did not fall by chance, but were formed with great care by help of artful knots, and the lappet falling formally down went round the knots at his ſide. As he was a walking one day in this elaborate dreſs, he brought an action of damages againſt his colleague, becauſe he had accidentally diſcompoſed the oeconomy of his gown as he went by him in a narrow paſſage, conſidering it as a capital injury that he had changed one fold on his ſhoulder.’

[F] He had ſeveral country-houſes.] Pliny (13) makes mention of Hortenſius's Tuſculanum, in which he placed the Argonauts of the Painter Cydias, which coſt him 14400 livres, according to Father Hardouin's computation. He had a houſe at Bauli (14), one near Laurentium (15), and another near the Porta Flumentana (16). Judge of his expences by the number of hogſheads of wine, which he left to his heir, which was above ten thouſand. Hortenſius ſuper decem millia cadûm hæredi reliquit (17). Here is the proof of what I have ſaid (18) concerning the care he took to pour wine with his own hands upon his plane-trees. ‘Is Hortenſius platanos ſuas vino irrigare conſuevit, adeo ut in actione quadam quam habuit cum Cicerone ſuſceptam, precario à Tullio poſtulaſſet ut locum dicendi permutaret ſecum, abire enim in villam neceſſario ſe velle, ut vinum Platano quam in Tuſculano poſuerat ipſe ſuffunderet (19). —— Hortenſius uſed to water his plane-trees with wine, and was ſo punctual in doing ſo, that being once engaged in a cauſe with Cicero, he begged that he would change his time of pleading with him, being, ſaid he, neceſſarily obliged to go to the country to pour ſome wine on a plane-tree which I have planted at my villa of Tuſculanum.’

[G] He was careful of the health of his fiſh.] Varro (20) relates upon this ſubject ſome very ſingular things. Hortenſius did with reſpect to his fiſh, as miſers do with reſpect to their money; he durſt not make uſe of them, he choſe rather to buy fiſh in any neighbouring town, than to take them out of his ponds: nor was he only contented not to feed upon his own fiſh, but he alſo fed them nicely and plentifully. ‘Neque ſatis erat eum non paſci piſcinis, niſi eos ipſe paſceret ultro . . . Celerius voluntate Hortenſii ex equili educeres rhedarias ut tibi haberes mulas, quàm è piſcina barbatum mullum . . . Non minor cura ejus erat de ægrotis piſcibus, quàm de minus valentibus ſervis: itaque minus laborabat ne ſervus æger, quàm aquam frigidam biberent ſui piſces. —— It was not enough for him that he did not feed upon the fiſh of his own ponds, but he fed them with great care . . . And he would have been more eaſily perſuaded to give you the mules out of his ſtable, than a mullet out of his pond . . . He was as careful of the health of his fiſh as of that of his ſervants: and was more ſollicitous that his fiſh ſhould have freſh water, than that his ſervants when indiſpoſed ſhould be furniſhed with it.’ It is ſaid he was ſo paſſionately fond of a lamprey that he ſhed tears for the death of her (21). This Porphyry (22), Macrobius (23), and Tzetzes (24) have aſcribed to the orator Craſſus.

[H] One will much more wonder that he and Cicero gave one another . . . marks of affection.] Perhaps there is nothing upon which jealouſy is more able to cauſe a greater alienation in mens minds than eloquence. I know not whether beauty or poetry ought to be excepted. Two famous preachers ſeldom love one another, and eaſily quarrel even to the utmoſt rupture. It is much if they can conceal their jealouſy, and keep fair appearances with each other. So that what Hortenſius did in Cicero's behalf, may well be admired; but the ill offices he may have done him privately, ought not to ſurprize us. He got him admitted into the college of the Augurs (25): he praiſed him nobly on an occaſion, wherein his praiſes might be of uſe of him (26); he ran the hazard of loſing his life for his ſake (27); and Cicero himſelf confeſſes, that there had always been between them a reciprocal commerce of good offices. ‘Cùm præſertim non modo nunquam ſit aut illius à me curſus impeditus, aut ab illo meus, ſed contra ſemper alter ab altero adjutus, & communicando, & monendo, & favendo (28). —— Eſpecially ſince we never oppoſed one another's intereſts, but, on the contrary, always aſſiſted each other, by mutual communication, of counſels, advice, and favour.’ Cicero's good-offices towards Hortenſius, are not ſo much to be wondered at, as thoſe of Hortenſius towards him; becauſe, though naturally ſpeaking, Cicero muſt have had for many years, his heart filled with the rancour of jealouſy, it is likely he did not keep half of it, when he ſaw himſelf ſuperior. There was a time when he did not equal Hortenſius, another when he equalled him, and a third, when he excelled him. This laſt period is an excellent

(d) Macrob. Saturn. lib. ii, cap. ix. Moreri, after Voſſius, quotes lib. iii, cap. xiii, but the third book contains only twelve chapters.

(e) Dion, lib. xxxix.

(f) Varro de re Ruſtica, lib. iii, cap. vi. Plin. lib. x, cap. xx. Ælian. lib. v, Hiſt. Anim. cap. xxi. Tertull. de Pallio, ſub fin.

(g) Varro, de re Ruſtica, lib. iii, cap. xiii, & xvii.

(h) See the remark [F].

(12) Macrob. lib. ii, Saturn. cap. ix.

(13) Plinius, lib. xxxv, cap. xi.

(14) Cicer. 2. Acad. quæſt. Varro, de re Ruſt. lib. iii, cap. xvii.

(15) Varro, ibid.

(16) Cicer. ad Attic. lib. vii. Ep. iii.

(17) Varro, apud Plin. lib. xiv, cap. xiv.

(18) I have mentioned this in the text, citat. (h).

(19) Macrob. Saturn. lib. ii, cap. ix.

(20) De re Ruſt. lib. iii, cap. xvii.

(21) Apud Baulos in parte Baiana Piſcinam habuit Hortenſius Orator, in qua Muraenam adeo dilexit ut exanimatam fleſſe credatur. Plin. lib. ix, cap. lv.

(22) De abſtin. lib. iii.

(23) Saturn. lib. ii, cap. xi.

(24) Chil. viii, Hiſt. 174.

(25) Cicero in Bruto, init.

(26) At Hercule alter tuus familiaris Hortenſius quàm plena manu, quàm ingenue quam ornate noſtras laudes in aſtra ſuſtulit, quum de Flacci Prætura & de illo tempore Allobrogum diceret. Sic habeto nec amantius, nec honorificentius, nec copioſius potuiſſe dici. - - - I cannot expreſs how copiouſly, how ingenuouſly, and how elegantly your other friend Hortenſius raiſed my fame to the very ſkies in the Oration, in which he mentioned the pretorſhip of Flaccus, and the time of the Allobroges. Be aſſured that nothing could be ſaid more affectionately, more honourably, or more fully. Id. ad Attic. Ep. ult. lib. ii.

(27) Vidi, vidi hunc ipſum Q. Hortenſium lumen & ornamentum Reip. penè interfici ſervorum manu cum mihi addeſſet. - - - I ſaw with theſe eyes that very Hortenſius, the glory and ornament of the common wealth, in the utmoſt hazard of being ſlain by the hands of ſlaves, on my account. Id. pro Milone.

(28) Idem in Bruto.

ſome annals, but alſo ſome laſcivious poems [I]. None of all theſe are now extant; and it muſt be confeſſed, that his tongue was much better than his pen [K]. Tho' he carried the cauſe of Meſſala his ſiſter's ſon, having pleaded with the beſt of his eloquence for excellent remedy remedy againſt jealouſy. But, on the contrary, what a mortification muſt it have been to Hortenſius to ſee Cicero, who only came after him at the beginning, overtake him ſome time after, and at laſt get the ſtart of him? ‘ Hortenſius . . . qui diu princeps Oratorum, aliquando æmulus Ciceronis exiſtimatus eſt, noviſſimè quoad vixit, ſecundus.’ Thus Quintilian ſpeaks in the third chapter of the eleventh book: I know, that it was not a diſadvantage to Hortenſius to have ſuch a rival as Cicero. The honours of his conſulſhip had ſo ſlackened that ardent and indefatigable application, with which he had cultivated his mind from his youth, that he was perceived every day more and more to decline (29). He took heart again when he ſaw the great progreſs of Cicero's glory. But in truth, he would have eaſily diſpenſed with ſuch a ſpur, which coſt him the firſt place. There were hardly any great cauſes, wherein theſe two famous orators were not retained, ſometimes for the ſame, and ſometimes for contrary parties (30). The famous extortioner Verres was to have Hortenſius for his advocate, which was one of the ſtrongeſt reaſons Cicero alledged to exclude Cæcilius from being the accuſer. It appears by that pleading (31) how fit Hortenſius was to make the beſt of the cauſes he undertook. Cicero had all ſorts of advantages here: he was the accuſer; and it is ſaid that he at firſt made Hortenſius give over thoughts of pleading for his client Verres (32) there being ſo many charges and proofs againſt him. ‘ Multis diebus prima actio celebrata eſt, ‘ dum teſtes Verris producuntur criminum diverſorum, ‘ dum recitantur publicæ privatæque literæ. Quibus ‘ rebus adeò ſtupefactus Hortenſius dicitur, ut rationem defenſionis omitteret (33). —— The opening ‘ of the cauſe continued many days, while by the witneſſes of Verres many crimes were produced, and the ‘ public and private documents were read. At the ‘ hearing of which Hortenſius, is ſaid to have been ſo ‘ aſtoniſhed, that he laid aſide thoughts of making any ‘ defence for his client.’ We have ſeen how Cicero declared that Hortenſius had never done him any ill offices: and we may ſee in the ſame place, that he confutes thoſe, who thought that Hortenſius was not favourable to him. ‘ Dolebam quod, non ut plerique ‘ putabant, adverſarium aut obtrectatorem laudum ‘ mearum, ſed ſocium potius & conſortem glorioſi laboris amiſeram (34). —— What added to my grief ‘ was, that I had loſt not, as moſt people fancied, an ‘ enemy, and an envious rival, but rather a companion ‘ and fellow in our glorious toils.’ But he wrote in another ſtile to his brother Quintus, when he told him, ‘ Quantum Hortenſio credendum ſit neſcio: me ſumma ſimulatione amoris, ſummaque aſſiduitate quoti‘ diana ſceleratiſſime inſidioſiſſimeque tractavit, adjuncto ‘ quoque Arrio: quorum ego conſiliis, promiſſis, præ‘ ceptis deſtitutus in hanc calamitatem incidi (35). —— ‘ I do not know how far Hortenſius is to be truſted: he ‘ together with Arrius have uſed me in the moſt baſe ‘ and treacherous manner, under appearances of the ‘ warmeſt friendſhip and affection to my intereſts: and ‘ I have fallen into this diſtreſs, by being at once deprived of their counſels, promiſes, and directions.’ How few people are there even amongſt thoſe who are accounted honeſt men, who have not two ſorts of language, one for books which they deſign for the public, and another for the letters which they write to their friends. See the remark [M] of the article GROTIUS. As long as theſe are not public, this inſincerity or amphibious language doth not appear: but I wait for the publication of their letters to find it. We ſhould vex ſome authors not a little, ſhould we oblige them to repeat in converſation, or to hear repeated, the ſame elogies they have given in their writings, prefaces, citations, and the agreeable neceſſity of making a funeral oration, how do you impoſe on the world! However it be, we have reaſon to look upon it as a wonderful addreſs of Pomponius Atticus, that he was able to preſerve the intimate friendſhip both of Cicero and Hortenſius, and to hinder them from falling out. ‘ Utebatur intimè Q. Hortenſio, ‘ qui iis temporibus principatum eloquentiæ tenebat, ‘ ut intelligi non poſſet uter eum plus diligeret, Cicero an Hortenſius, & id quod erat difficillimum, ‘ efficiebat ut inter quos tantæ laudis eſſet æmulatio, ‘ nulla intercederet obtrectatio, eſſetque talium virorum ‘ copula (36). —— He lived in the cloſeſt friendſhip ‘ with Hortenſius, who at that time was the moſt celebrated orator at Rome, ſo that it was impoſſible to ‘ tell whether Cicero or Hortenſius loved him moſt, and ‘ what was a proof of his great addreſs, he was the ‘ cauſe that theſe two mighty rivals, never expreſſed ‘ any jealouſy of one another, ſo that he was, as it were, ‘ the bond of friendſhip betwixt them.’

[I] He had publiſhed ſome laſcivious poems.] This we learn from Ovid in his ſecond book de Triſtibus, where he gives a catalogue of thoſe who have with impunity compoſed love poems.

Is quoque Phaſiacas Argo qui duxit in undas
  Non potuit Veneris furta tacere ſuæ.
Nec minus HORTENSI, nec ſunt minus improba Servi
  Carmina. Quis dubitet nomina tanta ſequi?

The hero too, whom far-fam'd Argo bore
To diſtant Phaſis, and the Cholchic ſhore,
Diſclos'd the love-intrigues he follow'd there,
And boaſted of the favours of the fair.
Nor leſs obſcene Hortenſius' numbers flow,
Nor Servius' lines a chaſter ſubject know.
To copy ſuch examples who'd refuſe?
They authorize the licence of the Muſe.

Aulus Gellius doubtleſs ſpeaks of theſe poems of Hortenſius, when he ſays (37), they were not polite, invenuſta. I know not whether the poem which Varro (38) aſcribes to him, be another work: as to the annals, they have been cited by Velleius Paterculus. I believe Hortenſius was a learned man, Cicero having given him that commendation. But I do not ſee that his poems, his annals, and the proffer of Lucullus, are ſo good proofs of his learning, as Corradus would fain have us believe. ‘ Sane, ſays he (39), videtur ‘ benè doctus fuiſſe, ſiquidem poëma ſcripſit, ut Autor ‘ eſt Varro libro primo de Analogia, & Annales, ut ‘ Paterculus affirmat, & certè cum Siſenna & Lucullo ‘ de Græce Latineque ſcribendo venit in eam contentionem quam Plutarchus in Lucullo refert. —— ‘ He ſeems to have been a learned man, for he wrote a ‘ poem, as we are told by Varro, in his firſt book of Analogy; he wrote likewiſe Annals, as Paterculus affirms; ‘ and he certainly ſtrove with Siſenna and Lucullus for ‘ the ſuperiority of writing, both in Greek and Latin, ‘ as Plutarch teſtifies in the Life of Lucullus.’ Methinks Corradus has not underſtood Plutarch's meaning; for he does not ſpeak there of a challenge betwixt Hortenſius, Siſenna, and Lucullus, but of a little preſumption of the later, who undertook in the preſence of the other two, to write the Social War, either in Latin or Greek, in proſe or in verſe, as the lot ſhould decide. Plutarch conjectures, that the Greek proſe fell to him by lot, ſince the hiſtory of that war, written by Lucullus in Greek proſe, was extant in his time: but ſtill, this doth not at all ſignify, that Hortenſius and Siſenna had engaged to perform the ſame taſk if the lot fell to them. Catanæus who relates it ſo (40), is miſtaken.

[K] His tongue was better than his pen.] This we learn from Quintilian, third chapter, eleventh book, where he obſerves that action has a mighty force in an orator; and that as this was Hortenſius's great talent, when his pleading came to be read, they were not found to come up to the reputation of their author. ‘ M. Cicero, ſays he, unam in dicendo actionem dominari putat, hac . . . Antonium & Craſſum multum valuiſſe, plurimam verò Q. Hortenſium, cujus ‘ rei fides eſt quod ejus ſcripta tantum infra famam ‘ ſunt . . . ut appareat placuiſſe aliquid eo orante quod ‘ legentes non invenimus. —— Cicero is of opinion, ‘ that action is the chief talent of an orator . . . that ‘ Anthony and Craſſus excelled in it, but eſpecially ‘ Hortenſius, which will appear, if we conſider how for him [L], ſeeing him charged with being ingaged in a faction; yet he did himſelf a great injury by it, and expoſed himſelf, in his old age, to hiſſings and clamours, which he alone had eſcaped before (i). He died in the 703d year of Rome, in the 64th year of his age, 44 or 45 of which he had ſpent with a mighty reputation at the bar (k). It has been ſaid that he had ſo worn out his voice, that he loſt it before he loſt his life. Others have ſo ill underſtood that thought, that they have taken it, as if he died in pleading, having killed himſelf by the violence of ſpeaking. We muſt look upon this as fabulous, ſince he pleaded a cauſe of importance a few days before his death [M]; and ſince Cicero is ſo far from mentioning this ſort of death, as he would doubtleſs have done if he had died in that manner, he affords us reaſons to think otherwiſe. Conſult upon all this, the remark [M]. Hortenſius married in his youth a daughter of C. Catulus (l), I cannot well tell whether ſhe was alſo the daughter of Servilia (m), a lady of the greateſt diſtinction in Rome. He was Catulus's ſon-in-law, at the time of Verres's trial. But nothing can be more ſingular than his marriage with Martia [N] the wife of Cato of Utica, and

---

(29) Cicer. in Bruto, ſub fin.

(30) Sæpe, in iiſdem, ſæpe in contrariis cauſis verſati ſumus. Cicer. Divinat. in Q. Cæcil.

(31) Divinat. in Q. Cæcilium.

(32) It is to be obſerved, that Hortenſius did not ſo forſake Verres, but that Quintilian, lib. x, cap. i, ſpeaks of his pleadings for him.

(33) Aſcon. Pedian. in procœmio act. in Verrem.

(34) Cicero, in Bruto, init.

(35) Id. Epiſt. iii, lib. i, ad Quint. fratrem. See alſo Epiſt. ix, ad Attic. lib. iii.

(36) Cornel. Nepos, in Vita Pomp. Attic.

(37) Lib. xix, cap. ix.

(38) Lib. 1 de Annal. apud Corradum in Cicer. Brutum, pag. 428.

(39) Ibid.

(40) In Plin. Ep. lib. v, pag. m. 283.

‘much inferior his writings are to the great fame he enjoyed . . . ſo that it would ſeem that they had certain charms while he pronounced them, which are quite loſt in the reading.’ How many preachers have we of whom we may ſay the ſame thing? Mr Morus is an inſtance of it.

[L] Having pleaded with the beſt of his eloquence for him.] This cauſe was pleaded in the year of Rome 702. Hortenſius was then ſixty three years old, which age did not hinder him from making an excellent plea. Brutus, who always thought him a great orator, never admired him ſo much as he did on that day; others paſſed the ſame judgment; and Cicero having read the piece, publiſhed word for word, as it was pronounced, was of the ſame opinion (41). And if Hortenſius was hiſſed the next day, it was not becauſe he had pleaded leſs eloquently than he uſed to do, but becauſe people were vexed to ſee that he had brought his client off. That reſentment had already ſhewn itſelf againſt the judges. ‘Clamoribus ſcilicet maximis judices corripuerunt, & oſtenderunt planè eſſe quod ferri non poſſet . . . Acceſſit huc, quod poſtridie ejus abſolutionem in Theatrum Curionis Hortenſius introiit, puto ut ſuum gaudium gauderemus. Hic tibi ſtrepitus, fremitus, clamor, tonitruum & rudentum ſibilus. Hoc magis animadverſum eſt quod intactus ab ſibilo pervenerat Hortenſius ad ſenectutem. Sed tum ita bene ut in totam vitam cuivis ſatis eſſet, & pœniteret eum jam viciſſe (42). —— They inveighed againſt the judges with terrible outcries, and ſhowed that it was a thing not to be ſuffered . . . Beſides, the next day after his acquittal, Hortenſius entered into the theatre of Curio, expecting, no doubt, the compliments of his friends upon that occaſion, but inſtead of that he was received with murmurs, outcries, clamour, and hiſſing. This was the more taken notice of, becauſe Hortenſius had arrived to old age, without ever being ſo uſed before, but then he got as much of it as was enough for one's whole life, and as made him regret that he had got his cauſe.’ He pleaded a few days before his death, as Cicero obſerves; he was undoubtedly one of thoſe great wits, who have a laſting ſtrength of mind. It is true, he ſhined more in his youth, than in his more advanced age, for which two reaſons are aſſigned: one is that he had made choice of the Aſiatic eloquence, which was more becoming in a young than an old man: the other was, that he laboured with greater application when he was young. ‘Si quærimus, cur adoleſcens magis floruerit dicendo, quàm ſenior. Hortenſius, cauſas reperiemus veriſſimas duas: primum, quod genus erat orationis Aſiaticum, adoleſcentiæ magis conceſſum, quàm ſenectuti. Genera autem Aſiaticæ dictionis duo ſunt . . . Hæc . . . genera dicendi aptiora ſunt adoleſcentibus, in ſenibus gravitatem non habent. Itaque Hortenſius utroque genere florens, clamores faciebat adoleſcens . . . Sed cum jam honores, & illa ſenior autoritas gravius quiddam requireret, remanebat idem, nec decebat idem: quodque exercitationem ſtudiumque dimiſerat, quod in eo fuerat acerrimum, concinnitas illa crebritaſque ſententiarum priſtina manebat, ſed ea veſtitu illo orationis, quo conſueverat, ornata non erat (43). —— If we aſk why Hortenſius was more famed for eloquence in his youth, than when he came to years, we ſhall find two very good reaſons for it, the firſt is, that he choſe the Aſiatic ſtile, which is more allowable in youth than in age. There are two kinds of Aſiatic eloquence. . . . Theſe . . . are fitter for young men, but have not gravity enough for the old. Therefore Hortenſius excelling in both theſe, could not fail to gain a great reputation in his youth . . . But when the honours he had obtained, and that authority which his age gave him required a graver manner, he continued in the ſame, which had not now it's former grace: beſides, he having ſlackened his application and ſtudy, which had been prodigious, the concinnity and frequency of his ſentences remained, but the elegant dreſs with which he uſed to adorn them was now gone.’ He was happy even in the time of his death; for he died juſt before the deplora- confuſions into which the common-wealth was plunged (44).

[M] It has been ſaid that he loſt his voice . . . Others have ill underſtood that thought . . . We may look on this as fabulous, ſince he pleaded a cauſe of importance a few days before his death.] The proof of the firſt of theſe two things is contained in this paſſage of Quintus Serenus Samonicus:

Sic eſt Hortenſius olim
Abſumptus, cauſis etenim confectus agendis,
Obticuit, cum vox domino vivente periret,
Et nondum extincti moreretur lingua diſerti.

Hortenſius, tir'd with law, his tongue ſurviv'd,
And liv'd, an orator of voice depriv'd.

Glandorpius has not underſtood the ſenſe of theſe verſes. ‘Deceſſit è vita, ſays he (45), ſub bellum civile Cæſ. & Pompeii . . . . clamore in actione cauſæ diruptus, ut indicat Q. Serenus —— He died during the civil-war between Cæſar and Pompey, having burſt himſelf by the vehemence of his ſpeaking in pleading a cauſe, as Serenus reports.’ The following words of Cicero do not agree with the paſſage of Samonicus. ‘Perpaucis ante mortem diebus una tecum ſocerum tuum defendit Appium . . . Q. Hortenſi vox extincta fato ſuo eſt, noſtra publico (46). —— A few days before his death, he, together with you, defended your father-in-law Appius . . . . The voice of Hortenſius was put to ſilence by his own fate, but ours by the fate of the public.’

[N] Nothing can be more ſingular than his marriage with Martia.] Plutarch tells the ſtory thus (47). Hortenſius deſired Cato to give him Porcia his daughter, who was married to Bibulus, and had already born two children. Give her to me alſo, ſaid he, as a fertile ſoil, in which I may ſow children: I am ſenſible, added he, that, according to the opinion of the world, this is ſomewhat abſurd; but in reality is there any thing more excellent and more beneficial to ſocieties, than not to leave the fruitful field of a young woman uncultivated; and on the other hand, not to ſuffer a family to be oppreſſed with too many children, which have enough already? Beſides, the mutual lending of wives amongſt worthy men diſperſes virtue amongſt a greater number of families, and occaſions more alliances in the ſtate; and if Bibulus is not willing entirely to quit his title to Porcia, I promiſe to reſtore her, after ſhe has brought me ſome children, which may be a ſtricter bond betwixt you and him, and my ſelf. Cato did not think proper to treat of this affair; but when Hortenſius declared to him, that he had a mind to Martia, Cato's own wife, conſidering ſhe was ſtill very young, and that Cato had children enough, he readily promiſed her, provided Martius the lady's father would agree to it.

(i) Epiſt. ii, Cicer. ad Famil. lib. viii.

(k) Eſt autem L. Paulo, C. Marcello Coſſ. mortuus, ex quo videmus eum in Patronorum numero annos quatuor & quadraginta fuiſſe. Cicer. in Bruto.

(l) Id. de Orat. lib. iii, ſub fin.

(m) Ex ſocru tua, fœmina primaria Servilia. Id. Verr. 4.

(41) Hortenſium magnum Oratorem ſemper putavi maximeque probavi pro Meſſala dicentem, cum tu abfuiſti. Sic ferunt, inquam, idque declarat totidem quot dixit, ut ajunt, ſcripta verbis oratio. Cicer. in Bruto.

(42) Cælius ad Cicer. Epiſt. ii, lib. viii, ad Famil.

(43) Cicero, in Bruto, ſub. fin. pag. m. 451.

(44) Perpetua quadam felicitate uſus ille ceſſit è vita ſuo magis quam ſuorum civium tempore, & tum occidit cum lugere facilius Rempub poſſet ſi viveret quam juvare Id ibid. init.

(45) Glandorp. Onomaſt. pag. 405, 406.

(46) Cicero, in Bruto.

(47) Plut. in Catone Utic pag. m. 770.

and daughter of Martius Philippus. He asked her of Cato by way of loan, and obtained her without much difficulty, though her big belly declared ſhe had no great miſunderſtanding with her Husband. He had one ſon who gave him much trouble, ſo that when he

it. Martius conſented to it, and preſently Martia was transferred to Hortenſius. When ſhe became afterwards both his widow and heir ſhe again returned to her firſt husband. This Cæſar did not forget in his Anti-Cato, ‘ If he had need of a wife, ſaid he (48) ‘ why did he give her to another? And if he had ‘ no need of her, why did he take her again? Does ‘ not this ſhew, that he made uſe of this lure, that ‘ by lending a young wife to Hortenſius, he might ‘ recover her with great wealth?’ Strabo (49), having ſaid that the Tapyri (50) had a law, by which the husbands gave their wives to others, when they had two or three children by them, adds, that Cato practiſed the ſame thing to gratify Hortenſius's requeſt who deſired his Martia of him; and obſerves that Cato, in this only, followed the ancient cuſtom of the Romans. There is reaſon to doubt whether this was their ancient cuſtom; for beſides that, there are ſo few inſtances of it, that Turtullian cites only that of Cato (51); it appears that Hortenſius owned ſome ſingularity or novelty in his deſign, according to the common opinion. Δόξῃ μὲν γὰρ ἀνθρώπων ἄτοπον εἶναι τὸ τοιοῦτον, φύσει δὲ καλὸν καὶ πολιτικόν. Nam eſſe hominum quidem illud opinione novum (ſo Xilander renders it) natura pulchrum tamen & civile (52). —— For this indeed is ſtrange in the opinion of men, but naturally it is beautiful and politic. He does not oppoſe to this opinion the ancient laws or cuſtoms of the Romans, which ſo great a civilian would not have omited on that occaſion, but only nature. Bodinus (53) cenſures Plutarch without reaſon, as if he had ſaid, in the life of Cato Uticenſis, that it was lawful for the Romans to lend their wives; for that hiſtorian does not ſpeak of it as of a cuſtom founded upon the laws, or as a thing that was uſually practiſed: on the contrary, he introduces Hortenſius, confeſſing, that his propoſal ſeemed ſtrange or new. It is a great raſhneſs in the ſame Bodinus, not to give credit to this lending of Cato's wife; for it is a ſtory that Thraſeas had taken from the writings of Munatius, Cato's friend, and Cæſar would not have ventured to have reproached him for it, if it had not been well known (54). The reaſon upon which Bodinus grounds his not believing it, is a new fault; it is becauſe, ſays he, by the law of Romulus, and the antient practice reſtored by Tiberius, the relations puniſhed at their diſcretion wives that committed adultery. But what does this make againſt Cato's wife, who was given to another by her father and her husband? I ſay nothing againſt theſe words. Plutarchus & Strabo Parthos æque ac Lacedæmonios mutuas uxores amicis dare conſueviſſe ajunt (55), tho' they are very likely to deceive the reader; for who in reading them would not think, that Plutarch attributed this conduct to the Parthians, and Strabo to the Lacedæmonians? And yet Bodin means, that Strabo aſcribes this to the Parthians (56), and Plutarch to the Lacedæmonians. This way of quoting is but too frequent, and leads into miſtakes; it ſeems to bring many witneſſes for the ſame thing, when in reality there is but one. Bodinus ſeems to ſay, that Plutarch and Strabo both teſtify, that the lending of wives was practiſed both among the Parthians, and among the Lacedemonians. I have read in Mr Menage, that, according to Caſaubon, Plutarch mentions this marriage of Hortenſius and Martia, as a thing of which he doubted. Ad quem Strabonis locum notat Caſaubonus. Plutarchum de Catone rem ita narrare ut de ea dubitaſſe ſignificet (57). Mr Menage had reaſon to ſay that this is falſe: it is not about the fact itſelf that Plutarch expreſſes his doubts; he only ſays, that that part of Cato's life is like a piece of a play, in which the plot is not well opened, that is, in my opinion, that people paſſed different judgments upon it.

Note, that when I cenſure Bodinus for imputing this to Plutarch, I conſider that he cites the life of Cato of Utica; for if he had cited the parallel between Lycurgus and Numa Pompilius, he could not have erred. Plutarch there affirms, that this king of Rome permitted husbands to lend their wives; but I think he is miſtaken in ſaying ſo, and ſo does Mr Dacier. ‘ This is true, ſay he (58), of Lycurgus, but it does ‘ not appear that Numa ever had any ſuch deſign; ‘ it would be alſo eaſy to prove, that this community of wives did not begin at Rome, under Numa, ‘ but much later, and that it was not general.

Lucan ſuppoſes, that Martia, after Hortenſius's death, went to Cato, and moſt humbly intreated him to take her again. She declared to him, that being paſt child-bearing, ſhe only asked the name of wife, that ſhe would live in continence, and deſired only to ſhare with him in thoſe troubles and fatigues, that the ill poſture of public affairs had brought upon him. Lucan adds, that Cato was moved by theſe words of Martia, and though that was not a proper time for marriage, he granted her requeſt: it is true, that all the nuptial ceremonies were omitted, without excepting that which is looked upon as the principal, and the conſummation of the work. Martia did not quit her mourning weed, ſhe embraced her husband, as a mother doth her child (59). Cato was ſo deeply afflicted for the public calamities, that from the beginning of the civil war, he deprived himſelf of all diverſions; he let his beard grow, and lived as a man in mourning. Martia's offers were accepted in the literal ſenſe. See what Lucan makes her ſay:

Dum ſanguis inerat, dum vis materna, peregi
Juſſa Cato, & geminos excepi fœta maritos.
Viſceribus laſſis, partuque exhauſta, revertor
Jam nulli tradenda viro: da fœdera priſci
Illibata tori: da tantum nomen inane
Connubii: liceat tumulo ſcripſiſſe, Catonis
Martia; dec dubium longo quæratur in ævo,
Mutarim primas expulſa, an tradita, tædas.
Non me lætorum ſociam, rebuſque ſecundis
Accipis: in curas venio, partemque laborum.
Da mihi caſtra ſequi (60).

While nature yet with vigour fed my veins,
And made me equal to a mother's pains,
To thee obedient I thy houſe forſook,
And to my arms another husband took;
My pow'rs at length with genial labours worn,
Weary to thee and waſted I return,
At length a barren wedlock let me prove,
Give me the name without the joys of love.
No more to be abandon'd let me come,
That Cato's wife may live upon my tomb,
So ſhall my truth to lateſt times be read,
And none ſhall ask if guiltily I fled,
Or thy commands eſtranged me from thy bed.
Nor ask I now thy happineſs to ſhare,
I ſeek thy days of toil, thy nights of care.

Rowe.

If he had been throughout all his work as fond of fiction, as in this place, I am apt to think he would not have been accuſed of following too cloſely the thread of hiſtory, and not giving his work a form poetical enough. However it be, let us ſee what he ſays of the extreme rigidneſs Cato.

Ille nec horrificam ſancto dimovit ab oræ
Cæſariem, duroque admiſit gaudia vultu.
(Ut primum tolli feralia viderat arma,
Intonſus rigidam in frontem deſcendere canos.
Paſſus erat, mœſtamque genis increſcere barbam,
Uni quippe vacat ſtudiiſque odiiſque carenti,
Humanum lugere genus) nec fœdera priſci
Sunt tentata tori: juſto quoque robur amori
Reſtitit: hi mores (61).

Nor he the chief his ſacred viſage chear'd,
Nor ſmooth'd his matted locks or horrid beard,
Nor deigns his heart one thought of joy know,
But met his Martia with the ſame ſtern brow.
For when he ſaw the fatal faction's arm,
The coming war, and Rome's impending harm,

Regardleſs,

---

(48) Id. ibid. pag. 784.

(49) Strabo, lib. xi, pag. 355.

(50) They bordered upon the Parthians.

(51) Ex illa, credo, majorum & ſapientiſſimorum diſciplina, Græci Socratis & Romani Catonis qui uxores ſuas amicis communicaverunt - - - O ſapientiæ Atticæ! ô Romanæ gravitatis exemplum! lenones Philoſophus & Cenſor. - - - Agreeably I ſuppoſe to the doctrine of the antients, and of the moſt wiſe men, of the Grecian Socrates, and the Roman Cato, who lent their wives to their friends. - - - O wonderful example of the Attic wiſdom, and Roman gravity! A Philoſopher and Cenſor both panders Tertull. in Apologet. The example of Socrates does not concern the Romans. Tertullian aſcribes to Cato the Cenſor, what he ſhould have aſcribed to Cato of Utica.

(52) Plut. pag. 771.

(53) Bodin. Meth. Hiſt. cap. pag. m. 78.

(54) Plut. in Cat. pag. 770.

(55) Bod. Meth. Hiſt. pag. 78.

(57) He ſhould have ſaid to the Tapyri, and not to the Parthians.

(57) Menag. Amæn. Juris, cap. x. I do not find this in Caſaubon's notes upon Strabo.

(58) Dacier in a marginal note of his tranſlation of Plutarch, in the parallel between Lycurgus and Numa. pag. 362, 363. Dutch Edit.

(59) Sic ut erat, mœſti ſervans lugubria cultus, Quoque m do natos, hoc eſt amplexa maritum. Lucan. l b. ii, ver. 365.

(60) Lucan. ibid. ver. 338.

(61) Id. ibid. ver 373.

he pleaded for his nephew, he declared, that he made choice of him for his heir, to the prejudice of his ſon. And yet it was to this unworthy ſon that he left his eſtate, if we may believe Valerius Maximus. See the following article.

Regardleſs quite of every other care,
Unſhorn he left his looſe neglected hair;
Rude hung the hoary honours of his head,
And a foul growth his mournful cheeks o're ſpread,
No ſtings of private hate his peace infeſt,
Nor partial favour grew up in his breaſt,
But ſafe from prejudice he kept his mind,
Free, and at leiſure to lament mankind.
Nor could his former loves returning fire,
The warmth of one connubial wiſh inſpire,
But ſtrongly he withſtood the juſt deſire.
Rowe.

HORTENSIUS (Quintus) ſon to the former, behav'd himſelf ſo unworthily of ſuch a father, that he had like to have been diſinherited by him [A]. But if he be the ſame that was proconſul of Macedonia after Julius Cæſar's death, we may preſume he reformed his life. He warmly ſided with the aſſerters of liberty, and ſtrenuouſly engaged with Brutus, to raiſe armies which might be able to maintain the cauſe (a). He was taken at the battle of Philippi, and put to death by way of reprizal, by Marc Antony's order, upon Caius Antonius's tomb [B]. Some believe our Hortenſius was the ſame with him, who had joined with Julius Cæſar againſt Pompey [C]. But as they who ſpeak of him, ſufficiently intimate, that he was the only Son of Hortenſius, we may look upon him as the Father of Q. HORTENSIUS CORBIO and MARCUS HORTENSIUS HORTALUS, the firſt whereof was a monſter of impurity and debauchery [D], and the latter fell into poverty, and had the diſcretion not to marry, till

[A] He had like to have been diſinherited.] Cicero intimates plainly enough in his letters (1), that Hortenſius's ſon was good for nothing, and that his own ill temper (2) and a freed-man called Salvius, had ſpoiled him (3). He ſeems to ſay that his father did not love him (4); but let us hear Valerius Maximus, who is more than ordinary clear in this matter. ‘Q. Hortenſii, qui ſuis temporibus ornamentum Romanæ eloquentiæ fuit, admirabilis in filio patientia extitit. Cum enim eo uſque impietatem ejus ſuſpectam & nequitiam inviſam haberet, ut Meſſalam ſuæ ſororis filium hæredem habiturus ambitus reum defendens judicibus diceret, ſi illum damnaſſent nihil ſibi præter oſculum nepotum in quibus acquieſceret ſuperfuturum: Hac ſcilicet ſententia quam etiam editæ orationi inſeruit, filium potius in tormento animi quam in voluptatibus reponens: tamen ne naturæ ordinem confunderet, non nepotes ſed filium hæredem reliquit (5) —— The patience of Hortenſius, who was the ornament of the Roman eloquence, in the age in which he lived, towards his ſon is worthy of admiration. For tho' he was ſo incenſed againſt him on account of his undutiful and ſcandalous behaviour, that he ſaid to the judges in a ſpeech which he made in defence of Meſſala, his ſiſter's ſon, whom he then deſigned to make his heir, and who was accuſed of corruption, that if they condemned him he ſhould have no other ſolace left but the embraces of his grand children: by this ſentence, (which he likewiſe inſerted in this oration when he made it public) ſhowing that he conſidered his ſon rather as the torment than the pleaſure of his ſoul; yet, that he might not overturn the order of nature, he left his ſon his heir, and not his grand-children.’ It is ſomewhat ſtrange that Hortenſius ſhould have given out, that he had made choice of his nephew for his heir; for if he thought his own ſon deſerved to be diſinherited, could not he transfer his eſtate to his grand-children, as he ſaid he ſhould be obliged to do, if they condemned his nephew? A ſtrange grand-father ſure, not to think of his grand-ſons, but in caſe of failure of his ſiſter's ſon! Valerius Maximus has perhaps curtailed the matter by the ſuppreſſion of ſome eſſential circumſtances. It may be too, that we muſt take this declaration of Hortenſius only as a figure of rhetoric: there are ſtratagems in this profeſſion, which our orator knew well how to make uſe of. Probably he had a mind to move the judges in appearing ſo much concerned for the diſcharge of his client, as a perſon that was to be to him inſtead of a ſon. Others ſay that Hortenſius's wife inherited his eſtate (6), ſhe whom Cato had lent him, and whom he took again after Hortenſius's death.

[B] He was murdered by way of reprizal, on the tomb of Caius Antonius.] To underſtand what this reprizal was, we muſt remember that Caius Antonius, brother to Marc, fell into Hortenſius's hands during the confuſions that followed Julius Cæſar's death; and that Brutus underſtanding that by the rage of the Triumvirate, D. Brutus and Cicero had been put to death, together with other illuſtrious men, wrote to Hortenſius to ſacrifice his priſoner to their ghoſts (7): which was done. Thus you ſee what was the end of Caius Antonius, and how his death was revenged.

[C] Some believe . . . . that he had ſided with Julius Cæſar againſt Pompey] That which cauſes ſome difficulty here, is, that Hortenſius's ſon was at Laodicea in the year of Rome 702, and led a very ſcandalous life there (8). How then is it probable, will ſome ſay, that two years after he ſhould have raiſed himſelf ſo high in Cæſar's eſteem, that he ſhould entruſt him with the command of his army, the day that he deſigned to paſs the Rubicon, and poſſeſs himſelf of Ariminum, which was the leading ſtroke of that great affair, that was to determine the fate of the empire? Yet this he did to that Hortenſius who was in Cæſar's party (9). Some time after he gave him the command of a fleet upon the coaſts of Italy (10). We muſt not determine upon appearances.

I have not found in Eutropius what Glandorpius (11) pretends to have taken from his ſixth book, that Octavius and Libo, Pompey's lieutenants, defeated this fleet of Hortenſius. It is Oroſius who ſays it (12). However, Glandorpius will have Hortenſius, the orator's ſon, of whom Valerius ſpeaks ſo ill, to be the commander of that fleet. He goes upon good grounds in this; for Cicero (13) does not permit us to doubt, that this ſon of Hortenſius went over to Cæſar's party. I have not been able to find when he left it, nor how he obtained the proconſulſhip of Macedonia, a poſt, wherein he merited the applauſes of Cicero (14). Catanæus (15) confounding the father and the ſon, aſcribes to the orator the being in Pompey's party, and the putting to death Caius Antonius, and the having been put to death by Marc Antony.

[D] Q. HORTENSIUS CORBIO was a monſter of impurity and debauchery.] Valerius Maximus (16) giving a liſt of children that have verified the proverb, Heroum filii noxæ, forgets the ſon (17) but not the grandſon of Hortenſius. ‘Q. Hortenſii . . . . nepos Hortenſius Corbio omnibus ſcortis abjectiorem & obſceniorem vitam exegit, ad ultimumque lingua ejus tam libidini cunctorum inter lupanaria proſtitit, quàm avi pro ſalute civium in foro excubuerat. — Hortenſius Corbio, grand-ſon to Hortenſius, lived in a more vile and beaſtly manner, than the moſt abandoned women, and at laſt his tongue was as much proſtituted to the luſt of all men in the brothels, as that of his grand-father had been watchful in the Forum for the ſafety of the citizens.’ If Lipſius had remembered that this author ſpoke in the plural number of Hortenſius's grand-ſons in the ninth chapter of the fifth book, he would not have believed (18) that Hortenſius Hortalus, and Hortenſius Corbio were one and the ſame perſon. The character Tacitus gives the former, plainly diſtinguiſhes him from

---

(a) Cicero, Philipp. x.

(1) Epiſt. iii, lib. vi, ad Attic.

(2) Natura metuenda eſt: hæc Curionem, hæc Hortenſii filium non patrum culpa corrupit. Ibid. lib. x, Epiſt. iv.

(3) Illa Hortenſiana omnia fuere infantia: ita fiet homo nequiſſimus: à Salvio liberto depravatus eſt. Ibid. Epiſt. xviii.

(4) Ibid. Ep. iii, lib. vi.

(5) Valer. Maxim. lib. v, cap. ix, n. 2.

(6) Plutarch. in Catone min. pag. 784.

(7) Plutarch. in Bruto. See alſo Velleius Paterculus, lib. ii, cap. lxxi, who ſays, that the ſon of Hortenſius loſt his life in that war.

(8) Cicer. Ep. ad Attic. iii, lib. vi.

(9) Plut. in Cæſar. pag. 723.

(10) Appian lib. ii, Bell. Civil.

(11) Onomaſt. pag. 406.

(12) Lib. vi, cap. xv.

(13) Epiſt. ad Attic. iv, xvi, xvii, xviii, lib. x.

(14) Philipp. x.

(15) In Plin. Ep. lib. v.

(16) Lib. iii, cap. v.

(17) He ſpeaks of him upon another occaſion, as we have ſeen in the remark [A].

(18) Comment. in Tacit. Ann. lib. ii.

till Auguſtus gave him the means of maintaining a family (b). But that emperor's liberality not being ſufficient to ſupply the neceſſities of all the children that were born of that marriage, Hortalus begg'd the aſſiſtance of the ſenate [E]. Tiberius at firſt rejected this petition very harſhly; but afterwards perceiving that his ſeverity was diſliked by the ſenate, he ſaid that, if they deſired it, he would give a certain ſum to each of Hortalus's male-children (c) [F]. They thanked him for it, but Hortalus, either out of fear or greatneſs of ſoul, ſaid not a word; and from this time, Tiberius ſhewing him no favour, he by degrees fell into the moſt extreme poverty (d).

(b) Tacitus, Ann. lib. ii, cap. 37, 38.

(c) Docena ſeſtertia ſingulis qui ſexus virilis eſſent. Tacit. ibid. Ryckius makes it amount to 5000 Crowns.

(d) Egere alii grates; ſiluit Hortalus, pavore an avitæ nobilitatis etiam inter anguſtias fortunæ retinens. Neque miſeratus eſt poſthac Tiberius, quamvis domus Hortenſii pudendam ad inopiam dilaberetur. Tacit. Ann. lib. ii, cap. xxxviii.

from the later. Moreri and Hofman commit the ſame fault as Lipſius, ſince they cite Valerius Maximus chap. 5. book 3, Tacitus in the ſecond book of his annals, and Suetonius in the Life of Tiberius, with reſpect to Hortenſius's grandſon, who was extreamly debauched. Voſſius has miſled them, becauſe he refers thoſe three citations to a grand-ſon of Hortenſius, as if they had concerned the ſame perſon (19).

(19) Voſſius, de Hiſt. Latin. pag. 48.

[E] M. HORTENSIUS HORTALUS begged the aſſiſtance of the ſenate.] His ſpeech is in Tacitus (20): he brought with him his four little boys, and ſhewing them to the ſenate, intreated them to have ſome regard for the poſterity of ſo many conſuls, and ſo many dictators, En ſtirps & progenies tot Conſulum tot Dictatorum. Lipſius (21) thinks the hyperbole ſomewhat ſtrong, ſince the family of Hortenſius produced but one conſul, and one dictator. He endeavours to excuſe Hortalus, by ſaying that probably he had his mother's anceſtors in view. Ryckius (22) ſpeaks with more aſſurance, and lays it down as a thing undeniable, and is of opinion that Hortenſius had chiefly in view the Marcius Philippus's, from whoſe family, ſays he, Martia, Hortalus's grand-mother, deſcended. This laſt fact is by no means probable; for on one ſide, we find but one ſon of Hortenſius the orator; and this ſon was a grown man when Cicero paſſed through Laodicea in the year 702. On the other ſide, Cato could not be very young, when he parted with Martia to Hortenſius, ſince his daughter Portia had born already two children (23). But Cato died at forty eight years of age in the year 707 of Rome (24). If then we ſuppoſe, as it is very probable, that he was at leaſt 35 years old when he obliged Hortenſius with his wife, we muſt ſay that this marriage happened in the 694th year of Rome. It is not there poſſible that Hortenſius's ſon, whom Cicero ſaw in Laodicea, in the 702d year of Rome, ſhould be Martia's ſon. But we need not go upon a conjecture: there is a fact in Plutarch which decides the queſtion: Martia was ſtill Cato's wife during the expedition of Cyprus (25), that is, in the 696th year of Rome. It muſt not be diſſembled that Hortalus is called a young man by Tacitus in the 769th year of Rome, which would not very well agree with the ſuppoſition, that the only ſon of Hortenſius was that debauchee mentioned by Cicero, and Valerius Maximus, who died a little after the battle of Philippi in 712. But it is much more reaſonable to think, that Tacitus has not been ſo exact as to the age of Hortalus, than to cavil about the ſpeech which Valerius Maximus read, and Hortenſius ſpoke a little before his death. Now that ſpeech plainly ſuppoſes he had but one ſon: for if beſides this rake, who ſaluted Cicero in Laodicea, he had had any ſon by Martia, there had been no need of his making his grand-children his heirs, in default of his debauched ſon, and of Meſſala his nephew.

(20) Ann. lib. ii, cap. xxxvii.

(21) Comment. in Tacit.

(22) In Tacit. pag. 41.

(23) Plut. in Caton. min. pag. 770, 771.

(24) Ibid. pag. 794.

(25) Id. ibid. pag. 777.

[F] Tiberius . . . ſaid that . . . he would give . . . . to each of Hortalus's male-children.] This leaves room to believe that Hortalus only brought his four ſons with him, but that he left his a daughters behind; ſo that to ſpeak exactly, we muſt not ſay with Suetonius (26), that he had four children by his marriage; for if he had no more, Tacitus would make Tiberius guilty of an abſurdity. Neither do I think that, ſpeaking ſtrictly, we can ſay that Tiberius gave nothing to Hortalus (27). Did not he offer to give him a ſum, if the ſenate approved of it? was not he thanked for it? could he doubt of the favourable intention of the ſenate for that poor member? it is therefore highly probable that this ſum was given; but as it was the only liberality of that prince, it did not prevent the miſery of Hortalus. Let not Suetonius be urged (28), who pretends that the charities of Tiberius towards the poor ſenators, were annexed to ſome conditions, which excluded him from them. Theſe conditions, ſaid he, were, that he ſhould make his indigence appear to the ſenate (29): 'Quo pacto pleroſque modeſtia & pudore deterruit, in 'quibus Hortalum Q. Hortenſii oratoris nepotem. '—— By which means the greateſt part were hindered by ſhame and modeſty, and amongſt others Hortalus grand-ſon to the orator Hortenſius.' But it is not true that ſhame or modeſty hindered Hortenſius's grandſon from performing that condition: did not he confeſs his miſery? did not he carry his four ſons to deſire the ſenate to have compaſſion on them? did not he intreat the emperor to preſerve them from ſtarving? 'Nec ad invidiam iſta ſed conciliandæ 'miſericordiæ refero: adſequentur florente te, Cæ'ſar, quos dederis honores, interim Q. Hortenſii 'pronepotes, divi Auguſti alumnos ab inopia defende '(30). ———— Nor is this requeſt invidiouſly made, 'but to move pity. In the progreſs of your happy reign, 'Cæſar, theſe children may arrive at the places you 'will be pleaſed to honour them with; defend them 'in the mean time from want; they are the great grandſons of Hortenſius, they are foſter ſons of Auguſtus.' Achilles Statius (31), who ſays that our Hortalus is probably the perſon who is mentioned in the ſixty ſeventh epigram of Catullus, did not conſider that what he relates out of Tacitus, and we have juſt now ſeen, belongs to the year of Rome 769. It is true Catullus did not die in 697. Scaliger has ſolidly confuted that falſity of St Jerome; but there is no likelihood that he lived till 763. I have refuted Joſeph Scaliger upon this, in the article of CATULLUS. Certainly, Hortalus, mentioned by that antient poet, was rather Hortenſius than his grand-ſon; and I cannot but be amazed that Iſaac Voſſius in the ſame book (32), wherein he maintains againſt Scaliger, that Catullus died, in the 704th, or 705th year of Rome, ſhould pretend (33) that the Hortalus mentioned by that poet, is the ſame with him mentioned by Tacitus.

(26) In Tiber. cap. xlvii.

(27) This is ſaid in Moreri's Dictionary of the Dutch edition, at the word Hortalus.

(28) In Tiber. cap. xlvii.

(29) Tacitus, Ann. lib. i, cap lxxv, ſays the ſame.

(30) Tacit. Ann. lib. ii, cap. xxxvii.

(31) Notis, in Catull. Epig. lxvii.

(32) Obſervat. ad Catull. pag. 83.

(33) Pag. 252.

HORTENSIUS (JOHN) in French Des-Jardins, Phyſician to Francis I, was born near Laon in Picardy, being ſon of John Des-Jardins, governour of the caſtle of Hamelle in the dioceſe of Laon. He taught claſſical learning at Paris, in the college of cardinal le Moine, and afterwards applying himſelf to the ſtudy of Phyſic, he was made bachelor in that ſcience in the year 1514, a licentiate in the year 1517, and doctor in 1519. It appears by the regiſters of the univerſity of Paris, that he was regent-doctor in the year 1521, and dean of the faculty in 1524. As he underſtood Greek to perfection, he warmly exhorted his ſcholars to the ſtudy of that language; and that every body might be in a capacity of conſulting Galen in the original, he made a preſent of a Greek edition of that antient Phyſician to the library of that faculty; for at that time the Phyſicians at Paris had a public library in their ſchools (a). He got ſuch a reputation, that he was thought able to cure all ſorts of diſeaſes, provided the fatal hour was not come (b). That was the only exception [A], ſo that this proverb was commonly applied to him, Contra

(a) Hemeræus, Diſſert. de Acad. Pariſienſi.

(b) Bulæus, Hiſtoria Academ Pariſ.

[A] That was the only exception.] Vulgarly ſpeaking, this was ſaying a great deal; but at bottom it was to except a great deal; for if death does not interpoſe, there is no diſtemper but a Phyſician may cure; nature itſelf is then

Contra vim mortis non eſt medicamen in hortis (c). We find him commended in many books [B]; but as for himſelf, he printed nothing; nor have we any poſthumous work of his. He married Joan Bourdin in 1520, and Mary le Tellier in 1541. He left ſeven children by the firſt, and four by the later. Their ſettlements they had [C], and the real eſtate he left, are a proof that he had gained a great deal of money. He died ſuddenly of an apoplexy, as he was entertaining his relations and friends on his birth-day in 1547. This occaſioned a fine ſonnet of Des-Portes [D], which I will give intire in the remarks. Mr Menage, who deſcended from John Des-Jardins by the mother's ſide [E], has wrote his life (d). We have taken this article from thence.

(c) He was called in Latin Hortenſius, or de Hortis.

(d) It is in Latin, in the volume he publiſhed at Paris in the year 1675, in 4to, containing the Lives of Peter Ayrault, William Menage, &c. with ſeveral remarks.

then ſufficient for the work. However according to our way judging of things, by repreſenting to our ſelves abundance of very poſſible conditions, which may change the chain and courſe of events, it is to give a great idea of a Phyſician, to ſay, that if a greater force does not interpoſe, he will reſtore a ſick man's health. This makes me remember a too hardy expreſſion of I do not know what admiral, who being ready to engage in very favourable circumſtances, and after having taken all proper meaſures, ſaid they were ſure of victory, if GOD would ſtand neuter, and leave both parties to themſelves.

[B] We find him commended in many books.] Mr Menage (1) cites Arnaud d'Oſſat, in his Expoſition againſt James Charpentier; Renatus Moreau, in the Life of James Sylvius; du Boulay, in the Hiſtory of the Univerſity of Paris; Lewis d'Orleans, in the Human Plant; Peter Ayrault, in his books de Ordine judiciario; John Vaſſe (2), in an Epiſtle Dedicatory.

[C] The ſettlements his children had.] Mr Menage has theſe words (3). Prædivitem fuiſſe, ut tum erant tempora, teſtantur & ejus ædes plurimæ, & prædia multa & liberi undecim, qui nido majores pennas, ut Flacci verbis utar, extenderunt. From the particular account of theſe eleven children, it appears that the daughters were married to perſons of diſtinction; one to William Verſoris, counſellor in the Chatelet, the ſon of John Verſoris, a famous advocate in the parliament of Paris; another to John Matayer, counſellor of the exchequer; a third to Peter Ayrault, lieutenant-criminal at Angers. One of the ſons was a counſellor in the Chatelet; another was canon of Senlis; a third was counſellor of the exchequer. He that was counſellor in the Chatelet, left a ſon who had the ſame office, was echevin at Paris in 1600, and left a ſon, who had, amongſt other children, the wife of Denis Godefroy, Hiſtoriographer of France. There remained amongſt John Des-Jardins's deſcendants but one perſon (4) who bore his name, when Mr Menage wrote his book.

[D] His death . . . . . gave occaſion to a fine ſonnet of Des-Portes.] The reader will not be diſpleaſed to ſee it. Here Father Vavaſſeur has tranſlated into Latin, and Mr Menage has made an epigram upon the ſame thought (5).

Après avoir ſauvé par mon art ſecourable
  Tant de corps languiſſans que la mort menaçoit,
  Et chaſſé la rigueur du mal qui les preſſoit,
  Gagnant comme Eſculape un nom toujours durable.
Cette fatale ſœur, cruelle, inexorable,
  Voyant que mon pouvoir le ſien amoindriſſoit;
  Un jour que ſon courroux contre moi la pouſſoit;
  Finit quant & mes jours mon labeur profitable.
PASSANT, moi qui pouvois les autres ſecourir,
  Ne dis point qu'au beſoin je ne me pus guerir,
  Car la mort qui doutoit l'effort de ma ſcience,
  Ainſi que je prenois ſobrement mon repas,
  Me prit en trahiſon, ſain & ſans defiance,
  Ne me donnant loiſir de penſer au trepas.

Long had I flouriſh'd in the godlike art
To ward the threats of death, and health impart;
From num'rous patients heal'd had gain'd a name,
And ſettled, Eſculapius-like, my fame.
Th' inexorable ſiſter ſaw each hour
Leſſen her conqueſts, and decreaſe her pow'r;
And jealous of my rival proweſs grown,
She ſtop'd my triumphs, to ſecure her own.
Yet ſay not, paſſenger, who hear'ſt this tale,
To heal myſelf my art cou'd not avail:
Death, when my thoughts were otherwiſe employ'd,
Seiz'd an unguarded hour, and all my art deſtroy'd.

[E] Mr Menage was deſcended from John Des-Jardins by the mother's ſide.] Peter Ayrault, grandfather by the mother's ſide to Mr Menage, married Anne Des-Jardins, daughter of our Hortenſius, and of Mary le Tellier his ſecond wife, who was of the ſame family, from which chancellor le Tellier deſcended (6).

---

(1) Remarques ſur la Vie de Pierre Ayrault, pag. 150.

(2) Ei præterea & Martino Acaciæ & Michaëli Dumontio, Medicis Pariſienſibus doctiſſimis interpretationem librorum Hippocratis & Galeni de victus ratione in morbis acutis nuncupavit Johannes Vaſſæus Medicus & ipſe Pariſienſis doctiſſimus. Menag. in eodem volumine, pag. 512.

(3) Ib. pag. 514.

(4) Petrum Hortenſium militem ſtrenuum, qui Margaretam de Gravella uxorem ſibi adjunxit Ibid. pag. 517.

(5) All this is to be found, ibid. pag. 514. The Sonnet is at pag. 510.

(6) Menage, Remarq. ſur la Vie de P. Ayrault, pag. 515, 517.

HORTENSIUS (LAMBERT) born at Montfort in the province of Utrecht, the firſt day of April 1518 [A], has been ranked among the learned of his age. He ſtudied at Louvain the learned languages with an extream application, under excellent maſters, and heard alſo Vives's lectures upon Logic. He publiſhed in Latin verſe a tranſlation of Ariſtophanes's Plutus, with notes, where he ſhewed the progreſs he had made in the Greek tongue. He publiſhed many other books [B]. He taught ſchool a long time at Naerden in Holland, and very nearly eſcaped with his life when that town was ſacked by the Spaniards in 1572, under the conduct of Frederic de Toledo, ſon to the duke of Alva. His houſe was plunder'd, and his natural ſon killed before his eyes (a), and he himſelf was going to be killed, notwithſtanding his being a prieſt, but by good luck a gentleman (b) who had been his ſcholar, and then bore arms in the Spaniſh ſervice, came in very ſeaſonably to ſave his life. It is obſerved, that his only care was to ſave from the common wreck his comment upon Lucan's Pharſalia. He wrote a deſcription of the (a) Occiſo in oculis filio ſuo naturali. Valer. Andr. Bibl. Belg. pag. 613. But obſerve that Brandt in his Dutch Hiſtory of the Reformation, ad ann. 1584, pag 702, 703, ſpeaks of Jerom Hortenſius, miniſter at the Hague, and then at Waſſenaer, who he ſays was Lambert's ſon.

(b) His name was Weldam.

[A] He was born at Montfort the firſt day of April 1518.] In this I diſagree with my author Valerius Andreas, who ſays he was born in the year 1500. He was deceived doubtleſs by theſe words of Swertius (1), Naſcitur anno CIↃ. IↃ. XVIII. Kal. Aprilis: he thought the numeral letters XVIII, referred to the word Kalends, for want of remembering that there is not in the Roman Calender, any eighteenth day, before the Calends of April. But this is not the only reaſon that determined me to join XVIII to the preceeding letters; I have been moved to that by another conſideration; Valerius Andreas ſays, that Hortenſius was very young (2) when he went to ſtudy at Louvain under Rutgerus Reſcius, profeſſor of the the Greek tongue: now he ſays in another place (3), that Reſcius died in 1545, which was the ſeventeenth year of his profeſſorſhip; ſo that he began it only in 1528. How then could Hortenſius ſtudy under this profeſſor when he was very young, if he was born in the year 1500? but if he was born in the year 1518, all is eaſy reconciled. Paul Freherus (4) is miſtaken, both in the year of his birth and of his death; for he ſays that Lambert Hortenſius was born in the year 1501, and died in 1577.

[B] We have many books of his.] Theſe are the titles of them; Enarrationes in Virgilii Æneida, in Fol. Explanationes in Lucani Pharſaliam, printed at Baſil in the year 1578, in Fol. Satyrarum in ævi ſui the plundering and ſlaughter of Naerden; the manuſcript whereof is at Utrecht. He ſcarce ſurvived that deſolation, for he died in 1573 (c) near Naerden, in (d) a country houſe (e).

---

(1) Athen. Belg. pag. 508.

(2) Admodum adoleſcens, pag. 613.

(3) Pag. 805.

(4) In Theatro, pag. 1473. Konig ſays alſo, that he was born in 1501.

(c) Anno à laniena quæ ſoli propter doctrinam ſingularem parſerat altero, à nato Chriſto MDLXXIII. See the epitaph which thoſe of Naerden ordered to be made for him in the church of St Vitus. Valerius Andreas has it.

(d) Freberus, in his Theatrum, pag. 1473, ſays, in præſidio ſub ſuburbano. It ſhould be prædio.

(e) Ex Valer. Andrea, Bibl. Belg. pag. 613.

ſui vitia & mores libri II. Epithalamiorum liber I. Seceſſionum civilium Ultrajectinarum libri VII. De Bello Germanico à Carolo V. Cæſare geſto libri VII. Tumultuum Anabaptiſtarum liber I. (5).

(5) I have quoted that book in the remark [B] of the article PICARDS. I add here, that it was reprinted at Amſterdam, in 1636, with the Hiſtoria Anabaptiſtica de factione Monaſterienſi of Conrad. Hereſbachius, by the the care of Theodorus Strackius, miniſter of Burik in the country of Cleves.

HORTENSIUS (MARTIN) a native of Delft in Holland, and profeſſor of Mathematics at Amſterdam, would have made a greater progreſs in that ſcience, if he had not died in the flower of his age (a) in the year 1639 [A]. The preface which he prefixed to a book of Philip Lanſbergius, which he tranſlated into Latin, and in which he makes ſtrong objections againſt Tycho Brahe's ſyſtem, ſhews how he cultivated the ſtudy of Aſtronomy; in which he was aſſiſted by Lanſbergius's converſation, to whom Beekman, rector of the ſchool of Dort, a man very much ſpoken of in Des Cartes's hiſtory, recommended him. That book of Lanſbergius is intituled Commentationes in motum terræ diurnum & annuum, & in verum aſpectabilis cœli typum, and was printed at Middleburg in the year 1630, in 4to. Hortenſius has alſo tranſlated the Aſtronomical Inſtitution of William Blaeuw, and writ a diſſertation de Mercurio ſub Sole viſo & Venere inviſa, dedicated to Gaſſendus, and an anſwer to what Kepler had prefixed to his Almanack in 1624 (b). Gaſſendus's letters to him, ſhew the particular eſteem he had for him. Hortenſius's letters to Gaſſendus are printed among thoſe of that famous Philoſopher. From them I learned that he was born in 1605 (c), and that he was admitted profeſſor at Amſterdam in the year 1634 (d). He did not ſeem to be contented with his condition; and he ſpeaks (e) of the ſpirit that reigned in that famous town, like a man vexed and inraged that they did not come to his lectures, nor encouraged the making of thoſe machines he had contrived, from which he expected a ſucceſs above all that Tycho Brahe had done (f). We have ſome orations of his, one de utilitate & dignitate Matheſeos, and another de Oculo ejuſque præſtantia. He ſays in one of his letters to Gaſſendus (g), that the impreſſion of his anſwer to the book which Peter Bartholinus had publiſhed againſt him in defence of Tycho Brahe, was only put off for want of paper. Probably that work kept company with the Pleiadographia (h); which remained in manuſcript among the papers of the ſame author when he died. Des Cartes does not ſpeak advantageouſly of his ability. As for the ſchool-profeſſors, ſays he (i), not one of them underſtands my Geometry; no not Golius, much leſs Hortenſius, who has not made a ſufficient progreſs for that.

(a) Valer. Andr. Bibl. Belg. pag. 652.

(b) See Voſſius, de Scient. Math. pag. 201, 202.

(c) Oper. Gaſſ. pag. 418, Tom. VI.

(d) Ibid pag. 422.

(e) Ib. pag. 429.

(f) Ibid. pag. 425. Vide etiam pag. 429, & pag. 432.

(g) Pag. 129.

(h) Valer. Andr. Biblioth. Belg. pag. 652.

(i) Letters, Tom. III, pag. 191.

[A] He died in the year 1639.] I have not followed Valerius Andreas here, who ſays he died in the year 1640. That which induced me not to follow him is a paſſage of Des Cartes, which deſerves to be copied: I take it from one of his letters to Father Merſennus (1) which tho' it be not dated, yet it ſolidly fixes the date which I have occaſion for, ſince in the very firſt lines the author acquaints us, that he wrote in anſwer to a letter of the laſt of December 1639. This is what I thought proper to copy of it: 'Hortenſius being ſome years ago in Italy ſet about 'making the ſcheme of his nativity, and told two young 'men of this country who were with him, that he 'ſhould die in the year 1639, and as for them they 'ſhould not live long after. Now he dying this ſum'mer as you know, theſe two young men fell into 'ſuch fears that one of them is already dead, and the 'other, who is the ſon of Heinſius (2), languiſheth in 'ſuch a manner, and is ſo melancholy, that he ſeems 'to do all that is poſſible to verify the Aſtrologer's 'prediction. Here is a fine ſcience indeed, which 'ſerves to kill people, who perhaps would not have 'been ſick without it.' It would be wrong to object to me that Des Cartes might have written this letter after the ſummer of the year 1640, and conſequently that he does not contradict Valerius Andreas; for his correſpondence by letters with Father Merſennus was ſo frequent, that this objection muſt needs be falſe. But beſides, I find in a letter of Boxhornius (3), dated the thirteenth of September 1639, that he laments the loſs of Hortenſius, who was lately dead.

(1) It is the 35th of the ſecond volume, in the edition of 1659.

(2) It is doubtleſs Nicolas Heinſius, who did not die till 1681. Mr Baillet ſays the contrary, pretending that Heinſius had two ſons, and that he whom Des Cartes ſpeaks of, actually died, and that his name was Daniel.

(3) Vide Epiſtolas Boxhornii, pag. 144. Edit. Francof. 1679.

HOSIUS (STANISLAUS) cardinal and biſhop of Warmia, was one of the moſt ingenious men that Poland has produced: he was born at Cracow in the year 1504. You will find in Moreri (a) an account of his actions, and of the honours he arrived to: It was not thought, when he was one of the preſidents of the council, that he had all the addreſs that ſuch a ſtation required [A]. His books of controverſy are not inferior to

(a) And better ſtill in Bullart's Academie des Sciences, Tom. I, pag 64, and following.

[A] It was not thought, when he was one of the preſidents of the council, that he had all the addreſs that ſuch a ſtation required.] The cardinal of Mantua dying the ſecond of March 1563, his colleagues, who preſided with him in the council, wrote immediately to the Pope. He who was the firſt preſident (1), deſired that a legate might be ſent that ſhould be above him. Hoſius deſired that he might have leave to go into Poland: but Simoneta adviſed the Pope not to ſend a new legate to Trent, hoping thereby to obtain the direction, not only becauſe cardinal Seripande was weary of the council, and had no inclination to direct it any longer, but becauſe cardinal Hoſius was a plain man, who was eaſily governed. Simoneta deſideroſo che la ſomma di guidare il Concilio reſtaſſe à lui, & havendo ſperanza di condurlo bene, con ſodisfattione del Pontefice, & honor proprio; conſiderando che Seripando era ſatiato di quel negotio, & poco inclinato a volerlo guidare, & che Varmienſe era ſemplice perſona, diſpoſta à laſciarſi reggere; miſe in conſideratione al Pontefice, che, ritrovandoſi le coſe del Concilio, &c. (2). Mr Amelot has not well tranſlated theſe words, as any one may eaſily perceive. Here follows his verſion: 'Simoneta earneſtly deſiring the direction, and hoping 'to

(1) It was cardinal Seripande.

(2) Fra-Paolo, Iſtoria del Concilio di Trento, lib. vii, pag. m. 603. Compare with this the paſſage of the ſixth book, pag. 548. It is the 517*th page in Amelot's tranſlation.*

to the beſt that were written in that age. Caſaubon has juſtly accuſed him [B] of having made an apology for a controverſiſt, who had ſaid, that without the authority of the church, the holy Scripture has no more weight than Æſop's Fables. The Jeſuit who has cenſured Caſaubon upon this account, has only ſhewn his own ignorance (b). Hoſius died near Rome the fifth of Auguſt 1579. Moreri has committed ſome miſtakes [C].

It

‘to obtain it to his honour, and the Pope's ſatisfaction; repreſented to him that the poſture of affairs being but ill, the leaſt novelty would make them go worſe, ſo that he ſaw no occaſion for ſending another legate: that Seripande loving his repoſe, and being not inclinable to direct the council; and Hoſius being a man of no addreſs and wholly governed by others, he offered himſelf in their place, undertaking to ſteer the veſſel like a skillful pilot (3).' I. the original does not import that Hoſius was wholly governed by others. II. It is not true that Simoneta wrote to the Pope, that Hoſius was a man of no addreſs. He thought ſo indeed, and built upon it: but he did not communicate that thought to the Pope. Father Paul clearly diſtinguiſhes what was thought from what was written by him. The tranſlator ſhould have followed that diſtinction.

Note, that cardinal Palavicini (4) pretends to prove by authentic pieces, that what Father Paul advances concerning the ambitious artifices of Simoneta, is falſe.

[B] Caſaubon has juſtly accuſed him, &c. . . . . .] Let us follow the progreſs of this diſpute, and begin with the words of this great critic (5): ‘Verbo Dei viventis ſcripto minus etiam tribuit (Scioppius in Eccleſiaſtico, cap. 135. quam ſive Pighius, ſive alius qui dixit Patrum memoria: Scripturam ſi auctoritate Eccleſiæ deſtituatur, non plus per ſe valere quàm fabulas Æſopi. Quod blaſphemum dictum poſtea defendere auſus eſt Cardinalis Hoſius. —— He (Scioppius in Eccleſiaſtico) gives leſs authority to the written word of the living GOD, than either Pighius, or another, who in the days of our fathers ſaid: That if the Scriptures were deprived the authority of the church, they would of themſelves be of no more value than Æſop's Fables. Which blaſphemous ſaying cardinal Hoſius has dared to defend.' The Jeſuit Eudæmon-Johannes maintained, that it was a calumny forged by Brentius, and pretended to prove it thus. ‘Jam verò quando non memorat, neque quis Æſopicæ hujus fabulæ auctor ſit, neque quo loco eam Hoſius defenderit, vel ne convinci impoſturæ poſſet, vel quod in aliquo alio rem eam legerat, & auctorem & calumniam ex Hoſio detegam: videant deinde lectores, quàm bona fide infideles iſti fidei patroni diſputent. Is igitur lib 3. in prolegomena Brentii, ipſo ferè initio; Magna pars, inquit, libelli [prologomenorum Brentii] non aliunde conſtant, quàm è ſannis, dicteriis, conviciis, in quo ſic etiam ludit Scripturis, ſic eas tractat jocu lariter: ut verè de ipſo dici poſſit, quod venerabili viro Petro à Soto falſo impingit, eum haud aliter Scripturis, quàm Æſopi fabulis uti. Non eſt igitur ea Catholici cujuſquam Scriptoris vox; ſed calumnia Brentii: quam vir illuſtriſſimus falſo in virum doctiſſimum excogitatam, in auctorem ipſum verè convenire defendit (6). —— But ſince he doth not tell us, either who is the author of this Æſopic Fable, nor in what place Hoſius has defended it, and this leaſt he ſhould be convicted of an impoſture, or that he had read this ſtory of ſome other perſon, I ſhall ſhow both the author of it and the calumny from Hoſius himſelf: and then let the reader judge, how ingenuouſly theſe faithleſs defenders of the faith argue. Hoſius therefore in the third book againſt the Prolegomena of Brentius, near the beginning, ſays, The greateſt part of this book [the Prolegomena of Brentius] conſiſts only of buffoonry, jokes, and reproaches; in which likewiſe he ſo plays with the Holy Scriptures, and treats them in ſo burleſque a manner, that we may truly ſay of him, what he falſly alledges againſt the reverend Peter de Soto, that he uſeth the Scriptures in the ſame manner one would uſe Æſop's Fables. This therefore is not a ſaying of any Catholic writer, but a calumny of Brentius; which our illuſtrious author ſhows to be falſly invented againſt a very learned man, and properly to belong to the inventor himſelf.' Here we find four things. I. A complaint that Caſaubon has not marked in what part of Hoſius's works he found this. II. That Brentius accuſes Soto of uſing the ſcriptures as Æſop's Fables. III. That Hoſius maintains, that this accuſation is a ſlander with reſpect to Soto, but moſt true with reſpect to Brentius. IV. That theſe words of Hoſius occaſioned the ſcandalous reflection mentioned by Caſaubon. The firſt of theſe four things is juſt. The careleſſneſs of thoſe who do not quote the particular chapter in an accuſation of importance cannot be too much blamed: great authors are moſt liable to this fault: they think they ſhall be believed on their own word, and ſo will not give themſelves the trouble of quoting: they think it enough to ſay, Plutarch, Cicero, St Auguſtin, ſay this. Abundance of readers had rather take it upon truſt, or remain dubious, than take the pains to verify it. Tho' Caſaubon had no real deſign to hinder any one from diſcovering whether his accuſation was falſe or no, yet he has left room for that ſuſpicion: why did he quote in ſo looſe a manner? the ſecond and third things are undeniable facts (7), but they ſignify nothing to this diſpute. The fourth is a notable blunder of the Jeſuit, as I ſhall prove in what follows.

The confidence with which he accuſes Caſaubon of calumniating cardinal Hoſius, raiſeth a certain prejudice to the diſadvantage of this critic; but when we ſee Caſaubon's apologiſts ſtop ſhort, and coldly confeſs he has no book of Hoſius (8), we are inclinable to believe that Eudæmon-Johannes is well founded in his accuſation. Can one eaſily believe that a miniſter, who undertakes the confutation of Caſaubon's cenſurer, ſhould not ſeek for Hoſius's books till he finds them? is it ſo hard a matter to find them? one therefore ſuſpects that this confeſſion of his want of them is a ſubterfuge, invented on purpoſe that he may not be obliged to own the cardinal's innocence. But be in no fear for Caſaubon: he charges Hoſius with nothing but what is moſt true. ‘Fingamus autem nunc verum eſſe, (they are Hoſius's words (9) in the ſame book that Eudæmon-Joannes cites) quod tu ſcripſiſſe neſcio quem narras, nam nomen non exprimis, ac fieri poteſt ut ſit commentum tuum, Scripturas valere quantùm fabulas Æſopi, ſi deſtituantur autoritate Eccleſiæ. Cedo Brenti, num hic minus reverentur de Scripturis loquutus eſt, quam qui vocat eam librum Hæreticorum (10), cùm tamen nullorum ſit minùs quàm Hæreticorum: eſt enim Catholicorum propria, qui tot ſeculis in ejus poſſeſſione præſcripſerunt. Et potuit illud tamen pio ſenſu dici, quem homo pius, qui charitatem habet quæ non cogitat malum, ex iis verbis eliceret. Nam revera, niſi nos Eccleſiæ doceret autoritas hanc ſcripturam eſſe canonicam, perexiguum apud nos pondus haberet. —— Let us ſuppoſe that this is true, which you pretend ſome body or other has wrote, for you name no body, and poſſibly it may be an invention of your own, that the Scriptures are of no more value than Æſop's Fables, if you deprive them of the authority of the church. Pray, Brentius, has this perſon ſpoke with leſs reverence of the Scriptures, than he did who calls them the book of Heretics, when indeed it belongs to none leſs than to them: for it is the property of the Catholics, who have a right to it by the poſſeſſion of ſo many ages. Aud yet theſe words might have been ſaid in a pious ſenſe, which a good man, who has charity, and thinketh no evil, may draw out of them. For indeed if the authority of the church did not teach us that this is the Canonical Scripture, it would have very little weight with us.'

[C] Mr Moreri has committed ſome miſtakes.] I. It was not to Pavia, but to Padua, that Hoſius's relations ſent him to ſtudy. Moreri might have diſcovered his miſtake, if he had known that Lazarus Bonamici, whom he makes Hoſius's maſter, was profeſſor at Padua. Du Sauſſai (11) ſuppoſes, that Hoſius being ſent into Italy by the advice of Peter Thomici, biſhop of Cracow, ſtopped at Bologna. He ſhould have ſaid that Hoſius having ſtudied at Padua ſome time, went to Bologna, and was there admitted doctor of law. ‘Patavii, dein Bononiæ . . . . . Juriſprudentiæ induſtriam primo addixerat, & lauream

ſub

(b) See the remark [B].

(3) Hiſt. du Concile de Trente, pag. 657, 658. Amſterdam Edit. 1686.

(4) Hiſtor. Concil Trident. lib. xx, cap. vi, n. 6.

(5) Caſaubon. in Baronium, Exercit. i, cap. xxxiii, pag. m. 134.

(6) Andr. Eudæmon-Joannes, caſtigat. Exercit. Iſaaci Caſauboni, lib. ii, cap v, pag. 147.

(7) The words of Hoſius quoted by by Eudæmon-Joannes, are to be found in the third book againſt Brentius's Prolegomena, pag. 196. Edit, Colon. 1551, in fol.

(8) Si nihil gravius dixit Hoſius, erit hæc in Brentium calumnia, non in Spiritum S. blaſphemia. Ego Pighii, Hoſii nihil habeo, nec Hermanni, cui blaſphemam hanc Scripturæ cum Æſopi fabulis comparationem tribuentes viros magnos audivi. Jacob. Capellus, Vindic. Iſ. Caſaub. lib. iii, cap. v, pag. 78.

(9) Hoſius, lib. iii, in Prolegom. Brentii, pag. 230, 231.

(10) Hoſius had been ſaying, that Luther calls the Holy Scripture the book of Heretics. Gretſerus obſerves it likewiſe, Proleg. Exam. Myſterii Pleſſaani, pag. 90, and quotes Luther's words, ex Poſtil. Eccleſ. Domin. 8. poſt. Trin.

(11) Continuat. de Script Eccleſ, cap. xxxii, pag. m. 23.

It has been thought, that this cardinal was the author of an anonymous book, very injurious to the Swiſs, which was confuted by Bullinger in the preface to Joſiah Simler's tract de æterno Dei filio (c).

It is certain (d) that he wrote the anonymous piece I am going to mention. He compoſed it the year 1564, and intituled it Judicium & Cenſura de Judicio & Cenſura Miniſtrorum Tigurinorum & Heidelbergenſium de dogmate contra adorandam Trinitatem in Polonia nuper ſparſo. It has been inſerted in the collection of his works (e) and I do not doubt but it is in the editions which the author himſelf publiſhed. I believe the moſt compleat edition of his works it that of 1584 [D]. It contains a volume of poſthumous works, among which there are many letters of Hoſius, wherein he frequently repeats the ſame things, to wit, that Heretics ought to be extirpated, and that their diviſions ſufficiently ſhow the injuſtice of their pretended reformation. He had read with great care the books which the Zuinglians and Lutherans had publiſhed againſt one another, and thoſe concerning the violent diſputes which had aroſe among the Lutherans. He is inceſſantly drawing odious concluſions from them, and he very ſubtily takes advantages from this, that theſe new doctors publiſhed books in defence of penal laws againſt thoſe who erred, and that the ſtrongeſt ſide in the ſchiſms among the Lutherans, baniſhed, impriſoned, &c. the other.

‘ ſub ipſo Hugone Boncompagno qui S. S. Gregorii XIII nomine dein præfuit, poſtremo adeptus eſt (12). —— He began the ſtudy of the Law at Padua, and afterwards ſtudied at Bologna, and at laſt received the doctor's degree from Hugh Boncompagno, who was afterwards Pope, by the name of Gregory XIII.’ This ſhews the ſecond falſity of Moreri; who ſays that Hoſius received his doctor's degree at Padua. III. He ‘ was made biſhop of Culm, at the inſtance of king Sigiſmund I.’ Theſe words of Moreri imply another falſity; for it was Sigiſmund Auguſtus who procured him that biſhopric. IV. How could Sigiſmund I. ſend him to Rome to Pope Julius III. He died in 1548, whereas this Pope was not created till 1550. V. He ſhould not have ſaid, that retiring into Poland after the concluſion of the council, he writ thoſe admirable works that remain of his: for this ſignifies, that he wrote no books before; whereas it is certain, that his anſwer to Brentius was printed at Cologne, in 1558. It is a work of four hundred pages in Folio. His book, intituled, Confeſſio Catholicæ Fidei Chriſtiana (13), was publiſhed before that at Mentz. His books de Communione ſub utraque ſpecie, de Sacerdotum conjugio, and de Miſſa vulgari lingua celebranda, were printed at Paris, in 1561 (14). Du Sauſſai (15) deſerves here a little cenſure; for he reckons moſt of theſe works among the books which Hoſius publiſhed after the council of Trent. VI. Moreri ſhould not have have ſaid in general, that Hoſius's books were printed thirty two times before he died. He ſhould, as Mr Bullart does, have made ſome exceptions. Several of his writings, ſays he (16), were printed two and thirty times in his life-time, in the principal cities of Chriſtendom, and tranſlated into French, Italian, German, Flemiſh, Poliſh, Engliſh, Scotch, and Armenian. Mr de la Rochepozai (17) is wrong in making no exception. See the following remark.

I have not taken notice of what Moreri ſays about the reaſons that obliged cardinal Hoſius not to be preſent at the twenty fourth ſeſſion. He pretends it was becauſe he diſapproved the deciſion, made concerning clandeſtine marriages: it is very true, that he did not like that deciſion, and that he endeavoured three or four times to get it revoked, for which reaſon he was taxed with obſtinacy (18), but it is not certain, that his abſence was grounded upon the reaſon which Moreri aſſigns. For he aſſiſted at the ſeſſion before, tho' he diſapproved ſome things which were determined there about the ſacrifice of the maſs: he made no ſcruple to oppoſe them. Why then durſt he not do as much as to clandeſtine marriages? would he not have been ſeconded by his colleague cardinal Simoneta, and ſome others? did he not ſend in writing, his opinion, which was contrary to the decree? did he not declare in writing, that he referred all that to the judgment of the holy father? In a word, his ſickneſs was not counterfeited, and laſted a long time. Thus you have moſt of the reaſons that Palavicini makes uſe (19) to refute a ſtory adopted by Father Paul, that Hoſius pretended to be ſick, that he might not be preſent at the ſeſſion, in which the decree for clandeſtine marriages was to be ratified. There is ſometimes reaſon to ſay, that the ſickneſſes of great men are affected, and only politic grimaces, But hiſtorians too ſpeculative, are likewiſe ſometimes miſtaken in ſaying ſo.

[D] I believe the compleateſt edition of his works is that of 1584.] It was printed at Cologn by Maternus Cholin, and makes two volumes in Folio. The firſt contains the works formerly publiſhed, but here you have them as they were laſt reviſed by the author. The ſecond volume conſiſts altogether of pieces which had not been printed before, and which were collected by Staniſlaus Reſcius, who dedicates them to Stephen Battori king of Poland. His Epiſtle Dedicatory is dated from Rome, September 1. 1582. By the manner in which Mr Crenius ſpeaks (20) of the Treatiſe intituled Judicium & Cenſura &c. I conclude that it is not in the Antwerp edition of 1566 in Folio, but I am perſuaded that it is in the edition of Venice which the author himſelf dedicated to Pope Gregory XIII on the fifteenth of Auguſt 1573. He had reviſed and augumented his works for this edition. He dedicates the firſt Treatiſe to Henry of Valois king of Poland, and dates the Epiſtle Dedicatory on the ſame day with that of the whole volume. The firſt Treatiſe is intituled Confeſſio Catholicæ Fidei Chriſtianæ. The author had wrote part of it three and twenty years before, and having ſent it to Rome by the archbiſhop of Gneſna, it was ſo much approved of, that cardinal Otho Truchſes, biſhop of Augsburg, printed it in his own town of Dillingen. What was wanting being added, the whole work was printed at Mentz by the care of the archbiſhop of Gneſna. There ſoon followed other editions. Hoſius's name did not as yet appear to it, and was not put to it, till Ruard Tapper deſired the author to put his name, becauſe it was uſual in Germany to diſcourage the ſale of anonymous books (21). This has been the beſt received of any of Hoſius's works. Pope Pius IV made Paul Manutius reprint it at Rome (22): if there is no hyperbole in the thirty two editions which they mention (23), it muſt principally relate to this piece. Reſcius extends it to all Hoſius's works which he had publiſhed. ‘ Ipſo etiam Authore vivente bis & trigeſies in præcipuis Chriſtiani Orbis urbibus, Latinâ, Germanicâ, Gallicâ, Flandricâ Linguâ omnes Hoſii Libri typis excuſi, in Polonicam etiam & Italicam tranſlati videbantur, & fortaſſe etiam in Armenicam, ſicut ex ſermone viri cujuſdam in hac urbe illuſtriſſimi accepimus (24). —— During the author's own life, all Hoſius's works were printed thirty two times in the chief cities of Chriſtendom, in the Latin, German, French, and Flemiſh languages, and tranſlated into the Poliſh and Italian, and poſſibly into the Armenian, as I have been informed by a famous man in this city.’ But his Poſthumous Works, conſiſting of a large volume in Folio, being to be excepted, I had reaſon to condemn Moreri's general expreſſion.

(c) See Hottinger in Pentade Diſſert. Miſcell. pag. 214.

(d) Mr Crenius, part XII of his Animadv. pag. 65, only ſays, It is reported.

(e) From page 669 to 707, of the firſt Tome of the Cologn edition. My copy has in the title the year 1639.

(12) Thuan. lib. lxviii, ſub fin. pag. m. 297.

(13) See the preface of his anſwer to Brentius's Prolegomena.

(14) Oldoinus, in Athen. Romano, pag. 615.

(15) In Contin. de Scriptor. Eccleſiaſt pag. 23.

(16) Bullart, Academ. des Sciences, Tom. I, pag. 70.

(17) In Nomenclatore Cardinalium, pag. 151.

(18) Palavic. Hiſtor. Concil. Trident. lib. xxii, cap. ix, n. 6.

(19) Ibid. lib. xxiii, cap. vii, n. 17.

(20) Crenius, Animadv. part. XII, pag. 65.

(21) Taken from Hoſius's dedication to Henry of Valois, king of Poland.

(22) See the ſame epiſtle dedicat.

(23) See the preceding remark, citation (16).

(24) Stan. Reſcius, Epiſt Ded. Tom. II, Oper. Hoſii, folio 3, verſo. Edit. Colon. apud Cholinum, 1584.

HOSPINIAN.

HOSPINIAN (Rodolphus) is one of the greateſt authors of Swiſſerland. He was born at Altorf, a village of the county of Kiburg, in the canton of Zurich, the 7th of November 1547, and at ſeven years of age he was ſent to Zurich to begin his ſtudies. He made a great progreſs in them, under the direction of John Wolphius (a), his uncle by his mother; and loſing his father (b) in the year 1563, he found a moſt affectionate patron in Rodolphus Gualterus (c) his godfather. He left Zurich to viſit the other univerſities in March 1565, and ſtaid two years at Marpurg, where he diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his great application to ſtudy, and his good conduct. He did the ſame at Heidelberg the ſix months he ſpent there; after which, his ſuperiors recalled him, and he was received into the miniſtry in 1568. He was obliged to go and preach twice a week in a country church four or five leagues from Zurich. He punctually diſcharged theſe duties for eight years together, though he had a great deal of other buſineſs upon his hands in that town. For he was made a teacher of the third claſs in 1569, and Proviſor of the Abbatial ſchool in 1571. He was made Proviſor of the Caroline ſchool five years after. He rolled this Siſyphean-ſtone with wonderful patience for nineteen years together [A]. He was made burgher (d) in the year 1569, and married happily the ſame year [B]. His paſtoral labours were ſomewhat leſſened in the year 1576; for they gave him a church but a league from Zurich. The duſt of the college did not diſcourage him from undertaking a noble work, and of a vaſt extent [C]. As he had beſtowed all his ſpare time on the ſtudy of Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory, he formed the ground-work of a deſign which might ſhew the Roman Catholics, that they vainly boaſt of the conformity of their

(a) He was a miniſter, and publiſhed many books.

(b) He was miniſter at Altorf.

(c) He was a famous miniſter, of whom we have ſeveral Latin Homilies.

(d) Jus civitatis Tigurinæ rara felicitate ipſi collatum eſt. Heidegger. ubi infra, citat. (e).

[A] He rolled this Syſyphean ſtone for nineteen years.] I take this thought from the author of his life. ‘ Hanc ‘ quoque Spartam ornavit, (ſays he) (1), quantum ‘ potuit, ſaxumque hoc vere Siſyphium volvit revol‘ vitque, & novemdecim annorum orbe circumegit in‘ defeſſus athleta pari & induſtria & ſucceſſu. —— ‘ He likewiſe adorned this profeſſion, and rolled this ‘ truly Syſyphean ſtone with indefatigable labour for ‘ nineteen years, with a ſucceſs equal to his induſtry.’ What he ſays a little after, is very judicious: he wonders that Hoſpinian's genius was not debaſed by ſo painful employments. Ferreum certe adamantinumque dixeris qui tot labores exantlare, & ſimul ingenium à ſitu & ſqualore vindicare poſſet.

[B] He married ſucceſsfully in the year 1569.] He married Anne Lavater, daughter of Lewis Lavater, then archdeacon of the Caroline church, and afterwards firſt miniſter. He was the ſon of Rodolphus Lavater, burgomaſter of Zurich. The mother of Anne Lavater, was the daughter of Henry Bullinger, one of the principal reformers. Our Hoſpinian lived very happily with his wife above above thirty years (2), and had fourteen children by her, whereof Elizabeth the youngeſt was ſtill alive in 1681. She was widow of Rodolphus Stuckius, and eighty eight years old; and as ſhe had preſerved her judgment, and her memory, ſhe furniſhed materials to him who wrote the life of her father (3). JOHN HENRY HOSPINIAN, his brother, was miniſter of the church of Bulac, and dean of the chapter of Reinsburg. RODOLPHUS HOSPINIAN, his brother, profeſſor of the Hebrew tongue at Zurich, and deacon of the Caroline church, left two ſons, RODOLPHUS HOSPINIAN, who was provoſt of the chapter of the ſame town, when Mr Heidegger wrote the life of our Rodolphus, and JOHN HENRY HOSPINIAN, miniſter of the church of Glattfeld. You will find in Mr Heidegger, ſeveral other perſons deſcended from our Rodolphus. Who loſing his wife in the year 1612, made reflexions becoming a good Chriſtian, and quickly ſought for conſolation in a ſecond wife. ‘ Patienter tamen domeſticam il‘ lam calamitatem, utcunque acerbam, tulit, memor ‘ utique, & mortalem ſe duxiſſe, & ad æternam bea‘ titudinem præmiſiſſe. Conſolabantur etiam mox or‘ bitatem ejus ſecundæ nuptiæ cum matrona hone‘ ſtiſſima Magdalena Wirzia, nobilis & eximii viri Con‘ radi Wirzii, Præfecti quondam Vadivillani, filia, bo‘ nis omnibus contracta, & d. XIII. Maji An. M. ‘ DC. XII. ſolenniter celebrata (4). —— He patient‘ ly bore this domeſtic and bitter calamity, remembring ‘ that he had married a mortal woman, and that ſhe ‘ was gone before him to eternal happineſs. His wi‘ dowhood was ſoon after comforted by a happy ſecond ‘ marriage, with a virtuous matron Magdalen Wirz, ‘ daughter to that great and good man Conrad Wirz, ‘ ſome time governor of Wediſchwyl which was ſolemn‘ ly celebrated May 13. 1612.’ He had experienced, that a wife did no ways take him off from his ſtudies. ‘ Cujus conſortium tantum abeſt ut, quod Ro‘ manenſes noſtris objiciunt, impedimentum aliquod ‘ ſtudiis ejus piis objecerit, ut magno illi contra & ‘ dulci ad omne opus bonum incitamento adjumento‘ que fuerit (5). —— Whoſe ſociety far from being ‘ an impediment to his ſtudies (as thoſe of the Romiſh ‘ Church pretend) was a powerful and ſweet help, and ‘ incitement to every good work.’

[C] He engaged in a noble work, and of a vaſt extent.] It was the hiſtory of the errors of Popery. That which gave him the firſt thoughts of this undertaking, was a converſation which he had in a country inn with his hoſt, who ridiculouſly believed, that the monaſtic life was derived from paradiſe. ‘ Faſſum ali‘ quando ferunt, cum illa excurſione neceſſum habe‘ ret in hoſpitio pornoctare, hoſpitem ruſticum non ‘ incurioſum crebra ſecum colloquia miſcentem, & de ‘ Origine Papatus, vitæ in primis Monaſticæ, quam ‘ ille pro ſimplicitate ſua ex Paradiſo arceſſendam ri‘ diculè ſuſtinuerit, anxiè inquirentem, anſam ſibi li‘ bros de Origine errorum ſcribendi præbuiſſe (6).’ He conſidered that the Papiſts, when beaten by the ſcripture, had recourſe to tradition, and vaunted their antiquity, and undervalued the Proteſtants for their novelty. To deprive them of that ſanctuary, he traced the original and progreſs of the Romiſh ceremonies and doctrines; and ſhewed by what degrees the truth, which Jesus Christ and his apoſtles had taught, had given place to innovations. ‘ Impetum concepit animo ſuo plane ‘ heroicum, & laude nunquam intermoritura digniſſi‘ mum, fictitiæ illius vetuſtatis ſpectrum debellandi, ‘ Gibeoniticaſque artes & fraudes, monſtratis genuinis ‘ errorum, qui paulatim Eccleſiam inundaverant, origi‘ nibus, detegendi convellendique. Et magnæ quidem ‘ molis, immenſique laboris opus aggrediebatur, cùm ‘ de cœleſti doctrina, & ceremoniis veræ primitivæ ‘ Eccleſiæ, tum de inclinatione & depravatione ejuſ‘ dem doctrinæ, deque ceremoniarum mutatione, au‘ ctione & progreſſu iis ſeculis, quæ Chriſtum & A‘ poſtolos primùm, deinde verò Conſtantinum Impera‘ torem, imprimis autem Gregorium M. ſecutæ ſunt ‘ (7). — He formed a truly heroic deſign, and worthy of ‘ immortal honour, of deſtroying that ſpectre of pretended ‘ antiquity, and of detecting and rooting out all their Gi‘ beonitiſh arts and deceits, by ſhowing the true origin of ‘ theſe errors which by degrees have overwhelmed the ‘ church. And this indeed was a work of great importance ‘ and immenſe labour, not only treating of the heavenly ‘ doctrine and ceremonies of the truly primitive church, ‘ but alſo of the decline and corruption of that doctrine, ‘ and the change, encreaſe, and progreſs, of theſe cere‘ monies, firſt in the ages which followed CHRIST ‘ and the apoſtles, and then in thoſe which followed the ‘ emperor Conſtantine, but eſpecially in thoſe which ‘ followed Gregory the great.’ He chiefly deſigned to write about baptiſm, the euchariſt, the churches, feaſts, faſts, orders, monks, the primacy of the Pope, and burials (8). He began alſo to compoſe the lives of the Popes, and ſome animadverſions upon Gratian (9). He was about forty one years old, when he laid the plan of this great deſign.

[D] He

(1) Jo. Henr. Heidegger. in Vita Hoſpiniani, pag. 8.

(2) Annoſque pluſquam triginta concorde in matrimonio tenuit. Heidegger. ibid. pag. 9.

(3) Quæ annum agens 88. ſic ſatis vegeta etiamnum integro judicio & memoria, ex qua non pauca mihi ſuggeſſit hiſtoriam hancce locupletantia, pollet. Id. ibid.

(4) Id. ibid. pag. 23.

(5) Id. ibid.

(6) Id. ibid. pag. 8.

(7) Ibid. pag. 11.

(8) Ibid.

(9) Anti Gratianum inſuper moliebatur, quo demonſtrare inſtituerat, Gratianum in ſuo decreto multa falſa, pugnantia, commentitia & notha recitare, tum vero impudenter, fallaciter, malitioſe & impie corrumpere. Id. ibid.

their doctrines with antiquity. He was not able to finiſh his undertaking; but he publiſhed conſiderable parts of it [D], which procured him a great reputation, and obliged his maſters to remove him from the duſt of the ſchool, to a more eminent ſtation. He was made archdeacon of the Caroline church the 25th of September 1588. Six years after, he was choſen miniſter of the Abbatial church; an employment ſo much the more convenient for him, becauſe it did not divert him ſo much from his great deſign. The book he publiſhed upon the Euchariſt, and that intituled Concordia diſcors, terribly vexed the Lutherans. They vexed him in their turn with their Anſwers [E]; to which he did not

[D] He publiſhed conſiderable parts of it.] I will here give a liſt of the books he publiſhed. The firſt was an oration de origine & progreſſu rituum & ceremoniarum Eccleſiaſticarum. He ſpoke it in an academical aſſembly, and printed it in 1585. Two years after he publiſhed his treatiſe de templis, hoc eſt de origine, progreſſu, uſu & abuſu templorum, ac omnino rerum omnium ad templa pertinentium. He publiſhed a ſecond edition of it in the year 1603, not only with corrections, but alſo with great additions; for he added to it, a confutation of the arguments which Bellarmin and Baronius had produced in behalf of their party upon that ſubject, ſince the firſt edition. In the year 1588, he publiſhed a tract De Monachis, ſeu de origine & progreſſu monachatus ac ordinum Monaſticorum, equitum militarium tam ſacrorum quam ſecularium omnium. —— Concerning the origin and progreſs of monkery and monaſtic orders, and of all the orders of knighthood both eccleſiaſtical and ſecular. He publiſhed a ſecond edition of it in 1609, in which he refuted Bellarmin's book de Monachis, publiſhed ſince the firſt edition of his work. He was juſt ready to publiſh his tract de Origine & progreſſu jejuniorum, in 1589, when a work of Bellarmin juſt printed gave him to underſtand, that this Jeſuit promiſed a book upon that ſubject. He therefore deferred the publication of it, till he could join a confutation of what Bellarmin ſhould alledge. But he having applied himſelf to other ſubjects in the mean time, never finiſhed that treatiſe. Theſe other ſubjects were the Holy Days, upon which he publiſhed two volumes, one in 1592, the other in 1593. The firſt treats, De feſtis Judæorum & Ethnicorum, hoc eſt, de origine, progreſſu, ceremoniis & ritibus feſtorum dierum Judæorum, Græcorum, Romanorum, Turcarum, & Indianorum. —— Concerning the feaſts of the Jews and Heathens, that is, concerning the origin, progreſs, rites and ceremonies of the feaſt days of the Jews, Greeks, Romans, Turks, and Indians. He reprinted it in the year 1611, with many corrections and additions. The ſecond is intituled, De Origine, progreſſu, ceremoniis & ritibus feſtorum dierum Chriſtianorum. —— Concerning the origin, progreſs, rites, and ceremonies of the Chriſtian feaſts. He reprinted it in 1612 with large ſupplements, which ſerved both to refute Bellarmin upon the Romiſh idolatry, and James Gretſer upon Corpus-Chriſti-day. In 1598, he publiſhed the firſt volume of his Hiſtoria Sacramentaria: ‘Hoc eſt libri quinqne de Cœnæ Dominicæ prima inſtitutione, ejuſque vero uſu & abuſu in primitiva Eccleſia, nec non de origine, progreſſu, ceremoniis & ritibus Miſſæ, tranſubſtantiationis & aliorum pœne infinitorum errorum, quibus Cœnæ prima inſtitutio horribiliter in Papatu polluta & profanata eſt. —— That is five books concerning the inſtitution of the Euchariſt, and it is true uſe and abuſe in the primitive church; likewiſe concerning the origin and progreſs, rites and ceremonies of the maſs, of tranſubſtantiation, and an almoſt infinite numbers of other errors, by which the original inſtitution of the Euchariſt, has been horribly polluted and profaned in the church of Rome.’ Four years after he publiſhed the ſecond volume of that hiſtory, containing the controverſies betwixt thoſe of the Augſburg confeſſion, and the other Proteſtants, about the Euchariſt. The title of it is De origine & progreſſu controverſiæ ſacramentariæ de Cœna Domini inter Lutheteranos & Orthodoxos quos Zwinglianos & Calviniſtas vocant exortæ, ab anno Chriſti Salvatoris 1517, uſque ad annum 1602. —— Concerning the origin and progreſs of the Sacramentarian controverſy, about the Lord's-ſupper, betwixt the Lutherans, and the orthodox called Zuinglians and Calviniſts, from the year 1517 to 1602. He publiſhed in the year 1607 a work intituled, Concordiæ diſcors, ſeu de origine & progreſſu formulæ Concordia Bergenſis. — The Diſcording Concord, or of the origin and progreſs of the Form of Concord of Berg. In the year 1619, he publiſhed a book againſt the Jeſuits. Hiſtoria Jeſuitica, hoc eſt, de origione, regulis, conſtitutionibus, privilegiis, incrementis, progreſſu, & propagatione Ordinis Jeſuitarum; item de eorum dolis fraudibus, impoſturis, nefariis facinoribus, cruentes conſiliis, falſa quoque ſeditioſa & ſanguinolenta doctrina (10) —— A hiſtory of the Jeſuits, that is, of the origin, rules, conſtitutions, privileges, encreaſe, progreſs, and propagation of the order of Jeſuits; likewiſe of their deceits, frauds, impoſtures, flagitious crimes, bloody counſels, and falſe ſeditious and bloody doctrine. With this he ended his compoſitions, being reſolved to ſpend the reſt of his days in prayers, pious reading, and ſacred meditations.

[E] Two of his pieces vexed the Lutherans; and they vexed him in their turn by their anſwers.] The hiſtory of the Sacramentarian war betwixt the Lutherans and Calviniſts, and that of the Formulary of Concord, ſhew ſo much confuſion, paſſion, ſhuffling and cavilling on the Lutheran ſide, that it would be a miracle, if theſe two books had not furiouſly provoked the Saxon divines. In Saxony they choſe a man to anſwer Hoſpinian, who was very fit to dazzle the public; a man, I ſay, who treated his adverſaries moſt contemptuouſly, and took upon him magiſterial airs. There is nothing like this to conceal the weak ſides of a cauſe. ‘Hiſtoriæ ſacramentariæ pars poſterior & concordia illa diſcors vehementer eos, qui Lutheranarum partium aſſeclas ſe profeſſi ſunt, urebant; qui eorum operum vim chryſippeis ſophiſmatis, & tortuoſis argutiis, acribuſque dicteriis convellere maximopere laborabant. Conſtat autem, utriuſque operis refutandi in Saxonicis oris negotium Leonhardo Huttero, Wittebergenſi Profeſſori, homini arroganti & prave facundo, datum eſſe. Et primum quidem An. M.DC.XI. perſonatus ille, uti prudenter conjectabant, prodiit, larva ſcilicet aſſumpta cujuſdam Chriſtophori à Vallo, S. Theologiæ Candidati, ſub qua adverſus ea, quæ Hoſpinianus in Annalibus Sacramentariis ad annum M.DC.XIX. (11) geſta prodidit, vernacula ſcriptione ingenii ſui libidinem procaciter ſatis exercuit (12). —— The ſecond part of the Sacramentarian hiſtory, and the Diſcording Concord, grievouſly galled the Lutherans, who endeavoured to ruin the ſtrength of them by ſophiſtry, cavilling, and railing. It is certain that the task of anſwering them both was laid upon Leonard Hutterus, profeſſor at Wittemberg, a man of an arrogant and petulant wit. And he firſt appeared in the year 1611, diſguiſed under the name of Chriſtopher à Vallo, ſtudent in Theology, as was well conjectured, under this mask he exerciſed the petulancy and licentiouſneſs of his wit, in his native language, againſt what is contained in Hoſpinian's Sacramentarian hiſtory to the year 1529.’ David Pareus no ſooner ſaw this work of Hutterus (13), but he gave Hoſpinian notice of it, and adviſed him to anſwer it in High-Dutch, without waiting till his adverſary ſhould finiſh his Confutation. ‘Adverſus Commentarium tuum alterum de re ſacramentaria, nec non Concordiam diſcordem comperimus, mandatum ex aula Saxonica D. Huttero datum, hiſtoriam tuam ut refutaret. Laboraſſe etiam illum ea in re ex domeſticis meis ſtudioſis cognovi. His nundinis Lipſenſibus prodiit Germanica hæc Hiſtoriæ Sacramentariæ conſignatio, uſque ad annum 29 deducta. Credo vobis non eſſe viſam. Author magna pollicetur, & triumphus eſt, ut audio, noſtris vicinis, &c. Percurri librum. Præter magnifica mendacia nihil video novi. Suaſerim ut veſtigia hujus ſcriptoris, qui haud dubiè eſt ille Hutterus, premas illico, neque exſpectes, dum tota moles te opprimat. Feceris magnum operæ pretium Germanicè reſpondendo (14). —— I am informed that Hutterus, has received orders from the court of Saxony, to anſwer the ſecond part of your Sacramentarian hiſtory and ana Diſcording Concord. And I am told by ſome ſtudents

(10) Taken from his Life, written by Heidegger.

(11) It is an error of the preſs: it ſhould be MDXXIX.

(12) Heidegg. ubi ſupra, pag. 22.

(13) Note, that ſome ſay, that Chriſtophorus Wilhelmus à Vallo, was Chr. Wil. Walpurgerus, a divine of Leipſic. See Mollerus, Iſagoge Hiſt. Cherſoneſi Cimbricæ, part. III, pag. 133.

(14) Heidegg. ibid. pag. 22.

not finiſh his reply, as knowing that the common enemies of the Proteſtants were too much diverted by ſuch a ſcene. He therefore turned all his forces againſt the Jeſuits. I doubt not but the ſuppreſſion of his Reply was very grateful to ſome Princes [F]. He loſt
the

‘ dents who lodge in my houſe, that he has for ſome time been employed in it. This laſt Leipſic fair, this German confutation of the Sacramentarian hiſtory has appeared, carried down to the year twenty nine. I believe you have not yet ſeen it. The author promiſeth mighty things, and our neighbours, I hear triumph upon it, &c. I have read over the book; beſides impudent falſhoods I ſee nothing new in it. I would adviſe you to come as cloſe on this author's heels as poſſible, who no doubt is the above-named Hutterus, and not to wait till you are oppreſſed by the whole load. It would be of great uſe if you would anſwer him in the German language.’ Hoſpinian immediately wrote a reply, but he did not publiſh it (15). In the year 1614 came out another work of Hutterus, intituled, Concordia concors, ſeu de origine & progreſſu formulæ concordiæ Eccleſiarum Confeſſionis Auguſtanæ. — Concording Concord; Or, of the origin and progreſs of the Form of Concord of the churches of the Auguſtan confeſſion. In which he undertook to deprive Hoſpinian of all the reputation he had got either for learning or candour. ‘ Quo quantum de libro ipſo, tantundem de eruditionis, candoris & judicii Hoſpiniani fama, ſuæque eccleſiæ infamia ſe detrahere poſſe ſperavit. Opus ipſum haud exiguæ molis, & μετὰ πολλῆς φαντασίας prodiit: aſt ſi inanem verborum ſtrepitum & rerum, convitiorum, ſplendidarumque calumniarum tumorem ei demeres, tantùm non ad incitas redigi, atque in nihilum recidere liquebat (16). —— In which he hoped to take as much from the fame of Hoſpinian's learning, candor, and judgment; and from the infamy of his own church, as he could detract from that book. This work of no mean bulk appeared with much pomp, but if we take from it the empty ſound of big words and vain calumnies and reproaches, it would ſhrink into a very ſmall compaſs.’ Hoſpinian's friends adviſed him to reply immediately, and to humble the pride of his adverſary (17). He preſently took pen in hand, and went about a reply; but he never finiſhed it. Mr Heidegger teſtifies, that this work is admirable. It is likely the author was diſcouraged, becauſe he had to do with ſo abuſive an enemy; he was afraid alſo of diverting the Jeſuits too much, by continuing this civil-war: whatever was the cauſe, his book was never publiſhed. ‘ Neque tamen opus iſthoc ad metam perduxit, ſeu tædio victus eſt maledicentiæ adverſarii, qui neſcio quibus agitatus furiis ubique inſultare, quàm cum ratione quadam diſputare maluit; ſeu faſtidium ſubiit ducendi funem moleſtæ adeò contentionis, qua non tantùm animos veritatis factâ copia ſauciatos ægroſque, magis exulceratum iri, ſed etiam capitales religionis hoſtes, Jeſuitas cumprimis, infauſti certaminis illius futuros ſpectatores avidiſſimos, delicias jucundo ejuſmodi ſpectaculo ſibi facturos . . . metuit (18). —— But he did not finiſh that piece, whether tired by the abuſiveneſs of his adverſary, who, like a man poſſeſſed, choſe rather to rail inceſſantly than to argue: or becauſe he did not care to proceed in a controverſy in which he not only feared that ſick minds would be more and more irritated by declaring the truth to them, but likewiſe that the deadly foes of religion, the Jeſuits eſpecially, would be joyful ſpectators of ſuch an unfortunate conteſt.’ The Lutherans ſeem by this to have got the victory, the world being ready to adjudge it to him that ſpeaks laſt. This is to remain maſter of the field of battle. I am going to mention a reaſon which probably contributed to Hoſpinian's ſilence.

[F] The ſuppreſſion of his reply was very grateful to ſome princes.] About the time that Hoſpinian printed his Concordia diſcors, Frederic IV, elector Palatine, wrote to the magiſtrates of Zurich, about a conference, that was propoſed betwixt the Lutherans and the Calviniſts, to find out ways of accommodation, that might ſerve for a league between the Proteſtant princes, againſt the ſanguinary deſigns of the Jeſuits. For this reaſon Hoſpinian's book was thought to be publiſhed out of ſeaſon. He juſtified himſelf as to that matter, the beſt he could, in a letter he wrote to Maurice, Landgrave of Heſſe (19). He ſaid, that though theſe conferences ſerve only to widen the breach, as has been often found by experience; yet he would have deferred the impreſſion of his work, or even condemned it to the obſcurity of his cloſet, if he had known the princes intentions before: ‘ Libri, intempeſtive editi culpam . . . . . ſic ſtudioſe amolitur, ut ſimul de inſtitutis ejuſmodi Colloquiis ſententiam graviter proferat hunc ferè in modum: Etſi ego de hujuſmodi colloquio mihi ipſi nihil boni polliceri poſſim, & majoris animorum diſtractiones & conturbationes, odia item, contentiones, ac diſſidia poſt illud nocentiſſima vehementer metuam, præſertim ſi mecum reputem, quæ Marpurgenſe, Maulbrunnenſe, Mompelgardenſe & Ratisbonenſe colloquia ſecuta ſint; & adverſarii palam proteſtentur, ſe non diſcere, ſed docere, & ne in minimo quidem articulo ſententiam mutare, ſed in ſemel concepta opinione firmiter permanere velle: nihilominus editionem hujus libri vel in aliud tempus rejeciſſem, ac reſervâſſem; vel, ſi ex uſu eccleſiæ fuiſſet, prorſus ſuppreſſiſſem, ſi hoc conſilium & inſtitutum Illuſtriſſ. Principum vel ante ſemeſtre mihi cognitum fuiſſet, ne illud impediiſſe accuſari meritò poſſem (20). —— He makes an apology for the unſeaſonable publication of his book, and at the ſame time with great gravity, delivers his opinion concerning conferences of this kind, in the following words. Though I, for my own part, hope for no good from ſuch a conference, but am very much afraid that it will be followed by greater diſtractions of mens minds, greater hatred, contentions, and dangerous diviſions, eſpecially when I conſider what were the conſequences of the conferences at Marpurg, Maulbrun, Montbeliard, and Ratisbon, and that the adverſaries openly declare that they will teach, but not learn, that they will not change their opinion in the leaſt article, but will remain firm in their preconceived notions: yet notwithſtanding I would have deferred the publication of this book to another time; or if it had been for the good of the church ſuppreſſed it altogether, if I had known the deſign of theſe illuſtrious princes, but half a year ago, that I might give no ground to any to accuſe me of hindering it.’ The fear he had of diſpleaſing ſome princes, and expoſing ſome people to great dangers, obliged him not to inſert in his work all that he knew (21). ‘ Faſſus eſt ingenuè, operi illi de Concordia diſcorde, deeſſe plurima: nulla equidem ſua culpa, ſed tum quòd ad cognitionem & manus ſuas plura non pervenerint; tum quôd nonnulla dedita opera, omitti conſultiùs viſum ſit, propter admonitionem ex aula potente inſinuatam, ut in ſcribenda ea hiſtoria caute circumſpecteque agat, ſi quid ſecretorum ex cameris Principum, præſertim verò ex oris Saxonicis habeat. Fore alioquin, ut res hæc ingenti periculo non careat, propter orthodoxos iis in locis ſuſpectos, ne cum iis ludus Crellianus vel Procerianus (22) ludatur. —— He owned ingenuouſly, that many things were wanting in that book, intituled, The Diſcording Concord, and that through no fault of his, but partly becauſe many particulars never came to his knowledge, and becauſe he had thought it better to omit ſome things, on account of an advice he had received from a powerful court, that he ought to be very cautious in writing that hiſtory, if he had got any ſecrets from the cabinets of princes, eſpecially from thoſe on the Saxon ſide. That otherwiſe it might have dangerous conſequences to the orthodox who might be ſuſpected there, and the Crellian and Pucerian game might be played over again.’ It is therefore very likely, that he gave over his reply, amongſt other reaſons, becauſe he feared he ſhould be looked upon as the cauſe of a Theological War, that might hinder the Proteſtant ſtates from uniting in their common intereſts (23). It is very certain, that the princes of the empire, both Lutherans and Calviniſts, were well pleaſed with his ſilence; for the hiſtory of that time informs us, that the controverſies of the divines very much embarraſſed the princes, and they ſtill at this day cauſe from time to time the greateſt diſturbances to the magiſtrates in ſeveral imperial towns. Into what troubles has Hamburgh fallen not long ago (24), upon the diſputes of the miniſters that divided the people, and were the cauſes of ſeditious aſſemblies? Theſe diſputes are hardly ever appeaſed, but by the baniſhment of him who has the weaker faction: ſo that, if one

(15) Non defuit bonæ cauſæ Hoſpinianus, utpote qui . . . perſonato larvam egregiè detraxit, adornata ſcriptione vernacula, quæ & hiſtoriæ à ſe conſignatæ veritatem in arce collocavit, & adverſantis vanitatem ſolidè detexit. Neque tamen reſponſio iſthæc, omnibus numeris abſoluta, lucem videt. *Id. ibid.

(16) Ib. pag. 22.

(17) Sine mora reprimendam exultantem hominis audaciam. *Id. ibid. pag. 24.

(18) Id. ibid.

(29) The twenty ſecond of Auguſt, 1607.

(20) Vita Hoſpin. pag. 21.

(21) In literis ad Wolphangum Amlingum, Eccleſiæ Serveſtanæ Paſtorem & Superintendentem, die 22. Aug. 1607.

(22) I think it is an error of the preſs for Peucerianus.

(23) Idem, Heidegg. pag. 21.

(24) Two or three years ago, the Dutch Gazettes ſpoke of nothing elſe. I write this in September, 1695.

the uſe of his eyes for almoſt a year by a cataract; however, he preached as he uſed to do. It was happily couched the 18th of September 1613. At ſeventy ſix years of age he grew childiſh, and was not delivered from that miſerable condition, but by his death the 11th of March 1626, in his ſeventy ninth year. His writings had raiſed ſuch an opinion of his learning, that he was adviſed from all ſides to confute Baronius's annals, no body being thought more capable of doing it (e). A new edition of his works was printed at Geneva in ſeven volumes in Folio, 1681. [G].

one may be allowed to uſe compariſons, it might be ſaid, that theſe quarrels are like thoſe of bulls, who fight for a heifer; the weakeſt hides himſelf, and comes no more in ſight.

Nec mos bellantes una ſtabulare; ſed alter
Victus abit, longeque ignotis exulat oris,
Multa gemens ignominiam, plagaſque ſuperbi
Victoris, tum quos amiſit inultus amores:
Et ſtabula aſpectans regnis exceſſit avitis (25).

Nor when the war is over is it peace,
Nor will the vanquiſh'd bull his claim releaſe,
But feeding in his breaſt his antient fires,
And, curſing fate, from his proud foe retires,
Driven from his native land to foreign grounds,
He with a generous rage reſents his wounds;
His ignominious flight, the victor's boaſt,
And more than both, the loves which unreveng'd be loſt.
Often he turns his eyes, and with a groan
Surveys the pleaſing kingdom once his own.

Perhaps the reaſon I have mentioned, induced Hoſpinian to break off his hiſtory of the reformation projected in Saxony, under the elector Chriſtian. He had been furniſhed with memoirs, which might have provoked his ſucceſſors. See in the margin the title that was to be given to this hiſtory (26); and here follows what Mr Heidegger obſerves concerning the memoirs he was ſupplied with: ‘Grande ſcilicet volumen ex Saxonia ſubmiſſum in hæredum manibus verſatur, quo Chriſtiani Electoris illius Principis & pientiſſimi & fortiſſimi, dicere crebro ſoliti: Ego nec Calvinianus ſum, nec Flaccianus, ſed Chriſtianus. Habent Flacciani ſuum Cœlum in quo etiam ipſum orcum collocant: Ephemerides accuratiſſimè texuntur, & inſtituta ab ipſo eccleſiarum Saxonicarum Reformatio, ſubita & improviſa ejus morte interrupta, pleniſſimè exponitur, ex quibus, aliiſque etiam irrefragabilibus monumentis Chriſtianum illum redivivum orbi Chriſtiano, non parum certè pia Principis illius meditamenta admiraturo, repræſentare ſtatuerat (27). —— A great volume which was ſent to him from Saxony, is ſtill in the poſſeſſion of his heirs, in which the Annals of Chriſtian, that pious and brave elector and prince, who uſed frequently to ſay: I am neither a Calviniſt, nor a Flaccian, but a Chriſtian. The Flaccians have their heaven, in which they place, even hell itſelf, are written with great accuracy, together with a full hiſtory of the reformation of the Saxon churches, begun by him, and interrupted by his ſudden and unexpected death, from which and other unqueſtionable authorities, he deſigned to offer his Chriſtianus Redivivus to the Chriſtian world, which without doubt would greatly admire the pious intentions of that prince.’

[G] A new edition of his works was printed at Geneva in 1681, in ſeven volumes in folio.] There are none of thoſe tracts in it, to which the author had not put his laſt hand. His heirs have religiouſly obſerved his intention (28), being not willing to communicate them to the public; but have only furniſhed ſome remarks, which he added to his works after they were printed. You will find in his Life what pieces he had advanced a good way in, and what he had but made a rough draught of. This is enough to ſhew his vaſt learning and prodigious labour.

(e) Taken from his Life, written by John Henry Heidegger, and prefixed to the edition of his works, 1681.

(25) Virgil. Georg. lib. iii, ver. 224.

(26) Chriſtianus redivivus, hoc eſt, de ortu & progreſſu ſuſceptæ à Chriſtiano Electore Saxoniæ Eccleſiarum & Scholarum in Saxonia ſuperiore Reformationis Hiſtoria, ex actis & originalibus, ut ſint optimi Principis defuncti vindiciæ perennes, fideliter congeſta, & tribus libris comprehenſa. - - - Chriſtianus Redivivus, that is, A Hiſtory of the Riſe and Progreſs of the Reformation of the Churches and Schools in Upper Saxony, begun by Chriſtian, Elector of Saxony. Extracted from Acts and Original Papers, which may ſerve for a laſting Apology for that excellent Prince, faithfully compiled in three books. Heidegg. ubi ſupra, pag. 22.

(27) Id. ibid.

(28) Neque contemnenda etiam illa quæ inchoata & affecta, quoa nondum juſtus ordo, lima & colophon iis adhibita, ultimaque manu nec dum perpolita eſſent, neque ipſe ſuperſtes prodire paſſus eſt, ceu imparia ſuſtinendæ famæ nominis ſui, neque præter ejus voluntatem & conſilium hæredes, cimeliorum iſtorum cuſtodes, edere voluerunt. Id. pag. 11.

HOSPITAL (MICHAEL DE L') chancellor of France in the XVIth century, was one of the greateſt Men of his Time. He was of Auvergne, and of a family of no great diſtinction; he gradually raiſed himſelf [A], and was counſellor in the parliament of Paris, when princeſs Margaret, ſiſter to king Henry II, having had the duchy of [A] He was of Auvergne, and of a family of no great diſtinction.] His father was a Phyſician, and was employed by the conſtable Charles de Bourbon. ‘He never forſook him, following him in diſguiſe, partaking of all his misfortunes, aſſiſting him in all his deſigns, againſt the king, againſt the emperor, and againſt Rome, againſt the cardinals, and the Pope himſelf (1).’ When he accompanied him in his retreat to the emperor Charles, he left in France, ‘all his children, both ſons and daughters; who being but young, could not bear the hazards and fatigues of ſuch a journey. Our Michael was then at Toulouſe and eighteen years of age, and though he was there with no other deſign than to ſtudy, he was carried away upon ſuſpicion, and ſhut up in the public priſons, till there was an expreſs command from the king to releaſe him, and give him liberty to purſue his ſtudies, ſince he was not found tainted with any deſign that could render him guilty (2).’ He went to ſee his father at the time that the conſtable being returned into Italy, found affairs much perplexed there (3); for Francis I. had laid ſiege to Milan (4), ‘and becauſe the ſiege was like to laſt long, this Phyſician fearing leſt his ſon, by too great a diſcontinuance, ſhould make a dangerous breach in his ſtudies, committed him to the care of ſome carriers, that they might take him along with them, with whom he left Milan, diſguiſed in the habit of a mule-driver; and with great danger of his life paſſed the river Abdua, and afterwards went to Padua, where the ſtudy of the Law had flouriſhed from all antiquity. His father left him in that univerſity ſix years, and then he recalled him to Bologna, and to Rome; where he was honoured with a place amongſt the judges whom they call auditors of the Rota. He reſigned it by the advice of his father, upon the promiſes made him by cardinal Grandmont to advance him to higher poſts in his country; but he was diſappointed of his hopes at once, both on one ſide and the other. For the place of auditor was given to another, and the ſudden death of cardinal Grandmont put an end to the hopes that brought him into France. Being thus diſappointed, he applied himſelf to the bar; and after practiſing there about three years, he married Mary Morin, daughter of the lieutenant-criminal Morin, who brought for a portion, a place of counſellor in the parliament (5), which he exerciſed about nine years, and then he was ſent embaſſador to Bologna, for king Henry, where a general aſſembly of the biſhops had been appointed for ſome reformation.’ Thevet adds, that he was afterwards chancellor to the ducheſs of Berry, and then ‘head and ſuperintendant of the king's Finances, in his chamber of accompts, and that after the death of king Henry he was elected privy-counſellor (6).’ Note, that his father, after the conſtable's death, followed for ſome time the court of the emperor Charles V (7), and then attaching himſelf to the ſervice of Renata de Bourbon, ſiſter of his firſt maſter, and wife of Antony of Lorrain, ſpent there the reſt of his days (8). Some make him the ſon of a man, who was born, and lived and died, a Jew in the city of Avignon (9). Varillas, from whom I take theſe words, ſays elſewhere (10), that the father of Michael de l'Hoſpital was a Jew. He is very much ſubject to this ſort of confuſion. Mr Teſſier aſſures us, that Mezerai relates,

(1) Naudé, Coups d'Etat. chap. v, pag. m. 787.

(2) Thevet, Elog. Tom. VII, pag. 368, Edit. in 12mo. He takes this, as he owns, from the laſt will of chancellor de l'Hoſpital. You will find it in Colomiés's Bibliotheque choiſie, pag. 53.

(3) Id. ibid. pag. 369.

(4) Id. ibid. What he ſays is to be found in the chancellor's will. See Colomiés, ubi ſupra.

(5) Note, that there is a miſtake as to the time in Moreri's Dictionary, where it is ſaid, that l'Hoſpital was counſellor of the parliament of Paris, in 1524, and that his place of chancellor to the princeſs Margaret, was given him after all the others, except that of chancellor of France.

(6) Thevet, ubi ſupra, pag. 371.

(7) Teſtam. de l'Hoſpital apud Colomiés, ubi ſupra, pag. 55.

(8) Belcarius, lib. xxviii, n. 57.

(9) Varillas, Hiſt. de l'Hereſ. livr. xxii, pag. m. 170. Dutch Edit. He had this from Beaucaire, lib. xxviii, n. 57.

(10) Idem, Hiſt. de François II, pag. m. 194.

of Berry aſſigned her, choſe him for her chancellor (a). He continued with her in the ſame poſt in Italy, after ſhe married the duke of Savoy, and he was at Nice when he was raiſed to the dignity of chancellor of France, under the reign of Francis II in 1560 (b). It was believed that the Guiſes procured him that office, and that they did it upon the notion they had, that being obliged to them [B], he would do all they ſhould deſire. They were miſtaken; for he laid down for his maxim the good of the kingdom, and the true intereſts of the king his maſter. It is true, he was obliged to uſe addreſs [C], becauſe if he had openly oppoſed the deſigns of the Guiſes, he had not been able to remedy the confuſions of France. He was forced then to ſwim betwixt two ſtreams, and by that prudent conduct he turned off ſome ſtorms, which threatned the kingdom, and retarded ſome others, and found the means of doing good ſervice to his country, as much as the miſerable condition of the times would permit him. He hindred, amongſt other things, the introduction of the Inquiſition, by conſenting to an edict (c) that was much more ſevere againſt the Proteſtants, than he would have deſired [D]. It was the edict of Romorantin. There is no doubt but that if he had been

(a) Paſquier, Letters, Tom. II, book xxii, pag. 758.

(b) La Planche, Hiſt. de François II, pag. m. 228.

(c) Dated in May, 1560.

relates, that the father of the chancellor was the ſon of a Phyſician to the queen of Navarre, wife of Antony de Bourbon (11). He cites (12) page 1156, of the ſecond volume of Mezerai's Hiſtory of France. I find nothing concerning chancellor de l'Hoſpital in the ſecond volume of that author: I only find in the twenty ſecond page of the third volume, that he was the ſon of the Phyſician to Renata de Bourbon, wife of Antony of Lorrain.

[B] It was believed that the Guiſes procured him that office, and that they did it upon the notion they had, that being obliged to them, &c.] Lewis Regnier, Sieur de la Planche, relates, that after the death of chancellor Olivier, they offered his place to Morvilliers, a privy counſellor and biſhop of Orleans . . . . a moſt affectionate ſervant of their family, and that they cunningly ſerved themſelves by his refuſal. 'For thinking they could make better uſe of Michael de l'Hoſpital, a man brought up, advanced, and formed by them, they took Morvilliers at his word, and ſent in queſt of the other to Nice, where he was chancellor to the ducheſs of Savoy. The ducheſs was therefore made to believe, that the king, to oblige her, made her chancellor his own (13).' But other hiſtorians ſay, that the queen-mother was the true author of that choice; being moved to it by the ducheſs of Montpenſier, who thought thereby to give a check to the ambition of the Guiſes. See the article LONGVIC (14). Thuanus (15) adds, that when they acquieſced in that choice, the affair was already concluded, and that Catherine de Medicis let Michael de l'Hoſpital know, that it was not at their recommendation, but at her's, that the king had honoured him with that dignity, and that therefore ſhe hoped to ſee him more zealous for the intereſt of his prince, and of the queen, his mother, than for that of a family, whoſe ambition was deteſted by every body. The ſame hiſtorian obſerves, that it was more eaſy for the queen-mother to bring this about, becauſe Michael de l'Hoſpital was in good eſteem with the cardinal of Lorrain. Note, that Mr Teſſier is miſtaken when he ſays, quoting Thuanus's twenty fourth book, 'that Catherine de Medicis obliged Henry II, to make Michael de l'Hoſpital chancellor of France (16).' He ſhould have ſaid Francis II.

[C] He was obliged to uſe addreſs.] We will ſtill make uſe of la Planche, for our comment upon this text. 'As for the chancellor de l'Hoſpital, few people rejoiced at firſt to ſee him raiſed to that dignity, having been ſo familiar with the cardinal (17), inſomuch that it was thought he would not be ſo bold as to contradict him in any thing, having had ſo many favours and preferments from him. But as he knew the genius of the Guiſes, having for a long time been acquainted with them; ſo he had the prudence dexterouſly to prevent their ſtratagems, if not as he ought, yet at leaſt as well as he could, according to the malice of the times, warding off their moſt furious blows with a ſingular induſtry. For having propoſed to himſelf, as ſoon as he was eſtabliſhed in his poſt, to ſteer a right courſe, like a wiſe man, and not to favour one party or another, but to ſerve the king and his country, he was obliged to uſe a wonderful addreſs to keep thoſe of the houſe of Lorrain within due bounds. And this likewiſe he had a mind to perform in ſuch a manner, that they might not perceive, he intended in any thing to contradict or diſpleaſe them, well knowing, that if they once entertained that opinion of him, he ſhould be able to do nothing to any purpoſe. Thus with great diſſimulation many things paſſed through his hands, which were thought very dangerous: however he kept a medium, giving hopes to thoſe who loved the public, that all ſhould end well at laſt, provided they would let him bring it about. Few people underſtood his intention: but time diſcovered that he had the ſervice of his king, and the ſafety of the people at heart, quite otherwiſe than was imagined. And to ſpeak truth, his prudence cannot be ſufficiently deſcribed. For certainly, though if he had taken a ſhorter way, and boldly oppoſed the evil, he would have been more to be praiſed, and GOD poſſibly would have bleſſed his conſtancy: yet as far as may be judged, he alone by his moderate management has been the inſtrument, which GOD has made uſe of to ſtop the force of theſe impetuous waves, in which all the French would have been overwhelmed. Nevertheleſs, outward appearances were againſt him. In ſhort, when any one minded him of an approaching danger, he had always this ſaying in his mouth, patience, patience, all will go well (18).'

[D] He hindered . . . the introduction of the Inquiſition, by conſenting to an edict much more ſevere againſt the Proteſtants than he would have deſired.] Here is the ſequel of the Sieur de la Planche's narrative (19). 'To make ſhort, when the queſtion was about expediting the edict for the Spaniſh Inquiſition, knowing that the privy-council and the parliaments had agreed to it, he moderated the matter, by an edict made on purpoſe, for which he gave ſo good reaſons, that the Guiſes themſelves, who had procured the firſt edict, were of his opinion, and made the Spaniards approve it, who were deſirous that France ſhould be ordered and framed by their model. This happened in the month of May, in the town of Romorantin, and that edict was ever after called the edict of Romorantin.' Varillas obſerves (20) that '. ſo moderate a conduct diſpleaſed the Calviniſts, and did not ſatisfy the Catholics. The Calviniſts took exception, that they had given them their adverſaries, and irreconcileable enemies, for their judges (21); and the Catholics ſuſpected from that time, that the chancellor was of the new religion . . . . . They reproached him with going to maſs only for form ſake; and the maſs of the chancellor became a proverb, to ſignify a maſs that people went to, only in obedience to the king. The houſe of Guiſe had no better opinion of this magiſtrate, and repented that they had contributed with the ducheſs of Savoy to raiſe him to that high-ſtation. They fancied, that this able politician endeavoured to withdraw himſelf from their dependance, by forming at court a third party with the queen-mother, to keep the balance even between the two others, ſo as neither of them might ſupplant the other.' This puts me in mind of this paſſage of Brantôme (22). 'He was reckoned an Huguenot though he went to maſs, but it was ſaid at court, GOD preſerve us from the maſs of Monſieur de l'Hoſpital.'

REFLEXION on moderate meaſures, ordinarly diſpleaſing both parties.

This is the common fate of thoſe, who ſeek to keep a temper between the pretenſions of two oppoſite parties, that they pleaſe neither the one nor the other. But that inconvenience is ſometimes a leſſer evil, than it would be to comply with the paſſions of one of the parties; and there are many conjunctures, in which the (11) Teiſſier, Addit. aux Elog. Tom. I, pag. 396. Edit. 1696.

(12) Id. ibid. Tom. II, pag. 413. Edit. 1683.

(13) La Planche, pag. m. 228. Hiſt. de François II.

(14) In the remark [I].

(15) Thuan. lib. xxiv, ſub fin.

(16) Teiſſier, Addit. aux Elog. Tom. I, pag. m. 396.

(17) Thuanus, lib. xiii, ſub fin. pag. m. 278, obſerves, that Michael de l'Hoſpital, preſident of the chamber of accompts in the the year 1554, favoured the deſign of the cardinal of Lorrain, to make the parliament of Paris ſit half a year.

(18) La Planche, ubi ſupra, pag. 359, 360.

(19) La Planche, ibid. pag. 361.

(20) Varillas, Hiſt. de l'Hereſ. livr. xxii, pag. 170.

(21) By virtue of that edict, the cognizance of the crimes of Hereſy belonged only to the biſhops, and all the royal judges were deprived of it.

(22) Brantôme, Eloge du Connet. de Mommorenci, Tom. II. of his Memoirs, pag. 89.

been ſole manager of theſe things, he would have procured a full toleration for the Proteſtants. His good offices and management were undoubtedly one of the cauſes which altered the diſpoſitions of mens minds towards them; this alteration was ſo remarkable, that the ſecond year of his miniſtry there were almoſt as many voices for them as againſt them in the council which examined the petition they preſented to the king [E], deſiring the free exerciſe of their religion. His influence was no leſs effectual in the reſtrictions of the edict of July 1561 (d), and in the liberty they had not to obſerve it (e). The edict of January which they obtained ſome time after, was doubtleſs his work: now that edict permitted them public aſſemblies, and many other privileges. This was the only remedy for the evils of the kingdom; all the dreadful miſeries that afflicted it for thirty years aroſe from the infraction of that edict: and after all theſe diſmal calamities, it was neceſſary to take the ſame remedy, and in a ſtronger doſe. It was neceſſary to grant them the edict of Nantes, which was much more advantageous to the Reformed, than that which chancellor de l'Hoſpital had procured them. But I confeſs alſo that the Romiſh religion did not run ſuch a riſk when the edict of Nantes was granted, as it did when he procured the edict of January [F]. The obſtacles that he was the greateſt good that can be done, is to divide the diſadvantages, that every one may have his ſhare of them. Our chancellor would have ſpoiled all, if he had at firſt undertaken to give full ſatisfaction to the enemies of the houſe of Guiſe. This had been to ſplit againſt a rock. Prudence would not ſuffer him to attack that faction, but with a ſide wind; they had the wind in the ſtern, and he was not to ſteer againſt it. I believe, that many Calviniſts, who had more zeal than knowledge of the world, always condemned this chancellor's conduct. They would have had him to declare himſelf openly and boldly the protector of their cauſe. But could he have preſerved his poſt three months together, had not he obſerved that temper? He well underſtood, that the beſt way to withſtand a tempeſt, was that which Plutarch makes mention of, ſpeaking of the government of republics. 'Aſtronomers tell us, the ſun's motion is neither exactly parallel with the reſt of the orbs, nor yet directly and diametrically oppoſite to them; but deſcribing an oblique line, with inſenſible declination, he ſteers his courſe ſo, to diſpenſe his light and influence, in his annual revolution, at ſeveral ſeaſons, in equal proportions to the whole creation. So it happens in political affairs, that if the motions of rulers be conſtantly oppoſite and croſs to the genius and inclination of the people, they will be ſtomached as arbitrary and tyrannical; as, on the other ſide, too much deference and indulgence to the ſubjects levity and wantonneſs, has often proved dangerous and fatal; but the gratifying them in reaſonable and fair requeſts, when they are not maſterly and inſolent, may prove for the honour and ſafety of the government (23).' Our chancellor was not ignorant of what Cicero obſerves, that politicians ought to imitate ſailors. 'An, cùm videam navem ſecundis ventis curſum tenentem ſuum, ſi non ea eum petat portum, quem ego aliquando probavi, ſed alium non minùs tutum atque tranquillum, cum tempeſtate pugnem periculosè potiùs, quàm illi ſalute præſertim præpoſita obtemporem & paream? neque enim inconſtantis puto ſententiam tanquam aliquod navigium, atque curſum ex Reipub. tempeſtate moderari (24). —— Should I, when I ſee a ſhip holding a ſteady courſe with a fair wind, though ſhe doth not ſteer to the harbour which I once approved of, but to another equally ſafe and calm, ſhould I, I ſay, rather, with the utmoſt hazard, endeavour to ſtrive againſt the weather, than, eſpecially when I ſee ſafety in ſo doing, to yield to it, and be guided by it? For I do not think it inconſtancy for a man to guide his reſolutions and his courſe, as it were a ſhip, by the ſeaſons of the common-wealth.' Though he had not the good fortune of Lepidus, who kept in the favour of Tiberius, by obſerving a juſt medium betwixt ſordid flatteries, and a too great ſtiffneſs, he deſerves the praiſes that Tacitus has expreſſed in this manner: 'Hunc ego Lepidum, temporibus illis, gravem & ſapientem virum fuiſſe comperio. Nam pleraque ab ſævis adulationibus aliorum, in melius flexit: neque tamen temperamenti egebat, cum æquabili auctoritate & gratia apud Tiberium viguerit. Unde dubitare cogor, fato & ſorte naſcendi, ut cetera, ita principum inclinatio in hos, offenſio in illos: an ſit aliquid in noſtris conſiliis, liceatque inter abruptam contumaciam, & deforme obſequium, pergere iter ambitione ac periculis vacuum (25).'

[E] There were almoſt as many voices for the Proteſtants as againſt them, in the council which examined the petition that they preſented to the king.] This particular ſeems to me to be curious; and I fancy, that every body will be pleaſed to find here the circumſtances of that affair. I make uſe of the commentary which a Catholic writer ſupplies me with (26). 'The Huguenots have preſented a petition to the king, that they might be permitted to have a ſeparate church from ours. The king ſent the petition to the parliament, to adviſe about it with the lords of the council. There they freely voted on both ſides, the one for the Catholic party, the other for the Proteſtant. The Catholics have carried it by three voices, it being their reſolution that people muſt either follow the Romiſh church as our anceſtors did, or depart the kingdom, with leave to ſell their eſtates. When the voices came to be caſt up, there was no ſmall murmur; becauſe the others maintained, that in a matter of ſuch importance, there was no reaſon that all France ſhould be put into a combuſtion by reaſon of thoſe three votes. Becauſe ſuch a baniſhment could not be executed, and beſides that, to undertake, while they continued in France, to bring them over to the Romiſh religion againſt their conſcience, was very abſurd, and amounted to an impoſſibility. The admiral and ſeveral other lords, cannot be ſilent about it. The duke of Guiſe, on the other hand, tho' the time ſeemed to oppoſe his deſign, plainly declared, that ſince it had been ſo reſolved, they muſt ſtand to that determination, and that his ſword ſhould never reſt in the ſcabbard, when the queſtion ſhould be whether that decree ſhould take effect. Things in this contention paſſed without concluſion...... (27) ſince that, to content both parties by a ſort of neutrality, an edict has been publiſhed in July laſt (28)......The ſincere Catholics complain of this edict, and ſay that thoſe of the new or pretended reformed religion, being not to be diſturbed in their houſes, it is in plain terms to fruſtrate the firſt article of the edict, and nevertheleſs to deliver them from the power of the magiſtrate: which ſome time after will give them occaſion quite to ſhake off the yoke from their necks (29).'

[F] The Romiſh religion did not run ſuch a riſk ...... as when the edict of January was made.] The Proteſtants had very nearly got the upper hand, in the beginning of Charles IXth's reign; and if they had, God knows what would have become of the religion that had perſecuted them under the three preceding reigns. If the king of Navarre, who had openly declared for them, had been able to diſcover the ſnare, that the other party laid for him, he would have continued firm in their communion. There needed no more to have procured them the victory; for he was lieutenant-general of the kingdom, and there had been no difficulty then to have brought over Catherine de Medicis to the reformed religion (30). But he ſuffered himſelf to be cheated by imaginary hopes, and had not penetration enough to diſcover the groſſneſs of the ſnare; he took the iſland of Sardinia, a country of exile, a country miſerable and diſgraced (31): he took it, I ſay, ſo well he knew the map, for one of thoſe fortunate iſlands mentioned in the fables. Being thus groſly deceived by the artifices of the Spaniards, and the cardinal Legate, he abandoned the Proteſtants (32); and thus ſee, how little was

(d) The zealous Catholics were diſpleaſed with thoſe reſtrictions. See the end of the remark [E].

(e) See the remark [F], citat. (33).

(23) Plutarch. in Phocione, init.

(24) Cicero, Orat. pro Plancio, cap. xxxix, pag. m. 619. See alſo Epiſt. ix, lib. i, ad Familiar. pag. m. 56.

(25) Tacit. Annal. lib. iv, cap. xx.

(26) Paſquier, Letters, Tom I, book iv, pag. 196.

(27) Id. ibid. pag. 197.

(28) That is 1561.

(29) Ibid. pag. 198.

(30) See the article SOUBISE (JOHN, &c.) remark [B].

(31) See the remark [G] of the article CHATEL (TANNEGUS du); and Tacitus, Annal lib. ii, cap. lxxxv.

(32) See the article HENRY IV, remark [L].

was to overcome, did not ceaſe after he had ſealed it. New ones aroſe concerning it's being regiſtered in parliament. And it was neceſſary for him to ſhew the force of his genius, was wanting to their becoming maſters. I will quote a paſſage, which will ſhew the intereſt they had by his favour in the ſtates of Orleans, and the liberty they enjoyed under his protection. They publickly aſſembled even in the capital city of the kingdom, before they had any edicts permitting them to do ſo. But it muſt be noted, that the regent, Catherine de Medicis, agreed in this with the king of Navarre (33). ‘(34) The Huguenots. . . . . had all their dependance upon this king (35), as upon one whom they had carried on their ſhoulders, and to whom they had procured the government of France, by their intrigues and ſecret practices, in the aſſembly of the three ſtates. And indeed as an acknowledgment of this, he permitted, by a very great connivance, their preaching with the doors open, not only in Paris, but alſo at the king's court at St Germains en Laye. Indeed it was difficult for him, to maintain his grandeur, but by means of thoſe who reciprocally were to maintain themſelves by his countenance and ſupport. Neverthleſs changing his mind he was the firſt inſtrument of the Catholics arming themſelves againſt the others. But becauſe theſe are things unknown to many, and poſſibly you have not heard how theſe practices were carried on; you muſt know that the Pope perceiving the commotions that were among us, ſent the cardinal of Ferrara, uncle of Madam de Guiſe, as Legate into France with moſt ample inſtructions . . . . . . (36) We have here alſo the lord de Charantonneau, ſon to the deceaſed chancellor Granvelle. It is ſaid that this embaſſador of king Philip is gained by ſome of our great princes, who are not pleaſed with this diverſity of religions. He, according to the deſign laid betwixt them, went three or four times in a diſguiſed habit to the king of Navarre, aſſuring him in his maſter's name, that as ſoon as he would take upon him the protection of the church of Rome, he would reſtore him his kingdom of Navarre, or at leaſt an equivalent in as rich and plentiful a country. As this engine began to work, the legate alſo came in, promiſing from the holy ſee the county of Venaiſſin, and moreover to procure him from his Catholic majeſty the iſle of Sardinia, which the Pope would erect into a kingdom, in caſe the king would not reſtore to him the kingdom of Navarre. It is ſaid that the conſtable, and the mareſchal de St André, did all in their power to make him reliſh theſe promiſes. I will not venture to aſſure you that this is as true as the goſpel: but ſo much I can tell, that it was the common report (37). Only this I can ſay, that in an inſtant his countenance and affections were changed towards the Huguenots: for he forbad the miniſters to preach in the caſtle any more, as they had taken the liberty and permiſſion to do for five or ſix months before. Even in the aſſembly of St Germains he oppoſed the Huguenots as much as he could: but the prince of Condé, the admiral, and others, who then were not the leaſt in favour with the king, oppoſed him, and carried it with reſpect to the publication of the edict (38).' The ſame author, in what follows, will ſhow us the proſperity the Proteſtants enjoyed, even before the edict of January, and whilſt Antony king of Navarre favoured them. ‘The ſame day, (that is to ſay, the twenty ninth of September 1561) the Queen of Navarre in ſight of all the people, cauſed the marriage between young Rohan and the lady Brabanſon, niece to Madam d'Eſtampes, to be celebrated in the form of Geneva, in the borough of Argentueil, by Beza. There were preſent the prince of Condé and the admiral. That action performed thus, at the gates of Paris, and of St Germains en Laye, where the king reſided, not being controuled, mightily encouraged the miniſters. And in October following, they actually preached without the walls of Paris, near the monaſtery of St Antony in the fields, in the preſence of eight or nine thouſand perſons. At their return a tumult was raiſed, which was eaſily appeaſed by the authority of the king of Navarre. They have ſince proceeded farther. For on All-Saints eve there was another public aſſembly in the counteſs of Senigan's houſe, which was guarded by the provoſts of the marſhals and their archers, to prevent any popular commotion. A few days after, not confining themſelves to the king's edicts, but infringing that of July, they undertook to preach two ſermons, one in the ſuburbs of St Marcel, in the place called the Patriarch; and the other without St Antony's gate, in a place called Popincourt. It is incredible what crouds of people were preſent at theſe new devotions. To which Gabaſton, captain of the watch and his archers, ſerved as a guard. L'Aulnay and l'Eſtang preach at Popincourt: Malo and Viret at the Patriarch. The Catholic lords ſeeing a neceſſity of giving way to the ſtorm, the duke of Guiſe enraged has retired to his ſeat of Nantueil, cardinal de Lorrain to his archbiſhopric of Reims, Mr de Nemoux to Savoy, the conſtable to Chantilly, &c. (39).' See in ſome other letters of Stephen Paſquier's (40), the concourſe at theſe aſſemblies, and how they were ſupported by the ſecular power. You may alſo conſult Hubert Languet's letters (41), where we find amongſt other things (42) that the meetings near Paris had ſometimes fifteen thouſand people (43), the women in the middle being ſurrounded with men on foot, and theſe encompaſſed by horſemen, and during the ſermon the governour of Paris cauſed the avenues to be guarded by the ſoldiers, who beat or impriſoned, or repreſſed ſome other way, all that endeavoured to diſturb the devotion of the aſſembly.

WHETHER it can be alledged that the Proteſtants behaved in too oſtentatious a manner.

Many people who judge of things only by the event, will ſay that the Proteſtants would have been more prudent, if they had affected leſs haughtineſs at that time; for that oſtentation of their numbers was looked on as a bravado, which ſoured their enemies, and put them upon the moſt violent remedies. We ſee from a letter of the cardinal Legate, that theſe haughty ſteps gave him hopes of a proſperous iſſue: his letter is dated from St Germains the twenty ſeventh of February 1562. Here is a paſſage of it. ‘There happened lately a quarrel betwixt thoſe of both religions, in which ſome remained dead upon the ſpot: and yet the danger proved greater than the damage. The Catholics in an inſtant flocked hither to complain of the inſolence of the Hugnenots; they remonſtrated that, according to the expreſs order of his majeſty, they had laid down their arms; but that the Huguenots had done the quite contrary. For this reaſon they earneſtly deſired that they might be immediately permitted to reſume them, to ſecure themſelves from their ambuſcades, which made them juſtly apprehenſive that being emboldened by theſe troops of ſoldiers, they would afterwards do violence, both to their perſons and goods. But the Huguenots likewiſe failed not to come and excuſe themſelves, alledging in their vindication: that the jealouſies the Catholics gave them by reaſon of their great numbers, was the reaſon they did not diſarm. The anſwer of the queen and king of Navarre was extreamly favourable to thoſe of our party; for they bad them take courage, and alſo promiſed them that they would take great care to provide for their particular ſecurity, and for the common repoſe of their city. So that after ſuch obliging words proceeding from the mouths of their majeſties, by which they expreſſed more tenderneſs than they ever expected, they went away with all poſſible ſatiſfaction. On the contrary the Huguenots were aſtoniſhed, when they were told in very rough terms; that if they would not be more modeſt, and abſtain from ſuch violences, they ſhould be taught better manners. The king of Navarre went ſtill farther: for, even before them, he ſaid to the queen, that her majeſty needed only give the command, and that when ſhe pleaſed, he would find a means to ſtop the courſe of their inſolence. To this I add this particular, which is none of the leaſt conſiderable; that not only their majeſties but people in general, are extreamly ſcandalized with Beza's walking in Paris, conſtantly attended by Mr d'Andelot, and a great number of gentlemen following them. However after all, tho' diſorders and ſcandals are for the moſt part prejudicial; yet ſometimes they fail not to produce ſome fruit, becauſe provoking the patience of the great, they frequently incline them to generous enterprizes. Which makes me believe, that we ought to be the leſs troubled at this, becauſe it is probable, that, conſidering the preſent diſpoſition genius, and the conſtancy of his ſoul, in order to get the better of the ſcruples, and the ill humour of the parliament of Paris [G]. The ſpeeches he made for toleration, rendered

---

(33) Beza's Hiſtory of the Reformed Churches, book iv, pag. 670, and Belcarius, lib. xxix, n. 34, pag. 966.

(34) Paſquier, Letters, Tom. I, book iv, pag. 218.

(35) That is the king of Navarre.

(36) Id. ibid. pag. 219.

(37) That common report was true: the moſt exact hiſtorians own it.

(38) That is, the Edict of January 1562.

(39) Paſquier, ubi ſupra, pag. 200, 201.

(40) Ibid. pag. 202, 205, & ſeq.

(41) Lib. ii, pag. 145, 150, 155. Edit. Hal. 1698.

(42) Ibid. pag. 155.

(43) In a letter written the twenty third of January 1562 (the Edict was already made, but not regiſtered) he ſays that there were ſome aſſemblies at Paris of about thirty and forty thouſand people, and that two or three miniſters were obliged to preach in the ſame place at the ſame time. Ibid. pag. 196.

'of the minds of the great, ſuch diſorders will all at once fall on the heads of thoſe that cauſe them (44)?' Let us ſay however to theſe critics, that it was very natural for thoſe who had groaned near forty years under ſo hard and cruel an oppreſſion, to uſe their liberty without reſtriction, and to overflow like waters at the opening of the ſluces. Nay, there were ſome reaſons of prudence that might perſuade them to that conduct. They might reaſonably imagine, that the court would think itſelf obliged to treat civilly a party, whoſe power ſhould be found capable of making itſelf feared. Laſtly, I ſay, that neither the miniſters nor the people could hinder Andelot, and other brave men of quality, to mix with their zeal for religion, ſome airs of the ſoldier and gentleman, which courage and cuſtom made natural to them. However it be, the other church eſcaped narrowly; for if notwithſtanding the deſertion of the king of Navarre, the Proteſtants maintained the firſt war very well, what would not they have done under the protection of the lieutenant-general of the kingdom, which would doubtleſs have drawn after it that of the queen-mother? Languet tells us the good opinion one might have of their forces. 'Re patefacta plerique noſtrorum venerunt armati ad Concionem, & jam idem quotidie faciunt, & inter reliquos ſtudioſi magno numero. Iis præbent ſe Duces Dandelotus Frater Amiralii, Princeps de Rohan, & Frater nothus Reginæ Scotiæ, ac alii Illuſtribus familiis nati, quod, meo judicio, non faciunt ſine conſenſu Reginæ: aliter enim graviter peccarent in legis regni. Monmorantio urbis præfecto mandatum eſt, ut huc inducat, præſidii cauſa, duas alas equitum, & certum numerum peditum, quibus præerit Dandelotus. Interea autem dum iſti milites præſidiarii expectantur, nobilitas & ſtudioſi funguntur eorum officio, & tota urbs armis perſtrepit. Pontificii deſperant fere de reliquis urbibus Galliæ, ſed exiſtimant ſummam rerum in hoc conſiſtere, ut hanc ſibi addictam retineant. Verum ita creſcunt hic ſtudia factionum, ut verear, ne eam omnium primam amittant. Quamvis enim à partibus eorum ſint plures Cardinales, Epiſcopi, Abbates, Præſides, Aſſeſſores, & alii, qui opibus & auctoritate valeant noſtri tamen viribus & ferocia videntur eſſe potiores, & ſi ad vim deveniatur, totius ipſorum ſapientiæ nullus erit uſus. Mihi venet in mentem facetum dictum Ludovici 12 Regis Galliæ, cui ſuſcepturo bellum adverſus Venetos cum quidam dicerent fore periculoſum, illud bellum propter eximiam Venetorum ſapientiam: ego, inquit, multitudine ſtultorum ipſorum ſapientiam obruam . . . . Heri hic celebrarunt Jubilæum, ex mandato Legati Pontificii: noſtri vero convenerunt, (ut exiſtimo) ad quadraginta millia, & præcipuas plateas urbis armatis compleverunt. Tres concionatores tantæ multitudini vix ſufficiebant (45). —— This being diſcovered, moſt of our people came armed to the ſermon, and now they do ſo daily, and among the reſt ſcholars come in great numbers. They are headed by Mr D'Andelot, brother to the admiral, by the duke of Rohan, by the queen of Scots natural brother, and by many others of noble families, and this not without the conſent of the queen, as I imagine: for otherwiſe this would be a high tranſgreſſion of the laws of the kingdom. Montmorancy, the governour of the city, has received orders to ſend for two ſquadrons of horſe, and a certain number of foot, hither, to be commanded by D'Andelot, and to ſerve for a guard. In the mean while till theſe ſoldiers arrive, the nobility and the ſtudents ſupply their place, and the whole city is filled with the noiſe of arms. The Catholics almoſt deſpair of the other cities of France, but they think their all depends upon their keeping this city ſteady in their intereſts. But our party gains ground ſo faſt here, that I am afraid they will loſe it firſt of all. For tho' on their ſide there are a greater number of cardinals, biſhops, abbots, preſidents, aſſeſſors, and others of great wealth and authority: yet ours ſeem to have the advantage in ſtrength and keenneſs: and if it come to trial by force of arms, all their wiſdom will be of little uſe to them. This makes me remember a pleaſant repartee of Lewis XII of France, who being to make war with the Venetians, was told by one of his courtiers that it would be dangerous, becauſe, of the ſingular wiſdom of Venetians: I, ſaid he, will overpower their wiſdom by a multitude of fools . . . . Yeſterday the Jubilee was celebrated by order of the Pope's legate: but our party convened to the number of 40000 (as I think) and filled all the principal ſquares with armed men. Three preachers were ſcarce ſufficient to ſo vaſt a multitude.

[G] It was neceſſary for him to ſhow the force of his genius, in order to get the better of the ſcruples, and ill humour of the parliament of Paris.] This parliament refuſed to regiſter the edict of January, and deputed a preſident, and a counſellor, to make their remonſtrances to the king. Theſe two deputies 'having particularly explained before the king, the reaſons that moved the parliament not to receive that edict, the chancellor, by reaſon of the eminence of his office, and the minority of our king, anſwered them in this manner: that he did not doubt but all the arguments repreſented by them, were very weighty; but he deſired them to conſider, that they had not been forgotten in the great council of St Germains; that the queſtion in hand, was one of thoſe in which there is ſome difficulty, what way ſoever we turn our thoughts; and that to ſpeak the truth, there was room to excuſe the magiſtrates, whatever part they took. He granted that the foundation of a common-wealth was the having but one religion; but when things were come to ſuch a height, as was then obſerved in France, whoever rejects this edict muſt reſolve on one of theſe two things: either to put all the adherents of this new religion to the ſword, or to baniſh them intirely, with permiſſion to diſpoſe of their effects. The firſt point could not be executed, that party being too ſtrong both in leaders, and partiſans; and though it were poſſible to do it, if the king's youth were ſtained with the blood of ſo many ſubjects, perhaps when he came to age and underſtanding, he would require it at his governours hands. And as to the ſecond point, that it was as impracticable: and ſhould it ſucceed to our deſire, we ſhould raiſe by this conduct as many deſperate enemies as exiles. And as to the edict of July, though it had a plauſible pretence, it really tended to make men Atheiſts, by permitting them to abſent themſelves from the Catholic churches, and yet nevertheleſs depriving them of the exerciſe of their own religion. Wherefore to obviate all theſe miſchiefs, it had been thought good to eſtabliſh two churches in France, till GOD ſhould pleaſe to re-unite us in the ſame mind: and that this had been the practice heretofore of Galerius Maximian and Conſtantius, the emperors, to compoſe the diviſions betwixt the Chriſtians and Heathens: remonſtrating to them, and praying them to ſubmit to the preſent neceſſity; in brief to tolerate this ſcandal, to avoid a greater evil, and that if we tranſgreſſed in this, it was in imitation of the neighbouring nations, who in the like neceſſity had been obliged to do the ſame. This anſwer being reported to the parliament, the chambers once more aſſembled, did not change their opinion (46).' This reluctance diſturbed the court, and it was again debated with ſome deputies of Paris what was to be done (47). By a majority of voices, it was reſolved that the edict ſhould be maintained, 'And the prince of la Roche-ſur-yon was commiſſioned to publiſh it in parliament, with expreſs orders that if they ſhould refuſe or delay to do it, he ſhould cauſe it to be publiſhed without a judicial form, aſſiſted only by ſome particular counſellors, ſuch as he ſhould chuſe. This commiſſion was violent; but he being a wiſe prince, executed it very gently, declaring that the king's intention was founded on the neceſſity of the time; that the court of parliament might eaſily know what paſſed before their eyes in the city of Paris, but they were not informed of the complaints that came daily to the king and council from all parts of the kingdom; intreating them to give their reſolution briefly, and without any long diſcourſe, by yes or no, what they would anſwer. Hereupon it was by common conſent reſolved that all thoſe who had aſſiſted at the council of St Germains, ſhould have a deliberative voice in that matter as well as others: ſo that at laſt it was ordained that the edict ſhould paſs. It is true that in the execution, they ſufficiently declared,

(44) Negotiations, ou Lettres d'Affairs eſcrites au Pape Pie IV, & au Cardinal Borromée par Hippolite d'Eſt, Cardinal de Ferrare, Legat en France, pag. 93, 94.

(45) Hub. Languetus, Epiſt. lxx, lib. ii, pag. 207, 208. It is dated from Paris, in March 1562. See alſo the ſixty ſeventh letter of the ſame book.

(46) Paſquier's Letters, Tom. I, book iv, pag. 212, & ſeq.

(47) Id ibid. pag. 214.

dered him very much ſuſpected to the Catholics, and odious to the court of Rome [H], and becauſe he was conſtantly againſt the civil-war, they would not allow him to aſſiſt at the councils of war (f). He appeared very much afflicted, when he ſaw preparations made on both ſides to take up arms after the affair of Vaſſi: he declared plainly his thoughts upon it, and made a moſt excellent anſwer to the Conſtable, who told him, that

‘that it was by a forced conſent: becauſe on Friday the twenty ſixth of March an extraordinary day of pleading, it was confirmed with all the demonſtrations of conſtraint; foraſmuch as with the edict were publiſhed all the orders of the king, a thing not uſually done in ſuch publications. Beſides, the attorney-general required nothing publickly, but only declared that he had given his concluſions in writing. And therefore it was ordered by the court, that upon the back of the letters it ſhould be wrote, that they had been read, publiſhed, and regiſtered, after having heard the king's attorney-general, without approbation however of the new religion; the whole by way of proviſion, until it ſhould be otherwiſe ordered by the king. Thus it was this edict paſſed at Paris (48).’ This has ſome connexion with the hiſtory of Mr de l'Hoſpital, and contains ſome particular circumſtances, which are not to be found in the General Hiſtory; and therefore the reader will have ſome reaſon to be pleaſed that I have related them.

[H] His ſpeeches . . . rendered him very much ſuſpected to the Catholics, and odious to the court of Rome.] We have ſeen above (49), in a paſſage of Varillas, what was ſaid in France by way of jeſt, of the chancellor's maſs. Beaucaire de Peguillon ſpeaking of the aſſembly of St Germains (50), and reporting the heads of the ſpeech which the chancellor made there, obſerves that this firſt magiſtrate ſerved for an example to the judges who favoured the ſectaries, and that he only loved the Calviniſts. ‘Deinde Regios miniſtros qui juridicundo præſunt & Regia edicta non ſatis accurate exequuti ſunt, excuſat: inter quos ille merito accuſatus eſt, qui illis exemplo erat, & nullos, niſi Calvinianos in oculis habebat; quique præclara hac oratione, & multis aliis perverſis machinis ad condendum ſatis celebratum poſtea ſuum Januarii ſequentis edictum viam præparavit (51). —— Then he excuſeth the king's judges who do not execute the royal edicts with ſufficient care: and amongſt them he is deſervedly accuſed, who gave them an example, and loved none but the Calviniſts: and who by that notable oration, and by many other wicked arts, paved the way for his edict of January which was afterwards ſo famous.’ This hiſtorian has the impudence to call this great man an Atheiſt: here is what he ſays, when he obſerves that the cardinal of Lorrain raiſed him to the dignity of chancellor. ‘Interim Olivario Cancellario vita functo Cardinalis Lotharingus præter domeſticorum ſuorum omnium ac familiarium ſententiam, ut Michael Hoſpitalis homo quidem doctus, ſed nullius religionis, aut ut vere dicam ἄθεος in ejus locum ſurrogaretur, effecit (52). —— In the mean while chancellor Olivier being dead, the cardinal of Lorrain, contrary to the opinion of all his ſervants friends, procured that place for Michael l'Hoſpital, a learned man indeed, but of no religion, or, to ſay the truth, an Atheiſt.’ Something has been ſaid in another place (53) concerning this accuſation. Odoric Raynaldus has renewed this cruel reproach in the very words of Beaucaire. It is in a place where he ſpeaks of a certain enterprize of the preſident du Ferrier, which I have mentioned above (54). Mr Couſin ſhewed a juſt diſpleaſure at that injuſtice, and at the outrageouſneſs of Raynaldus, and has quoted a fine paſſage of the letter, which our chancellor wrote to Pius IV, the twenty ninth of September 1562 (55). Father Paul (56) tells us, that this Pope found the oration which that chancellor had made in the conference of Poiſſi heretical in many points. He adds, that the ſame Pope ‘threatened to have him cited before the Inquiſition, and that the court of Rome, where copies of this diſcourſe were ſpread, ſpoke very ill of him, and conjectured that all the miniſters of the kingdom had the ſame opinion of that court: and the embaſſador of France had much 'ado to defend himſelf.’ Note that Pius IV having determined to give the king of France an hundred thouſand crowns by way of donation, and to lend him as many more, ſtipulated among other things, that the ‘chancellor, the biſhop of Valence, and ſome others that he ſhould name, ſhould be impriſoned (57).’ I will here add a paſſage of a letter, which the cardinal legate Hippolytus d'Eſt wrote to the Pope the fourteenth of June 1562. It is dated from Bois de Vincennes. ‘Among other difficulties it is none of the leaſt to keep the chancellor, and many other dignified perſons, as your holineſs deſires, at a diſtance from the court, for you put in this number both Heretics, and thoſe that are ſuſpected of Hereſy. But if all the latter were to be baniſhed the court, would doubtleſs be deſerted, theſe new opinions having already made ſuch an impreſſion on the minds of the courtiers, that there are few that have not ſome little tincture of them . . . . But to return to the moſt factious of the court, your holineſs is not ignorant how hard a matter it was to get the Chaſtillons removed . . . But as to the removing of the chancellor which is deſired *, it is quite another thing: for beſides that, he is in a poſt that will not permit him to be abſent from court, except for very important reaſons; he cannot as yet either be deprived of his employment, but by the expreſs order of the king, or for ſome great fault, if he had committed any; nor can it be reaſonably ſaid, that he has deſerved death, unleſs it be proved by unqueſtionable arguments. Now to think to bring an accuſation againſt him to put him upon his trial, is a thing that cannot be done without a great deal of time. Beſides, ſuch a proceſs againſt him would doubtleſs be ill grounded, ſince he is ſeen commonly to go to maſs, to confeſſion, and communion, ſo that he could not be convicted of his not being a Catholic (58).’ The letter he wrote the next day to cardinal Borromeo, ſhews that Catherine de Medicis did not reliſh his propoſals of removing ſome perſons; and that ſhe was ſtill more diſpleaſed, when he named to her particularly the chancellor, according to the expreſs order he had received from Pius IV (59). Whence it appears that Varillas is in a great error in ſaying that the Triumviri obliged Mr de l'Hoſpital to retire, and that the queen ſacrificed him to them (60). He will have this pretended retreat to have preceded the declaration of the ſeventh of April 1562, and that it continued all the firſt war (61). This is contradicted as well by the ſilence of other hiſtorians, as by the letters of the legate dated the fifteenth of June, and the eighth of July 1562 (62).

They were not miſtaken in believing that Mr de l'Hoſpital approved in his heart the doctrine of the Proteſtants. Catherine de Medicis did not ſay any thing but the truth in all the diſcourſe that Mezerai reports. ‘She employed all her induſtry to undermine the credit that he had gotten in the mind of the young king; to whom ſhe taught her confidents to ſay, that undoubtedly he was a favourer of Heretics, that his wife, his daughter; his ſon-in-law, and all his family, being of that religion, there was no doubt but that he was of the ſame in his heart, and that it was only the fear of loſing his place, that hindered him from publickly profeſſing Calviniſm. Therefore as ſecret enemies are more dangerous than open ones, he was much more to be feared than the admiral; and that his majeſty ought not to ſuffer him to poiſon his whole council with theſe fine maxims of peace, under which, as under the ſkin of a ſerpent, variegated with colours moſt agreeable to the ſight, was concealed a moſt pernicious venom; and which by flattering cauſed certain death (63).’ She had no reaſon to ſay that Mr de l'Hoſpital was a dangerous enemy; for if he favoured the Proteſtants, it was not by any diſloyal artifices, but by maxims moſt conformable to the good of the ſtate, and the ſervice of the king. The integrity of his morals, his experience and his wiſdom in the management of affairs were acknowledged by all the world; as alſo his inviolable affection for the good of the ſtate, the preſervation of the laws, and the eaſe of the people, and his conſtant courage in reſiſting the injuſtice of great men, were highly cried up by all good men (64). Catherine de (f) See the remark [H], citat. *.

---

(48) Id. ibid.

(49) In the remark [D], citat. (20).

(50) Held in 1561.

(51) Belcar. lib. xxix, n 30, pag. 964.

(52) Id. lib. xxviii, n 57, pag. 937.

(53) See the Penſées diverſes ſur les Cometes, pag. 539, and the Critical Anſwer to Maimbourg's Hiſtory of Calviniſm, Letter xvi, n. 2. of the third edition.

(54) See the remark [C] of the article FERRIER (ARNAULD).

(55) See the Journal des Sçavans, Febr. 28, 1689, p. 118, 119, Dutch Edit.

(56) Hiſt. du Concile de Trente, book v, pag. 438, of Amelot's tranſlation.

(57) Id. ibid. lib. vi, pag. 487, ad ann. 1562.

* He complied in the council with the intentions of the queen, who had privately inſtructed him; but becauſe he voted for a peace againſt the opinion of the duke of Guiſe, and the conſtable, he was ill treated by both, and under pretence of being a man of the gown, he was excluded from the councils of war, where the queen found afterwards that ſhe wanted one of her principal miniſters. Davilla, Hiſt. lib. ii.

(58) Negotiations ou Lettres d' Affaires eſcrittes par le Cardinal de Ferrare Legat en France, pag. 224, 225.

(59) Ibid. pag. 240, 241.

(60) Varillas, Hiſt. de Charles IX, Tom. I, pag. m. 151.

(61) Id. ibid. pag. 353.

(62) See the Negociations du Cardinal de Ferrare, pag. 308.

(63) Mezer. Hiſt. de France, Tom. III, pag. 185.

(64) Mezer. ibid. pag. 296.

that it did not belong to thoſe of the long robe to give their opinions in matters of war: tho' ſuch men, anſwered he, know not how to bear arms, yet they know when they ought to be uſed (g). Cardinal Hippolitus d'Eſt, Legate à Latere in France, received orders to uſe all poſſible endeavours to get him diſmiſſed from court; but he anſwered the Pope, that he ſaw no probability of ſucceding in that affair (b). He propoſed it however to the queen-regent, at which ſhe was very angry. If Varillas had known this, he would not have been guilty of the fault which we ſhall ſee below (i). The peaceable counſels of this chancellor contributed more to his diſgrace than any thing elſe. I have given good proofs of it (k). He voluntarily retired, when he perceived that his enemies had exaſperated the king againſt him, and he ſpent the reſt of his life at his country ſeat (l) in Beauce. He made that retreat in June 1568. A meſſage was ſent to him ſome days after, to deliver up the ſeals. He returned them very freely, ſaying, that indeed he was no longer fit for the affairs of the world, which he ſaw too much corrupted (m). We ought to think it more ſtrange that he maintained his ground ſeven or eight years in ſo vicious a court, than to ſee him diſgraced at laſt. There had been ſomething wanting to the luſtre of his virtue and glory, if he had continued chancellor to his death; for under ſuch a reign it was a ſort of ſtain and a very bad ſign to be thought proper for that great employment. An honeſt man was not what thoſe who had then the management of affairs wanted. Let us obſerve that Mr de l' Hoſpital did however procure the enacting of ſeveral excellent laws [I], and that he neither flattered the ſubjects nor the prince de Medicis ſpoke truth, when ſhe ſaid the chancellor's family were Proteſtants (65). Now this is a good argument, that he diſapproved the doctrines of the church of Rome. In the Icones of Theodore Beza, he was painted with a candle lighted behind him, to ſignify, ſays Spondanus (66), that he carried a torch to give light to others, and not to himſelf. The diſcourſe which attends that picture, teaches us, that two reaſons moved him to abſtain from the public profeſſion of the truth. He feared he ſhould be deprived of the means of ſerving the good cauſe, and he hoped the time would come when there ſhould be no more occaſion to diſſemble. He vainly expected that conjuncture, and afterwards having reſolved to declare himſelf, he could not execute his reſolution. He ſacrificed himſelf for others. Beza expreſſes this very well. Huic . . . ad juſtum laudis cumulum id videtur defuiſſe, quod partim ne ſibi ad pios juvandos aditum præſtrueret, ſi veram religionem apertè profiteretur, partim vana quadam expectatione deluſus, eo luto ex quo erutos omnes optabat, penitus extricare ſeſe quum diu neglexiſſet, poſtea volens id præſtare non potuit. Sed ecquis illius memoriam non celebrarit, qui, ut aliis conſuleret, ſeipſum tamdiu penè neglexit (67). His will is a proof that he was no Papiſt in his heart: there is no mention in it of the maſs, or purgatory, or prieſt, or any thing like it; and he obſerves in it that Chriſtians have no great eſteem for funeral ceremonies and burials (68). Spondanus pretends, that this is the language of a prophane perſon (69), and Maimbourg ſays that theſe words are unworthy of a Chriſtian (70). Genebrard had before inveighed againſt theſe words in the Funeral Oration of Peter Danes. Note that it has been ſaid, that Mr de l'Hoſpital had a hand in the enterprize of Amboiſe. Conſider well theſe words of d'Aubigné: Chancellor Olivier dying at that time in the manner before mentioned, l'Hoſpital, a man of great eſteem, ſucceeded him, though he had been one of the conſpirators, in the buſineſs of Amboiſe. Which I maintain againſt all that has been written againſt it, becauſe the original of the enterprize was conſigned into my father's hands, in which was his name at length, betwixt that of Andelot and one Spiſame: a thing I have ſhewn to many perſons of note (71). Mezerai confutes this by a very weak reaſon; which is (72), that l'Hoſpital, as he pretends, had left France in the month of November. But did not he know how many journies la Renaudie cauſed to be made? Was it ſo hard for him to diſpatch one of the accomplices to Mr de l'Hoſpital in Piedmont? However it be I am perſuaded that if he ſigned that conſpiracy, he was only ſhewn the beſt ſide of it, and that he did not expect it ſhould ever be executed in the manner it was projected.

Father Garaſſe, tranſported with a blind paſſion of cenſuring the Proteſtants, has accuſed them of calumny, in that they endeavoured to perſuade all France, that chancellor de l'Hoſpital was of their perſuaſion. He compares them to the Novatians, who publiſhed in lying writings, that St Cyprian died in their communion; and he ſays, that this has been an ingenious malice of wicked men from all antiquity (73). In this he only diſcovers his own ignorance.

I cannot forbear inſerting two obſervations in this place, which I find in an anonymous piece, which is excellent. They inform us of the cauſes of this chancellor's diſgrace. I do not think, ſays that unknown author (74), 'that a great miniſter who is employed in the great affairs of his prince, ought to be ſilent, whatever may happen thereupon. Otherwiſe he may be the cauſe of his maſter's ruin, as well by his ſilence as others are by their conſpiracies and enterprizes. It is for this reaſon that I cannot be of their opinion, who think that chancellor de l'Hoſpital needed not to have oppoſed ſo vigorouſly the reſolution which had been taken * * * againſt the prudent advice of the late conſtable, to cauſe the king to depart * * * at the beginning of the ſecond troubles. For ſince that wiſe and prudent miniſter judged, and that very well too as the event ſhewed, that ſuch a ſudden departure, if put into execution * * * *, would undoubtedly prevent a reconciliation, and bring things to extremity; it is certain that if he had concealed his opinion, and had not inſiſted upon it as he did. He would have been guilty of a baſeneſs, unworthy of a man whoſe virtue alone had raiſed him to that dignity. For tho' ever ſince he has been declining, and his enemies, that is to ſay, the enemies of his virtue, integrity and ſincerity, began from that time to conſpire together to remove him; yet that was no reaſon for him to be wanting in his duty, ſince the end of thoſe who have the honour to be employed in ſuch poſts, ought not to be to maintain themſelves in them, to the prejudice of their honour and conſcience, but to ſerve well and faithfully. Beſides, things taking the courſe which they took afterwards, a great man of good principles and courage, as this worthy chancellor was, ought to be very well ſatisfied to be diſmiſſed . . . . (75). A good miniſter and truly virtuous . . . . . will never give his advice contrary to his judgment, and when he is commanded to ſpeak and give his opinion, he will do it with fidelity and courage. This is what this chancellor did, about the queſtion concerning the bulls, which permitted the ſale of church lands, to the amount of an hundred and fifty thouſand livres of revenue, for the extirpation of Heretics. For that clauſe was contrary to the edicts of pacification, the obſerving of which the chancellor judged neceſſary for the good of the kingdom: beſides, thoſe edicts having been granted in a ſolemn manner, he was of opinion that they could not be infringed, and that this was one of the effects of the League which was then contriving; and therefore he propoſed his opinion, which was followed, viz. to obtain new bulls, without that clauſe, which was the laſt ſtumbling-block, and the reaſon which was urged to render this great man ſuſpected of hereſy, and to take away the ſeals from him, and put them into the hands of a man whom they thought more proper for the time, and ſoon after all parties made ready for war.'

[I] He procured the enacting of ſeveral excellent laws.] Stephen Paſquier furniſhes me with this reflexion; theſe are his words (76); 'We have ſeen in our time, a young king Charles IX, in France, who by reaſon of prince. He was very zealous to maintain and confirm the royal majeſty and authority, and he will knew how by the gravity of his cenſures to make the parliaments ſenſible of their error, in diſobeying their king [K]; but on the other hand, he took care that the prince

---

(g) Paſquier's Letters, Tom. I, book iv, pag. 226. See alſo Baptiſt le Grain, book i, of his Hiſtory of Henry IV, pag. m. 129, 130, where he praiſes him as much, as he blames thoſe, who excluded him from the council of war.

(b) See citation (58), near the middle.

(i) Citat. (60).

(k) At the end of the remark [H].

(l) Called Vignai, and not Vignan, as Mezerai calls it, pag. 186 of the third Tome of his Great Hiſtory. He is far from being exact as to proper names.

(m) Brantome, in the Diſcourſe of the Conſtable of Mommorenci, Tom. II, pag. 87.

(65) See Spondan. ad ann. 1573, n. 15, pag. m. 745.

(66) Ad ann. 1561, n. 18, pag. 609.

(67) Beza, in Iconibus, fol. V. iii.

(68) See Colomiés's Biblioth. choiſie, pag. 70.

(69) Spondan. ad ann. 1573, n. 15, pag. 745.

(70) Hiſt. du Calvin. pag. 105. See what was anſwered to him in the General Criticiſm on his book, Letter xvi, n. 3.

(71) D'Aubigné, Hiſt. Univerſ. Tom. I, book ii, chap. xviii, pag. m. 129.

(72) Mezerai, Hiſt. de France, Tom. III, pag. 22.

(73) See Garaſſe's Doctrine curieuſe, pag. 918, 919.

(74) Fragment de Examen du Prince de Machiavel, pag. 95, &c. Edit. 1622, in 12mo.

(75) Ibid. page 97, &c.

(76) Paſquier, Letters, book xix, Tom. II, pag. 520, 521.

‘ of the weakneſs of his youth in the beginning, and afterwards by the extraordinary violence of his temper, had no leiſure to make laws; nevertheleſs none of his predeceſſors made ſo many good edicts as he: witneſs that of 1560, in the ſtates held in the town of Orleans, the other that he made at Rouſſillon in the year 1563, and the laſt at Moulins in the year 1566. Thoſe three edicts containing abundance of articles in matter of civil policy, and fine regulations, infinitely exceeding our ancient ordinances. To whom are we indebted for this advantage? To no other than to Michael de l' Hoſpital, his great and wiſe chancellor, who, under the authority of the young king his maſter, was the principal mediator of the firſt, and the inſtigator, promoter, and author, of the two others. And I which with all my heart that they had been always obſerved with the ſame zeal, as they were introduced.’ I wonder that Paſquier does not ſpeak of the excellent edicts Mr de l' Hoſpital procured under Francis II. A hiſtorian of that time (77) reckons three, which were extraordinary good and wholeſom. I am going to ſhew in what the firſt conſiſted; it was that which regulated the wills, or the donations of widows, who quickly married again. I will make uſe of the words of an author of that age (78). It was at the ſollicitation of chancellor de l'Hoſpital, that many ordinances, edicts, and ſtatutes, were made and publiſhed by our kings of France, for the relief of the people, and the preſervation of juſtice. Among others, we have an edict of king Francis II, which gives a check to ſecond marriages, by taken away the liberty they who married again had to give more to the ſecond husband, than to one of the children of the firſt. The occaſion of this edict was this: it happened that a woman of this kingdom extreamly rich, fell in love with a young lord, who, becauſe ſhe ſeemed too old for him, had no inclination to make her his wife. She was ſo dotingly in love with him, that underſtanding how greedy he was of money, ſhe made him a donation of all her eſtate, reſerving only what might belong to her children of the firſt marriage as of their falcidion, or lawful portion. So that for a morſel of bread, they were almoſt entirely deprived of their mother's inheritance, which was transferred to a ſecond husband. To prevent ſuch frauds, this chancellor introduced in France the ordinance of the emperor Leo, which is mentioned in the law hac Edictali. 6. tit. de ſecund. nupt. in the fifth book of Juſtinian's Code, which forbids giving or leaving to the ſecond husband more than to one of the children of the firſt marriage. It was very juſt and neceſſary to renew this law for the intereſt of the children of the firſt husband; for there are but too many woman, who deſiring to be married again, would deprive them of their rights, to make themſelves more agreeable to their new husband. They would ſupply by their liberalities, what age has taken from their charms; beſides, the liberty of diſpoſing of their eſtates would expoſe them to be courted by men, who without it would never have diſturbed the reſolution they might have taken, to ediſy their neighbours by a virtuous widowhood.

[K] He knew how to make the parliaments ſenſible of their error in diſobeying their king.] An attorney could not reprimand a clerk, who has been guilty of a great blunder more ſmartly than our chancellor did the parliament of Bourdeaux, when Charles IX, held his Bed of Juſtice there, the twelfth of April 1564, before Eaſter. The king, ſaid he (79), has found many faults in this parliament, which, as it is of a later erection, being but of 102 years ſtanding, you have the leſs excuſe for forgetting ſo ſoon the antient ordinances, which would be excuſable in other parliaments that are old; nevertheleſs you are as much depraved, or perhaps worſe than the old ones . . . . I have received many complaints of your diſſentions . . . See here a houſe ill regulated, and it is you who are accountable for it. The firſt fault is your diſobedience to your king. For although his ordinances are preſented to you, you obſerve them as you pleaſe: If you have any remonſtrances to make, make them as ſoon as you will, and he will hear them. You rob him of his royal power, when you will not obey his royal ordinances, which is worſe than to rob him of his crown-lands. I am informed that the ordinance made at the requeſt of the States, is not yet publiſhed here. And, addreſſing himſelf to the preſidents, and the king's counſel, he ſaid, I will now ſpeak to you, that are preſidents and the king's counſel, who ought to require and ſollicite the publication of his edicts and ordinances; and you preſidents, you ought to propoſe them, for you are the king's preſidents in the court. I have alſo notice, ſaid he, that the ordinance about juſtice is not publiſhed. I remember likewiſe ſome others, which I will not mention that I may, not be too long: I think ſaid he, that you fancy your ſelves wiſer than the king but your wiſdom is limited to judge of proceſſes; do not think your ſelves wiſer than the king, the queen, and his council. He has obtained peace, and at preſent there is a war betwixt him and the court of parliament . . . . (80) You deſpiſe the queen and the king's council. I ſee that you ſo much value your own decrees as to ſet them above ordinances, which when you have received, you interpret as you pleaſe: It is not your buſineſs but the king's, to interpret an ordinance, even the ordinances that concern the public welfare. I omit the ſequel of his diſcourſe, which is ſtill more thundering than what we have ſeen. Note, that this is but a commentary on what the King had ſaid in few words to this parliament; That he would for the future be better obeyed than he had been; that he would not ſuffer any of his ſubjects to take up arms without his leave, and that he would alſo have his edicts obſerved (81). There is no doubt but Mr de l'Hoſpital ſuggeſted this diſcourſe to him, as alſo the vigorous declaration made by the ſame prince ſome time before, to the deputies of the parliament of Paris. They had made remonſtrances to him about the edict of his majority, which they had not regiſtered. ‘ The king, whoſe voice and countenance was compoſed to a ſtudied ſeverity, anſwered them, that they muſt obey, that they ſhould meddle no more with public affairs, and that they ſhould rid themſelves of this old error, That they were the king's tutors, the defenders of the kingdom, and the guardians of the city of Paris. The deputies having made their report to the court, it was divided (82),’ and they ſent a new deputation to the king, who ordered that the edict ſhould be publiſhed and regiſtered without delay, and that all the preſidents and counſellors ſhould be preſent at it, upon pain of interdiction (83). It is is eaſy to perceive, conſidering the king's age, that he, in that caſe, only repeated the leſſon of Mr de l'Hoſpital. ‘ He once made a ſpeech to the parliament with open doors, who would not paſs ſome of his edicts . . . . and complaining of their adminiſtration of juſtice, and of their corruption, and of the refuſal of his edicts; it is your your buſineſs, ſaid he, with a brave, and as it were menacing, boldneſs, to obey my ordinances, without diſputing and conteſting about them; for I know better than you, what is proper and convenient for the advantage and intereſt of my kingdom. Having as yet no beard, he held this diſcourſe before thoſe old and wiſe heads, who all marvelled at this bold and grave ſpeech, which ſavoured more of his generous courage, than of the leſſons of Mr Amiot his preceptor (84).’ Brantome ſhould have added that this diſcourſe was the leſſon of Michael de l'Hoſpital. The prince, who had already diſgraced him (85), well remembered the inſtructions he had received from his chancellor, that it concerned him to humble the boldneſs of the parliament of Paris, ſo pernicious at that time to all the kingdom.

REFLEXION on what is commonly ſaid, that it is the intereſt of France, that the authority of the parliaments ſhould be increaſed.

In this place I ought to examine in a few words the diſcourſe we daily hear, which lays down as a principle of miſery, the ſuppreſſion of the right, which was heretofore in parliaments of rejecting the edicts, that appeared unjuſt to them. This was a bank, ſay they, which kept the people from being drowned under the arbitrary power of the monarch. The breaking of this bank ought to be compared to the blow by which Æolus ſhaked the mountain, which ſerved for a priſon to the winds.

- - - - Cavum

---

(77) Louïs Regnier Sieur de la Planche, Hiſt. de François II, pag. 515. & ſeq.

(78) Thevet, Elog. Tom. VII, pag. 375.

(79) See the Collection of ſeveral Memoirs, printed at Paris for Peter Chevalier, 1623, in 4to, pag. 424.

(80) Ibid. pag. 426.

(81) Ibid. pag. 421.

(82) Mezerai, Abr. Chron. Tom. V, pag. 80, ad ann. 1563.

(83) Id. ibid.

(84) Brantôme, Eloge de Charles IX, pag. 33, & 34, of the fourth Tome of his Memoirs.

(85) Without doubt Brantome means the ſame ſpeech of Charles IX, mentioned by Mezerai in the year 1571, pag. 239 of the third volume of his Great Hiſtory.

prince ſhould obey juſtice and reaſon. He oppoſed as much as poſſible unjuſt edicts. And if after all he was obliged to ſeal them, he ſhewed that it was againſt his will [L]. One

- - - Cavum converſa cuſpide montem
Impulit in latus: ac venti, velut agmine facto,
Quâ data porta, ruunt, & terras turbine perflant.
Incubuêre mari, totumque à ſedibus imis
Unà Euruſque Notuſque ruunt, creberque procellis
Africus; & vaſtos volvunt ad littora fluctus.
Inſequitur clamorque virûm, ſtridorque rudentum (86).

He ſaid, and hurl'd againſt the mountains ſide
His quiv'ring ſpear, and all the GOD apply'd;
The raging winds ruſh through the hollow wound
And dance aloft in air, and skim along the ground;
Then ſettling on the ſea the ſurges ſweep,
Raiſe liquid mountains and diſcloſe the deep,
South, eaſt, and weſt, with mix'd confuſion roar,
And roll the foaming billows to the ſhoar;
The cables crack, the ſailors fearful cries
Aſcend, and ſable night involves the skies,
And heaven itſelf is raviſh'd from their eyes,

DRYDEN.

They imbelliſh this with many maxims, which have a great appearance of ſolidity; but they never go farther, they never turn the tables, nor conſult experience, nor examine whether any one could anſwer, I appeal to experience. Now this is the weak ſide; for it is eaſy to prove, that France was never ſo diſtreſſed and miſerable as when the parliaments enjoyed the full authority of rejecting the edicts and ordinances of the prince, under Charles IX, and Henry III. It is eaſy to prove alſo, that the exerciſe of that authority, was the main cauſe of the miſeries of the kingdom from the year 1562 to 1594. Chancellor de l'Hopital had laid the foundations of the public peace by the edict of the month of January. The church of Rome had no longer reaſon to fear the danger I have mentioned above (87); the king of Navarre had deſerted the Huguenots; Catherine de Medicis no longer thought of pulling off the mask. They would have been contented to have had their fill of preaching; and ſo the kingdom would have remained in peace, provided the edict of January had been obſerved. But the Catholics infringed it, and from hence proceeded the firſt religious war, the root of all the evils that afflicted the ſtate, till the extinction of the League; for all thoſe evils were grafted upon, or ſprung from one another, by a well connected train of cauſes and effects (88). Now to whom muſt the infraction of this edict of January be principally aſcribed, but to the parliament of Paris? Did not they encourage every body to the non-obſervance of it? They did not regiſter it without defaming it (89), that is to ſay, not till after three commands, and with ſuch reſtrictions and clauſes, as plainly ſhewed that it was regiſtered by force, and as a very tranſient and very miſchievous ordinance. Who would have feared after this, to violate ſuch an edict, when they could not but be well aſſured, that a parliament who judged in this manner, would never trouble themſelves to puniſh thoſe that ſhould break it; Now at that time to be acceſſory to the infraction of the edict, and to ſound an alarm for civil war, was one and the ſame thing. Obſerve well the words Varillas makes uſe of in the beginning of his relation of the meaſures that were taken againſt the Proteſtants, a little before the maſſacre of Vaſſi. The houſe of Guiſe, ſays he (90), judged by the oppoſition that the edict of January had met with in the parliament, that it would not long ſubſiſt, and doubted not but that civil-wars would quickly begin. It may be ſaid in general, that the parliaments of France, by refuſing to ratify the edicts of pacification, or by ratifying them with an ill grace, and afterwards by a natural conſequence, taking no care that they ſhould be obſerved, were the chief cauſes of thoſe long calamities that waſted the ſtate, and had like to have ruined the monarchy root and branch. If Charles V had reigned at that time, France would infallibly have become a province of his dominions, or at leaſt would have been divided into a thouſand pieces.

You only alledge, will ſome ſay, the bad uſe the parliaments then made of their right to reject the edicts of the prince. But I anſwer, are tyranny and moſt other diſorders any thing elſe but an ill uſe of good things? It ſuffices to refute your reflexions, to tell you, that this bank or barrier you ſpeak of, and which, properly ſpeaking, includes this contradiction, that a ſtate is and is not monarchical, cannot be thought a good remedy, ſince it has done much more harm than good. What compariſon is there between the advantages that accrued from the rejection of ſome pecuniary edicts (91), and the deplorable miſery of the kingdom for thirty years together? Theſe calamities are much leſs to be imputed to the court, than to the parliaments. The court was grown wiſe by the inſtructions of a moſt able and a moſt virtuous chancellor. Mr de l'Hoſpital had perſuaded it to prevent, by the edict of January, all miſfortunes, and to deſtroy the root of civil-wars. The parliament, inſtead of ſeconding him, oppoſed him, and diſappointed the remedy he had found; a remedy which muſt needs be good, ſince there was no other (92). The court would have walked in the road the chancellor had marked out, and only left it, by reaſon of the confuſions into which the kingdom fell, through the fault of thoſe who diſobeyed the edict; and it was the parliaments that opened a wide path to this diſobedience. They therefore are reſponſible for ſo many churches prophaned, plundered, demoliſhed, of which ſome are pleaſed to give long liſts to render the Huguenots odious. Nor was it owing to them, that the miſeries of the ſtate were not perpetual, even after the deſtruction of the League. They oppoſed the edict of Nantes, the only remedy for theſe inteſtine confuſions: the parliament of Paris would never have ratified it, if Henry IV had not made uſe of intreaties; but in a tone, that ſhewed he knew how to make himſelf obeyed (93). Note, that the ſpeech of Mr de l'Hoſpital to the parliament of Bourdeaux (94), ſhews that at that time, when ſo little account was made of the king's ordinances, the adminiſtration of juſtice was horribly corrupted, and full of hideous diſorders. I will conclude with ſaying, that the government of the people is ſuch a perplexed affair, that the remedies which ſeem beſt, are ſometimes worſe than the diſeaſe, and the cauſe of the greateſt diſorders I have juſt now given a remarkable inſtance of it.

[L] If he was obliged to ſeal unjuſt edicts, he ſhewed that it was againſt his will.] A miniſter of ſtate, and eſpecially the chancellor of a monarch, ought to do two things, if he would well diſcharge his duty. One is earneſtly to recommend ſubmiſſion and obedience to the ſubjects; he ought not to ſpeak to them of any thing elſe: he muſt not ſtand arguing with them, whether they have ſometimes right to take up arms, or to refuſe obedience to the ordinances that they think unjuſt and burdenſome. He muſt ſuppoſe it a thing beyond diſpute, that they have not that right. The other thing which he ought to do is to repreſent ſtrongly and inceſſantly to the prince, that the royal authority does not diſpenſe him from an abſolute ſubmiſſion to juſtice, and that it has no right or privilege to depart from reaſon, equity, and promiſes, &c. Mr de l'Hoſpital punctually acquitted himſelf of both theſe duties. He took the part of the king before the ſubjects, and the part of the ſubjects before the king. He repreſſed with great vehemence, thoſe who made any attempt upon the royal authority. See (95) the cenſures that he made, or that the king made to the parliaments, according to his advice. See alſo (96) what he anſwered to the deputy of the parliament of Dijon. But you will now ſee with what integrity, with what conſtancy, he reſiſted the unjuſt propoſals which were ſuggeſted to the prince. He withſtood them by his arguments, as far as was poſſible; and if his remonſtrances did not hinder the concluſion of the affair, he ſhewed that he had no ways conſented to it. Ah, SIR, what a foul and venomous tail is it in an edict, when the ratification of it is decreed with theſe words, by the expreſs command of the king, often times repeated, which only produce a condemnation from the wiſe and good, againſt the injuſtice of it, ſupported only by the commands, which the chancellors are frequently forced to ſeal againſt

---

(86) Virgil. Æn. lib. i, ver. 85.

(87) In the remark [F].

(88) Compare with this d'Aubigné's remark, chap. ii, of the fifth book of the third volume of his Hiſtory, pag. m. 628.

(89) See the remark [G].

(90) Varill. Hiſt de Charles IX, Tom. I, pag m. 121, ad ann 1562.

(91) The ninth of September, 1578, the parliament regiſtered only two pecuniary Edicts, out of the twenty two that were laid before them. See Father du Londel's Faſtes, pag. 88.

(92) Optimum remedium quia unicum.

(93) See Matthieu, Hiſtoire de la Paix, livr. ii, Narrat. 1, n. 7, pag. m. 210, & ſeq.

(94) I have quoted it above, citat. (79).

(95) In the foregoing remark.

(96) In the article BEGAT.

One of the occaſions in which he diſcovered his great preſence of mind, was when the demands of the Engliſh embaſſadors were examined in the king's council concerning the reſtitution of Calais. He anſwered their firſt reaſons, and replies with ſo much force, that he had manifeſtly the victory (n), and gave occaſion to the king his maſter to flatter himſelf, that by retaining that place, he did not infringe the treaty of peace of Cateau. His vigilance, as great as it was, could not ſecure him from the artifices of a ſecretary, who was a wicked man [M]: which gave him a great deal of trouble. It has been obſerved, that his face reſembled Ariſtotle's [N]. Some attribute to him the their opinion, in which are ſeen theſe odious and ſhameful words: Notwithſtanding all the remonſtrances made and to be made, which we hold as heard and underſtood, and for which we will not have it delayed. That is to ſay, in ſpite of reaſon, by a malignant counſel, an unjuſt will, and a raſh determination, by the rebuke of virtue, the toleration of evil; and the hatred of honour, and by an affected ignorance, and the contempt of what is good. Wherefore that he might not participate of that ſhame, the good and moſt worthy chancellor de l'Hoſpital commonly wrote theſe words with his own hand upon the back of the letters, Me non conſentiente, that is to ſay, I have been forced to ſeal them againſt my opinion; as he did to the letters about the reception of the powers of the cardinal of Ferrara, ſent legate * into France by Pope Pius IV, and the court of parliament reading theſe words indorſed by the chancellor, joined with him, and would never ratify theſe powers (97). Preſident de la Place will inform us more particularly of what concerns this laſt paſſage. 'Now for as much as among other articles decreed in the ſtates, it was ordered, that the benefices of the kingdom ſhould be conferred by the ordinaries in every dioceſe, and no longer by the Pope, and that no diſpenſations ſhould be received; there was great difficulty in admitting the power of the ſaid legate: the chancellor remonſtrating, that he could do nothing againſt what had been ſo unanimouſly reſolved and concluded by the ſaid ſtates. But notwithſtanding, the ſaid legate giving to underſtand, that he being related to the houſe of France, it would be a great reproach and diſhonour to him, to be the firſt legate refuſed in it, and offering not to uſe the ſaid power, and to return immediately after the ratification of it, the chancellor was commanded to ſeal the letters; which he did after many altercations betwixt the legate and him, writing with his own hand under the ſeal of the letters, theſe words, Me non conſentiente, that is, without my conſent: which being ſeen by the ſaid court, were refuſed with a declaration, that they could not, and ought not to receive them (98).' Some hiſtorians ſay that at laſt the legate, in ſpite of the chancellor's opinion, got his powers received in the council of ſtate; in which he was allowed a place (99). Every one knows the tranſcendent power of the Guiſes, under Francis II, yet they were not able to make the chancellor ſtoop. He was the only one that refuſed to ſign the Arrêt for putting the prince of Condé to death (100).

Languet has preſerved a ſmart repartee, which the chancellor made to the legate. The later was ſo bold as to tell him, that he did not know what was the duty of his place. I have endeavoured at leaſt, ſaid the chancellor, to learn it; but you who poſſeſs ſeveral biſhoprics, have never thought of getting yourſelf inſtructed in the epiſcopal duties. 'Solus Cancellarius pertinaciſſime reſtitit, & dixit in ea re fieri ſummam injuriam Regi Puero, ac Regni Gallici Jura, & Majeſtatem proſtitui, nec ſe paſſurum, ut Regio Sigillo ſibi Concredito, ad eam rem abuterentur. Ad quæ incandeſcens Ferrarienſis dixit eum ignorare quæ eſſent ſui muneris & Officii: Ego vero, inquit Cancellarius, hoc ſaltem egi, ut id intelligerem, ſed tu ne quidem cogitâſti unquam quod ſit Officium Epiſcopi, cum tamen aliquot Epiſcopatus poſſideas. Tandem victus aliorum importunitate tradidit eis Regium Sigillum, ſed tamen voluit inſtrumento permiſſionis inſeri, ſe contradicente hoc eſſe permiſſum (101). —— The chancellor alone oppoſed it with the utmoſt vehemency, ſaying, that this was doing an injury of the higheſt nature to their ſovereign, as yet a child, and a proſtitution of the laws and majeſty of France, and that he would never ſuffer the ſeals which were intruſted to him to be abuſed to ſuch a purpoſe. Upon this the legate, incenſed, told him that he did not know the duty of his place and office. I have, replied the chancellor, at leaſt been at ſome pains to learn it, but you never ſo much as thought what is the duty of a biſhop though you poſſeſs ſeveral biſhoprics. At length, being overcome by the importunity of others, he gave them the ſeal, but obliged them to inſert in the Inſtrument, that the permiſſion was granted contrary to his opinion.'

Here is a paſſage of Bodinus. 'It is very certain that the laws, ordinances, letters-patents, privileges and grants of princes, have no force but during their lives, if they are not ratifyed by the expreſs conſent, or at leaſt by the permiſſion of the prince who takes cognizance of them . . . . Which was the reaſon why Mr de l'Hoſpital, chancellor of France, refuſed to ſeal the confirmation of the privileges, and exemption from taxes for St Maur des Foſſez, whatever command he had to do it; becauſe they bore a perpetual exemption: which is againſt the nature of perſonal privileges, and diminiſhes the power of the ſucceſſors, and cannot be given to any corporations, but for the life of the prince who grants them; although the word perpetual be inſerted (102).'

[M] His vigilance . . . . could not ſecure him from the artifices of a ſecretary, who was a wicked man.] I will relate upon this, what I have read in a book, intituled, La Fortune de la Cour. —— The Fortune of the Court. 'Chancellor de l'Hoſpital was blamed, for that being naturally very ſevere in expediting juſtice, and ſtern to thoſe that came to ſollicit him; yet he was otherwiſe with reſpect to his domeſtics, and eſpecially to his ſecretary Bouvaut, who put upon him as often as he pleaſed; which he continued to do, till a complaint was brought to the council, on occaſion of a very indecent letter: the chancellor was aſhamed to be ſo over-reached, and was obliged to turn away, with a thouſand reproaches, a ſervant whom he had before much loved (103).' The author tells another thing, which has no reference to my text, yet I will tranſcribe it, being a remarkable paſſage. 'He was in like manner ſeverely reprimanded by the late Mr de Montpenſier, in full council, for that being almoſt inexorable to paſs the grants which the king made of ſums which were any way conſiderable, yet he had ſome days before received from the treaſurer fifty thouſand livres; and he was greatly reproached for it, though it was certain that the king himſelf, of his own deſire, had preſſed him to take them (104).'

[N] It has been obſerved that his face reſembled Ariſtotle's.] Beza affirms this in very ſtrong terms. Ut ex antiquiſſimo numiſmate apparuit, ſummum illum omnium Philoſophorum principem Ariſtotelem ſic ore toto retulit, ut alterius ex altero imago expreſſa videri poſſet (105). Thevet refutes it. 'And as to the likeneſs, ſays he (106), which Beza feigns, betwixt Ariſtotle and our chancellor; if he means in the features and lineaments of the face, there is no man that compares the true picture that I have given of Ariſtotle, above, with that of the chancellor, which he has got drawn to the life, but will diſcover at firſt ſight, that there is a great difference. But Stephen Forcadel gives us ſome circumſtances, which make for Beza. He ſays, that as Charles IX was viſiting the towns of his kingdom, a ſtatue was dug up, bearing the name of Ariſtotle, which perfectly reſembled Michael de l'Hoſpital. He adds, that he made verſes upon it, which pleaſed the chancellor. I tranſcribe his words at large, becauſe they contain the praiſes of this great man, and that my dictionary ought ſometimes at leaſt to reſemble thoſe compilations, wherein are collected the judgment of the learned upon famous perſons. Here follows then what Stephen Forcadel relates (107): 'Legis pervigil & excellens cuſtos Cancellarius: qualem re ipſa ſe præbuit, dum viveret, ideoque à fato maximè laudabilis vir Michael Hoſpitalis, cui Muſæ ſtatuam libentiſſimè ponerent, niſi Juriſprudentia, ſimulque Philoſophia (n) See Thuanus, lib. xli, pag. 840, 841, ad ann. 1567, & Varillas, Hiſtoire de Charles IX, Tom. II, book vi, pag. m. 39, & ſeq. See alſo Tom. I, pag. 256.

* La Popeliniere, livr. vii.

(97) Le Grain, Decade d'Henri le Grand, livr. viii, pag. m. 898.

(98) La Place, Commentaires de l'Eſtat de la Religion & Republique, livr. vi, fol. m 214, verſo, ad ann. 1561. See concerning that legate, the book on the origin of cardinals, pag. 265, & ſeq. Dutch Edit. 1670.

(99) Le Grain, ubi ſupra, book i, pag. 118.

(100) Id. ibid. pag. 109.

(101) Languet. Epiſt. lxii, lib. ii, pag. 157.

(102) Bodin, de la Republique, lib i, cap. viii, pag m. 131, 132.

(103) La Fortune de la Cour. pag. 349. That book was printed at Paris, in 1642, in 8*vo. See Sorel's* Bibliotheque Françoiſe, pag. 414. Edit. 1667.

(104) Id. ibid. pag. 350.

(105) Beza, in Iconib ubi ſupra,

(106) Thevet, ubi ſupra, pag. 367.

(107) Stephanus Forcatulus de Gallor. Imperio & Philoſophia, lib. vii, pag. m. 1086, 1087.

the compariſon of the apes; and probably they do in that what is common enough, not only among babblers in converſation, but alſo among writers; I mean, they aſcribe to one what belongs to another [O]. He made a noble will, which was printed, in which he ſhewed, among other things, the inclination he had to peace [P], and his indifference for funeral ceremonies (o). He died the thirteenth of March 1573, being about ſixty eight years of age [Q]. He made his only daughter his heireſs, whom he had married ‘phia hoc decus præripuiſſet. Idque non ambiguè ſignificatum eſt ſuperioribus annis, Carolo IX Rege ſuam Galliam opidatim luſtrante, cùm fortè eruta fuit, & è ſinu terræ altiùs effoſſæ ſtatua inciſo Ariſtotelis titulo, quæ apprimè M. Hoſpitalem lineamentis ac figuram referebat, ut nec ſibi ipſi magis ſit ille ſimilis, ſicut nec animi dotibus ab inſigni Philoſopho multum differt. Unde bene ominari cœpi de componendo turbulentæ Reipublicæ ſtatu, quia Gallorum Cancellarius Regi maximo intimus Magni illius Alexandri doctorem effigie exæquaſſet . . . Nos itaque Hoſpitali humaniſſimoque viro, honoris gratia, tunc verſiculos dedicavimus comiter ſupra expectationem accipiendos:

Quiſquis Ariſtoteli doctum te contulit, idem
Blanditus docto fertur Ariſtoteli.

Thuanus confirms what Beza ſays (108). Note, that Brantome ſpeaks of another reſemblance: Chancellor de l'Hoſpital, ſays he, (109) had all over Cato's mien, a great white beard, a pale face, a grave countenance; ſo that one would have ſaid upon the ſight of him, that he was the true picture of St Jerome, and ſo ſeveral people ſaid at court.

[O] Some attribute to him the compariſon of the apes, and probably they . . . give to one what belongs to another.] They transfer to our chancellor a thought of his predeceſſor. Read theſe words of Montagne (110): ‘I have found the ſhorteſt and eaſieſt way . . . to rid myſelf of this deſire, and to ſit ſtill . . . judging impartially of my ſtrength, that it was not capable of great things. And remembring that ſaying of the late chancellor Olivier, that the French were like apes, who go leaping up a tree from branch to branch, and never leave off, till they are come to the topmoſt bough, to ſhew their breech when they are there (§α).’ Mr Menage (111) cites theſe words of Montagne, after having quoted ſome Greek verſes (112), in which Scaliger made uſe of the ſame thought againſt Lydiat, and the Latin verſes which Salmaſius made againſt Petavius, which turn upon the ſame compariſon. Coſtar intimates that chancellor Olivier ſaid this in a ſpeech, but I can hardly believe it. ‘Chancellor Olivier, ſays he (113), made no ſcruple publickly to compare the French to apes, who leap from branch to branch, and ſhew their breech when they are at the top of the tree.’ I will ſhew, that an advocate in the parliament of Paris, aſcribes that compariſon to chancellor de l'Hoſpital. This advocate is little known, but by the name of Gutherius (114), which may be tranſlated five or ſix different ways, without departing from the analogy, by which the French have latinized their names. This by the way. The paſſage is as follows. Sæpe ego audivi à fori noſtri principibus viris, Michaelem Hoſpitalium Franciæ Cancellarium, cui nulla ætas habuit parem, ſolitum dicere, multos, qui ad honores à fortuna pelluntur, ſimiarum eſſe ſimillimos, quæ altiorem arborem nactæ, eouſque conſcendunt, ut cum ad ſummum arboris faſtigium evaſerint, foliis vento ſtridentibus opertæ totæ poſteriora tantùm prætereuntibus ridiculè oſtentant (115). There are a thouſand inſtances which prove, that the ſame thought is commonly aſcribed to different perſons. I will only cite one which has ſome affinity with the reign, under which Mr de l'Hoſpital was chancellor. ‘Mr Villeroy was told one day, that he was the fitteſt man to write the hiſtory of Charles IX, as having had a hand in every thing, and for that reaſon that he ought to write it. I am too much obliged, anſwered he, to that prince, and I love his memory too well to write his hiſtory (§β); meaning that the truths he ſhould be obliged to relate, would diſgrace that king (116).’ This is what is ſaid by the author of the book, intituled, La Fatalité de St Clou; but Mr le Laboureur (117) relates this as Morvillier's anſwer. And I had rather follow this laſt tradition.

[(§α) The edition of Montagne's Eſſays in 16mo, printed at Lyons by Francis le Febvre 1595, has ſuppreſſed this as injurious to the French nation. It is however no more ſo than that of Livy, l. 10. Gallorum prima prœlia plus quam virorum, &c. a ſaying which Rabelais has ventured to put in the mouth of one of the generals of Garagantua's army, in a ſpeech which he makes in full council, and before his maſter. REM. CRIT.]

[(§β) This repartee which in Matthieu, Hiſtory of Lewis XI, pag. 571. edit. of 1610. is related of a certain lord to one Mr de Tinteville, who had ſaid to him, that none could write his late maſter's life better than he, was probably originally ſpoke by chancellor Morvillier, whom Lewis XI had affronted, by diſowning ſome ſevere words, which he had charged him to deliver in his name to the count of Charolois. REM. CRIT.]

[P] He ſhewed in his will . . . the inclination which he had for peace.] In that laſt act of his life, he was deſirous to claim honour on account of a thing of which Cicero boaſted in a full ſenate. ‘Quo quidem in bello, ſaid that great Roman orator, ſemper de pace agendum, audiendumque putavi; ſemperque dolui, non modo pacem, ſed orationem etiam civium pacem, efflagitantium repudiari; neque enim ego illa, nec ulla umquam ſecutus ſum arma civilia: ſemperque mea conſilia pacis, & togæ ſocia, non belli, atque armorum fuerunt . . . . Quod quidem meum conſilium minime obſcurum fuit, nam & in hoc ordine, integra re, multa de pace dixi: & in ipſo bello eadem etiam cum capitis mei periculo ſenſi (118). —— During that war I always was for treating of peace, and giving ear to peaceful counſels; I always grieved, that not only peace but even the ardent prayers of our citizens for it were rejected; neither did I ever join in theſe or in any other civil wars: and my counſels always were on the ſide of peace and juſtice, and not on that of war and arms. That ſuch were always my ſentiments can be unknown to none, for when matters were ſtill entire, I frequently ſpoke for peace in this auguſt aſſembly: and even during the war, I declared my ſelf on the ſame ſide with the hazard of my life.’ There is hardly any thing in this, but what Mr de l'Hoſpital might have ſaid; but here is what he wrote in his will (119). ‘I can ſay for myſelf, that though arms have been taken up four times, and battels have been given as often, I have always adviſed to a peace, not reckoning any thing ſo prejudicial to a country, as a civil war, nor any thing more advantageous than a peace, upon what condition ſoever (120).’ Afterwards ſpeaking of the enemies which that maxim drew upon him, and of the miſeries which France was plunged into, &c. he adds (121): ‘I gave place to arms, which were the ſtrongeſt, and retired into the country with my wife and family, and little children, begging but one thing of the king and queen at my departure: that ſince they had determined to break the peace, and to proſecute thoſe with war, with whom they had concluded a peace but a little before, and ſince they removed me from the court, becauſe they underſtood I was always contrary, and had an ill opinion of their deſign: I requeſted them, I ſay, that ſince they did not acquieſce in my counſels, yet at leaſt, when they had ſatiated and glutted their heart and their thirſt with the blood of their ſubjects, they would embrace the firſt occaſion of peace that ſhould offer itſelf, before things were reduced to extream ruin; for whatever might be the iſſue of that war, it muſt neceſſarily be very pernicious to the king and the kingdom.’

[Q] He died about ſixty eight years of age.] He begins his will thus (122): ‘I have always been in doubt concerning my age, becauſe my friends ſaid they have heard my father * ſpeak variouſly about it, who ſometimes ſaid that I was born before the war began againſt the Genoeſe, and at other times maintained married to Robert Hurault, and he left his library to Michael Hurault, the ſecond of his grand-ſons, who has been well known by the name of Mr du Fay [R]. I might have added a great many more things; but I have omitted them, becauſe they may be found in Moreri, or in the Additions of Mr Teiſſier to the Elogies of Thuanus, or in Thevet's Elogies, or Brantome's Memoirs. The later, who was a man of the ſword, has ſucceeded better in the praiſes of this chancellor (p), than all the profeſſed writers that I have read; tho' I confeſs, that Thuanus and Scævola Sammarthanus, have wrote very handſomly in his praiſe. Ronſard's ode, (q) deſigned as an elogy upon this chief officer of juſtice, has been looked upon as an excellent one; but in certain reſpects I find nothing that comes up to Brantome's deſcription. It ſhews Mr de l'Hoſpital to have been a man that might be oppoſed to the moſt eminent and generous men of the gown in ancient Greece and Rome. I ſhall cite in my remarks ſo many other paſſages, that not to be too tedious, I wave what Brantome has written. I only intreat my readers to conſider two things: the firſt is, what he obſerves upon the diſpute which the chancellor maintained with the utmoſt reſolution, againſt the cardinal of Lorrain, who demanded that the council of Trent ſhould be received (r): the other concerns the undauntedneſs that Mr de l'Hoſpital expreſſed after the Paris maſſacre, when he had reaſon to fear, that the murtherers had received orders to do execution in his houſe (s). I will add this one thing more. A famous author (t) having defined the force of the ſoul to be ‘ a certain temper and diſpoſition of mind, always equal in itſelf, conſtant, ‘ ſtable, heroic, able to ſee, to hear, and do all things without diſturbance, confuſion, ‘ or aſtoniſhement, adds, that this is much the ſame with Juvenal's deſcription of it in ‘ ſix fine verſes of his tenth Satire (u). Chancellor de l'Hoſpital (he goes on) (x), who ‘ was poſſeſſed of this ſtrength of mind, as much as any that went before, or came after ‘ him, deſcribed it ſtill in fewer, though in much bolder words, which he even choſe ‘ for his device; Si fractus illabatur orbis, Impavidum ferient ruinæ (y).’ See the margin (z). Shall I forget the ſervices which he did even after his death? Is it not juſt to obſerve, that the ſtate-maxims by which he regulated his conduct, were of very great uſe to France, becauſe he left ſome diſciples, imbued with his wiſe principles, who in due time oppoſed the Leaguers, and rendered their pernicious enterprizes abortive [S]? I ſhall add ſomething to the remark which relates to Mr du Fay, his grand-ſon (aa) [T].

(o) See, above, the remark [H], citat. (68).

(108) Qui non vultu tantum Ariſtotelis os, quod ex utriuſque imaginum ubique proſtantium comparatione conſtat, ſed Solonis . . . pectus . . . . referebat. Thuan. lib. lvi, pag. 43.

(109) Brant. Memoir. Tom. II, pag. m. 78, in the Elogy upon conſtable Montmorency.

(110) Montagne, Eſſays, book ii, chap. xvii, pag. m. 576, 577.

(111) Menage, Modi di dire Italiani, pag. 29, at the end of his Etymologies of the Italian tongue.

(112) You will find them tranſlated into Latin, apud Voſſium de Scient. Mathem. pag. 237.

(113) Coſtar, Suite de la Defenſe de Voiture, pag. 189.

(114) His French name was Goutiere, as I find it in Guichenon's Hiſtory of Breſſe, pag. 36.

(115) Jacobus Gutherius, de jure Manium, lib. ii, cap. xxvi, pag. 351, Edit. Lipſ. 1671.

(116) Fatalité de Saint Clou. I have mentioned that book in the article of HENRY III, citat. (89), and at the end of remark [R].

(117) Le Laboureur, Addit. aux Mémoires de Caſtelnau, Tom. I, pag. 522.

(118) Cicer. pro Marcello, cap. v.

(119) Teſtament de Michel de l'Hoſpital, apud Colomiés, Bibl. choiſie, pag 60.

(120) See Paſquier's Letters, Tom. I, book x, pag 62, & ſeq. where he repreſents the miſeries of civil wars.

(121) Teſtam. &c. ibid. pag. 62.

(122) Ibid. pag. 52.

* John de l'Hoſpital.

‘ tained, that my birth was dated from the end which ‘ king Lewis XII put to that war, in which my father ‘ was employed as a Phyſician to Charles duke of ‘ Bourbon.’ It would be no wonder, that a groſs and ignorant clown ſhould not know the age of his ſon, and yet this happens but rarely; but it is very ſtrange, that a man of parts and learning, as was the father of Michael de l'Hoſpital, ſhould ſo vary about it, and that not by a day or a week, but by many months. His ſon declares (123), that he was eighteen years old when the conſtable of Bourbon left France (124); he believed therefore he was born in the year 1505. Note, that the war of Lewis XII againſt the Genoeſe, was terminated in April 1507. Brantome, who has inſerted in his Memoirs (125) the chancellor's will, does not forget the preface (126) which witneſſes, that the teſtator was ſixty eight years of age. The date of the will is the third (127) day of March 1573. This is ſtill to place his birth in the year 1505. If Thuanus (128), and Sammarthanus (129) had conſidered theſe things, they would not have ſaid that Michael de l'Hoſpital lived about ſeventy years.

[R] The ſecond of his grand children . . . . has been very well known by the name of Mr du Fay.] We find in his Elogy, compoſed by Sammarthanus, that he had a great deal of wit and learning, and that he was chancellor to the king of Navarre, and might have arrived to the dignity of chancellor of France, if inſtead of ingaging in a ſoldier's life, he had perſevered in the functions and exerciſes of the gown. We find there alſo, that he died of grief in 1592, for having been forced to quit the government of Quillebeuf (130); but we do not find there, that he was actually a Proteſtant. Some have accuſed him of being ready to turn Papiſt. See the Confeſſion Catholique de Sanci (131), and the notes upon it in the edition of 1699. He wrote a treatiſe in 1588, intituled Le franc & libre Diſcours (132), which paſſed for a very good piece. See the Perroniana, at the word Fay, and Thuanus's 92d book.

[S] He left ſome diſciples who oppoſed the enterprizes of the Leaguers . . . . and made them abortive.] An anonymous author, whom I have already quoted, furniſhes me with a commentary that I have occaſion for. He ſays (133), that if the devotion of a miniſter or counſellor to a prince is not well grounded, and his zeal well regulated, it is impoſſible to imagine the miſchief he may do. Firſt of all, he ſuffers himſelf to be deceived, and then he himſelf deceives his maſter, for in point of devotion, the wiſeſt of men are often impoſed upon. Many think that they are very pious and devout, if they are groſsly ignorant of what concerns religion, and refer themſelves to thoſe whoſe buſineſs it is to teach it; ſome of whom being practiſed upon, lead them a fine dance. We have ſpoken of the great misfortunes into which ſeveral great princes, who were otherwiſe prudent men, have fallen for want of underſtanding this cabal. We will ſpeak a word of ſome of their miniſters . . . . There were two ſorts of them; for thoſe who had been bred up under the dicipline of chancellor l'Hoſpital, obſerved maxims, which were not only conſonant to piety and Chriſtian moderation, but uſeful for the preſervation of the peace, and maintenance of the king's authority. The others, on the contrary, whether it was out of conſcience, without much knowledge, or to make a ſeparate party, adhered ſo much to the externals of religion, that they thought it better to let the kingdom fall into a combuſtion, than to ſuffer the leaſt accommodation in matters of religion. Now what followed from this diverſity of opinions, was, that the later proved very inſtrumental in forming, raiſing, and fortifying the League, the other in deſtroying it and preſerving the kingdom, which the contrary party had brought to the brink of deſtruction.

[T] I ſhall add ſomething to the remark concerning Mr du Fay, his grand-ſon.] He compoſed ſeveral books concerning the affairs of thoſe times. They aſcribe to him the Anti-Sixte, Anti-Eſpagnol, and the Francophile contre les Conſpirations du Roi d'Eſpagne, du Pape, & des Rebelles de France (134). Mr Baillet, from whom I have this, doth not give us any character of the firſt of theſe three pieces, and I do not know whether he means a book of which I have ſeen an edition printed at Cologn by Herman Jolin (135) in 1586 in 8vo. It is intituled, Moyens d'abus, entrepriſes & nullitez du reſcrit & bulle du Pape Sixte V du nom en date du mois de Septembre 1585, contre le Sereniſſime Prince, HENRY DE BOURBON, Roy de Navarre . . . . . & HENRY DE BOURBON . . . . . Prince de Condé, par un Catholique, Apoſtolique, Romain: mais bon François, & très-fidele Subjet de la Couronne de France. ——— A proof of the abuſes, incroachments, and nullities, of the reſcript and bull of Pope Sixtus V, dated September 1585, againſt

(p) It is inſerted in the elogy of the conſtable of Mommorency.

(q) It is the tenth of the firſt book. Richelet, who commented upon it, ſays it is a maſter-piece of poetry. See alſo Paſquier, in the twenty ſecond book of his Letters, pag. 758.

(r) Brant. Memoir. Tom. II, pag. m. 85. See in Varillas, Hiſt. de Charles IX, book vi, pag. m. 5, & ſeq. the particulars of that diſpute at large.

(s) Brantôme, ibid. pag. 87, 88.

(t) Naudé, Coups d'Etat, chap v, pag. m. 784.

(u) Fortem poſce animum mortis terrore vacantem, &c.

(x) Naudé, ibid. pag. 785, 786.

(y) They are Horace's words, Od. iii, lib. iii, and ſignify, If the world ſhould be overturned, the ruins of it would ſtrike me fearleſs, and undaunted.

(z) The vigour which the court of France ſhewed in 1563, againſt the Pope, who had cited the queen of Navarre, &c. and who was obliged to revoke his Monitory, was owing to Mr de l'Hoſpital, and the conſtable of Mommorency. See Thuanus, lib. lxxxii, pag. m. 32, 33.

(aa) In remark [R].

(123) Ubi ſupra, pag. 53.

(124) He left it in 1523.

(125) In the ſecond Tome, in the Elogy of the conſtable Montmorency.

(126) It is not in Colomiés's edition.

(127) The 12th in edit. Colomiés.

(128) Thuan. Hiſtor. lib. lvi, in fin. pag. 43.

(129) Sammarth. in Elog. lib. i, pag. m. 60.

(130) See Sammarthanus, Elog. lib. ii, pag. m. 177, & ſeq.

(131) In the fifth chapter of the firſt book, and in the ninth chapter of the ſecond.

(132) It was inſerted in the third Tome of the Memoirs of the League, pag. 1, & ſeq. with this title, Excellent & libre Diſcours ſur l'eſtat preſent de la France.

(133) Fragment de l'Examen du Prince de Michiavel, pag. 83, & ſeq.

(134) See Baillet, in the Recueil des Anti, art. xxxiv.

(135) I believe this is ſuppoſititious.

againſt the moſt ſerene prince, Henry of Bourbon king of Navarre, and Henry of Bourbon . . . . . . prince of Condé . . . . . by a Catholic, Apoſtolic, and Roman : but a true Frenchman and faithful ſubject of the crown of France. With regard to the ſecond of theſe three pieces, Mr Baillet ſays as follows. The Anti-Eſpagnol ' has been printed at different times with ſome alterations. That which appeared 1594 in 12mo, is intituled L'Anti-Eſpagnol & Exhortation de ceux de Paris qui ne ſe veulent faire Eſpagnols, à tous les François de leur parti, de ſe remettre en l'obéïſſance du Roi Henry quatriéme, & de ſe delivrer de la Tyrannie de Caſtille. —— The Anti-Eſpagnol, and Exhortation of ſuch Pariſians as are not willing to become Spaniards, to all the Frenchmen of their party, to return to their obedience to king Henry IV, and to deliver themſelves from the tyranny of Caſtile. It is the fourth and laſt of theſe excellent diſcourſes on the ſtate of France, publiſhed in 1695. But that which was afterwards reviſed was publiſhed under the title of L'Anti-Eſpagnol, ou brief diſcours, du but où tend Phillippe Roi d'Eſpagne ſe meſlant des affaires de France. —— The Anti-Eſpagnol, or a brief diſcourſe concerning the ends of Philip king of Spain, in meddling in the affairs of France. It is inſerted in the fourth volume of the Memoirs of the League publiſhed in 1604 by Samuel du Lis (136).' There is an edition which preceded both theſe, printed in 1590 in 8vo, and intituled only, Coppie de l'Anti-Eſpagnol faict à Paris. —— A copy of the Anti-Eſpagnol written at Paris. My edition of the fourth volume of the Memoirs of the League is printed in the year 1595 : the Anti-Eſpagnol is inſerted there at page 230. If Mr Baillet has ſeen an edition in 1604, it is not the firſt. What I am going to cite may ſerve for a ſupplement to a remark in the article of GREGORY VII (137). It is that wherein I ſay, that it is not a ſure way to judge of princes by the pieces which are publiſhed againſt them during the heat of factions. It is ordinary for all factions to produce Libels. He who wrote the Anti-Sixte would not have ſtopped there, had he not been expreſsly ordered ſo to do by the king, long before he had the happineſs to be reconciled to the Church. His majeſty who never loved theſe turbulent and furious ſpirits, commanded that ſatirical piece to be ſuppreſſed. But it was not poſſible to do it ; and if it is preſerved to another age, it will ſerve as a ſword and buckler to the enemies of the church, who will riſe out of the aſhes of theſe people, to attack the head thereof, as is their cuſtom (138).

(136) Baillet, Recueil des Anti, Art. cxii.

(137) It is remark [O].

(138) Flor. de Remond, l'Anti-Papeſſe, cap. xvi, n. 3, folio. 406.

HOSPITAL (FRANCIS DE L') created mareſchal of France, the twenty third of April, 1643 (a), was called before that time Mr du Hallier. Moreri, copying Father Anſelme, gives an ample account of his genealogy, and mentions his exploits and dignities ; but he does not take notice of a thing which I have read in a State of France [A]. I ſhall relate it here. I will alſo give a ſupplement to an obſervation I have made above, concerning the firſt wife of mareſchal de l'Hoſpital [B].

I ſaid

(a) Anſelme, Hiſt. des Grans Offic. pag. 266.

[A] Mr Moreri doth not take notice of a thing which I have read in a State of France.] Which is that marſhal de l'Hoſpital, ' was originally of Calabria, of a very illuſtrious family, having had many alliances with the kings and queens of Naples. But the love his predeceſſors had for Charles of Anjou, ſecond king of Naples, ingaging them in his intereſt againſt the kings of Arragon and Caſtile, they were forced to ſeek a ſanctuary in France, when theſe Spaniſh princes reſumed the ſceptre of that kingdom (1).' Since Father Anſelm has not mentioned this, he muſt either have not known it, or have judged it uncertain. He begins the genealogy of that family, with one Francis de l'Hoſpital, who lived in 1314, and 1338 (2) ; and in another book (3) he goes no higher than Francis de l'Hoſpital, chamberlain, &c. to Charles VI in 1404, and fifth grandfather to him, who is the ſubject of this article. Note that the author of the notes upon Gabriel Naudé's Coups d'Eſtat, is very much out in pretending (4), that our marſhal de l'Hoſpital was deſcended from the chancellor of the ſame name.

[B] I will give a ſupplement concerning the firſt wife of mareſchal de l'Hoſpital.] We have ſeen elſewhere (5), that he made no ſcruple to marry Charlotte des Eſſars, mother of ſeveral illegitimate children, ſome of king Henry IV, and others of cardinal de Guiſe. I forgot when I made that remark, what I had read in the notes upon the Amours of Henry the Great. But ſince I now remember it, I muſt give my readers a new circumſtance of the victory Mr du Hallier obtained over matrimonal ſcruples. You will ſee, that Charlotte des Eſſars was a baſtard herſelf, and that after the death of cardinal de Guiſe, ſhe was miſtreſs to another prelate. Henry IV ' loved alſo Charlotte des Eſſars, natural daughter of the baron de Sautour in Champagne, and of the lady Dheny, by whom he had two daughters. She had attended the counteſs de Beaumount Harlay in her embaſſy to England; then ſhe was miſtreſs to cardinal de Guiſe, who had ſeveral children by her, the count de Romorantin, the abbot de Chailly, the Chevalier, Madam de Rhodes, &c. Afterwards ſhe was miſtreſs to Mr de Vic, archbiſhop of Auſch, three years ; then ſhe married Francis de l'Hoſpital, count de Roſnay, baron de Bein, mareſchal of France (6).' Father Anſelm tells us, that ſhe was married to him about the year 1629, and that her huſband married again the twenty eight of Auguſt, 1633, to Frances Mignot, by whom he had a ſon, who died a few days after he was born (7). Moreri obſerves, that the adventures this Frances Mignot are very ſingular. This has been left out in the Paris edition of 1699. Mareſchal de l'Hoſpital's ſtars were not fortunate in that reſpect.

Father Anſelm (8) obſerves that Charlotte des Eſſars died in the year 1651. We ſhould conclude from this that our Francis de l'Hoſpital got his marriage diſſolved ; for he married another wife in 1633 (9). I do not know how this came about, neither do I know whether we have any account of it in any book. I believe many of my readers will imagine that he diſcovered the falſe ſtep which he had made after he had committed it, and that hoping to repair it, he commenced a ſuit againſt his wife. Poſſibly he did not find her ſo rich as he imagined. It is probable that he fancied that a lady who had been miſtreſs ſucceſſively to a king of France, and two archbiſhops, muſt needs be immenſely rich, and that if a perſon of quality is allowed to marry a maid of mean birth, who brings him the treaſures of a Financier, he ought not to be condemned for putting his affairs in a very good condition, by marrying a lady who had gained a great fortune by her galantries. If he reaſoned in this manner, and found afterwards, that the fortune of the lady was not ſufficient to repair either her want of youth or reputation, what he had to do but annul the contract ? however the lady obtained the great thing deſired by perſons of her ſex, ſhe got a huſband, ſhe entered the harbour notwithſtanding ſo many ſtorms and ſhipwrecks. It is very likely ſhe owed this to the opinion of her being rich. Let us conclude with ſome verſes of Regnier.

Je ne ſuis point adroit, je n'ay point d'éloquence
Pour colorer un faict, ou deſtourner la foy,
Prouver qu'un grand amour n'eſt ſujet à la loy,

. . . .

Desbaucher une fille, & par vives raiſons
Luy monſtrer comme Amour fait les bonnes maiſons,
Les maintient, les eſleve, & propice aux plus belles
En honneur les advance, & les fait Damoiſelles.

. . . .

Et pour le faire court
Dire qu'il n'eſt rien tel qu'aymer les gens de court
Allegant maint exemple en ce ſiecle ou nous ſommes
Qu'il ne'ſt rien ſi facile à prendre que les hommes,
Et qu'on ne s'enquiert plus s'elle a fait le pourquoy,
Pourveu qu'elle ſoit riche, & qu'elle ait bien dequoy.
Quand elle auroit ſuivy le camp à la Rochelle,
S'elle a force ducats elle eſt toute pucelle.

(1) Etat de la France, printed in 1657, pag. 92, 93.

(2) Anſelme, Palais de l'Honneur, pag. 414.

(3) Idem, Hiſt. des Grans Offic. pag. 232.

(4) Page 905.

(5) Above, remark [B] of the article GUISE (LEWIS de, &c.)

(6) Obſervations ſur l'Hiſtoire des Amours du grand Alcandre, pag. 299.

(7) Anſelme, Hiſt. des Grans Offic. pag. 266.

(8) Hiſt. Geneal. de la Maiſon Roiale, pag. 156.

(9) See the marginal note at the end of this remark.

I ſaid in the ſecond edition of this Dictionary, that Father Anſelm has not obſerved that the family of this mareſchal was originally from the kingdom Naples, as another writer, whoſe words I quoted, had obſerved. I ſhall confirm this, below, by the teſtimony of one author more, and ſhall ſhow that the marquis de L'HOSPITAL, one of the moſt profound mathematicians of the XVIIth century, was of the ſame family with this mareſchal of France [C].

L'honneur eſtropié, languiſſant, & perclus,
N'eſt plus rien qu'un idole en qui l'on ne croit plus (10).

I am not artful, have not eloquence,
To colour o'er a fact, virtue ſupplant,
And prove that mighty love is ſubject to no law.
. . . .
A girl debauch, and by ſtrong reaſons ſhew,
That love makes families illuſtrious,
Raiſes their fame, and, to the fair propitious,
Advances them to th' rank of gentlewomen.
. . . .
And to cut it ſhort,
Say, 'tis an honour to intrigue with courtiers,
Alledging many examples of this age;
That nothing's eaſier to be had than men;
And that a woman's whole concern ſhou'd be
T' enrich her coffers with the ſpoils of love:
What tho' the camp ſhe follow to Rochelle,
If ſhe has ſtore of gold, ſhe's ſtill a maid.

There are both truth and hyperboles in the expreſſions of this ſatiriſt. See the margin (11).

[C] I ſhall confirm this . . . . . by the teſtimony of another author, and will ſhow that the marquis de l'HOSPITAL, one of the profoundeſt Mathematicians . . . . . . was of the ſame family with this mareſchal of France.] The count of Saint-Meſme, who died December 4, 1701, 'was of the family of l'Hoſpital, much more illuſtrious on it's own account (ſince it's orgin is loſt in royal and conſular families) than famous for the eminent poſts and high dignities which in has enjoyed for more than than four hundred years in France, that it has been ſettled there. It is originally, of Naples, and bore the name of Gallucy, which it quitted for a French one, which was that of the eſtate of l'Hoſpital which one Gallucy, the head of that family in France, bought upon his arrival there (12).' You will obſerve that the count of Saint-Meſme is deſcended (13) from ALOLF DE L'HOSPITAL, Sieur de Choiſy, captain of the foreſt of Orleans, elder brother of CHARLES DE L'HOSPITAL, Sieur de Vitry, from whom the mareſchal of France is deſcended. Theſe two brothers were ſons of HADRIAN DE L'HOSPITAL and Ann Rouhault daughter of Joachim Rouhault mareſchal of France. He ſwore fealty to the king at Paris November 27, 1498. The count de Saint-Meſme was lieutenant-general of the king's armies, governour, bailif, and particular judge in Eyre of the foreſts of the county of Dourdan, firſt maſter of the horſe to Gaſton of France duke of Orleans; gentleman of Honour, and firſt maſter of the Horſe to the ducheſs Dowager of Orleans (14), and afterwards to the great ducheſs of Tuſcany (15). You will find an elogy of him in the book which I quote (16). He was married to Elizabeth Gobelin, daughter to Mr Gobelin counſellor of ſtate, and intendent of the armies, and left behind him two ſons. The eldeſt is the marquis DE L'HOSPITAL, author of the Analyſe des infiniment petits, or Analyſis of infinitely ſmall quantities. The younger is the count DE L'HOSPITAL, who enjoys the ſame poſt with the grand ducheſs of Tuſcany which his father held (17).

The marquis de l'Hoſpital, author of the Analyſe des infiniment petits, and one of the greateſt Mathematicians of our age, died at Paris February 2, 1704, aged forty three years. See his elogy in the Memoirs of Trevoux (18), and in the News from the Republic of Letters (19). 'He had married Madmoiſelle Romilley de la Chenelaie, with whom he lived in ſo ſtrict an uniion, that he even communicated his genius for the Mathematics to her. He has left four children by her, one ſon and three daughters (20).'

(10) Regnier. Sat. III, folio m. 12. He ſays, in Sat. XIII, folio 66, verſo, Que lors qu'on a du bien, il n'eſt ſi decrepite, Qui ne trouve (en donnant) couvercle à ſa marmite.

(11) See the remark of the article ESSARS (CHARLOTTE des), and you will find the mareſchal's ſecond marriage was poſterior to the death of his firſt wife, &c.

(12) Mercure Galant, of Jan. 1702, pag. 170, 171. See alſo the News from the Republic of Letters, June 1704, pag. 621, &c.

(13) Anſelme, Hiſt. des Grans Officiers, pag. 232.

(14) Wife to Gaſton of France.

(15) Mercure Galant. Januar. 1702, pag. 169.

(16) Id. ibid. pag. 172, &c.

(17) From the Mercure Galant. ibid. pag. 179, 180.

(18) In the addition to the month of February, 1704, pag. 24, &c, of the edit. of France. See alſo June 1704, pag. 1014, &c.

(19) June 1704, art. ii.

(20) Journ. Trevoux, June 1704, pag. 1016.

HOTMAN

HOTMAN (FRANCIS), in Latin Hotomanus (a), was one of the moſt learned civilians of the XVIth century. He was born the twenty third of Auguſt, 1524, at Paris, where this family, originally of Sileſia [A], had flouriſhed for ſome time. At fifteen years of age he was ſent to Orleans, there to ſtudy the civil-law, and he became capable of a doctor's degree in three years. His father, a counſellor in the parliament who had already deſigned his employment for him, cauſed him to return home, and entered him at the bar; but the young gentleman was quickly diſguſted with the wranglings of the court, and engaged deeply in the ſtudy of the Roman law, and polite learning. He reliſhed the new opinions, for which ſo many were put to death in the kingdom; and finding that he could not make profeſſion of them at Paris, he went to Lyons in the year 1547, where he publiſhed a book. This was the ſecond work that he put to the preſs [B]. Seeing that he had nothing to hope for as a ſubſiſtence from his father,

(a) So he writes his name at the beginning of his books. Many write it Hottomannus, or Hotomannus.

[A] His family was originally of Sileſia.] There are ſeveral families of the name of Hotman in Breſlaw, the capital city of Sileſia, from which are deſcended ſeveral others, ſettled in Luſatia, in Miſnia, in the country of Cleves, &c. LAMBERT HOTMAN (1), went into France to bear arms in the ſervice of Lewis XI (2), and married advantageouſly at Paris. JOHN HOTMAN, his eldeſt ſon was ſo rich, that he diſburſed vaſt ſums for the ranſome of Francis I (3). PETER HOTMAN, the laſt of Lambert's eighteen children, was chief juſtice in Eyre, and afterwards counſellor in parliament of Paris, Our FRANCIS HOTMAN was his eldeſt ſon (4). The Supplement to Moreri's Dictionary ſays, that HENRY HOTMAN, born at Cleves in the year 1466 was the firſt of that name who came into France, and that he came with Engilbert duke of Cleves, who was the firſt duke of Nevers.

[B] It was the ſecond work which he put to the preſs.] For he had already publiſhed a little book de gradibus cognationis, which was very much eſteemed. 'Pene puer libellum de gradibus cognationis adjuncto diagrammate publicavit à doctiſſimis viris in precio habitum, & mox à quodam haud ignobili Juriſconſulto probatum, ita ut eum ſuis in Inſtitutiones commentariis vehementur commendatum inſereret (5). —— When very young he publiſhed a book on the Degrees of Affinity, which has been greatly eſtemed by the learned, and was ſoon after ſo valued by a Civilian of no mean rank, that he publiſhed it in his Comment on the Inſtitutes, with great praiſes.' His ſecond work was a Commentary ad titulum Inſtitutionum de actionibus. The beauty of the ſtile, and the knowledge of the Roman Antiquities, that ſhined in that piece, gave him a great reputation (6). Mr Teiſſier (7) ſhould not have applied that fine commendation to the little book concerning the degrees of Affinity. Had he more attentively conſulted the work he quotes (8), he would not have taken the one for the other.

La Croix du Maine will tell you, that the French tranſlation, which Hotomanus made of Socrates's apology, written by Plato, was printed in the year 1549, at Lyons, for Sebaſtin Gryphius in 8vo.

[C] He

(1) Born at Emmerick, in the duchy of Cleves, according to Mr Baillet, in the Anti, art. cxxxi.

(2) Thus I correct the fault Lodovici VI, in Hotomanus's Life, of the Leipſic edition, 1686, and in that of Amſterdam, 1700.

(3) Redimendo Franciſco Regi ad Ticinum capto, ingentem pecuniæ vim ſolus fide ſua curaverit ſummo Galliæ bono, ſumma ſua cum laude. Petrus Neveletus Doſchius, in Vita Fr. Hottomanni, pag. m. 208.

(4) Id. ibid.

(5) Idem, Neveletus, in Vita Hottomanni, pag. 210.

(6) Juriſconſultis etiam magnis gratum ob Latini ſermonis elegantiam, & Rom. antiquitatis exquiſitam ſcientiam. Id. ibid.

(7) Addit. aux Eloges, Tom. II, pag. 115.

(8) Hotomanus's Life, written by Nevelet.

ther, he went to Lauſane [C], where the magiſtrates of Bern made him profeſſor of the Belles Lettres. He publiſhed ſome books there, and married a French gentlewoman (b), who had fled thither upon account of religion. His merit was ſo well known in all parts, that the magiſtrates of Straſburg offered to make him profeſſor of the civil-law; and whilſt he was diſcharging that office, he was ſought after by the duke of Pruſſia, and the landgrave of Heſſe. He did not accept thoſe invitations; but he did not ceaſe to go to the court of the king of Navarre, at the beginning of the troubles. He went twice into Germany to deſire ſuccours from Ferdinand in the name of the princes of the blood, and even in the name of the queen-mother (c). The ſpeech he made at the diet of Francfort is extant. Being returned to Straſburg, he yielded to the perſuaſions of John de Monluc, to go and teach the civil-law at Valence [D]; which he did ſo ſucceſsfully, as to reſtore the reputation of that univerſity. Three years after he went to profeſs it at Bourges, being invited thither by Margaret of France, ſiſter to king Henry II; but five months after he repaired to Orleans to the heads of the party, to whom his counſels were of notable ſervice. The peace which was made a month after, did not deliver him from the fear of a new ſtorm; for which reaſon he retired to Sancerre, and there waited for better times. It was there he wrote an excellent book de Conſolatione (d). He returned afterwards to his profeſſorſhip at Bourges, where he had like to have loſt his life, during the maſſacre of the year 1572. Having the good fortune to eſcape, he left France, fully reſolved to return thither no more, and betook himſelf to Geneva. He there read lectures of civil-law, and publiſhed ſome books with that ſtrength againſt the perſecutors, that he had great promiſes made him, to oblige him to write no more in that ſtrain: but he hearkened not to thoſe propoſals [E]. Some time after (b) She was a native of Orleans, and her name was Claudine Aubelin. Petrus Neveletus, ubi infra, citat. (23).

(c) See, below, citat. (23).

(d) His ſon got it printed after his father's death.

[C] He went to Lauſane.] Mr Teſſier ſays that Francis Hotman, after he had left France, retired to Geneva, and lived ſome time in Calvin's houſe (9). I believe he is in the right, tho' the life of Hotman, which he cites, does not mention it. Nevelet ſeems to have ſuppreſſed a thing, which he ſhould not have omitted. It is not very probable, that the magiſtrates of Bern ſhould have offered a profeſſor's chair, in the academy of Lauſane, to a young man of twenty three years of age, who lived at Lyons. But it is probable, they made this offer to him, if we ſuppoſe, that he lived at Geneva, and had got the love of Calvin. Thus you ſee the want of exactneſs that is found in the beſt books; becauſe commonly good authors are thoſe, who love to ſhorten a narration. They do not always take notice, ſo that by this contraction they ſometimes ſtrangle it. Brevis eſſe laboro, obſcurus fio (10). This may have been the caſe of Nevelet; or we may ſay, that not having found in the memoirs that were given him, the journey from Lyons to Geneva, he thought Francis Hotman left Lyons, only becauſe he was choſen profeſſor of the Belles Lettres at Lauſane (11). But let us not decide on the moſt probable ſide; for as there were already at Lauſane many eminent refugees, who both knew and loved the merit and piety of Francis Hotman (12), they might eaſily obtain from the magiſtrates of Bern an invitation to him, while he was at Lyons. Mr Teſſier obſerves, that it was by the mediation of Theodore Beza, that the town of Lauſane offered Hotman a profeſſorſhip of the Belles Lettres. I believe he is miſtaken, and that he had better have aſcribed it to Calvin's intereſt; for Hotman was profeſſor at Lauſane, before Beza went thither to profeſs the Greek tongue (13), and it is certain that Beza ſtood in need of Calvin's good offices to obtain that profeſſorſhip. Is it likely a man ſhould procure a profeſſor's chair for another, in a town, where he is not, and where he cannot ſettle himſelf but the intereeſt of others? Mr Teſſier, no doubt, believed, that Beza was profeſſor of the Greek tongue at Lauſane before Hotman was invited thither. Thus you ſee how important it is in the narrative of this ſort of things, to conſult well the dates and the niceties of Chronology.

[D] Being returned to Straſburg he yielded to the perſuaſion of John de Monluc, to go and teach the civil-law at Valence.] If Thuanus had conſulted the dates, he would not have ſaid that John de Monluc took Hotman from Lauſane to ſettle him at Valence; 'Lauſanæ primum docuit, INDE, à Joanne Monlucio 'Valentiæ Epiſcopo, & poſtea à Margarita Biturigum 'Duce evocatus repetitis vicibus Valentiæ & Avarici 'Biturigum, ubi eum aliquando audivi, evocatus, &c. '(14). —— He firſt taught at Lauſane, and from 'thence he was invited by John Monluc biſhop of Valence, and afterwards by Margaret, ducheſs of Berry, two ſeveral times to Valence and Bourges, where 'I heard him.' Theſe words repetitis vicibus were not underſtood by the French tranſlator: he thought they ſignified that Hotman taught the civil-law, ſometimes at Valence and ſometimes at Bourges (15), which is not the meaning, for he taught no longer at Valence, when he once had left it. The tranſlator ſhould therefore have ſaid, that the ducheſs of Berry invited him twice to Bourges, as may be ſeen in the body of this article. Thoſe who ſee in Hotman's life his ſucceſſive removals from one town to another, will make no great account of the memoirs that Thuanus was ſupplied with, ſince he ſays, that after the maſſacre of the year 1572. Hotman went to Montbeliard, and from thence to Baſil. He ſhould have ſaid, that he went to Geneva, and from thence to Baſil, and then to Montbeliard, afterwards to Geneva, any laſtly to Baſil.

[E] He publiſhed at Geneva (16) ſome books with that ſtrength againſt the perſecutors, that they made him great promiſes . . . . but he gave no ear to theſe propoſals.] This is what is ſaid of it by the author of his life (17), 'Ad Allobroges igitur iterum tan'quàm in portum ſe refert, ſcriptiſque aliquot erudi'tis contra fidem immò, per fidem ipſam cæſorum 'innocentiam conſtanter tuetur: & quidem adeò ef'ficaciter, ut qui mollem putabant futurum ejus in 'tanta calamitate animum, prolixis pollicitationibus 'hortarentur ab iſtiuſmodi ſcriptionis genere abſtine'ret: quibus ille hoc tantum repoſuit, Nunquam ſibi 'propugnatam cauſam quæ iniqua eſſet, nunquam quæ 'jure & legibus niteretur, deſertam præmiorum ſpe 'vel metu periculi; opprimi enim in bona cauſſa me'lius, quam male cedere. Non modo non excuſandum 'parricidium, ultro etiam defendendam cauſſam inno'centium. —— He therefore once more returned to 'Geneva, as to a ſafe port, and there, in ſeveral books, 'boldly defended the innocence of thoſe who were maſ'ſacred againſt all faith, or rather for their faith: 'This he did in ſo ſtrong a manner, that ſome who 'imagined that his ſpirit muſt needs be ſunk by his 'great diſtreſs, made him large offers if he would 'give over writing on that ſubject: to whom he an'ſwered, That he never had defended an unjuſt 'cauſe, and never had deſerted a juſt and honou'rable one, either for hope of rewards or fear of dan'gers, that it was better to be oppreſſed in a good 'cauſe, than baſely to quit it. That theſe cruel 'murders were not only not to be defended, but 'that we ought openly to defend the cauſe of the 'innocent.' A little after he ſpeaks of the book, de regni Galliæ ſtatu, which Hotman publiſhed about that time under the title of Franco-Gallia. It is a commendable work in point of learning, but very unworty of a French civilian, if we believe even many Proteſtants concerning it. Mr Teiſſier ſpeaks thus of it: His book intituled Franco-Gallia, drew upon him, WITH REASON, the cenſure of the true French-men. For in that work he endeavours to prove (18) that this kingdom which is the moſt flouriſhing in Chriſtendom, is not ſucceſſive, as the inheritances of private JUDGMENT concerning the book called the Franco-Gallia.

(9) Addit. aux Eloges, Tom. II, pag. 115.

(10) Horat. de Arte Poët. ver. 25, 26.

(11) In urbem Equeſtrium . . . ad humanorum quæ dicuntur literarum profeſſionem honorificè à Senatu Bernenſis Reipub. evocatus, cujus in ditione urbs illa ſe contulit. Neveletus, ubi ſupra, pag. 211.

(12) Id. ibid.

(13) Erant Lauſanæ tunc temporis doctrina & pietate viri inſignes Petrus Viretus Eccleſiæ Paſtor . . . Franciſcus Hottomannus eloquentiæ Profeſſor. In Vita Theodori Bezæ, apud Melchior. Adam. pag. 205.

(14) Thuan. lib. xcix, pag. 378, ad ann. 1590.

(15) See the elogies taken out of Thuanus by Mr Teiſſier, Tom. II, pag. 136, Edit. 1696.

(16) Mezerai is in the wrong to ſay, in his large Hiſtory, Vol. III, pag. 293, that Hotomanus was a fugitive in the Palatinate, when he publiſhed his Franco-Gallia.

(17) Pag. 221.

(18) This is only a tranſlation of Thuanus's Latin words, lib. lvii, pag. 49, ad ann. 1573.

after he removed to Baſil, where he taught the civil-law. The plague obliging him to leave it, he retired to Montbeliard, where he loſt his wife. He went afterwards to Geneva, where he wrote a book in defence of the rights of the king of Navarre [F]; after which he returned to Baſil and died there the twelfth of February 1590. He had refuſed to go to Leyden, where he was offered a profeſſor's chair. He had time to put his works in order, for a new edition (e), which did not appear till a long time after his death, in three volumes in fol. (f). They do not contain all that he had publiſhed [G]. Of all his writings, his Franco-Gallia, which he ſo much valued (g), is leaſt approved private perſons are, and that antiently our princes owed the crown to the ſuffrages of the nobility and the people: ſo that as antiently the power and authority of electing kings belonged to the ſtates of the kingdom, and to all the nation aſſembled in a body; ſo it was the ſtates who depoſed them from the government. Hereupon he brings in the examples of Philip de Valois, John, Charles V, Charles VI, and Lewis XI. But that which he principally inſiſts on, is to ſhew, that as women have ever been judged incapable of governing the kingdom, they ought alſo to be excluded from all public poſts, and adminiſtration (19). Add to this paſſage of Mr Teſſier the judicious words of Bongars, taken from a letter to Thuanus (20). 'I will freely confeſs to you de Franco-Gallia vellem parcius, and I wiſh I could do it more gently, both becauſe the book is not ſeaſonable, and alſo becauſe it ſeems to me that the good man is groſsly miſtaken in that diſpute. Grief (21) gave ſome colour to the work when it was firſt printed: and we ſuffer many words to eſcape us in an extream trouble, which we ſhould bluſh to hear repeated when the paſſion is over: I write to you my thoughts about it, not knowing what judgment you make of it. I am ſorry I did it not ſooner. I know well that the good man was well pleaſed with that piece; he ſhewed it by the repeated impreſſions of it. It is a diſtemper, with which many of our people, and too many are tainted, who would willingly have our monarchy reduced to an anarchy. If there be any evil in a thing, it doth not follow that it muſt be deſtroyed (22).' Bongars, you will ſay, has hit the mark: Hotman was in a paſſion againſt his country when he wrote that book, and not content to revenge himſelf on the preſent rulers, he endeavoured to diſcharge his reſentment upon the monarchy itſelf, and the whole body of the nation; and that with ſo little judgment, that he furniſhed the Leaguers with powerful arguments for the excluſion of Henry IV; for, according to his principles, the Catholics of France had a full right to elect the duke of Guiſe, king of France to the prejudice of the princes of the blood. A paſſionate writer, you will add, is not capable of thinking of the future, his thoughts are only intent upon the preſent; he conſiders not that the times may change, and that the doctrine which this day ſuits with the intereſt of our cauſe, will one time or other be as favourable to our enemies. This was manifeſt in France under Charles IX, and Henry III. Each party was obliged to confute itſelf, as Montagne has finely obſerved: See the remark [I]. It is certain that if Catherine de Medicis had embraced the reformation, and eſtabliſhed it all over France, Hotman would have written a fine book to prove that the regency of women was a very good thing, and agreeable to our fundamental laws. With what ſtrength would he not have refuted the Papiſts, who ſhould have written againſt this queen? The ſtrongeſt reaſon that the Proteſtants of France alledged to juſtify their taking up arms, was what Catherine de Medicis wrote to the prince of Condé. They therefore acknowledged the authority of this woman. Did not Hotman himſelf ſollicite ſuccours in Germany in this queen's name? Ab his paullo poſt, immo & ab ea quæ tum minorem annis Regem regnumque adminiſtrabat, in Germaniam bis miſſus eſt de Regis regnique rebus legatus, & auxilium a Cæſ. Ferdinando ordinibuſque Germaniæ rebus ruentibus petere juſſus. Exſtat dicta tum ab eo in comitiis Imperii Francofordienſibus oratio (23). We ſhall ſee elſewhere (24) that he is accuſed of dealing unfairly in his Franco-Gallia, and we will endeavour to ſay ſomething in defence of this learned man.

[F] . . . And wrote a book in defence of the rights of the king of Navarre.] It was that of the right of the nephew againſt the uncle (25). The League had put into the head of Cardinal de Bourbon, uncle to the king of Navarre, to ſet up for the lawful ſucceſſor, and an Italian civilian was employed to write a treatiſe of the right of the uncle againſt the nephew. Francis Hotman learnedly confuted him. We will cite Father Maimbourg: Antony Hotman, ſays he (26), advocate-general to the League in the Parliament of Paris, wrote the treatiſe of the uncle againſt the nephew to ſucceed to the crown. But it happened by a very lucky and pleaſant adventure, that the civilian, Francis Hotman brother to the advocate, having read this book, which was diſperſed in Germany, where he then was, maintained with great ſtrength, reaſon, and learning, the right of the nephew againſt the uncle; and in a learned piece he publiſhed on that ſubject, he manifeſtly expoſed the weakneſs and falſe reaſonings of his adverſary's treatiſe, without knowing that it was his brother, who had not put his name to it. There are many miſtakes in theſe words. I. It is not true that Francis Hotman wrote againſt an unknown author. He wrote againſt one Matthew Zampini, of Recanati, an Italian civilian. 'Id Matthæus Zampinus Racanatenſis de trivio J. C. à fœderatis pecunia ſubornatus, edita conſultatione probare conatus fuerat, quam Fr. Hotomannus magni nominis noſtra ætate J. C. contraria conſultatione itidem edita confutavit (27). ——— Matthew Zampini, a mercenary lawyer, being hired by the Leaguers, endeavoured to prove this, in a treatiſe which he publiſhed, and which was anſwered in a book written by Francis Hotman a famous civilian.' II. And conſequently it is not true that he wrote againſt his brother. III. It is not true that he wrote this book in 1589 (§ α): it was about the year 1585, as Thuanus obſerves: which agrees with Nevelet, who makes him then ſixty years old. IV. He was then at Geneva, and not in Germany. V. Antony Hotman was not one of the advocate-generals of the League in 1589, and was not ſo till two years after (28), when John le Maître, who diſcharged that employment with Lewis d'Orleans, was promoted to the office of preſident au Mortier. Preſident Briſſonius was already dead. VI. It was Antony Hotman who wrote againſt his brother Francis Hotman, and not the later againſt Antony Hotman. 'Poſtea & peculiari libro quem conſultationi à Franciſco fratre pro Navarro editæ . . . oppoſuiſſe videri voluit, (Antonius Hotmannus) rationes amplificatæ (29). ——— Afterwards theſe reaſons were laid down more at length in a particular book, which he (Anthony Hotman) would have the world think that he wrote, in anſwer to a treatiſe which his brother Francis had publiſhed in favour of the king of Navarre.'

[(§ α) I have a treatiſe intituled: Ad Tractatum Matthæi Zampini J. C. Recannatenſis, de ſucceſſione prerogativæ primi Principis Franciæ; Ornatiſſimi viri P. C. A. F. civis Pariſienſis, & Regii Conſiliarii, Reſponſio. It is in 8vo, and conſiſts of eighty pages printed by the heirs of Wechelius, 1589. Francis Hotman was a Pariſian, and likewiſe he was counſellor of ſtate to the king of Navarre, who came to the crown of France, by the name of Henry IV. Hotman being ſtill alive. So this may be his book, Rem. Crit.]

[G] The edition of his works doth not contain all that he had publiſhed.] The burleſque pieces which he wrote againſt Matharel, and Papyrius Maſſo, were left out, as alſo the book he publiſhed at Geneva in the year 1553, under the name of Francis de Villiers, Ad Remundum Rufum defenſorem Rom. Pontificis contra Carolum Molinæum de ſtatu primitivæ Eccleſiæ, &c (30): the Nullitatis proteſtatio adverſus formulam concordiæ (31), which he publiſhed under the name of Johannes Palmerius; and the Apology of this laſt book, in which he diſguiſed himſelf under the name of Johannes Franciſcus Aſpaſtis Salaſſi V. D. M. (32). His Anti-Tribonianus, printed in French in 1603, the Latin verſion whereof was printed at approved, and has perſuaded ſome perſons, that he was the author of the Vindiciæ contra Tyrannos [H], which is a book intirely agreeable to republican notions. Some time after, his own maxims were retorted upon him [I]. It is hard to avoid this inconvenience

---

(e) Taken from his Life, written by Petrus Neveletus Doſchius, of whom we ſhall ſpeak in the remark [O]. It is one of the ten Lives of Civilians, reprinted at Leipſic, by Leickherus, in 1686. I make uſe of that edition.

(f) They were printed at Geneva by the care of James Lectius, in 1599.

(g) See the remark [E].

(19) Teiſſier, Additions aux Eloges de Mr de Thou, Tom. II, pag. 139.

(20) It was written from Straſburg in 1595, upon occaſion of Hotman's Life, written by Nevelet.

(21) The original has it la doute, I believe it ſhould be la douleur.

(22) Lettres de Bongars, pag. 651, at the Hague, 1695.

(23) Nevelet. in Vita Hotomanni.

(24) In the remark [H].

(25) Vexatam illam rebus ita poſtulantibus & magnis viris hortantibus tractavit controverſiam, de ſucceſſione inter patruum & fratris filium, atque univerſum de jure ſucceſſionis regiæ in regno Galliæ. Nevelet. ubi ſupra, pag. 824.

(26) Hiſt. de la Ligue, livr. iv, pag. m. 367, ad ann. 1589.

(27) Thuan. lib. lxxxi, init ad ann. 1585.

(28) Mezerai, Hiſt. de France, Tom. III, pag. 999.

(29) Thuan. lib. xci, ſub fin. See also Mezerai, ubi ſupra, pag. 708.

(30) Epitome, Bibl. Geſneri, pag. m. 239.

(31) See Placcius, de Pſeudon. pag. 233.

(32) Placcius, ibid. pag. 153.

at Hamburgh in 1647, was alſo left out. Concerning this book, ſee the curious Mr Baillet (33). Laſtly, his Brutum Fulmen was left out, which is not a burleſque piece Thuanus ſays. It is a very ſerious work, in which Hotman refutes the Bull which Sixtus V publiſhed in 1585, againſt the king of Navarre and the prince of Condé. ‘ Poſtea, ſays Thuanus (34) & in cenſuram illam ſcripſit Franciſcus Hotmannus J. C. joculari iſto ſtilo, libroque Brutum Fulmen titulum fecit, quo & de B. Franciſci & B. Dominici vita ac moribus veteres hiſtoriæ, ab obſolete devotis viris ſcriptæ ridicule diſcutiuntur. —— Afterwards Francis Hotman, a civilian, wrote againſt that Bull, in a burleſque ſtile, and intituled his book Brutum Fulmen, in which he, in a very ludicrous manner, criticiſeth the ancient accounts of the lives and actions of St Francis and St Dominic, written by weak and ſuperſtitious men.’ There is nothing leſs than this treated of, in that tract of Francis Hotman. Deckher has been in this deceived (35) by Thuanus, but he has committed a fault of his own: He will have this learned civilian to have left France on account of that piece; which is falſe. Hotman quitted France in 1572, fully reſolved never to ſet foot in it again (36). The Brutum fulmen was publiſhed in 1585, as Deckher obſerves againſt Goldaſtus, who places the edition of it in the year 1586. I have ſaid nothing of the tract de regno vulvarum, which d'Aubigné aſcribes to our Hotman in the third chapter of the firſt book of the Confeſſion de Sanci: I know not what it is (§β).

[(β) The following epigram was in every body's hands, about the year 1561,* occaſioned by the greateſt part of the kingdoms of Europe, being then governed, or at leaſt adminiſtrated, by women.

Vulva regit Scotos (a), hæres (b) tenet illa Britannos, Flandros & Batavos, nunc notha vulva (c) regit.
Vulva regit populos quos ſignat Gallia portu (d)
  Et fortes Gallos Itala vulva regit (e).
His furiam furiis, vulvam conjungite vulvis,
  Sic natura capax omnia Regna capit.
Ad Medicem † artem incertam Gallia ſaucia tendit ‡
  Non uti Medicis eſt medicina tibi.
Non credas Medicis, vena qui ſanguinis hauſta
  Conantur vires debilitare tuas.
Ut Regi, matrique ſuæ ſis fida Deoque,
  Utere conſilio Gallia docta meo,
Et pacem tu inter proceres non ponito bellum,
  Hoſpita-(f)-lis Artus rodit agitque tuos.

This poſſibly is the pretended book de regno vulvarum, aſcribed by d'Aubigné to Francis Hotman. This lawyer was a Latin poet, and his Franco-Gallia which he publiſhed about twelve or thirteen years after, proves that he did not approve of female adminiſtrations. REM. CRIT.]

[H] He has been thought to be author of the Vindiciæ contra Tyrannos.] When I mentioned this work in the project of this Dictionary, I ſaid (37) that the error of thoſe who aſcribed Junius Brutus's book to Francis Hotman was a ſmall one, ‘ Hotman, continued I, left France for his religion, and tho' he was not like thoſe who fly from perſecution breathing out threatnings and ſlaughter (38), as fiercely as the perſecutors themſelves, yet he nevertheleſs complained and murmured in his retreat. He wrote a book intituled Franco-Gallia, to ſhew that the French monarchy is not what it is thought to be, and that of right, the people are the true ſovereigns in it. This was the reaſon that made it believed that he was the author of Junius Brutus's work; beſides, there are many maxims of the Franco-Gallia ſcattered in it. Barclay refutes only this laſt reaſon, which ſeems to him plauſible enough, and pretends to ſhew the weakneſs of it by ſomething that is ſtill more plauſible; which is, ſays he (39), that Brutus makes uſe of ſeveral arguments, which Hotman laughed at and refuted, and falls into ſuch childiſh errors as to the civil-law, that ſuch a man as Hotman could not be capable of. This is more obliging to this learned civilian, than what has been ſaid by Boeclerus. I wiſh, ſays he, Hotman had not ſo obſtinately appeared among the authors, who ſound an alarm againſt kings, and by their private authority convert them into tyrants with ſuch querks and cavils, and not only corrupt ſound Philoſophy, but alſo the Holy Scriptures. I wiſh he had not given this bad example to others in his Franco-Gallia, and that he had not falſified hiſtory more than once, in order to offer incenſe to his prejudices with too ſervile a complaiſance. The Greek Phraſe of Boeclerus has much more emphaſis in it, Εἰς τὸ δȣλεύειν τῇ ὑποθέσει, etiam hiſtoriam non ſemel corrumpit (40) . . . (41) I cannot forbear ſaying that Boeclerus does very much abuſe Hotman, who, to repeat it once more, was none of thoſe who, like ſome Engliſh Catholics of the laſt century, leave their country for religion, in a menacing manner, throwing about fire and flames, vomiting a thouſand imprecations, thundering out Maranathas, and endeavouring to re-enter it with ſword in hand, or by the help of the moſt exterminating armies; in a word, deſiring a return, preceeded, as the departure out of Egypt was, by all plagues of Pharaoh, not excepting the paſſage of the deſtroying angel. Hotman contented himſelf with ſmart ſtrokes of the pen, and with touching upon ſome things which were not pleaſing. It is true, that without thinking of it, he laboured for the League (42), and forged weapons for Bellarmin: It is alſo true that his blows were like thoſe of the Parthians (43); I mean, that, in the condition of a fugitive, he fought better than he would have done had he not retreated. But his writings are far from deſerving to be branded in the ſame manner with many others, that have been publiſhed in the like circumſtances. For example, the Engliſh Catholics have in vain made ſatires and bitter invectives againſt queen Elizabeth (44); this is all loſt paper, of which wiſe men make no manner of uſe in any party. However it be, the appearances were a little againſt Hotman, as to the book of Junius Brutus, and, as I have already ſaid, it was a very ſmall error to make him the author of the Vindiciæ contra Tyrannos.'

[I] His own maxims were retorted upon him ſome time after.] It was by accident, and by a very common fate which changes the intereſts of parties, that Hotman's work was ſubject to the inconvenience I ſpeak of. The revolutions of France ſo changed the ſcene, that the maxims of each party were reciprocally metamorphoſed into their contraries. Montagne pleaſantly redicules the Catholics. See, ſays he (45), with what horrible impudence we toſs about divine reaſons, and how profanely we reject them, and lay hold of them again, according as fortune has changed our ſituation in theſe public ſtorms. This important propoſition, whether it be lawful for ſubjects to rebel and arm againſt their prince for the defence of religion, was warmly maintained the laſt year by a certain party, and as warmly denied by the other party: but ſee now who maintains the affirmative, and whether arms rattle leſs for this cauſe than for that. We burn thoſe people who ſay, truth ſhould ſubmit to the yoke of our neceſſity; but does not France do worſe than ſay ſo? &c. As long as the world is a world, there will be every where ambulatory doctrines, dependant on times and places: true birds of paſſage, which are in one country in the ſummer, and in another in the winter: wandering lights, that, like the Carteſian comets, illuminate ſucceſſively ſeveral vortices. Whoever pretends to ſet up for a cenſor upon this occaſion, will be looked on as a moroſe critic, and a native of Plato's common-wealth. And ſo Hotman ought not to be reſponſible for the advantage, the famous advocate of the Holy-League found means to draw from his Franco-Gallia. ‘ They cannot complain, (it is Lewis d'Orleans who ſpeaks this in the name of the Engliſh Catholics) that they are dealt with as they deal with others. Follow their councils, tread in the paths they have traced out to eſtabliſh themſelves, and you will eſtabliſh your ſelves, and involve them in ſhame and confuſion. In their Franco-Gallia, which is

---

(33) Baillet, in his Anti, art. cxxxi.

(34) Lib. lxxxii, pag. 33, ad ann. 1585.

(35) De ſcriptis Adeſpotis, pag. 84, Edit. 1686.

(36) Neque unquam poſtea induci potuit, ut in patria conſiſtendum ſibi judicaret: non Andegavenſis ipſius Ducis literis inflexus, non promiſſis, non denique cum ab eo Magiſter ſupplicum apud ſe libellorum dictus eſſet: hoc ſæpe uſurpans: Fruſtra Neptunum accuſat, iterum qui naufragium facit. Nevelet ubi ſupra, pag. 221.

* Le Laboureur, Addit. aux Memoires de Caſtel. Tom. I, pag. 773.

(a) Mary Stewart.

(b) Queen Elizabeth.

(c) Margaret, ducheſs of Parma, natural daughter to Charles V.

(d) Catherine of Auſtria, ſiſter to Charles V, widow of John III, king of Portugal, and regent during the minority of Sebaſtian, her ſon.

(e) Catherine de Medicis.

† Medicam.

‡ Tendis.

(f) An alluſion to the name of chancellor de l'Hoſpital, to whom Catherine de Medicis, principally owed the regency.

(37) Pag. 90.

(38) Ἐμπνέων ἀπειλῆς καὶ φόνȣ, ſays the Scripture in the Acts of the Apoſtles, chap. ix, ver. i, concerning Saul.

(39) Barclay, lib. iii, contra Monarchomachos, cap. i, pag. 311.

(40) In Grot. de Jure Belli & Pacis, lib. i, cap. iv, pag m. 275.

(41) In the Project, pag 92.

(42) See the following remark.

(43) Navita boſphorum Pœnus perhorreſcit . . . Miles ſagittas & celerem fugam Parthi. Horat. Od. xiii, lib. iii,

(44) See the article ELIZABETH, remark [K].

(45) Eſſais, book ii, cap. xii, pag. m. 103. Mezerai makes the ſame obſervation, pag. 792, of the third volume of the Hiſtory of France.

venience in writing upon ſome ſubjects. He was well paid for his Brutum Fulmen [K] by the king of Navarre. He was one of thoſe who would never, conſent to drawing of their pictures (b), but his was drawn when he was in his laſt agony. He left two ſons and four daughters. JOHN HOTMAN, Sieur de Villiers, his eldeſt ſon, is thought to be the author of the Anti-Chopinus, a burleſque piece, and of the Anti-Colazon, which is an apology for his treatiſe of the embaſſador, in which he was, as they ſay, the plagiary of Charles Paſchal. See Mr Baillet (i). Moreri has not been guilty of many faults [L].

(b) Nevelet. ibid. pag. 229.

(i) In his Anti, art. cxviii, & cxix.

I wonder that a thing was forgotten in the life of Francis Hotman, which is very glorious for him, viz. that at the age of twenty three years he read public lectures in the ſchools of Paris [M]. The author of his life has alſo omitted, (and I do not wonder at ‘ one of the moſt deteſtable books that ever ſaw the light, and was compoſed to put all France in a flame, they ſay, that it is lawful to chooſe a king to ones own taſte. Tell then the Heretics that the king of Navarre is not to your taſte, and therefore let him keep in his Bern, till you deſire to have him. Thus they ought to be whipped with their own rods, that they may know that the powerful hand of GOD chaſtizes them, with their own wicked counſels, and pernicious writings (46).’ That book of Hotman is at the bottom a fine piece, well written, and full of learning, and ſo much the more vexatious to the contrary party, becauſe the author contents himſelf to cite matters of fact, as he himſelf repreſents to his cenſurers. ‘ Cur vel Maſſonus, ſays he (47), vel Matharellus Francogalliæ ſcriptori & ſimplici hiſtoriarum narratori ita terribiliter iraſcitur? Nam ut dicit Sylva nup. lib. 1. num. 10. quomodo poteſt aliquis ei ſuccenſere qui eſt tantum relator & narrator facti? Francogalliſta enim tantum narrationi & relationi ſimplici, vacat, quod ſi aliena dicta delerentur, charta remaneret alba. —— Why is Maſſo, or Matharellus, ſo very angry with the writer of the Franco-Gallia, who only barely relates facts? for as the Sylva Nuptialis ſays, how can any body be in a paſſion with a perſon who is only a relater of a fact? for the writer of that book doth nothing but relate, and if his quotations from other writers were taken away nothing would be left but clean paper.’ He was reproached as if his book looked like the production of a drunken, furious, and mad-man: to which he anſwers, that nothing could be more unſufferably impudent than this aſſertion, ſince he had conſtantly preſerved in that book the character of a moderate and ſedate relater (48). This is a wonderful advantage in ſuch ſort of books. For the reſt, tho' this anſwer be written in a burleſque ſtyle, yet it contains a thouſand things that ought to be underſtood ſeriouſly. Ridentem dicere verum quid vetat (49)? ſuch is, for inſtance, what he ſays to his adverſary, that it is not ſufficient for him to have brought in his accuſation, and given bail de Lite proſequenda; but that it is farther neceſſary he ſhould expreſsly engage to ſubmit to the law of retaliation, in caſe he ſhould be convicted of calumny. Sed adhuc requiritur tertius ut ſe expreſſe obliget ad pœnam talionis, in caſu quo probetur calumniator; quod probatur per L. ult C. de calumniat. & omnes Canoniſtas, ſed maxime per Hieronym. de Zanetinis in repetit. cap. 1. Extr. de accuſat. De quo ſi ſumus concordes, & Matharellus ſe ſubjiciat talioni in caſu quod calumniæ convincatur, totum negotium noſtrum bene vadit, niſi fortè &c (50).

If we believe a hiſtorian, who had been a miniſter, that piece of Hotman did not pleaſe all the Proteſtants, nor diſpleaſe all the Catholics of France, and was not written without ſome relation to the cabal of mareſchal d'Amville. A little after, ſays he (51), the duke of Alençon, his majeſty's brother, retired from court with ſeveral lords, who had been gained by the ſaid mareſchal d'Amville; and taking the name of malecontents, they joined with the Huguenots. Some of which began to write in another ſtrain than formerly: and Hotman the Civilian, in his Franco-Gallia, undertook to prove, that the people of France had formerly a ſupreme authority not only to elect their kings, but alſo to ſet aſide the ſons of their kings, and to chooſe ſtrangers: he ſays upon that ſubject many things, praiſing the people that curb the licentiouſneſs of their kings and bring them to reaſon. After treating of many other matters, he falls upon the regency of queens, the mothers of kings. This he did becauſe the queen-mother had been declared regent till the return of the king of Poland her ſon: in ſhort, he alledged our antient hiſtories right or wrong, according to his paſſion. This book was agreeable to ſome Proteſtants, and to ſome united Catholics, who were fond of innovations, but not to all. D'Aubigné gives the ſame plan of this book; but he ſays it was publiſhed (52) in 1573. While Charles the IXth was alive. Thuanus (53) and Mezerai (54) who give the ſame plan of it, place it, the one ſimply under the reign of Charles IX, the other, before the departure of the king of Poland. Which overthrows Cayet's hypotheſis; viz. That the regency conferred on queen Catherine at Charles IXth's death, was one of the grievances of Francis Hotman. It is certain his work was printed before the queen was declared regent by the edict of the 30th of May 1574. But he foreſaw perhaps that it would be ſo, and it is very likely he had her in view in what he ſaid againſt a female regency. He remembered the miſchiefs that princeſs had cauſed in her former regency. This great civilian who had quitted the poſt of counſellor in the parliament of Paris for his religion, had done better to anſwer his adverſaries ſeriouſly and modeſtly (55), than to uſe a burleſque ſtile. See what Mr Baillet ſays of it, pag. 336. Tom 2. of his Anti.

[K] He was well paid for his Brutum Fulmen.] We will begin our comment with theſe words of the author of his Life. ‘ His meritis præmium deberi cum intelligeret Henricus tum Navarræ Rex ultro codicillos ad eum miſit Senatoriæ in Conſiſtorio ſuo dignitatis: cujus tamen eum fructum non tulit, quem beneficus Princeps voluerat: ac opinor in tantis rerum omnium anguſtiis factum, ut ex annuo quod debebatur ſalario, vix ad eum quidquam, ſicut audio pervenerit (56). —— Henry IV, who was then king of Navarre, underſtanding that by theſe ſervices he had deſerved ſome mark of diſtinction, of his own accord ſent him letters appointing him one of his counſellors of ſtate, from which dignity however he did not reap the fruit, which that generous prince intended; for I am informed, that, by reaſon of the public neceſſities of theſe times, he received little or nothing of the ſalarly annexed to it.’ Bongars, to whom Nevelet dedicated Hotman's Life, made an obſervation upon this place (57). ‘ There is another paſſage. Having ſaid, that the king had upon his writing the Brutum Fulmen, given him a place of counſellor of ſtate, Cujus tamen eum fructum non tulit quem beneficus princeps voluerat (58). — But that he had never reaped the fruit from it which that generous prince intended. I aſſure you, Sir, the king never bought a book ſo dear as that: it was paid far above it's worth. You will tell me, that I ſhould have given my advice upon theſe paſſages ſooner; but it often happens, (and to me but too frequently) that we never conſider but when it is too late. I wrote my thoughts to Mr Hotman about the firſt (59). I do not touch upon the ſecond, he might poſſibly be offended at it, not knowing how the matter went.’ Note, that Nevelet does not ſpeak there of the Brutum Fulmen, as Bongars ſuppoſes, but of the book againſt Zampini de ſucceſſione inter patruum & fratris filium.

[L] Moreri has not been guilty of many faults.] I. He ſuppoſes falſly, that Hotman was ſaved by his ſcholars at Bourges, at another time beſide that of the maſſacre; that is, of one event he makes two. II. The year of his death is not well fixed; it ſhould have been 1590, inſtead of 1591. III. He ſhould not impute that miſtake to Spondanus, by citing him under the year 1591. n. 22. for it is under the number of the preceding year that he ſpeaks of Hotman's death.

[M] At the age of twenty three years, he read public lectures in the ſchools of Paris.] I prove it by theſe at it,) certain things which Baudouin had publiſhed againſt him, and which would horribly ſtain his memory, if they were true [N]. One could not give any credit to them,

---

(46) Advertiſſement des Catholiques Anglois, pag. 74, 75. Edit. 1587, in 8vo.

(47) Matagonis de Matagonibus, Monitoriale adverſus Italogalliam ſive Antifrancogallinm Antonii Matharelli. It is a piece of Hotman's in a Macaronic ſtile.

(48) Quod dicit Francogalliam compoſitam ab auctore bene poto in aliquo œnopolio, & eum evomuiſſe ſcriptum plenum furoris & inſaniæ, video multos auctoris amicos, dictum iſtud appellare meretriciam impudentiam flagris & carcere dignam . . . Ubi ullum iracundi animi ſignam? Ubi vox ulla perturbati animi in toto libro ac non potius ſedatæ & moderatæ narrationis? Id. ibid.

(49) Horat. Sat. I, lib. i, ver. 24, 25.

(50) Matagonis Monit. ibid.

(51) Peter Victor Cayet, avant-propos de la Chronologie novenaire.

(52) Hiſt. Univerſ. Tom. II. pag. 670. Simler, in his Epitome of Geſner's Bibliotheque, places the impreſſion of the Franco-Gallia, in 1573, and he is in the right. That book was printed at Geneva, by Jacobus Stoerius in the year 1573. The epiſtle dedicatory to the elector Palatine is dated the twenty firſt of Auguſt, 1573.

(53) Thuan. Hiſtor. lib. lvii.

(54) Hiſt. de France, Tom. III, in folio, pag. 293.

(55) Antony Matharel & Papyrius Maſſo.

(56) Nevel. ubi ſupra, pag. 225.

(57) Lettres de Bongars, pag. 651, at the Hague, 1695.

(58) Theſe words are very incorrect in the edition of Bongars's Letters, which I quote. I inſert them as they ought to be.

(59) That is, what concerns the Franco-Gallia. See, above, the words of Bongars, in the remark [E], citat. (22).

theſe words of Stephen Paſquier (60): ‘I aſſure you, that one of the moſt fortunate things that I think I met with in my youth, was that on the next day after our Lady's aſſumption in the year 1546, Hotman and Balduin began their firſt Law lectures in the ſchools of this city of Paris; the former at ſeven of the clock in the morning, reading the title de Notionibus; the latter at two of the clock in the afternoon, reading the title de Publicis Judiciis, before a great number of auditors. And that very day I began to ſtudy the civil-law under thoſe two learned men.’

[N] Certain things which Baudoin has publiſhed . . . . . would horribly ſtain his memory if they were true.] Baudouin aſſures us, that Hotman was excomunicated at Strasburg for adultery. Argentinæ propter adulterium excommunicarat ſodalem tuum Hottmannum (Petrus Alexander) (61). Theſe words are addreſſed to Beza. The author had already mentioned this with more circumſtances, and had added, that Hotman alſo loſt his canonry and his academical office. ‘Recitata tunc quoque noſtris fuit cauſa tui Hotmanni, nempe propter quod facinus illic aliquando primum fuiſſet excomunicatus abs ſuo Gallo concionatore Petro Alexandro, te quidem propter antiquam ſocietatem ſubmurmurante, ſed aſſentiente tamen tuo ſi minus parente, at certe avo Gulielmo Farello, ſæpius illum juriſperditum appellante. Addebant & complura ejuſdem generis quæ pervulgata erant per Joannem Infantium, teſtem valde idoneum, & cujus non ſolum opera, ſed & opibus quandiu opus habuiſti, tam liberaliter es abuſus, ut fidem ei detrahere vix audeas. Altera cauſa fuit expoſita cur tuus ille Hotmannus (cujus cauſa non eſt abs te ſejuncta) ut antea Eccleſia, ſic deinde ſchola & ſuo Canonicatu pulſus eſſet: tandemque quid in eo Sturmius ipſe graviſſime accuſaret narratum eſt, & perlecta Sturmiana adverſus eum terribilis expoſtulatio, quæ profecto non modo de iſtius flagitiis, ſed & de veſtræ conjurationis myſteriis narrabat nimis multa (62). —— At the ſame time we were told the ſtory of your friend Hotman, to wit, the crime for which he had been there firſt excommunicated by his own French miniſter, Peter Alexander, and that you indeed murmured at it, on account of your ancient friendſhip with him, but that William Farel, who if he is not your father is certainly your grandfather, conſented to it, and gave him the name of Juriſperditus. They likewiſe told us a great many things of the ſame nature, which they had from John Infantius, a very proper evidence, and to whoſe intereſt and purſe you ſo liberally abuſed in the time of your neceſſity, that you dare not call his authority in queſtion. We alſo were informed, for what reaſon your friend Hotman (whoſe cauſe and your's are pretty much the ſame) who had formerly been thrown out of the church, was alſo depoſed from his canonry and his academical office: and laſt of all what things even Sturmius accuſed him off, and we read Sturmius's expoſtulation againſt him, which indeed contained not only a hiſtory of his crimes, but too many of the myſteries of your cabal.’ All theſe things had preceded the year 1562. Baudouin a little after (63) relates, that having known Hotman at Paris, as a perſon who loved learning, he had adviſed him to go and ſee Geneva; that he received him in his houſe at Strasburg, with all civility, as an old friend, when Hotman retired thither, after having deſired his good offices for a law profeſſorſhip, and expreſſed a great diſlike to his teaching at Lauſane (64), and that he quickly perceived he harboured a viper in his boſom, ſince Hotman endeavoured all that was poſſible to ruin him by ſecret practices. Here is one of his tricks: having by his fraudulent contrivances, moved Duarenus to ſend him an invective againſt Baudouin; he diſperſed it all over the town, taking care however, that Baudouin ſhould not know it. He was at laſt obliged by Sturmius to go to him, and bear his reproaches, and he expreſſed an extream regret for his conduct. A fragment of the letter which Sturmius writ to him (65) is produced, in which he accuſes him of uſing a great many knaviſh arts to ſupplant Baudouin. His plot ſucceeded; for he made Baudouin weary of Straſburg. So that he went to ſeek another poſt (66), and Hotomanus ſucceeded him. All this is to be found in Baudouin's third anſwer to Calvin. He had already in the ſecond alledged this letter of Sturmius, and he had drawn many things out of it to Hotman's diſadvantage. He had mentioned a paſſage of it, which contains a reproach of an execrable perjury. Hotman, the very day that he received the ſacrament, proteſted to Sturmius, that he wiſhed the ſacrament he had received might be turned into a devil, if he denied falſly what he denied (67). And yet, adds Sturmius, he denied a thing that was moſt true. Baudouin mentions this as a proof, that his adverſary, who undertook to diſpute about the euchariſt, made no great account of it, and he takes this occaſion to reproach him, that he had been excluded from the euchariſt in Germany for adultery. ‘Etiam de myſterio Cœnæ Dominicæ diſputat, & me cum ſua Gallica (ut vocat) Eccleſia non idem ſentire narrat, qui ab ea propter Clodianum facinus in Germania excommunicatus aliam quæcunque illi fortaſſe patuit menſam occupavit. Vis ſcire quanti faciat totum iſtud myſterium tuus Myſtagogus? Audi Sturmium (68). —— He likewiſe diſputes concerning the myſtery of the Euchariſt, and pretends that I do not agree in my ſentiments about it with his church of France (as he calls it) from which he being excommunicated in Germany for the crime of Clodius, embraced the next table that chance offered to him, to which he could procure admittance. Would you know what regard this explainer of myſteries of your's has to that whole myſtery? ask Sturmius.’ Here is another paſſage of this ſecond anſwer of Baudouin (69). ‘Nonne ille eſt qui . . . . . Sileſium ſe eſſe finxit, cum in Germania negaret ſe eſſe Gallum ut in aulam Auſtriacam irreperet? Nonne ille eſt qui cum tuam (70) Eccleſiam clam fugeret & ſcholam, in qua tamen docuit aliquot annis Grammaticam, depoſita Juriſconſulti perſona, venit in Germaniam tuis ad Sturmium literis inſtructus quæ Sturmium feſellerunt? Nonne ille eſt cujus (ut nunc dicebam) vitam perfidiæ, nequitiæ, ſceleris, & omnium maleficiorum plenam ipſe Sturmius nuper deſcripſit? . . . Nonne ille eſt magnus ardelio, qui cum in Germania Principes miris modis eſt ludificatus, huc & illuc diſcurrens, modo in Gallia tumultuatur, modo ad Rheni ripas adverſus Regem ſuum milites cogit? Nonne ille eſt quem Sturmius . . . oſtendit etiam Galliæ Principibus plus quam proditoriè maledicere, cujuſque lingua nullum veneficium magis veneficum eſſe ait & probat? Nonne ille eſt qui ſuperioribus annis in Germania pinxit ſive ſuum ſive tuum tumultum Amboſianum, & Tigrim (71) peperit, & ejus generis formulas quotidie concipit novus magiſter libellorum, non (ut jactabat) ſupplicum ſed famoſorum? Denique nonne eſt ille tenebrio qui ad me aliquando ſcripſit, σκοτιϛέον ἐν τῷ νῦν χρόνῳ (72). —— Is it not he . . . who pretended to be a Sileſian, when he was in Germany, denying that he was a Frenchman, that he might inſinuate himſelf into the Auſtrian court? Is it not he who having fled from your church and ſchool, where, laying aſide the character of a civilian, he for ſome years taught grammar, came into Germany with your letters of recommendation to Sturmius, by which Sturmius was deceived? Is it not he whom Sturmius himſelf (as I ſaid before) accuſeth of perfidy, treachery, and all manner of crimes? . . . Is not he that buſy body, who after having in the moſt unheard-of manner deceived the princes of Germany, now wanders about, ſometimes raiſing ſeditions in France, at other times on the banks of the Rhine, levying troops againſt his ſovereign? Is it not he whom Sturmius . . . proves to have ſlandered even the princes of France in a worſe than treacherous manner, and whoſe tongue he ſays, and proves it too, is more venomous than poiſon itſelf. Is it not he who ſome years ago deſcribed his or your tumult at Amboiſe, and brought forth the tyger, and who is daily hatching ſuch ſeditious libels, and not humble petitions as he pretends? In fine, is it not that ſcoundrel who once wrote to me, that In theſe times one ought to ſeek darkneſs.’

Now this is the reaſon why I have made a diſtinction between what we find in Baudouin's ſecond and third anſwer. Beza has confuted the ſecond, but has ſaid nothing againſt the third; and therefore the third is not of ſo great conſequence againſt our civilian; for it

(60) Paſquier, Letter to Mr Loyſel. It is in the nineteenth book of his Letters. The words that I quote, are at page 501, of the ſecond Tome.

(61) Reſponſ. ad Calvin. & Bezam pro Franciſco Balduino, folio 77.

(62) Ibid. fol. 70, verſo.

(63) Ibid. fol. 86.

(64) Alterum Balduini ex non diſſimili errore peccatum fuit quod Hotmanni tui Lauſannæ languentis & in cædendis, quos in tuo ludo Grammaticam docebat, pueris defatigati, & ex eo carcere liberari miſere cupientis, & commendatione Balduini ad aliquam juris profeſſionem redire literis temere crediderit. Ibid.

(65) Ib. fol. 87.

(66) He went to Heidelberg.

(67) Balduin. Reſponſ. altera ad Joann. Calvin. pag. m. 176.

(68) Id. ibid.

(69) Id. ibid. pag. 181, 182.

(70) Theſe words are addreſſed to Calvin.

(71) It is a libel, which I ſpeak of in the article GUISE, (FRANCIS), remark [I].

(72) That is to ſay, in theſe times one ought to ſeek the ſhade.

them, without believing that it is a much eaſier thing to become very learned, and a great enemy to the perſecuting religion, than to become a tolerably honeſt man. I will ſpeak a word or two concerning the author of Hotman's life [O]. The book which was printed at Amſterdam (k), intituled, Franciſci & Joannis Hotomanorum. Patris ac Filii & clarorum virorum ad eos Epiſtolæ, might furniſh me with a great many additions for this article, both concerning the application of our civilian to the ſearch of the Philoſophers ſtone (l), which proved very prejudicial to him, and upon ſeveral other particularities of his life; but I think it better to refer my readers to Mr Bernard's journal (m). The extract which he gives us of this work, leaves nothing wanting. You may alſo conſult the firſt volume of Obſervationum Selectarum ad rem litterariam ſpectantium printed at Hall in the year 1700.

(k) In 1700, in 4*to.*

(l) See the Funeral Oration of Scipio Gentilis, apud Witte, Memor. Juriſconſ. pag. 33.

(m) Nouvelles de la Repub. des Lettres, March 1701, pag. 268, &c.

it may be preſumed, that if Beza had confuted it, he would have juſtified him. We muſt therefore give greater attention to the reproaches contained in the ſecond, becauſe they may be compared with the piece in which Beza refuted it. We muſt judge from that confutation, what grounds Baudouin went upon. I find that his adverſary advances nothing to the clearing of Hotman; he only ſays, that the reproaches of being ignorant of the Latin tongue, and of being an Atheiſt, will not at all diſturb Hotman, who will not vouchſafe to give any anſwer as to the laſt head. ‘ Magnum tibi certamen ſupereſſe video. Nam quæ tibi objecit magnam inſcitiam arguunt, quæ tamen (ut ajunt) refellere non poſſis. Illa verò quæ regeris cujuſmodi ſunt quæſo? Latinè ſcilicet neſcit, ut eum oportuerit ad Latinam epiſtolam ſcribendam alterius operam requirere. Crimen autem ἀθεότητος, etſi omnium eſt graviſſimum, ille tamen, ut opinor, ne reſponſo quidem dignum putabit. Quid enim hoc aliud eſt quam latrare (73). ——— You have now got a very heavy task upon your hands. For the things which he objected to you, argue a very great ignorance, and yet (as I am informed) you are not able to diſprove them. But what is it you accuſe him of? That he indeed is ſo ignorant of Latin, that he was obliged to make uſe of another hand to write a Latin letter. As for the crime of Atheiſm, tho' it is the greateſt of all others, yet I believe he will not think it worthy of an anſwer. For what is this but to ſcold and ſlander.’ Here is nothing relating to the accuſations I have tranſcribed, and which are contained in the 176, 180, 181, and 182 pages of Baudouin's ſecond anſwer. All that Beza has ſaid for Hotman, concerns the 175th page, where we find, 1. that Hotman appropriated to himſelf an epiſtle dedicatory that Sturmius had wrote: 2. that he then praiſed the very ſame works of Duarenus, which he had vilified formerly in writing againſt Rufus for du Moulin. 3. That an elegant maſter of Cicero's Atheiſm, is not fit to be a catechiſt. ‘ Noſter magiſter Latinitatis priuſquam de meis ſcriptionibus garriat, ſuarum oblitus reſpondeat Sturmio & aliis, à quibus accuſatus eſt quod ſuo nomine ediderit epiſtolam abs Sturmio ſcriptam, eamque inſtitutionibus præfixam tanquam ſuam vendiderit Duci Saxoniæ . . . Oportet iſtius tui patroni incredibilem eſſe, non jam dicam impudentiam, quia latitat, ſed nequitiam, cum quidem poſteaquam edito libello de ſacerdotiis adverſus Ruffum pro Molineo, proſcidit illos Beneficiarios commentarios (Duareni) nunc eos ſe adorare fingat . . . . . ſcilicet religionem nos docebit elegans magiſter Ciceronianæ ἀθεότητος (74).’

I am very certain, that all my readers will agree in comparing theſe paſſages of Baudouin and Beza together, that nothing could be more diſadvantageous to Hotman, than to anſwer, as Beza has done. Silence would have done him infinitely leſs hurt. To compleat his misfortune, Beza publiſhed (75) a letter of Sturmius, wherein he diſowns all that could be cited from him to the diſadvantage of Calvin and Beza; but as for Hotman, there is nothing like it.

Languet, a true Refugee, and a very honeſt man, having ſeen Sturmius's accuſations againſt Hotman, made very ſenſible reflexions, and altogether worthy of a good man; it was with the utmoſt ſorrow that he ſaw, that his countrymen behaved themſelves ſo ill in Germany, and that ſome men, who, under pretence of religion, endeavoured only to ſatisfy their vanity, did more injury to the Proteſtant religion, than the king of Spain and the Pope: however, he could not believe that Hotman could ſo far forget himſelf, as to be guilty of ſuch infamous actions. Theſe are his words: ‘ Hæc ſunt levia, ſi conferantur cum turpibus factis noſtrorum hominum in Germania, & quidem eorum qui ornati ſunt eruditione, & religionis ſpecie, inſinuarunt ſe in amicitiam bonorum virorum, qui ipſi ſumma beneficia exhibuerunt. Ut alios omittam, nuper vidi accuſationem Sturmii adverſus Hottomannum, quæ, ſi vera eſt, miſeret me Sturmii, & pudet alterius; ſed talia ſunt, ut mihi videantur vix poſſe venire in mentem erudito viro. Quidam mecum egerunt, ut ipſius accuſationis capita ad te perſcriberem, ſed à talibus miniſteriis ego planè abhorreo, cùm præſertim ſciam, te nec voluptatem nec utilitatem ex iis percipere poſſe, & ad me nihil pertineant, niſi fortè infamiæ pars in me redundet, eo quod à noſtris hominibus talia perpetrentur in ipſa Germania. Hæc ſane tanto dolore me afficiunt, ut neſciam an ex ulla re majorem unquam ſenſerim. Video ubique eorum ambitionem, qui prætextu Religionis ſua quærunt, magis obeſſe ipſius religionis progreſſui, quam Pontificem Ro. Regem Hiſpaniæ, & omnes ipſorum miniſtros; ſed de re odioſa nimis multa ſcribo (76). —— Theſe are trifles, if compared with the baſe actions of our countrymen in Germany, and even of thoſe who are men of learning, and pretend to religion; who inſinuated themſelves into the friendſhip of good men there, from whom they received the greateſt favours. Not to mention others, I have lately ſeen an accuſation of Sturmius againſt Hotman, if the things alledged in it be true, I pity Sturmius, and am aſhamed of the other; but they indeed are of ſuch a nature, that I can hardly believe that a ſcholar could be guilty of them. Some people have deſired me to write the particulars of that accuſation to you, but I have a great averſion to ſuch a task, eſpecially ſince I know that you can neither reap pleaſure nor profit from it, and that I have no concern in them, except that I may poſſibly ſhare in the infamy, ariſing from ſuch things being done by our countrymen in Germany. I muſt own theſe things grieve me ſo much, that I do not know that ever any thing grieved me more. I ſee that the ambition of thoſe who under pretence of religion ſeek only their own advantage, doth more hurt to the progreſs of religion every where, than both the Pope, the king of Spain, and all their emiſſaries; but this is too much on ſo diſagreable a ſubject.’ The letter out of which I have taken theſe words is dated from Paris, the eleventh of December, 1561. Another letter of his, dated from the ſame place the twenty third of January, 1526, informs us, that the duke of Guiſe, who was gone to ſee the biſhop of Straſburg at Saverne (77), had entered a proceſs againſt Francis Hotman, for defamatory libels, and that ſeveral people affirmed, that it was on that account he had undertaken that journey. Languet could not believe that ſo inconſiderable a motive had obliged the duke of Guiſe to go to Saverne; but I make no doubt, that he thought it was a ſhameful thing for Hotman to be proſecuted as a writer of libels.

[O] I ſhall ſay a word or two concerning the author of Francis Hotman's life.] His Latin name, Petrus Neveletus Doſchius, ſignifies Peter Nevelet, lord of Oſche. The title of that lordſhip, and that of advocate in the parliament of Paris, are given him in Paſquier's letters (78). He was ſon to a ſiſter of Peter Pitheus, as appears by a letter that uncle writ to him, which was printed at the end of Quintilian's Declamations, in ſome editions, Iſaac Nicolas Nevelet, his ſon, publiſhed Æſop, and other ancient fabuliſts, with notes, in 1610. This was the firſt fruit of his ſtudies, and he dedicated it to his father.

(73) Beza, Reſponſ. ad Balduin. ſub fin. pag. 233. Tom. II, Oper.

(74) Id. ibid. pag. 175.

(75) Beza, ubi ſupra, pag. 234.

(76) Languet, Epiſt lxiv, lib. ii, pag. 186, 187.

(77) Id. ibid. Epiſt. lxvii, pag 197.

(78) See the eighth book of Paſquier's Letters, pag. 467, of the firſt Tome.

HOTTINGER (John Henry), one of the moſt famous writers of the XVIIth century, was born at Zurich the tenth of March 1620. The progreſs he made in his firſt ſtudies, gave ſuch promiſing hopes, that the truſtees of the ſchools reſolved to ſend him to ſtudy in foreign countries at the public charge. He began his travels the twenty ſixth of March, 1638, and went to Geneva; from whence, after a ſtay of two months, he proceeded into France. He afterwards ſaw Flanders and Holland, and choſe Groningen for the ſeat of his ſtudies; but his deſire to perfect himſelf in the Oriental languages engaged him, a year after, to remove to Leyden (a), to be tutor to the children of profeſſor Golius, the moſt knowing man in thoſe languages of any in the world. He made a great progreſs in Arabic by Golius's aſſiſtance, and by the inſtruction of a Turk. He would have attended the embaſſador (b) of the States to Conſtantinople, in 1641, in quality of chaplain, if the magiſtrates of Zurich would have conſented to it; but they choſe rather to recal him that they might employ him for the reputation and good of their colleges. They permitted him to go over to ſee England before his return to Switzerland; and upon his return (c), they made him profeſſor of Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory; and a year after they gave him two other profeſſorſhips, that of catechetical Divinity, and that of the oriental languages. He married at twenty two years of age (d), and commenced author at twenty four [A]. He was ſo well pleaſed with that character, that he continually publiſhed a great many new books [B]. This was no difficulty to him; for he was extreamly laborious

(a) In the year 1639.

(b) William Boſwel.

(c) In the year 1642.

(d) See the remark [F].

[A] And began to ſet up for an author at twenty four.] It was not for a ſmall enterprize, but to attack, upon a very crabbed ſubject, one of the moſt learned men that was then in Europe. For he undertook to confute Father Morin's Diſſertations upon the Samaritan Pentateuch (1). We may therefore apply to him theſe verſes of the Chapelain décoiffé:

Mes pareils avec toi ſont dignes de ſe batre,
Et pour des coups d'eſſai veulent des Henris quatre.

My equals worthy are t'engage with thee,
And on four Henrys wou'd their courage prove.

This work, which he intituled Exercitationes Anti-Moriniana, was very grateful to the Proteſtants, whether becauſe of the learning of the author, or by reaſon of the ſubject, which could not be more favourable, ſince Hottinger defended the Hebrew text of the Bible, whoſe authority Father Morin invalidated as much as he could. Mr Simon judges this work to be one of the beſt that Hottinger publiſhed; and ſo it might be ſaid, that his firſt eſſay was his maſterpiece. Let us quote Mr Simon's paſſage at large: it is not very advantageous to the memory of this Swiſs doctor. ‘If Hottinger had obſerved ſome moderation in his works, and had not ſo much inſiſted on trifles, we might find ſomething uſeful in them, for the underſtanding of the literal ſenſe of the Scripture. But as he almoſt conſtantly wrote for a party, and compoſed his books with too much haſte, he is apt to fall into frequent miſtakes. One of his beſt works upon this ſubject, is that which he wrote againſt the Samaritanæ Exercitationes of Father Morin, but neither is he altogether exact in that work (2).’ Mr Simon, in another piece, has criticiſed this book of Hottinger; but lightly, and without any real deſign of prejudicing him. Theſe are his words (3): ‘Joannes Henricus Hottingerus, qui ſtatim à Libri ſui limine cujus hæc eſt inſcriptio, Exercitationes Anti-Morinianæ de Pentateucho Samaritano ejuſque udentica authentica, Morinum appellat Monachum qui communem Monachorum ſortem ſuperet. Ille de Samaritanis & eorum codicibus diſſerit, putatque Samaritanos à Judæis Pentateuchi ſui exemplar hauſiſſe; ſed conjecturis tantum, non autem firmiſſimis rationibus, ut ita ſentiret adduci potuit; iſtud minus accuratum eſſe probat exemplis aliquot Pleonaſmorum, vocum vel mutatarum in alias vel omiſſarum, ſimilibuſque erroribus quos profert, & ex quibus confici poſſe arbitratur, non magis credendum eſſe Samaritanis Pentateuchum ſuum jactantibus, quam Ebionitis verum & ſolum Matthæi Evangelium Hebræum venditantibus: qua in re profecto graviſſime hallucinatus eſt Hottingerus, qui tam venerandæ antiquitatis Pentateuchum Samaritanum cum adulterato Ebionitarum Evangelio comparare audeat. Morinum etiam imperitiæ arguit Hottingerus, quaſi Rabbinorum quorundam quos laudaverat mentem haud aſſecutus fuiſſet. —— John Henry Hottinger, in the very beginning of his book, intituled, Excercitations againſt Morin concerning the authenticity of the Samaritan Peutateuch, calls Morin a monk, learned above the common rate of his fraternity. In this book he treats of the Samaritans and their copies, and thinks that the Samaritans derived their copy of the Pentateuch from the Jews; but he muſt have been induced to think ſo rather from conjectures than ſtrong proofs; he ſhows the inaccuracy of it, by producing ſome examples of pleonaſms, omiſſions, or changes of words, and ſuch like errors, from which he thinks it may be proved that we are no more to believe the Samaritans when they boaſt of their Pentateuch, than the Ebionites pretences of being poſſeſſed of the only genuine Hebrew goſpel of St Matthew: In this Hottinger has been guilty of a groſs blunder to dare to compare the Samaritan Pentateuch, which is of ſuch venerable antiquity, to the ſpurious goſpel of the Ebionites. He likewiſe accuſeth Morin of ignorance, pretending that he had not underſtood the ſenſe of ſome Rabbies whom he had cited.’ Mr Heidegger is in the right to obſerve, that Father Morin's ſilence was a glorious thing to our Hottinger; but I queſtion whether he underſtood the thought of Father Merſenne (4): ‘Liber toti erudito orbi charus, acceptuſque fuit. Conſtat Morinum diu adhuc ſuperſtitem librum accepiſſe & legiſſe, neque contra mutire auſum (5). Et Merſennus, cui Hottingerus librum adjunctis literis miſit, id ſolùm reſpondit, nec ſibi Hottingeri juvenilem ardorem ſatis probari, nec Hottingerum Morinum penitus noſſe. Quaſi videlicet juveni integrum non fuerit ſenum deliria taxare, & ipſe Morinus interiorem animi ſui notam in vulgus edito libro non patefecerit. —— This book was received with great applauſe by all the learned world. It is certain that Morin, who lived a long time after, received and read it, but never dared to write any thing in anſwer to it. And Merſennus, to whom Hottinger ſent a copy of his book, together with a letter, only anſwered, that he did not approve of Hottinger's youthful heat, and that Morin was not throughly known to Hottinger. As if, forſooth, it were not lawful for a young man to find fault with the dreams of old men, and as if Morin had not ſufficiently ſhown to the world his intention in publiſhing that book.’ Father Merſenne ſeems to mean nothing elſe, but that Hottinger did not well know Father Morin. I doubt not but the ſenſe of his anſwer was this, ‘the heat of youth has carried you too far, and if you knew the real merit of Father Morin, you would not have treated him in that manner.’ Do you pretend to confute this, by ſaying, that Father Morin has diſcovered the bottom of his heart by his work? I grant he diſcovered that his deſign was to raiſe the credit of the vulgar Latin, and to enervate the authority of the original text; but is not this the general intereſt and deſign of the Romiſh controverſiſts? Hottinger did not very well know Father Morin, ſince he took him for a monk.

[B] He continually publiſhed new books.] If you would ſee an exact liſt of all the books he publiſhed, from the year 1644, to the year 1664, read his Bibliotheca Tigurina (6), you will there find the hiſtory, and

(1) Printed in 1631, and not in 16[illegible]1, as it is ſaid in Father Morin's Life, pag. 22, edit. Francof.

(2) Simon, Hiſtoire Critique du Vieux Teſtament, livr. iii, chap. xix, pag. m. 474.

(3) In Vita Joh. Morini, pag. 36, 37.

(4) Jo. Henr. Heideggerus, in Vita Hottingeri ad annum, 1644.

(5) The following words of Hottinger have relation to this: Non diſplicuerant hæ primitiæ viris eruditis, qui hinc inde novo Morini conatui finem impoſitum publicis teſtabantur ſcriptis. Hotting. in Bibl. Tigurina, pag. 122.

(6) Pag. 121, & ſeq.

was taken up by Mr Claude [I].

‘countrymen.’ Hottinger defended himſelf in few words (26): as for Ecchellenſis, he put him in mind (27) of the blunders, of which he had been convicted, and he ſhewed him ſome others. ‘Præfatus eſt illi libro de gradibus ſtudii Philologiæ, inſerta ſimul Apologia brevi adverſus Abrahamum Ecchellenſem, qui Præfatione in Catalogum librorum Chaldæorum Hebed Jeſu Metropolitæ Sobenſis, traduxit Seldenum, Hottingerum noſtrum, Calixtum, Ludovicum de Dieu, Conſtantinum L'Empereur, Salmaſium, eo potiſſimùm nomine, quod Orientalibus ſtudiis intenti, germanam tamen verborum ſignificationem, ut plurimum non deprehendant, ambigua & obſcura pro certis & luculentiſſimis ſtatuant, atque interim ea, quæ in clariſſima luce verſantur, quod ipſorum commenta radicitus extirpent, omnino prætereant. Verum non aliam defenſionem tum ſui, tum virorum horum doctiſſimorum, quos eâdem accuſatione involverat adverſarius, Hottingerus paravit, quàm in memoriam revocatis Ecchellenſi errorum plauſtris, quæ ipſi à contribulibus Flavignio, Gabriele Sionita, Johanne Morino objecta ſunt; nec non ex proprio ingenio demonſtratis notoriis ſphalmatis, quæ ille in tractatu Arabico-Latino, Synopſis propoſitorum ſapientiæ Arabum Philoſophorum inſcripto, adverſus genium Arabicæ linguæ admiſit (28). —— He wrote a preface to the book concerning the degrees of the ſtudy of Philology, and therein inſerted a ſhort apology for himſelf againſt Abraham Ecchellenſis, who, in a preface to a catalogue of the Chaldaic books of Hebed Jeſu, Metropolitan of Seba, traduced Selden, our Hottinger, Calixtus, Lewis de Dieu, Conſtantine L'Empereur, and Salmaſius, accuſing them that notwithſtanding their application to Oriental learning, they had for the moſt part miſtaken the genuine ſignification of words, and laid down ambiguous and obſcure matters as certain and evident truths; tho' they at the ſame time paſſed by many things which are of the cleareſt nature, becauſe they entirely ruined their hypotheſis. Hottinger contented himſelf here inſtead of all other defence of himſelf, and of theſe learned men, whom his adverſary had involved in the ſame accuſation with putting Eſchellenſis in mind of the numberleſs blunders which had been objected to him by thoſe of his own tribe; to wit, by Flavigny, Gabriel Sionita, and John Morin; adding likewiſe ſome notorious miſtakes which Ecchellenſis had been guilty of in his treatiſe in Arabic and Latin, intituled, Synopſis propoſitorum ſapientiæ Arabum Philoſophorum, againſt the genius of the Arabic tongue.’

[I] Mr Arnauld had a fling at him, but was taken up by Mr Claude.] ‘I relate this hiſtory (29) chiefly upon the credit of Allatius, who took a particular care to inform himſelf of it, and who being a Greek by nation, is more credible than Dutch or Swiſs miniſters, and than Hottinger amongſt others, who is one of the moſt paſſionate and unſincere writers I ever read.’ Theſe are Mr Arnauld's words (30); and this is Mr Claude's anſwer. ‘Why would Mr Arnauld have us rather believe Allatius than Hottinger? The firſt has all the characters of a paſſionate writer, who is always miſrepreſenting things; the later, on the contrary, whatever Mr Arnauld may ſay, has all the marks of a man of ſincerity, who ſpeaks things as he knows them. The firſt is more polite and more elegant I confeſs; but the other has more ſincerity. Allatius ſays of his own head whatever he pleaſes; Hottinger brings his witneſſes.’

HUARTE (JOHN) lived in the XVIth century, and acquired great reputation by a book which he publiſhed in Spaniſh, and has been tranſlated into diverſe languages, and frequently reprinted [A]. He treats there of the trial of wits, proper for the ſciences, and lays down many things which make one preſume that he did not follow the common road of Phyſicians; but was able to make many diſcoveries by his profound meditation, and careful ſtudy of the antients. However, it is not prudent to depend entirely, either on his maxims, or on all the authorities he alledges; for he is not to be truſted on either of theſe heads (a), his hypotheſes alſo are frequently chimerical, eſpecially when he pretends to teach us the formalities neceſſary to be obſerved, in order to beget children of a fine genius. There are many things in that part of his book which are contrary to modeſty, and which have been too groſsly tranſlated by Gabriel Chappuis. He is not to be excuſed for giving as an authentic piece, a pretended letter of the proconſul Lentulus from Jeruſalem to the Roman ſenate, containing a portrait of JESUS CHRIST, a deſcription of his ſtature, of the colour of his hair, the qualities of his beard, &c. There has been a criticiſm publiſhed on this author [B]. He was accounted a Spaniard, but was born in a town of the French Navarre (b).

[A] He acquired great reputation by a book, which he publiſhed in Spaniſh, and has been tranſlated into diverſe languages and frequently reprinted.] It was tranſlated into Italian by Camillo Camilli. This tranſlation was dedicated by Nicolo Manaſſi to Frederic Pendaſius, profeſſor of Philoſophy at Bologna (1). The epiſtle dedicatory is dated from Venice, the firſt of March 1582: the edition which I uſe is printed at Venice preſſo Aldo 1590 in 8vo. This book was tranſlated into French by Gabriel Chappuis in the year 1580. The title of his verſion is, Anacriſe ou parfait Jugement & Examen des Eſprits propres & naiz aux Sciences, &c. (2). that is, ‘An Anacriſis or perfect judgment and trial of wits, proper and born for the ſciences: wherein by wonderful and uſeful ſecrets, drawn both from true, natural, and divine Philoſophy, is ſhown the difference of the gifts and abilities of men, and for what ſort of ſtudy each man's genius is proper: ſo that whoever ſhall read this book with attention, may diſcover the property of his own genius, and will be able too chooſe that ſcience in which he ſhall make the greateſt progreſs.’ There is a better French tranſlation than this, it was printed at Amſterdam by John de Raveſtein in 1672. The tranſlator's name is Francis Savinien d'Alquié. It contains the additions which John Huarte made to the laſt edition of his book: they are conſiderable both in quantity and quality; but the new tranſlator could not inſert them in their proper places, and was obliged to give ſome of them at the beginning and ſome at the end of the book. I know the Latin verſion only by means of the Catalogue of the Bodleian Library. It was printed in the year 1622 in 8vo, and tranſlated by Æſch Major.

[B] There has been a criticiſm on this author.] It is intituled L'Examen de l'Examen des Eſprits. The name of the author of it is Jourdain Guibelet. Let us inſert this paſſage of Sorel (3). ‘The Spaniſh author of the trial of wits has been admired by ſome (4), and condemned by others. I ſhall not inſiſt on what they reproach him with, to wit, that he aſcribes ſo much efficacy to corporeal qualities, that one would think the ſoul depends upon them, and would hinder us from believing it to be immaterial and immortal. He ſufficiently defends himſelf on this head, by replying, that the ſoul of man acts only according to the diſpoſition of the organs; nevertheleſs it is ſtill thought, that he has too much ſubjected this ſpiritual ſubſtance to groſs and corporeal parts; and that the compariſons which he has drawn from brutes, and even the moſt imperfect of them, ſuch as inſects, are diſhonourable to ſo noble a creature as man; that it is likewiſe ridiculous to attribute aridity to ants, and ſuch inſects, becauſe they are wiſe, and from thence to draw a conſequence that prudence muſt be found in dry conſtitutions: for by what art has he been able to diſcover whether there is more

---

(26) In Eneade Diſſert. Philologico-Theolog. printed in 1662.

(27) In the preface to Etymolog. Orientalis, ſive Lexici Harmonico-Pentaglotti, publiſhed in the year 1661.

(28) Heidegger. in Vita Hotting.

(29) Viz. that of Cyril Lucar, patriarch of Conſtantinople.

(30) Perpetuité Defenduë, livr. iv. chap. vi. pag. 561. Bruſſels, in 12mo.

(31) Reponſe à la Perpetuité de la Foi, livr. iii, cap. xii, pag. m. 467.

(a) See L'Apologie de Coſtar, pag. 213, 214.

(b) At St Jean de Peid de Port. See Du Verdier, Biblioth. Franç. pag. 432.

(1) He had been formerly profeſſor at Padua.

(2) See Du Verdier, Biblioth. Françoiſe, pag. 432.

(3) Sorel de la Perfection de l'Homme, pag. 327.

(4) Anthony Zara (who wrote a book of the Anatomy of Wits and Sciences) Peter Charron, and others, receive the doctrine of this Spaniard, almoſt without contradiction. Ibid. pag. 335.

humidity or aridity in the brains of flies, which ſeem to be very humid? How likewiſe has he obſerved the difference betwixt the brains of bees and common flies, the firſt of which are reckoned very wiſe and the other quite the contrary? We ſhall not find any great difference in their brains upon diſſection, and if he ſays that the one have dry brains and the others humid, it is becauſe he has obſerved that the one are prudent, and the others imprudent, and not becauſe he has judged of their prudence or imprudence, by their aridity or humidity . . . . Some alſo object to the author of the Trial of Wits, that he has not well eſtabliſhed the temperaments for each faculty of the ſoul, and that he ought not to aſcribe the judgment alone to aridity but likewiſe the memory, and that theſe two faculties are not incompatible. Thus there are many things objected to ſeveral of his propoſitions, which have given occaſion to a French Phyſician, to write a Trial of his Trial, wherein he ſtrongly refutes the greateſt part of his doctrine. He treats it according to his fancy in a book as large as the other (5).' Sorel afterwards, makes ſome remarks againſt the doctrine of the author of the Trial of Wits. I ſhall inſert the following. 'Some have enquired into the means of putting the natural faculties in good condition. And in order to judge the better of them, they are not ſatisfied with obſerving men in themſelves, by their external marks; but have even carried their enquiries as far as the cauſes, to wit, to the time and place of their birth, and above all to the parents who begot them, who are the real ſources of the temperament, and have a great influence in making uſe of one humour or another. This being allowed, in order to make their doctrine the more acceptable, they have pretended at the ſame time to preſcribe remedies for the bad qualities which they diſcovered, or to give aſſiſtances to the acquiſition of the good. And in order to ſeek the perfection of men in their remoteſt origin, they would provide for their happy birth, and direct that they who bring them into the world ſhould uſe all manner of precautions to beget them with all the qualities which they deſire they ſhould have. Some Naturaliſts have enquired of what temperament and what age a man and a woman ought to be, in order to marriage, and how they ought to nouriſh and govern themſelves, that they may have children of good conſtitutions. The author of the Trial of Wits has added to this, the mannner of procreating them of ſuch temperaments, as ſhall render them fit to make progreſs in the liberal arts and ſciences. Both the one and the other lay it down as a rule, that great care ought to be taken in marriages, that a man of a very hot conſtitution ſhould be joined to a woman of a more moderate temperament, who has that humidity which he wants in order to form a perfect temperament. But it would be a very difficult matter to make ſuch enquiries, becauſe a great many other things are neceſſary to an agreeable match, which are principally regarded: it is ordinarily thought that as to bodily qualities, it is enough if the married perſons are not infirm or deformed. As to the manner of living of married people and the time of generation, and other obſervations which are preſcribed, in order to have ſons or daughters, and even to have them born with conſtitutions, proper for particular profeſſions, tho' all theſe I ſay do not ſucceed ſo exactly as we may promiſe to our ſelves, yet they muſt needs be attended with good conſequences. Some men leſs circumſpect enjoy theſe advantages without all this care: but that proceeds from the great vigour of their conſtitutions (6).'

It cannot be doubted that John Huarte has laid down ſome general maxims which are very true; ſuch as, for example, that it is advantageous to employ all perſons in thoſe profeſſions, for which they are moſt fitted by nature; that there are many who would have ſucceeded in the ſtudy of the Law, if they had not been ſet apart for the ſtudy of Phyſic; that great inconveniencies flow from the ſmall regard, that is had to natural diſpoſitions in the choice of employments: but it is very difficult to prevent this diſorder. The expedient which the author propoſed to Philip II, king of Spain, would not be attended with all the advantages which might be imagined. 'As I obſerve, ſays he (7), that the mind of man is ſo narrow and limited, that it is hardly ſufficient for one thing, I have always been of opinion that one can never be perfectly maſter of two different arts, and that we muſt of neceſſity be ignorant of one of them; this made Plato ſay, in his book concerning laws, Nemo ærarius ſimul & lignarius faber ſit; duas enim artes, aut ſtudia duo, diligenter exercere humana natura non poteſt. (No man can be both a good Smith and a good Carpenter; for human nature cannot excel in two arts or ſtudies): So I think that wiſe and knowing men ought to be appointed to examine the genius of children in their youth, in order to oblige them to follow that ſcience, which beſt ſuits them, without leaving it to their own fancy, leſt they ſhould make a bad choice of one leſs advantageous or leſs uſeful. By this means your majeſty would have the moſt exquiſite artiſts, and the moſt finiſhed works in the world in your dominions, and perſons who moſt happily join art with nature. I could wiſh likewiſe that all your univerſities ſhould uſe the ſame methods, and that as they do not permit the ſcholars to paſs from one faculty to another, till they are well skilled in Latin; ſo they would likewiſe appoint perſons to examine whether a ſcholar who wants to ſtudy Logic, Philoſophy, Phyſic, Divinity, or Law, has the genius which each of theſe ſciences requires in order to ſucceed in it: for beſides that it is a great injury to the public, for a perſon to exerciſe an art of which he is ignorant, ſo it is a great preſumption for a man to labour and rack his brain about a thing in which he can never acquit himſelf with honour.' What he ſays elſewhere would be ſtill more embaraſſing and doubtful in practice: 'In a well ordered commonwealth there ought to be marriage-makers, who ſhould know, by the rules of art, the qualities that perſons who marry ſhould have in order to a marriage's being happy for both parties. Hippocrates and Galen began to labour in this ſcience, and have given rules how to diſtinguiſh betwixt a fruitful and a barren woman, and betwixt a man fit for propagation and one who is unfit. But concerning theſe matters they have wrote but little, and not ſo diſtinctly as they ought, at leaſt, as is neceſſary for the preſent purpoſe (8).

(5) Sorel, ubi ſupra, pag. 327, 328.

(6) Sorel, de la Perfection de l'Homme, pag. 335, 336.

(7) Huarte, epiſtle dedicatory.

(8) Huarte, Examen des Eſprits, chap. xv, fol. m. 207.

HUGUES (James) a divine and canon, born at Liſle in Flanders, printed a book at Rome in 1655, of a moſt ſingular kind, conſidering the chimeras with which it is filled [A]. He dedicated it to Pope Alexander VII, and in his Epiſtle Dedicatory are ſeveral ridiculous applications.

[A] He printed a book of a moſt ſingular kind, conſidering the chimeras with which it is filled.] Here follows the title of it. Vera Hiſtoria Romana, ſeu Origo Latii vel Italiæ ac Romanæ Urbis è tenebris longæ vetuſtatis in lucem producta. Liber primus qui primordia Europæ ac Latii primævi Annales demonſtrat atque urbis conditæ. Romæ, typis Franciſci Monetæ, M.DC.LV. The true Roman hiſtory, or the origin of Latium or Italy, and of the city of Rome, brought to light out of the darkneſs of remote antiquity. Book the firſt, which contains an account of the firſt peopling of Europe, and the annals of antient Latium, and of the building of Rome. It contains 284 pages in 4to (1). A paſſage which I am going to cite from the Memoirs of Trevoux will give ſome idea of this extravagant production. According to James Hugues 'there never exiſted ſuch perſons as Janus, Æneas, or Romulus: all that has been ſaid of them is taken from the predictions of I do not know what Sybil, who, in the prophecies which ſhe delivered concerning St Peter, had given this ſaint the names of theſe heroes; and according to the prophetic ſtyle, had made uſe of the paſt time inſtead of the future. The book of the origin of Rome, compoſed by this author, is full of viſions as extraordinary as this is (2).

(1) Konig ſays this book was printed at Rome in folio, in 1655. I never ſaw that edition.

(2) Father Tournemine, in a Memoir inſerted in the Journal of Trevoux, February 1704, pag. 335, 336, of the Trevoux edition.

HUNGARY (Mary, Queen of) ſiſter of the emperor Charles V, was married in the year 1521 to Lewis king of Hungary, who unfortunately loſt his life at the battle of Mohatz in the year 1526. His widow was made governeſs of the Low-Countries in 1531, and ſhewed a great deal of courage and prudence in that poſt [A]. She exerciſed it till the abdication of Charles V, whom ſhe followed into Spain, where ſhe died the eighteenth of October 1558. She loved magnificence exceedingly [B], and was extreamly fond of hunting [C]. It is ſaid ſhe endeavoured to moderate the puniſhment of the Proteſtants [D). She underſtood Latin (a). There was a perſonal hatred betwixt her and Henry II, which occaſioned many ravages. They ruined in their turns even the country-ſeats of each other. Mary began this ſort of hoſtilities, to revenge herſelf for ſome ſongs that had been made againſt her honour in France [E]. Henry knew how to return theſe injuries [F]. He paſſionately deſired to make her a priſoner

[A] She ſhewed a great deal of courage and prudence in her government.] Conſult Brantome who tells you, ‘ that this queen of Hungary was very uſeful to the emperor, and that ſhe proved ſo very ſerviceable to him, that one cannot tell how he could have done without her, and that he ſo depended upon her in all the affairs of her government, that when the emperor himſelf was in Flanders, he referred all the affairs of the Low-Country to her, and the council was held under her and in her palace. It is true that ſhe, being a great politician, informed him of all that paſſed in the council when he was not there; which was a great pleaſure to him. She carried on glorious wars there ſometimes by her lieutenants, ſometimes in perſon, always on horſeback, as a valiant amazon (1).’ What he ſays (2) of the ſpeech ſhe made on the day of the abdication, is very curious. We have here a proof, that women are capable of reigning well.

[B] She loved magnificence wonderfully.] Brantome ſays (3), that when Philip II went to take poſſeſſion of the Low-Countries, the moſt ſumptuous entries that can be imagined were made for him; but he adds, ‘ the queen of Hungary ſurpaſſed them all in her houſes at Bains and Marimont.’ He afterwards deſcribes ‘ the ſiege of a place, which that queen repreſented to divert the emperor and all his court, in her fine houſe of Marimont.’ He ſays in another book (4) ‘ that ſhe feaſted at Bains the emperor Charles and all his court, when his ſon king Philip came from Spain to Flanders to ſee her, where the magnificence was ſo great that nothing was ſo much talked of then as las fieſtas de Bains, as the Spaniards called it: I remember likewiſe, that in the journey to Bayonne how great ſoever the magnificence was, in running at the ring, combats, maſquerades, and expences that were ſeen, yet all was nothing if compared with las fieſtas de Bains, as ſome old Spaniſh gentlemen, who had ſeen them, reported.’

[C] . . . and was extreamly fond of hunting.] She accompanied her husband every where, ‘ even when he went a hunting, for which ſhe had a wonderful paſſion; being afterwards regent of the Low-Countries for her brother the emperor Charles V, ſhe often quitted her agreeable palaces of Mechlen and Bruſſels, to live in the country at Marimont and in her houſes near the foreſts; where from morning till night ſhe diverted herſelf with hunting. For which reaſon the Flemings called her the Huntreſs, and painted her like Diana: ſhe communicated that inclination to her niece Margaret of Auſtria, ducheſs of Parma, who has been alſo governeſs of the Low-Countries. She had inherited a paſſion for the laborious exerciſes of hunting from her grandmother by her father's ſide, Mary ducheſs of Burgundy, wife of the emperor Maximilian I, who being a hunting, (with which ſhe almoſt every day diverted herſelf) fell from her horſe, and died to the great grief of the Flèmings and the emperor her husband, who loſt alſo his ſecond wife Blanche Sforza by the ſame misfortune (5).’ This ſeems to be the tranſlation of theſe words of Strada: Capiebatur venandi ſtudio ſummopere Gubernatrix, plane ut Venatricem vulgo appellarent, habituque venatricis expingerent: neptem videlicet Mariæ Burgundæ, quæ ab inſectandis feris numquam deſtitit, donec inter venandum equo excuſſa vitam amiſit †, fato non tam ſuo, quàm Maximiliani mariti, cujus & uxor altera, Blanca Sfortia, in venatione equo decidit, obiitque ‡. Ejuſmodi autem ſtudium arripuit tam avide, in eumque laborem duravit adeo membra decennis nondum puella (6), ut amitam per ſaltus campoſque ſequeretur impavida (7).

[D] It is ſaid ſhe endeavoured to moderate the puniſhment of the Proteſtants.] When to appeaſe the malecontents of the Low-Countries, the court of Spain promiſed them the ſuſpenſion of the Inquiſition in the year 1566; it was added, that the imperial laws which condemned Heretics to death, ſhould be mitigated, as they had been in the year 1550, at the requeſt of the queen of Hungary. ‘ Immo ſic Cæſarem facturum fuiſſe ſi viveret, quando ipſe ob ſimiles difficultates anno milleſimo quingenteſimo quinquageſimoque, poſtulante Mariâ Hungariæ Reginâ ejus ſorore, eaſdem pœnas quas ante ſtatuerat, emendare ac lenire non inutile aut indecorum arbitratus eſt (8).’

[E] She begun theſe ſort of hoſtilities to revenge herſelf for ſome ſongs that had been made againſt her honour in France.] Here is what we find in Brantome upon this ſubject (9). ‘ I have heard ſay, that the chief reaſon, that moved the queen of Hungary to burn Picardy, and other parts of France, was the inſolence of ſome babblers and ſtory-tellers, who ſpoke commonly of her amours, and ſung every where the Barbanſon of the queen of Hungary, which was a very coarſe ballad, and fit only for the mouths of ſuch rude reiſters.’ By this we ſee that the people are fated to bear the puniſhment not only of the follies of their ſovereigns (10), but alſo of many others. I ſhall ſet down a paſſage which does not ſeem to be full enough. ‘ There was a great hatred between Henry II, and the queen of Hungary, the occaſion whereof I do not know; but only that the French ſoldiers had made ſongs of her, and of Barbanſon the fineſt lord of her court (11).’ It was an eaſy thing to ſupply what is wanting in this diſcourſe; it was but ſaying that this queen ſet on fire ſeveral places of Picardy, even without ſparing the royal palace of Folembrai. By this we underſtand the reaſon of their perſonal hatred on both ſides. Mary doubtleſs believed, that Henry applauded theſe ſongs, and ſhe perſonally hated him for it. Henry on the other ſide took the burning of his houſe of pleaſure for a perſonal affront. I know not what we are to believe of the gallantries of this princeſs; I only remember what Brantome ſays (12), ‘ that ſhe was very handſome and agreeable, and very amiable, although ſhe appeared ſomewhat manly; but as for love, ſhe was not the worſe for it, nor for war, which ſhe made her principal exerciſe.’

If you deſire to know when ſhe made theſe ravages in Picardy; you need only caſt your eyes on the following words. ‘ Whilſt the emperor her brother was beſieging Metz, ſhe came with the count de Rœux into Picardy to make a diverſion, and ſo hinder the king from ſuccouring the beſieged, where ſhe made a great havock, and burnt Noyon, Neſle, Chauny, Roye, Folembrai, a royal palace, built by king Francis I, and ruined above ſeven or eight hundred villages; ſhe laid ſiege to Heiden and took it (13).’

[F] Henry knew how to return theſe injuries.] Having taken Marienburg and Dinant, and razed Bouvines, whoſe inhabitants were either hanged or put to the ſword, he paſſed the Sambre, and ruined Hainault, ‘ and burnt Mariemont, a country-ſeat built by the queen of Hungary; and the pretty town of Bains (14), with the magnificent palace ſhe had built there, adorned with infinite pictures, antient ſtatues, and works of graving and ſculpture. The antient town of Bavets, of whoſe antiquity and greatneſs, the old chroniclers have told a thouſand ſtories, ſuffered a like deſolation. Theſe burnings and deſtructions were very far from the temper of Henry II; but he thought himſelf in honour obliged thus to revenge the ruin of his caſtle of Folembrai, and the affront

(a) See remark [H].

(1) Brantôme, Dames Galantes, Tom. II, pag. 91.

(2) Ibid. pag. 95.

(3) Id. Memoirs, Tom. II, in the Elogy of Henry II, pag. 23.

(4) Memoires des Dames Galantes, Tom. II, pag. 92.

(5) Hilarion de Coſte, Elog. des Dames Illuſtres, Tom. II, pag. 561.

† 1482.

‡ 1496.

(6) That is, Margaret, natural daughter of Charles V.

(7) Strada, de Bello Belg. lib. i, pag. m. 45.

(8) Fam. Strada, Decad. I, lib. v, pag. 217.

(9) Dames Galantes, Tom. II, pag. 388.

(10) Quidquid delirant reges, plectuntur Achivi. Horat. Epiſt. ii, lib. i, ver. 14.

(11) Mezerai. Hiſt. de France, Tom. II, pag. 1090.

(12) Dames Galantes Tom. II, pag 90.

(13) Hilar. de Coſte, ubi ſupra, pag. 567.

(14) He ſhould have ſaid Binche.

priſoner [G]. Eraſmus dedicated a book to this princeſs, in which the Printers maliciouſly made a very ſtrange fault [H]. Father Hilarion de Coſte has committed ſome ſmall errors of Chronology [I]; and has not been well copied in every thing by Moreri [K]. I paſs over in ſilence the ſcandalous reports concerning the amours of Charles V, with the queen of Hungary [L], the mother, as they pretend, of Don John of Auſtria.

‘ affront of the Flemings, who had two days together there expoſed a picture of the great king Francis, his father, to the inſolence of the populace (15).’ I add to this teſtimony of Mezerai that of Brantome, which contains more circumſtances. ‘ It was ſhe that firſt began the great conflagration in our France, and made bon-fires of our fine houſes, and caſtles, as of that of Folembrai, a fine and agreeable houſe which our kings had built for the ſport and pleaſure of hunting; which gave the king ſo much indignation and trouble, that ſome time after he paid her in her own coin, revenging himſelf upon the fine houſe of Bains, which was reckoned the wonder of the world, ſurpaſſing (as I have heard thoſe relate who have ſeen it in it's perfection) the ſeven wonders of the world, ſo renowned in antiquity (16).’ There was in this queen's chamber in that palace a ſuit of tapeſtry of gold, ſilver, and ſilk, wherein were figured and repreſented to the life all the conqueſts and expeditions of Charles V (17). ‘ (18) In a word, there was nothing in it but what was exquiſitly fine: But the poor houſe quickly after loſt it's glory; for it was totally pillaged, ruined, and razed. I have heard ſay, that it's miſtreſs, when ſhe knew the ruin of it, fell into ſuch anguiſh, indignation, and rage, that ſhe could not for a long time recover herſelf; and coming one day near it, deſirous to ſee it's ruins, and looking upon it very pitifully with tears in her eyes, ſhe ſwore that all France ſhould repent of it, and that ſhe ſhould never be at eaſe till the fine Fontaine-bleau, which was ſo highly valued ſhould be levelled with the ground, and not one ſtone left upon another. And indeed ſhe diſcharged her rage upon poor Picardy (19), which felt it very heavily and the flames: and I believe if a truce had not intervened, her vengeance had been exceſſive; for ſhe had a heart that was great and could not eaſily be ſoftned; and ſhe was thought to be ſomewhat inclined to cruelty. But ſuch is the nature of women, eſpecially of great ones, who are too eager for revenge, when they are offended. The emperor, as it is ſaid, loved her the better for it.’ Some hiſtorians ſay, that Henry II, had an inſcription ingraved on a ſtone, which reproached this queen with folly, and put her in mind of Folembrai. Bincium Mariæ Hungariæ Reginæ olim deliciæ Henrici ſecundi Galliarum Regis odium expertæ. Feruntque repertum inibi ſaxum, quod Henricus villæ ſuæ à Maria vaſtatæ ultor inciderat in hæc verba: Inſana Regina, Folembræum memoria repete (20).

[G] He deſired to make her a priſoner.] Brantome tells us this (21). ‘ I have heard ſay, ſays he, that the late king Henry II, deſired nothing ſo much as to take the queen of Hungary priſoner, not to treat her ill, tho' ſhe had given him many occaſions by her ravages; but to have the glory of keeping that queen a priſoner, and to ſee what countenance and conſtancy ſhe would ſhew in priſon, and whether ſhe would be as brave and haughty as in arms: for there is nothing ſo lofty and brave as a great lady when ſhe pleaſes, and has courage as this lady had; and who was much pleaſed with the name the Spaniſh ſoldiers had given her, who, as they called the emperor her brother el Padre de los ſoldados, called her la madre: juſt as Victoria, or Victorina, in the old time of the Romans, was called in her armies the mother of the camp (22).’

[H] Eraſmus dedicated a book to her, in which the Printers maliciouſly made a very ſtrange fault.] The book which Eraſmus dedicated to her in the year 1529, is intituled Vidua Chriſtiana. The author declares, ſhe was wonderfully pleaſed with the reading of Latin books. ‘ Cæſaris germana Maria Latinos codices habebat in deliciis, cui nuper ſcripſi Viduam Chriſtianam. Id efflagitarat à me quidam Eccleſiaſtes illi chariſſimus. Scena rerum humanarum invertitur, monachi literas neſciunt, & fœminæ libris indulgent (23).’ She was then in Auſtria, from whence ſhe retired a little after into Moravia (24), not thinking herſelf ſafe Vienna, by reaſon of Solyman's irruption. But to come to the malicious fault of the Printers, you muſt know they were vexed they had not received the new-years gift they expected from the author. Hereupon the greateſt toper of them all undertook to be revenged, and found a means for it, which vexed Eraſmus heartily, and which cannot be tranſlated into another language. We muſt therefore be contented with the original. ‘ Nuper cùm inter imprimendum excuſores aliquot conqueſti fuiſſent me ſibi xenia nondum perſolviſſe, exortus eſt inter eos quidam cæteris vinolentior, qui profiteretur ſe pœnas à me exacturum, ni darem: atque id profectò veterator tam egregie effecit, ut auries nummis trecentis redimere eam ignominiam voluiſſem. Cùm enim in Vidua mea, quam ſereniſſimæ Hungariæ Reginæ dedicaveram, ad laudem cujuſdam ſanctiſſimæ fœminæ inter alia liberalitatem illius in pauperes referrem, hæc verba ſubjunxi: Atque mente illâ uſam ſemper fuiſſe, quæ talem fœminam deceret. Unde ſceleſtus ille animadvertens ſibi vindictæ occaſionem oblatam eſſe, ex mente illa mentula fecit. Itaque volumina mille fuere impreſſa (25).’

[I] Father Hilarian de Coſte has committed ſome ſmall errors of Chronology.] I. He ſays (26) that our queen of Hungary was born at Bruxelle the thirteenth of September, 1513. Which is falſe and impoſſible, ſince the arch-duke her father died in 1506. There is 1503, and not 1513, in Moreri's Dictionary. II. The ceremonies of that princeſs's marriage were not performed at Buda in the year 1521, to the great content of Uladiſlaus (27), king of Hungary, for Uladiſlaus died in 1516. III Queen Mary did not live continually at Lintz in Auſtria (28), during the years 1527, 1528, 1529, 1530. I have cited (29) Eraſmus, who aſſures us, that in 1529 ſhe retired into Moravia. IV. She did not govern the Low-Countries twenty eight years (30), but twenty four (31), namely, from 1531 to 1555. The author I confute contradicting himſelf confeſſes, page 569, that this government laſted but twenty five years; but he has committed many faults there. V. He ſuppoſes that the queen of Hungary reſigned her government into her brother's hands in October 1557. It was the twenty fifth of October, in 1555. VI. He ſuppoſes that Margaret of Auſtria, governeſs of the Netherlands, died in 1532. It was in the year 1530. In the elogy of this princeſs (32), he makes her to be born the tenth of January, 1480, and to die the firſt of December, 1532, aged fifty one years (33). Is this to have skill in numbers? VII. He ſuppoſes that the queen of Hungary began her government of the Low-Countries in 1532. It was the year before. VIII. He ſuppoſes, that when ſhe reſigned this government to her brother, ſhe made a long ſpeech to the people. This is not the name that ſhould be given to that aſſembly, before which Charles V renounced his kingdoms.

[K] . . . and has not been well copied in every thing by Moreri] Hilarion de Coſte had ſaid that the queen of Hungary died ‘ as ſhe was ready to depart, in order to return into Flanders . . . . where ſhe deſired to end her days, becauſe ſhe was very much beloved and honoured by that people (34).’ Moreri, inſtead of keeping within thoſe bounds, ſays ſhe died ‘ at the very ſame time that ſhe was about to go and re-aſſume the government of the Low-Countries.’ He has been a more faithful tranſcriber of one of the faults of this monk: he ſays after him, that this queen governed the Low-Countries twenty five years, till 1557, when ſhe went over into Spain. I have already ſaid, that ſhe governed them but from the year 1531, to the twenty fifth of October, 1555, and I add, that ſhe went into Spain in the year 1556. Moreri ſhould not have ſaid that ſhe married Lewis Jagellon, king of Hungary, when ſhe was very young; for ſhe was eighteen years old when the nuptials were celebrated. Moreri's expreſſion would make on believe that ſhe was younger. It is known that the daughters and ſiſters of kings are ſometimes married before they are ten years old.

[L] I paſs in ſilence the ſcandalous reports concerning the amours of Charles V, with the queen of Hungary.] Read above, the end of remark [A] of the article

Don

---

(15) Mezerai, Hiſt. de France, Tom. II, pag. 1090, ad ann. 1554. See alſo Lewis Guicciardin, Deſcription du Païs Bas, pag. m. 468.

(16) Brantôme, Dames Galantes, Tom. II, pag. 92.

(17) Id. ibid. pag. 93.

(18) Ibid. pag. 94.

(19) Brantôme here ſeems to be guilty of an anachroniſm: The ravages that queen made in Picardy preceded the deſtruction of her fine palace of Binche. Beſides, we find no truce under the government of Mary, after the year 1554. She was no more governeſs, when the truce was concluded the fifth of February 1556.

(20) Famian. Strada, Dec. I, lib. ix, pag. 577. ad ann. 1578.

(21) Dames Galantes, Tom. II, pag. 305.

(22) Brantome is in the right. Hic puerulus à Victoria Cæſar eſt appellatus, quum illa mater caſtrorum ab exercitu nuncupata eſſet. Treb. Pollio, in Triginta Tyrannis, n. 24. See alſo n. 30.

(23) Eraſm. Epiſt xxxi, lib. xix, pag. 846. See alſo Epiſt. xx, lib. xxvi, pag. 1432.

(24) Idem, Epiſt. xxi, lib. xxvi, pag. 1434.

(25) Idem, Epiſt. lxviii, lib. xxx, pag. 1956, dated from Friburg the ninth of January 1535. That letter was publiſhed by Merula with Eraſmus's Life, in the year 1607.

(26) Hilarion de Coſte, Eloges des Dames Illuſtres, Tom. II, pag. 559.

(27) Id. ibid. pag. 560.

(28) Id. ibid. pag. 565.

(29) In the remark, [H], citat. (24).

(30) Hilar. de Coſte, ibid. pag. 566.

(31) Brantôme, Dames Galantes, Tom. II, pag. 91, ſays about twenty two or twenty three years.

(32) Pag. 313, of the ſecond Tome.

(33) Ibid. pag. 319.

(34) Ubi ſupra, pag. 570.

Don Jo'hn of AUSTRIA, and join to it theſe words of Gabriel Naudé. ‘ The ſame emperor .... covered all thoſe diſgraces with the veil of piety, and religion, ſhutting up himſelf in a cloyſter, where he had likewiſe the conveniency of doing penance, for a ſecret ſin he had committed in begetting a baſtard ſon, who was alſo his nephew (35).’ Lewis de Mai very juſtly condemns this writers boldneſs in affirming ſuch a thing. See page 765, and 766, of his remarks upon Naudé's Coups d'Etat.

HUNGARY (Isabella, queen of) ſiſter of Sigiſmund Auguſtus king of Poland, was a princeſs of great merit. She was married, in the year 1539, to John Zapoliha Vaivod of Tranſylvania, who had been elected king of Hungary in the year 1526, and who ſtrenuouſly diſputed that crown with Ferdinand of Auſtria, brother of the emperor Charles V. She was delivered of a ſon the ſeventh of July 1540. Her huſband was ſo pleaſed with it, that he drank at table to ſuch exceſs, as occaſioned his death the twenty firſt of the ſaid month [A]. Iſabella finding that ſhe was not able to keep the crown for her ſon, which Ferdinand would deprive him of, implored the protection of the Ottoman Porte, from whence ſhe received ſo great ſuccours, that Ferdinand's army which beſieged Buda was cut in pieces. Solyman came in perſon into Hungary to bring Ferdinand to reaſon. He careſſed Iſabella's little child [B], and alledged very honourable excuſes for his not viſiting her [C]. But he quickly diſcovered his wicked deſigns; he made himſelf maſter of Buda, and forced Iſabella to retire to Lippa (a). This was a cruel mortification to that princeſs, who was fond of dominion. The hopes of ſeeing him reſtore the kingdom of Hungary to her ſon, when he ſhould come to age; thoſe hopes I ſay, grounded on the promiſes of Solyman, were but a poor conſolation. She expreſſed a great deal of conſtancy in that unhappy trial, and comforted herſelf as well as ſhe could, with the title of regent of Tranſylvania, which Solyman had left her; but as he made George Martinuſias her co-adjutor, ſhe met with a thouſand cauſes of vexation in her regency. It was but a name; the authority being intirely in the hands of this monk George (b). An open rupture enſued, the conſequences whereof compleated the ruin of Iſabella's authority; for her adverſary, ſupported by Ferdinand, introduced a fine army, commanded by a very cunning Italian (c), who managed things ſo dexterouſly, that he engaged this queen to give up Tranſylvania to king Ferdinand, in the year 1551, after which he retired to Caſſovia. It was in her paſſage thither, that ſhe wrote ſome Latin words upon a tree, which are mentioned by hiſtorians [D]. She was a woman of a reſtleſs diſpoſition;

[A] Her huſband drank to ſuch exceſs, as occaſioned his death.] He was gone into Tranſylvania to ſuppreſs a ſedition which the favourers of Ferdinand had raiſed there. Stephen Mailats, the moſt obſtinate among them, was retired to ‘ the caſtle of Fogaras to wait for the ſuccours which Ferdinand ſent him, under the conduct of Nadaſdy. The king beſieged him in it, and took him after a long ſiege. In the mean time there comes a courier, who brought him the news of the birth of a ſon which God had given him. This news being agreeable to all that want to have children, and eſpecially to perſons far in years; we may imagine that John received it very joyfully: It made him fall into an exceſs, drinking like a Hungarian, and this exceſs increaſing his diſtemper, he died at Saſſebes a few days after the birth of his ſon, in the fifty third year of his age (1).’

[B] Solyman careſſed Iſabella's little child.] I will uſe here the words of the author I have cited in the foregoing remark. ‘ Solyman ſent preſents to the young king .... intreating the queen to let him ſee her ſon, aſſuring her it was only to engage his children to love him the more. At the ſame time the deputies were ordered to tell her, that if he did not viſit her, it was for fear his viſit might injure her reputation. The queen thanked the grand-ſeignor for his civility, and wavering in her mind, whether ſhe ought to ſend her ſon or not. George Martinuſias told her, that ſhe could not refuſe it. Being then overcome by neceſſity, ſhe put him into a cradle worthy of ſuch a child; and ordering the nurſe and ſome other matrons, and many Hungarian lords to accompany him, ſhe ſent him to the camp. Solyman deſigning to do him honour, received him with a troop of horſe, ſaw him, careſſed him, and made his children do the like (2).’ Hilarion de Coſte, in his elogy on our queen Iſabella (3), is very particular about theſe things. ‘ Solyman, ſays he, ſent the young king three horſes of an extraordinary beauty, with trappings adorned with gold, pearls, and precious ſtones, and alſo very rich plumes, and veſtments of cloth of gold. He alſo ſent to the principal lords and barons chains of gold, and rich Turkiſh robes..... The queen put her ſon into a gilt and very rich coach, with his nurſe and ſome ladies, who had dreſſed that little prince to advantage, that he might be more agreeable to him...... The Ottoman prince ſent ſome troops of horſe nobly equipped, and ſome bands of janizaries to meet him, and give him an honourable reception and entertainment. As ſoon as theſe troops had ſaluted the king of Hungary, they placed him in the midſt of them, to conduct him with that pomp to the emperor, who, as ſoon as he ſaw this little prince, expreſſed a great affection for him, and received him very tenderly, both as a vaſſel of the Ottoman houſe, and as the ſon of John, king of Pannonia, whom he had greatly loved and honoured, having protected him againſt Ferdinand, king of Bohemia, and the emperor Charles V. He commanded his ſons, Bajazet and Selim, who where then in his camp, to do the like. They were the ſons of the beautiful Roſe, or Roxelana.’ This author pretends (4) that Solyman had a ‘ mind to know whether this child was a ſon or a daughter; for there was a report ſpread in the Turkiſh army, that it was the later, and that for this reaſon Iſabella Jagellon had him brought up ſecretly.’

[C] Solyman refuſed to ſee her, and alledged very honourable excuſes for it.] I have already ſaid, that he aſſured this princeſs, ‘ that the reaſon of his not ſeeing her, was the injury that his viſit might do her reputation.’ This was a very honourable procedure, for it is certain, that an interview betwixt Solyman and this queen, would have occaſioned much obloquy in the world. Hilarion de Coſte makes him alledge other excuſes, which are not probable. ‘ They (5) alſo told this princeſs, that Solyman had no leſs reſpect for her, than for her ſon, as well for her own merit, as for being the daughter of Sigiſmund, king of Poland, whom he called his father; and that if his law permitted him to viſit her, he would not have failed in it: which was the reaſon he could not invite her into his tents, and he intreated her to ſend only her ſon with his nurſe (6).’ If Solyman's religion had forbidden him to receive Iſabella in his tents, would it have permitted him to receive the young prince's nurſe, and the ladies who accompanied him (7)?

[D] She wrote ſome Latin words upon a tree which are mentioned by hiſtorians.] Thuanus obſerves in relating this, that ſhe was a learned woman (8). ‘ Quæ (Regina) ſtatim, ne privata in eo regno, cui ſummo cum imperio præfuiſſet, diutius viveret, convaſatis rebus ſuis tion; ſhe ſtaid but little at Caſſovia. She went from thence into Sileſia, and then into Poland, to Bonna Sforza her mother, and Sigiſmund Auguſtus her brother. She kept intelligence with the grandees of Tranſylvania, to attempt the regaining that country. She had recourſe again to the protection of Solyman, and uſed ſo many arts, that ſhe returned into Tranſylvania, in the year 1556. There ſhe maintained herſelf till her death, and kept the authority as much as ſhe could [E], without imparting it to John Sigiſmund her ſon. The bigots vainly endeavour to excuſe that conduct [F]. She died at Alba Julia the fifteenth of September 1558 (d).

---

(35) Naudé, Coups d'Eſtat. chap. iv, pag. m. 617.

(a) The fifth of September, 1541.

(b) So George Martinuſias was called.

(c) John Baptiſt Caſtaldo, marquis of Caſſano, who had been educated in the houſe of Francis d'Avalos Marquis de Peſcara. Hilar. de Coſté, Elog. des Dames, Tom. I, pag. 644. Delectus eſt Joan. Baptiſta Caſtaldus Piedenæ Comes, & ob res recenter egregie geſtas (nam in bello Germanico caſtrorum præfecti ſumma cum laude munus obiverat) Caſſani Marchio à Cæſare creatus. Thuanus, lib. ix, pag. 180.

(1) Diſcours Hiſtorique & Politique ſur les Cauſes de la Guerre d'Hongrie, printed with ſome other curious pieces at Cologne, 1666, in 12mo, pag. 237, 238. See alſo Hilarion de Coſte, Elog. des Dames Illuſtres; Tom. I, pag. 629.

(2) Diſcours Hiſtorique & Politique, &c. pag. 242.

(3) Ubi ſupra, pag. 631, & ſeq. 242.

(4) Hilar. de Coſte, ibid. pag. 632.

(5) That is, the deputies of Solyman, who brought the preſents to the young king.

(6) Ubi ſupra, pag. 632.

(7) Idem, pag. 633.

(8) She underſtood Italian. Hilarion de Coſte, ubi ſupra, pag. 644, ſays, that ſhe made a ſpeech in that language, to make her ſon reſign her kingdom.

(d) I have taken the matters of fact contained in this article, from Hilarion de Coſte, Eloges des Dames Illuſtres, Tom. I, pag. 622, & ſeq.

‘ſuis per monteis aſperos Caſſoviam verſus iter direxit. Cum propter anguſtias viarum inter ſilvas de curru deſcendere cogeretur, cum auriga currum traduceret, ipſa retro in Daciam reſpiciens, priſtini culminis, è quo diciderat, memor altum corde ſuſpirium duxiſſe dicitur, & cum aliud non poſſet literata femina, inſcripto arbori nomine, hæc addidiſſe, SIC FATA VOLUNT, eoque relicto juſti doloris monumento, rurſus currum conſcendit, inſtitutum iter perſequitur (9). —— The queen not caring to live any longer in a private ſtation, in a country where ſhe had enjoyed the ſovereign authority, having gathered all her effects together, ſet out for Caſſovia, thro' a very mountainous country. And being obliged to alight from her chariot, becauſe of the badneſs of the roads, among the woods, while the driver was diſingaging the chariot, ſhe looked back towards Tranſylvania, and remembering her former grandeur from which ſhe had fallen, fetched a deep ſigh, and, being a learned lady, carved her name on a tree, and under it SIC FATA VOLUNT, ſo fate decrees; and leaving that monument of her juſt grief, mounted her chariot, and proceeded in her journey.’ Hilarion de Coſte deſerves to be copied, by reaſon of the particulars to which he deſcends (10). ‘As that virtuous but unfortunate princeſs . . . was going to Caſſovia through the troubleſome and difficult roads of thoſe countries, ſhe was forced in an ugly paſſage to light from her coach. Whilſt the coachman was buſied in getting out the coach from that bad place, which was near a wood; this heroine, being as learned as ſhe was valiant, looked back on Tranſylvania which ſhe had left; and remembring the honours ſhe had received there, and the condition ſhe was in, could not forbear fetching a deep ſigh, and leaving on the bark of a tree theſe three words, ſhewing thereby her juſt grief, and knowledge of the Latin tongue: SIC FATA VOLUNT: ſo fate will have it; as it is related by Thuanus, and many other hiſtorians (11). Martin Fumée, Sieur de Ginelle, has deſcribed it in this manner, ſaying, that queen Iſabella paſſing over the mountain which ſeparates Tranſylvania from Hungary, and going down a rugged and difficult hill, which her coach could not paſs through for the badneſs of the way, was forced to go down on foot with her ladies, not without much trouble and inconvenience, as well by reaſon of the roughneſs of the ways, as of a great ſhower which overtook her, with which ſhe was wet thorough (12). The poor queen of Hungary, as ſhe went along complained of her ill fortune, which not content to be contrary to her in great things, would alſo afflict her in little ones, and attributing this misfortune which happened to her in paſſing over that high and difficult mountain, to the obſtinate malice of her deſtiny, ſhe took a knife, and, a little to ſolace her affliction and extream ſorrow, wrote with the point of it on the bark of a great tree, under which he retired to reſt herſelf a little, and avoid the rain, which fell in great abundance, theſe Latin words: SIC FATA VOLUNT, and below Iſabella Regina: So the fates will have it, Queen Iſabella.’ There is reaſon to believe, that ſhe wrote not this inſcription without murmuring and reflecting upon divine providence; for in the ſpeech ſhe made in diveſting herſelf of her royalty, ſhe ended with violent complaints againſt deſtiny. ‘Although inconſtant fortune, ſaid ſhe (13), according to the cruel mutations with which ſhe takes away and confounds at her pleaſure the affairs of this world, hath ſo changed mine, that at preſent my ſon and myſelf are obliged to leave this kingdom, &c.’ This was to repreach the providence of God, and accuſe him of cruelty, as the Heathens did in their misfortunes.

(9) Thuanus, lib ix, pag. 182, col. 2, ad ann. 1551.

(10) Hilarion de Coſte, ubi ſupra, pag. 648.

(11) Natalis Comes, P. Mathieu, Artus Thomas.

(12) We give this period ſuch as the Monk Hilarion de Coſte has it.

(13) Hilar. de Coſte, ibid. pag. 645. In Thuanus, lib. ix, pag. 182, ſhe ſpeaks thus to her ſon: Quando tua aut mea potius fortuna non tulit ut regno paterno legibus jure gentium tibi delato uti frui poſſes, fatorum INIQUITATEM quæ nulla vi noſtra aut humana induſtria corrigi poteſt, æquo animo feramus neceſſe eſt.

Cum complexa ſui corpus miſerabile gnati,
Atque Deos atque aſtra vocas crudelia mater (14.)

(14) Virgil. Eclog. v, ver. 23.

The wretched parent, with a pious haſte,
Came running, and his lifeleſs limbs embrac'd,
She ſigh'd, ſhe ſobb'd, and, furious with deſpair,
She rent her garments, and ſhe tore her hair,
Accuſing all the gods, and every ſtar.

DRYDEN.

Probably our princeſs thought to leave on the bark of this tree, a monument of the injuſtice ſhe believed ſhe received from heaven, and to acquaint all the paſſengers with the courage ſhe had to complain of it.

[E] She kept the authority as much as ſhe could, without imparting it to her ſon.] This may be proved by the remonſtrance that Henry II ordered to be made to this princeſs. John James de Cambrai, dean of Bourges, embaſſador of this prince, had aſſured her as he went to Conſtantinople, that ſhe ſhould receive from France all the ſuccours ſhe could deſire (15), ‘which obliged her to ſend into France Chriſtopher Bathori on an embaſſy (16) . . . . to thank the moſt chriſtian king for his favour and good affection. Bathori was well received by Henry II. and ſent back with Peter Francis Martinez into Tranſylvania, where they aſſured queen Iſabella, on the part of his moſt chriſtian majeſty, of the alliance he would make with her by the marriage of one of his daughters with her only ſon king John Sigiſmund, who was ſeventeen years of age; upon condition that he ſhould be bred up, and educated like a prince, and ſhe ſhould not ſuffer near him ſo many women and men of mean birth, who are not fit to be entertained near young princes, and that ſhe would admit him to the knowledge of her affairs. Petrouvitz, and moſt of the lords of Iſabella's council, approved the reaſons of the moſt chriſtian king in her majeſty's preſence, and ſaid aloud to the embaſſador of France, that they had already remonſtrated this to the queen their miſtreſs; ſhe began then to ſuſpect that embaſſy, and thought thoſe lords had given this advice to the king of France.’ She conſulted her mother, who made her this anſwer. ‘Daughter, keep always the power in your own hands, do not give ſo much authority to your ſon; which you will loſe as ſoon as you marry him to the daughter of ſo potent a monarch as that of France. Iſabella following the unhappy counſel of queen Bonna her mother, rejected the alliance of the French king, and ever after had an averſion for thoſe who adviſed her to let the king her ſon ſee the armies, and to give him an inſight into the affairs of the kingdom, and to ſend him to Waraden. She gave the command of all her armies to Michael Bellaſſa, an imperious man; which was not agreeable to her ſubjects, who deſired that ſhe would make choice of a commander more tractable and human (17).’

(15) Hilar. de Coſte, ubi ſupra, pag. 657.

(16) The father of the brave and unfortunate Sigiſmund Bathori, prince of Tranſylvania. Id. ibid.

(17) Hilar. de Coſte, ubi ſupra, pag. 658.

[F] The bigots vainly endeavour to excuſe that conduct.] As there is no paſſion but they juſtify at the expence of religion, they made uſe of this admirable cloak to conceal our Iſabella's ambition. Here are the words of a Monk, who cites Florimond de Remond; ‘the authors, who have written in favour of this virtuous princeſs, ſay, that ſhe did not look with a kind eye on the great lords of Hungary and Tranſylvania; particularly, Petrouvitz was odious to her, becauſe of his profeſſing Luther's hereſy; and and that under pretence of giving him light into the affairs of his ſtate, they deſigned to remove him from the queen, his mother, to make him more eaſily quit the true and old religion, for a new and falſe one. Which he did after the deceaſe of the queen, his mother (18).’ Father Maimbourg ſays (19), that John Sigiſmund durſt not declare for the Heretics in his mother's life-time; but that was not the only reaſon, but alſo becauſe Solyman ‘had written to the queen, that new ſects ſhould not be ſuffered to be

(18) Id. ibid.

(19) Maimbourg, Hiſt. de l'Arianiſme, Tom. III, pag, 345. Dutch Edit.

‘introduced into the kingdom, for fear of diſturbing the peace of it, by dividing mens minds upon ſo nice a point as that of religion (20). . . . . But the queen dying ſoon after, and Selim, who troubled not himſelf about theſe diſturbances of religion, ſucceeding her Father, Solyman, who died of an apoplexy at the ſiege of Ziget, the Lutherans, the Calviniſts, and Arrians, returned into Tranſylvania, and, under the protection of Petrouvitz, took more liberty than ever (21).’

(20) Id. ibid. ad. ann. 1555.

(21) Id ibid. ad ann. 1566.

HUNGERUS (Wolfgang), a Civilian of the XVIth century, was born at Waſſerburg (a) in Bavaria. He was profeſſor of the Civil-Law in the univerſity of Ingolſtadt, chancellor of Friſingen, and aſſeſſor in the Imperial chamber at Spires (b). He wrote an apology for the the emperors Frederic Barbaroſſa, and Lewis of Bavaria, but being a good Catholic he thought it was more prudent to ſuppreſs it [A], than to publiſh it in an age ſuch as that in which he lived. He died of a diſtemper which continued ſeveral years (c), by which the public was deprived of ſeveral uſeful works which they might have expected from ſo learned a man. His death is placed in the year 1555 (d). The notes which he wrote on the Ceſars of Cuſpinian, were printed at Baſil in 1561. They correct and clear up many things which had been either falſly or confuſedly advanced in that Hiſtory of the Emperors, and in ſome other books. The abridgment of Geſner's Bibliotheca, gives us a Wolfgang Hungarus, different from our Hungerus: this is a miſtake, and ſhows that the ſmalleſt change of the letters in proper names, multiplies writers without reaſon. We find the titles of ſome other works of this Civilian in the ſame abridgment [B].

(a) From hence comes the Latin ſirname Aquiburgenſis, which he takes.

(b) See the epiſtle dedicatory of the Ceſars of Cuſpinian. Baſil Edit. 1561.

(c) Ibid.

(d) Kong, in Biblioth. pag. 418.

[A] He compoſed an apology for the emperors . . . but he thought it more prudent to ſuppreſs it.] As he lays all the blame upon the Popes, there is no doubt but the Proteſtants would have taken advantage from his book. However, let us ſet down what he ſays himſelf: ‘Nos certe pro utriſque optimis Imperatoribus Baioario & Ænobaro elucubrata Apologia integra, luce ipſa clarius oſtendimus, & fabulam illam de Ludovico Baioario vanam, falſam & tralaticiam eſſe: & Ænobarum non tam de verbis quam rebus ipſis contendiſſe, atque in ſumma longe alias fuiſſe ſummis Pontificibus in hos Imperatores odiorum cauſas: & quæcumque tandem eæ ſuerint, ſaltem negocia ipſa controverſa à Pontificiis ea animorum impotentia, faſtu & acerbitate tractata, ut horundem Imperatorum ubique major modeſtia, manſuetudo, humanitas, adeoque innocentia, pietas & juſticia eluceat: utcumque inſignis ille Theologus Albertus Pighius Campenſis, Pontificiorum hector Li. 5. ca. 14. & 15. Eccleſiaſticæ hierarchiæ, cauſam hujus Ludovici ita propoſuerit atque explicarit, ut univerſam eam damnaret. Sed voluiſſe ipſum eo in argumento, ac præſertim libr. 6. Romanorum Pontificum auribus aliquid dare, jam pridem etiam Catholicum veritatis amantiſſimum Theologum, virum Eccleſiaſticum, doctrina & vitæ ſanctimonia, nuper dum viveret, cum primis ſpectatum, ſcio pronunciaſſe: & ubi neceſſe ſit, ipſius cenſuram autographam ea de re in medium proferre poſſum. Neque vero noſtro ex capite iſti apologiæ noſtræ hoc glorioſe arrogamus, ſed potius concordi ex calculo amicorum aliquot, tam eccleſiaſticorum quam laicorum qui Catholica in religione juxta nobiſcum verſantur, & Eccleſiæ ſtatum ac fœdis & pernicioſis abuſuum & vitiorum monſtris repurgatum, ſartumque & tectum (ut ajunt) jam pridem pio zelo, ſed hactenus fruſtra optant, ac ſuper ea apologia ipſis exhibita conſulti, etiam ſcripto ſua ſinguli candide & libere expoſuerunt judicia. Attamen & ſponte noſtra, & præcellentis cujuſdam amici benevolo monitu, hoc tempore domi retinere eandem quam in publicum edere maluimus (1). ——— In an apology which I wrote expreſsly in vindication of theſe two excellent emperors, Lewis of Bavaria, and Frederic Barbaroſſa, I have demonſtrated in the cleareſt manner, that the ſtory concerning the emperor Lewis, is falſe, groundleſs, and trifling: and that Barbaroſſa did not contend merely about words, but about things of conſequence, and in fine, that the hatred of the Popes againſt theſe two Emperors aroſe from quite different cauſes: and whatever theſe were that the controverſy was managed on the ſide of the Popes with ſuch fury, haughtineſs, and bitterneſs, that in the whole of it we may obſerve much more modeſty, meekneſs, humanity, and therefore more innocence, piety and juſtice on the ſide of theſe emperors: however, that famous divine Albertus Pighius of Campen, the champion of the other ſide, in the fifth book of his Eccleſiaſtic Hierarchy, has ſet forth and commented on the caſe of the emperor Lewis, in ſuch a manner as abſolutely to condemn him. But I know that a very ingenious Catholic divine (who while he lived was famous both for learning and piety, and whoſe opinion in this matter, I can, if needful, produce in writing under his hand) declared that Pighius, in that whole argument, and eſpecially in the ſixth book, deſigned to flatter the Popes. Neither do I here, on my own judgment, pretend to have proved theſe things in the ſaid apology, but on that of ſome of my friends, eccleſiaſtics as well as laics, all profeſſors of the Catholic religion, as I likewiſe am, who have long, but as yet in vain, wiſhed that the church being purged from many ſcandalous and dangerous abuſes, and immoralities, may be reſtored to it's primitive purity, they, I ſay, being conſulted about the ſaid apology which I ſhowed them freely and ingenuouſly, gave me each his approbation of it in writing. Yet of my own free choice, and by the advice of a very worthy friend, I have determined rather to keep it by me than to publiſh it at preſent.’

(1) Hungerus, Annot in Cæſares Cuſpiniani, pag. m. 186, col. 2.

[B] The title of ſome other works of Hungerus.] We ſee that he corrected and publiſhed a new edition of Bartholomæus Bologninus ſuper Authent. habita. C. ne filius pro patre; and that he tranſlated from the Italian and Spaniſh into German, a book intituled, Excitatorium Aulicorum, de officio Aulici ut gratiam Principis conſequatur & conſervet (2). This verſion, printed at Strasburg in 8vo in 1582, is no doubt the tranſlation of a book of Guevara (3). We ſee in the Bibliotheca Claſſica of Draudius (4), Wolffg. Hungeri Linguæ Germanicæ Vindicatio contra exoticas quaſdam, quæ complurium vocum & dictionum mere Germanicarum, Etymologias ex ſua petere conati ſunt (5), at Strasburg 1586 in 8vo.

(2) Epitome Geſneri, pag. m. 824.

(3) See remark [G] of the article GUEVARA, citat. (19).

(4) Pag. 1377, Edit. Francof. 1625.

(5) This word is a ſolecism here.

HUNNIUS (Giles) born in a village of the country of Wirtemberg, the twenty firſt of December 1550, was one of the moſt famous divines of the Augſburg confeſſion. He ſtudied Divinity at Tubingen, under James Andreas, under Brentius the ſon, and under two other profeſſors; and he grew ſo learned in the five years he ſpent in that univerſity, that he was thought capable of profeſſing Divinity at Marpurg, at twenty ſix years of age. He very well anſwered the opinion they had entertained of his learning: for upon ſome lectures and ſermons that he made at Marpurg (a), the landgrave being reſolved to retain him, recommended him in a very honourable manner to the duke of Wirtemberg, to be promoted to his doctor's degree. Hunnius returned to Tubingen, where he was admitted doctor of Divinity a few months after his marriage, the ſixteenth of July, 1576. During the firſt ſix years of his profeſſorſhip, feſſorſhip, he publiſhed no books againſt the Calviniſts; but otherwiſe he was continually at war with them [A], and did not ſpare them in his Academical Diſputations. At laſt he wrote againſt them [B] in the year 1584, and got ſuch a reputation, that, in the year 1592, he was invited into Saxony to reform the electorate. He was made firſt profeſſor of Divinity at Wittemberg, firſt miniſter of the church of the caſtle, and a member of the eccleſiaſtical ſenate. He applied himſelf with an extraordinary diligence, to find out thoſe who were not good Lutherans [C]; and as he was very ſucceſsful in clearing the country of them, he was invited to do the ſame in Sileſia [D]. He was made ſuperintendant of the church of Wittemberg in the year 1595; and the ſame year, he had a ſharp combate to maintain againſt Samuel Huberus about Election and Predeſtination [E]. He was one of the principal opponents againſt the Jeſuits Gretſer and Tanner, in the conference of Ratiſbon [F], in the year 1602 (b). He died the (b) Moſt authors ſay, that conference was held in 1601.

(a) In the year 1576.

[A] He was continually at war with the Calviniſts.] Read what is ſaid of it in his funeral oration (1). 'Quas autem & quàm ſerias, quamque frequentès velitationes in Haſſia tàm Caſſellis, quàm Marpurgi, jam cum clancularii, jam cum apertis hoſtibus, quos Sacramentarios Lutherani vocant, ſubire coactus fuerit; quæ & quam gravia certamina, ob ſanctiſſimum Religionis Chriſtianæ articulum, de perſonâ Chriſti, ejuſque ad dextram Dei ſedentis adoranda majeſtate ſuſtinuerit: id Deo, rerum omnium inſpectori ac judici notum eſt: neque fugit id multos pios & cordatos homines. —— What warm and frequent wars he was forced to wage in Heſſe, both at Caſſel and Marpurg, ſometimes againſt ſecret, ſometimes againſt open, enemies, whom the Lutherans call Sacramentarians; what ſore attacks he ſuſtained on account of that ſacred article of the Chriſtian religion, concerning the perſon of Chriſt, and his adorable majeſty, ſitting on the right hand of God: Theſe, I ſay, are known to God, the witneſs and judge of all things: neither are they unknown to many pious and worthy men.'

[B] At laſt he wrote againſt them.] The ſame orator will inform us, that Hunnius did not confine his exploits to the Sacramentarian war: He attacked alſo the followers of the Lutheran Illyricus. 'In publicum poſtea ſcriptis ſuis progreſſus ſub annum octogeſimum quartum, Danæum imprimis, Urſinum, Pezelium, Grabium, & alios oppugnavit, editis libellis de perſonâ Chriſti, ejuſque ad dextram D E I ſedentis divina majeſtate: de altarium abrogatione. Poſtea & Flacianorum cohorti bellum ſacrum indixit, edito libello de ſubſtantiâ peccati originis (2). ——— Afterwards, about the year fifteen hundred and eighty four, he publiſhed ſome books concerning the perſon of Chriſt, and his divine majeſty, ſitting at the right hand of God: and concerning the Abrogation of altars. Wherein he attacked, above all, Danæus, and alſo Urſinus, Pezelius, and Grabius. Afterwards he denounced a holy war againſt the Flacians, in a book concerning the ſubſtance of original ſin.'

[C] He applied himſelf . . . . . . to find out thoſe who were not good Lutherans.] This was a kind of Inquiſition, which deprived a great many honeſt men of their employments and country; for the refuſing to ſign the Formulary that Hunnius and his colleagues propoſed, was enough to paſs for a Calviniſt, and they found no mercy. The Jeſuit Contzen (3) makes himſelf merry in deſcribing this Inquiſition; and obſerves that Hunnius wrote an apology for it. 'Quin & Ægidius Saxonicam viſitationem contra Calviniſtas defendit; refutationem enim ſcripſit Calviniſtici libelli, quo viſitatio illa exagitata fuit (4).' The violences that were then exerciſed upon thoſe who were ſuſpected of Calviniſm, are horrible, as Hoſpinian has deſcribed them (5).

[D] He was invited to do the ſame in Sileſia.] This is witneſſed by Melchior Adam. 'Fridericus IV Lignicenſium & Brigenſium in Sileſia Dux, Hunnii potiſſimum opera ac ſtudio uſus, Eccleſiarum Lignicenſium per Sileſiam reformationem ſuſcepit atque perfecit; ejecto inde Leonhardo Krentzhemio, Lignicenſium tunc Superintendente; cui Calviniſmi crimen impingebatur (6). ——— Frederic IV, duke of Lignitz and Brieg, in Sileſia, begun and compleated a reformation of the churches of Lignitz, in Sileſia, by the means and ſtudy of Hunnius above all others; and ejected Leonard Krantzheim, then ſuperintendant of Lignitz, who was accuſed of Calviniſm.'

[E] He diſputed againſt Samuel Huberus about Election and Predeſtination.] This man had been miniſter of a village near Bern; and having examined the acts of the conference of Montheliard (7), he found four articles in Beza's doctrine, which he thought repugnant to the ſcripture: I. That Jeſus Chriſt did not die for all men. II. That moſt men are excluded from the promiſes of grace. III. That the cauſe of the damnation of the reprobate, is the ſole good pleaſure of God, who created them on purpoſe to ſhew in them the power of his anger. IV. That no body can know whether baptiſm regenerates children. He had the courage to contradict theſe four articles: but he was expelled for his boldneſs; Muſculus and Gryneus having ſucceſsfully procured his expulſion. He retired into the country of Wirtemberg, where he obtained a church, after having embraced the Augsburg confeſſion. Being made known to the elector of Saxony, by ſome books he publiſhed, he was invited to Wittemberg to profeſs Divinity. His earneſtneſs in refuting the Swiſs Proteſtants about the doctrine of Predeſtination, made him run into another extream, ſo far as to teach publickly, that GOD has elected all men to eternal life. Hunnius and his colleagues admoniſhed him of his error, and as he did not abandon it, he was expelled. He went from thence to Ratisbon, where he had conferences with ſome divines; he continued obſtinate in his errors, and publiſhed ſome books at Spires to maintain them. This was the fourteenth ſchiſm of the Lutheran church (8). Such was the man that our Hunnius had to deal with. He was ſo happy as to triumph over his enemy, for he got him deprived of his place; but he expoſed himſelf to ſome ſuſpicions of heterodoxy, and was obliged to write in his own juſtification. Read in the margin the words of Calixtus (9), and what follows. 'Fortem ſe & fidum purioris doctrinæ hyperaſpiſten, adverſus inanes Huberi φλυαρίας eo tempore præſtitit Hunnius, dum partim monendo, partim ſcribendo, errantem Huberum in viam revocare ſtuduit: quod ipſa res loquitur, & monumenta hac de controverſia bene multa edita, cum primis verò ille tractatus Hunnii de providentia & prædeſtinatione filiorum Dei, ſatis luculenter teſtatur. Diſſidio autem illo Huberi remotione ſopito, prodiit anno nonageſimo ſeptimo epiſtola: qua variorum errorum, de cœnâ Domini, de baptiſmo, de libero arbitrio, de perſonâ Chriſti, de æternâ predeſtinatione fuit inſimulatus. Hanc igitur Hunnius eodem anno reſutavit: ut & eos qui in Anhaltinis eccleſiis altaria, imagines, organa muſica, hoſtias, & alias ceremonias abrogarant (10). —— At that time Hunnius ſhowed himſelf a bold and faithful defender of the purer doctrine, againſt the vain cavils of Huberus, while partly by admonition, partly by writing, he endeavoured to bring back Huberus into the path of truth. Of this there can be no doubt, and the many pieces which he publiſhed concerning that controverſy ſhow it plainly, eſpecially his treatiſe concerning providence and the predeſtination of the ſons of GOD. But theſe diviſions being healed by the removal of Huberus, there appeared in 1597 an epiſtle in which he was accuſed of diverſe errors concerning the Lord's Supper, Baptiſm, Free-will, the Perſon of CHRIST, and Eternal Predeſtination. This therefore Hunnius refuted that ſame year, as alſo thoſe in the churches of Anhalt, who abrogated altars, images, organs, hoſties, and other ceremonies.' I add theſe laſt words, to ſhew, that Hunnius was not againſt altars and images, and many Romiſh ceremonies, which were deteſted by other Lutherans.

[F] He was one of the principle opponents . . . in the conference of Ratisbon.] I am ſure that moſt of my readers will be glad to be freed from the trouble of conſulting

(1) Apud Melchior. Adam. in Vit. Theolog. pag 727.

(2) Apud eumd. ibid.

(3) Contzen, in Jubilo Jubilorum ad ann. 1592, 1593.

(4) Id. ibid. pag. 304.

(5) Hiſtoriæ Sacramentariæ, parte altera, pag. 674, & ſeq.

(6) Melchior Adam, ubi infra.

(7) Between Theodore Beza, and John Andreas.

(8) Taken from Micrælius, Syntagm. Hiſt. Eccleſ pag. 871.

(9) Poſt annum ſuperioris ſæculi octogeſimum Ægidius Hunniſi fallor, primus vel certe inter primos præcipuus priſcam & ante Auguſtinum in primitiva Eccleſia receptam ſententiam revocavit, & in Eccleſias Scholaſque noſtras reduxit; non tamen ſine difficultate, contradictione & inſimulatione Pelagianiſmi. Calixtus, Conſider. Doct. Reform.

(10) Hutterus, apud Melchior. Adam. in Vit. Theol. pag. 729.

the year following, the fourth of April (c). He was fruitful both in books and children [G]. Some of his ſons made themſelves known by their works [H], but one of them turned Roman Catholic [I]. There is no book in which our Hunnius has diſcovered consulting another book, to know in general what this conference was: whereſore, I put down here, what Peter Matthieu ſays of it (11). ‘ Maximilian count Palatine of the Rhine, and duke of Bavaria, and Philip Lewis alſo, Palatine of the Rhine, and count of Veldents and Sponheim, couſins, and united by blood, but very much divided in the union of the mind, which is religion, reſolved, in order to re unite themſelves in the ſame belief, and to bring their ſubjects to the ſame confeſſion and profeſſion of faith, to aſſemble at Ratisbon the greateſt and moſt famous divines of Germany of both religions, that by an amicable conference they might clear the difficulties, that were the cauſe of that unhappy ſchiſm. The diſpute was only upon this theſis, whether the the holy Scripture be a ſufficient rule for things neceſſary to ſalvation. The Catholic diſputants were four profeſſors in Divinity of the univerſity of Paris (12), one of which was a Jeſuit. For the Proteſtants there were fifteen divines, as well of the Palatinate of the Rhine, as of the duchies of Saxony, Brandenberg, and Wittemberg . . . The preſidents were the two princes, and the ſpeakers Gretzerus a Jeſuit, and Heilbrun a miniſter (13) . . . The conference took up fourteen ſeſſions, in which they largely and warmly diſcourſed of the power of a judge, but not very clearly, ſince that verbal diſpute was followed by many apologies in writing.’ I inſert here this marginal note of Peter Matthieu. ‘ Upon this diſpute of Ratisbon, ſays he, beſides the acts and regiſters of the ſeſſions, day by day, we have a book with this title: Analyſis Dialectica Colloquii Ratisbonenſis, anno 1601. de norma & judice omnium controverſiarum fidei Chriſtianæ habiti.’

This hiſtorian's thought upon theſe verbal diſputes, is pleaſant enough. ‘ When I conſider, ſays he, the little advantage that has been reaped from theſe diſputes in ſeveral parts of Europe, and that the holy Scripture is the field in which every one thinks he has a right to fight; I cannot chuſe but wiſh there was ſome ſevere prohibition againſt this vulgar treatment of it: and it would be well if it were taught like Epicurus's atoms, Pythagoras's numbers, Plato's ideas, Ariſtotle's entelechia, and the figures of the cabaliſts; that no body might come at the knowledge of it, but by thoſe that are capable of underſtanding it. Whilſt every one pretends to be skilled in it, it happens, that from the ſame flower, the faithful, like the bee, gather honey, and the diſobedient, like the ſpider, gather poiſon, and many grow mad and beaſtly upon the beaſt of St John's Revelation.’

Add to this paſſage the words of Mr Baillet. ‘ This conference was like thoſe battles, wherein the victory is not determined by the number of the ſlain. Each party pretended to have come off with advantage; and relations were made of it on both ſides, and treatiſes in Latin and High-Dutch, above twenty in number. Amongſt theſe writings I have found one in the vulgar tongue, concerning the triumph over the Jeſuits, printed at Tubingen, a Lutheran town, in 1603, in Quarto, and another in Latin, compoſed by Hunnius, and publiſhed at Wittemberg in Saxony, the ſame year, in the ſame ſize, with this title, Epiſtola conſolatoria cum not . . . Hunnius endeavoured to revenge his party, by an Anti-Tanner . . . and an Anti-Gretſer (15).’ He had read the hiſtorical relation which Father Tanner had made; ‘ but he was not ſatisfied with an account ſo little favourable to his party. To prevent the effects he feared from the reading of it, he made a counter-relation, that is, a hiſtory of the conference of Ratisbon, in his own way, which was publiſhed in 1602, at Wittemberg in Saxony. Father Tanner thought he ought not to let that piece paſs unanſwered; and not content with reprinting his relation in Latin and German, at Munich in Bavaria, he publiſhed, beſides, ſome reflexions upon that of Hunnius, intituled, Examen Narrationis quam hiſtoricæ Relationis nomine inſignitam de Colloquio Ratisbonenſi edidit Ægidius Hunnius Prædicans, at Munich, 1602, in 4to. It was againſt this laſt work that Hunnius wrote his Anti-Tanner, which he printed the ſame year at Wittemberg.’ Father Tanner publiſhed a reply, in which he made a defence of his firſt confutation . . . . and ſome remarks upon the death of it's author (16). It appeared at Munich in 1603, in in 4to, intituled Apologeticus pro compendiaria relatione de Colloquio Ratisbonenſi 1601 adverſus Anti-Tannerum cum Appendice de morte Ægidii Hunnii. Mr Baillet obſerves, that Father Gretſer could not forbear making reflexions upon Hunnius's Anti-Gretſer. They were printed at Ingolſtadt ſome time after, and inſerted afterwards among ſome of his works, with this title, Admonitio de Anti-Gretſero (17). This Jeſuit publiſhed ſomething elſe againſt the ſame antagoniſt. Labyrinthus Cretico-Hunnianus, hoc eſt, Diſputatio de Hunnio Prædicante, genioque Lutherano ſemetipſum contradictionibus implicante & jugulante in aliquot articulis fidei 1602, & Reſponſum ad Theſes Hunnianas, de Colloquio Pontificiis jucundo (18), una cum ſex digreſſionibus contra ejuſdem Hunnii calumnias, 1602 (19). Note, that the two Bibliographers of the Jeſuits, aſcribe to Father Tanner a book, intituled Labyrinthus Critico-(20) Hunnianus, printed at Munich, in 1612. May not one think there is ſome miſtake in the matter (21). Would two Jeſuits have made uſe of the ſame title, writing againſt the ſame adverſary?

[G] He was fruitful both in books and children.] There is an edition of his works in five volumes. ‘ Primus varios tractatus de articulis fidei, alter polemica, tertius & quartus commentaria in Matthæum, Johannem & omnes pene epiſtolas Canonicas, quintus diſputationes & orationes varias continet. Edidit etiam vernacula lingua poſt illam Evangelicam & Epiſtolicam. Homilias in VI Prophetas, Threnos & Catechiſmum, confeſſionem de perſona Chriſti & id genus alia (22).’ As to his conjugal fecundity, we are aſſured in his funeral oration, that he received from heaven the benediction promiſed to the faithful by the pſalmiſt (23):

His wife like a fair fertile vine,
Her lovely fruit ſhall bring;
His children like young olive plants,
About his table ſpring (24).

[H] Some of his ſons made themſelves known by their works.] NICOLAS HUNNIUS, profeſſor of divinity at Wittemberg, and afterwards ſuper-intendent of Lubec, publiſhed, Epitome credendorum: Examen errorum Photinianorum: Capiſtrum Lancillotto impactum: Neceſſaria defenſio de Papa Antichriſto: Refutatio Weigelianæ Theologiæ: Apoſtaſia Eccleſiæ Romanæ: Pellis ovina papiſtica: Innocentia Lutheranorum: Fundamentalis diſſenſus Lutheranorum & Calvinianorum: Neceſſaria Admonitio contra theoſophos (25), novellos Prophetas, nomine miniſterii Lubecenſis, Hamburgenſis, & Lunæburgenſis, and ſome other tracts. He died in the year 1643, being fifty eight years old. His brother GILES HUNNIUS died the preceding year, being ſuper-intendant general of Altemburg (26).

[I] One of them turned Roman Catholic.] He was a civilian, and his name was HELFRICUS ULRICUS HUNNIUS. He publiſhed at Cologne, in 1633, a book, in which he pretended to ſhew, that even by the confeſſion of ſome learned Proteſtants, we are obliged to reſtore to the church of Rome, what was taken from her in the time of Luther's reformation. Voetius has been reproached with ſtealing from this book, his authorities and arguments, againſt the canons of Utrecht. ‘ Iteratò noto, pellucentem illum centonem, magnam partem conſarcinatum eſſe ex duodecim conſiliis Lutheranorum . . . . ſimul editis per Helfricum Ulricum Hunnium, J.C. filium Ægidii Hunnii, celebris quondam Theologiæ Doctoris & Profeſſoris in Academia Wittebergenſi qui pellectus offa Antichriſtiana, cum turpiſſimè defeciſſet ad Pontificios, atque ſecundum fatum Apoſtatarum, negligeretur ab iis, qui exemplo diaboli Matth. iv. 9. plurimos ſectatores ſibi colligere ſolent, per myſticam illam vocem: Hæc tibi dabo: Coloniæ Agrippinæ

(c) Taken from Melchior Adam, in Vitis Theolog. pag. 723, & ſeq. who has given us an Abſtract of Hunnnius's Funeral Oration, made by Leoanard Hutterus.

(11) Matthieu, Hiſt. de la Paix, livr. iv, ad ann. 1601, pag. m. 134.

(12) Matthieu is miſtaken. Cayet, Hiſt. de la Paix, pag. 290, is not more in the right when he ſays, that the divines of the duke of Bavaria were Hunger and Tanner, doctors of the Faculty of Paris, and Gretſer a Jeſuit. Tanner had been a Jeſuit ever ſince he was eighteen years of age, and conſequently he was not doctor of the Faculty of Paris.

(13) Matthieu, ubi ſupra, pag. 135.

(14) Ibid. pag. 136.

(15) Baillet, article xxi, of the Anti.

(16) Idem, Art. xxxvii, n. 1.

(17) Idem, Art. xxi.

(18) It is an error of the preſs for the ineundo. Father Southwell has kept the word jucundo.

(19) Alegambe, Biblioth Script. Societ. Jeſu, pag. 200.

(20) An error of the preſs for Cretico.

(21) See Mr Baillet, article xxi, of the Anti.

(22) Micrælius, ubi ſupra, pag. 760.

(23) Inde divinæ benedictionis veſtigia, tum in re familiari, tum in eo potiſſimum deprehendit: quod juxta promiſſio Pſalmi, vidit filios ac filias, ſicut plantationes olivarum, in circuitu menſæ ſuæ. Apud Melchior. Adam. ubi ſupra, pag. 730.

(24) Pſalm cxxviii.

(25) See Moller. Iſagoge ad Hiſt. Cherſoneſi Cimbricæ, part. III, pag. 469.

(26) Taken from Micrælius, ubi ſupra, pag. 760, 761.

diſcovered more prepoſſeſſion and violence, than in that which he intituled, Calvinus Judaïzans [K]. He accuſed Calvin of ſo many crimes in point of Hereſy [L], that pinæ anno 1633 evulgavit duodecim illa Reſponſa, ſeu, ut ipſe pariter vocat, Præjudicia, inſcripta Abbati Fuldenſi, eum in finem, ut evinci poſſet, Lutheranos (per errorum ſummum iis conjungit Calviniſtas, quum neque Matthæus Weſenbecius, neque Hieronymus Treutlerus, prout fingit Hunnius, unquam vixerint in communione eorum, qui Calviniſtæ audiunt) eſſe αὐτοκατακρίτους, atque dictante propria conſcientia, debere reſtituere bona Eccleſiaſtica, à ſe invaſa, occupata, direpta, ac prophanata, ut loquitur famelicus Apoſtata in titulo. Verum eſſe quod dico, quivis cognoſcet, ſi inſtituerit Conſilium Theologicum comparare cum hiſce Reſponſis; ubi aut Hunnius, aut ejus Typographus erravit in citandis authoribus, maxime juris Canonici textibus, pariter (reſpicio primam editionem) errant Architecti hujus, Κατ᾽ ἀντίφρασιν, Conſilii Theologici; quod adeo impudens, ut pag. 25. ſpeciatim in hunc Hunnii tractatum digitum intendat (27). —— I once more obſerve, that this poor compilation is for the moſt part taken from the twelve councils of the Lutherans . . . publiſhed together by Helfricus Ulricus Hunnius, a Civilian, and ſon to Giles Hunnius, formerly a famous profeſſor of Divinity, in the univerſity of Wirtemberg; who being allured by the bait of Antichriſt, baſely went over to the Papiſts, and being, according to the common fate of Apoſtates, neglected by them, who, after the example of the devil, Math. iv. 9. uſe to make moſt proſelytes by theſe myſtic words, all theſe things will I give unto thee, publiſhed at Cologn, in 1633, theſe three Anſwers, or, as he alſo calls them, Prejudices, dedicated to the abbot of Fuld, intending therein, to prove that the Lutherans (by an egregious blunder, he joins the Calviniſts to them, tho' neither Matthew Weſenbecius, nor Jerom Treutlerus never lived in the communion of thoſe who are called Calviniſts, as Hunnius pretends) are ſelf-condemned, and ought, according to their own priciples, to reſtore the eccleſiaſtic poſſeſſions, which they have invaded, poſſeſſed, robbed, and prophaned, as this hungry apoſtate expreſſeth himſelf in his title page. Any body may be convinced of the truth of what I alledge, by comparing the Theological Council with theſe anſwers: wherever either Hunnius, or his Printer, has committed an error in quoting of authors, eſpecially in the texts of the Canon-law there (I mean in the firſt edition) the compilers of this pretended Theological Council likewiſe err; which is ſo impudent, that, pag. 25, he particularly points to this treatiſe of Hunnius.' Mr Baillet, whom nothing can eſcape, was not ignorant of the change of this man's religion; but he did not know that he was the ſon of the author of the Anti-Gretſer. Let us ſee what he ſays. 'When the Proteſtants, who alledge againſt us the Anti-Hunnius, and the Reſolutio Anti-Hunniana of Valentinus Bullen, a Lutheran, reckon ſtill Hunnius amongſt thoſe of their communion; either they give us reaſon to believe, that they have confounded Nicolas Hunnius, a Lutheran, who died in 1643, with Helfricus Ulricus Hunnius, the German civilian, converted from Lutheraniſm to the church of Rome, who lived at the ſame time with the other Hunnius; or they are willing to conceal his converſion, either becauſe they take it to be falſe, or of a ſhort duration. However it be, Val. Bullen printed againſt him his Anti-Hunnius, at Leichen, in the year 1633, in 8vo, with this title, Reſolutio Anti-Hunniana ſeu Reſponſio ad calumnioſam Reſolutionem tertiam præjudicialium Quæſtionum H. Ulr. Hunnii. He ſhews in that work, that he is perſuaded there was no diſſimulation in his renouncing of Lutheraniſm, and he ſufficiently diſcovers, that he had read his book of the twelve unanſwerable arguments of the Catholic religion; which came out at Cologne, in 12mo, 1632 (28).' Our Ulricus Hunnius publiſhed at Gieſſen, a tract de Tranſactione, in 1615, four books variarum reſolutionem Juris Civilis, at Francfort, in 1620, and a diſpute de homicidio & ejus pœna, at Marpurg, in the year 1625.

[K] He intituled one of his books, Calvinus Judaïzans (29).] I am not ſatisfied with the knowledge I have hitherto acquired concerning the hiſtory of this book, and it's conſequences; but I think I may ſay, and I hope Mr Baillet (30) will not take it ill, that it did not come out in 1575. Hunnius was then but twenty five years old; and if he had ſignalized himſelf at that age by ſuch a work, the author of his Funeral Oration would not have failed to obſerve it, and would not have ſaid, that it was about the year 1584, that Hunnius began to write againſt the Calviniſts. The Jeſuit Contzen (31) places the impreſſion of Calvinus Judaïzans in the year 1593, and I believe he is in the right. That which perplexes me, is to ſee in Pareus's life, that in the year 1595. Giles Hunnius diſturbed the peace of the church, by accuſing the Calviniſts, and John Calvin by name, of judaizing. I ſet down the paſſage ſomewhat at large, becauſe we find in it ſome ſtrokes of our Hunnius's character in his adverſary's judgment: 'Repertus eſt anno deinceps 1595 turbulentus quidam Gracchus, qui pacem Eccleſiæ livido calamo inquietare paravit, ægre ferens, Evangelicorum Principum animos à tribunitiis Ecebolorum concionibus abhorrere, unionemque ac concordiam Chriſtianam ſerio meditari: quam proinde non alia fabrica melius ſe diſrumpere poſſe ſperavit, quam ſi immani iſto convitio gravaret Eccleſias Reformatas, criminatus eas Judaïzare, ac CALVINUM primipilarem Eccleſiarum Reformatarum Doctorem, Judaicis gloſſis pleraque oracula Veteris Teſtamenta detemerare. Accuſatio hæc tametſi non communem cauſam Eccleſiarum Orthodoxarum tangeret, proprieque eam ſpectaret, cujus Epiſcopus fuiſſet Calvinus, tamen quia per illius latus cæteræ omnes in capita CHRISTO unitæ petebantur, propudioſis iſtis calumniis CLYPEUM Veritatis Catholicæ de ſacroſancta Trinitate oppoſuit, Eccleſiaſque Orthodoxas, & CALVINUM Electum DEI organon fortiſſime aſſeruit: adeoque in fumos diſſipavit Judaïca & Arianica illa cymbala (32). —— In the year 1595, there appeared a ſeditious fellow, who prepared to diſturb the peace of the church by his pen, taking it ill, that the Proteſtant princes highly diſapproved of the tribunitial aſſemblies of the Ecebolians, and thought ſeriouſly of an union and agreement among Chriſtians: the beſt way to prevent which, he thought, was to load the Reformed churches with the grievous accuſation of judaizing, and to charge Calvin, the leading doctor of the Reformed churches, with adulterating many of the ſacred oracles of the Old Teſtament by Jewiſh gloſſes. This accuſation, tho' it did not affect the common cauſe of the orthodox churches, and particularly reſpected that of which Calvin was biſhop, yet, foraſmuch as all the reſt, united in CHRIST their head, were ſtruck at thro' his ſides, he oppoſed to theſe baſe calumnies the Clypeus Veritatis, &c. ſhield of Catholic truth concerning the Holy Trinity, and ſtrenuouſly defended the orthodox churches, and Calvin, the choſen inſtrument of GOD; and thus he baffled the charge of Judaiſm and Arianiſm.' In reading this concluſion, would not one think that the controverſy was intirely laid aſleep by Pareus's anſwer? And yet it is not true. Hunnius replied; and ſo did his adverſary. Hutterus relates that in 1598 Hunnius publiſhed two books againſt Pareus, who had written for Calvin (33). 'Pareus returned to the charge, and wrote a book that he printed at Neuſtadt in 1599, in 8vo, intituled Orthodoxus Calvinus oppoſitus Pſeudo-Calvino Judaïzanti. It was reprinted forty two years after at Geneva (34).' This I learn from Mr Baillet, who thereby brings me into a new perplexity; for I infer from the preface of Calvinus Orthodoxus (35) that Pareus compoſed and publiſhed it in 1594. He ſays (36) that Calvin had been dead thirty years, and that this Apology ſhould have come out at Francfort at the ſpring fair, if the authority of the ſuperiors had not retarded the impreſſion (37). He adds, they have changed their mind (38), and approved my publiſhing this book. This plainly ſhews that Calvinus Orthodoxus was printed in 1594, and yet the author tells us in the laſt pages that Samuel Huberus had been baniſhed from Wittemberg, which, according to Melchior Adam, did not happen till the year 1595 (39).

[L] He accuſed Calvin of ſo many crimes in point of Hereſy.] Here is the ſummary of his Calvinus Judaïzans, as Pareus gives it (40). 'In ipſo libri titulo Calvinum ex Ariano Judæum, vel certe ex Arianizante Judaïzantem facit, & amariſſimè paſſim inſectatur, (27) Martinus Schoockius, Exercitat. Variar. pag. 52. Edit. in 4to.

(28) Baillet, article lxxix, of the Anti.

(29) Here is the whole title: Ægidii Hunnii Calvinus Judaïzans, hoc eſt, Judaïcæ gloſſæ & corruptelæ quibus Joannes Calvinus illuſtriora Scripturæ Sacræ loca, & teſtimonia de glorioſa Trinitate, Deitate Chriſti, & Spiritus Sancti, cum primis autem vaticinia Prophetarum de adventu Meſſiæ, nativitate ejus paſſione, reſurrectione, aſcenſione ad cœlos & ſeſſione ad dexteram Dei deteſtandum in modum corrumpere non abhorruit.

(30) Art. lxvi, n. 1, of the Anti.

(31) In Jubilo Jubilorum, pag. 307.

(32) Philippus Pareus, in Vita Davidis Parei, pag. m. 51.

(33) Duobus libris D. Pareo reſpondit, qui Calvini patrocinium ſuſceperat. Apud Melchior. Adam. pag. 729.

(34) Baillet, art. lxvi, n. 1, of the Anti.

(35) It is the title of the book in the Geneva edition, 1641.

(36) Præf. pag. 4.

(37) Ib. pag. 14.

(38) Ib. pag. 15.

(39) In Vita Hunnii, pag. 729.

(40) Pareus, in Præfat. Calvini Orthodoxi, p. 9.

that he might have feared to be treated as Servetus was, if he had lain at Hunnius's mercy.

There are ſome things in the remark, in which I mention the Calvinus Judaïzans, which ought to be rectified [M].

quod mera ambitione, ſtudio, perverſo, ludo aleatorio, verſutia veteratoria, temeritate deſultoria, Scripturas ſacras à ſenſu proprio ad peregrinum inflectat, quod eaſdem tetris corruptelis, gloſſis impiis, proditoriis eluſionibus & plenis Judaïcæ perfidiæ nequitiæque ſtrophis, ad ſuam & aliorum perniciem horribiliter alio detorqueat: quòd teſtimonia de Deo uno & trino ſtropharum ſuarum ſpinis intricet, quòd Scripturæ locis æternam Deitatem Chriſti confirmantibus caliginem Judaïcam offundere non reformidet quòd illuſtriſſima vaticinia Prophetarum de Meſſia Judaïcis perverſionibus involvat, in fraudem Chriſtianæ religionis adulteret, & ad perfidiam Judaïcæ infidelitatis, Arianæque impietatis retundendam ſtrophis nefariis hebetet, inutiliaque reddat: quod evangeliſtarum, Apoſtolorumque ſacroſanctas explicationes nequitur eludat: ipſos Apoſtolos ſub ferulam cenſoriam revocet; flagellet: quod Scriptorum Eccleſiaſticorum, veterum & recentium pias interpretationes altiſſimè deſpiciat & irrideat, ipſoſque ſexagenarios de ponte præcipitet, &c. Paſſim etiam non acerbis modo ſarcaſmis ſurdo illudit, ſed & conviciatur virulentiſſimè, appellitans acutum Diaboli inſtrumentum, Cenſorem, Ariſtarchum, Dictatorem Apoſtolo Paulo doctiorem, ἀυτοδίδακτον Scripturæ interpretem, Doctorem ſuperciolioſum, præſtigiarum Judaicarum architectum, colubrum, angelum & Spiritum tenebrarum ex abyſſi puteo emergentem, & quæ alia hujus generis infinita ſunt maledicentiæ ejus emblemata, vel potius convicia, lectu ſanè & auditu horrenda. — In the very title of the book, he makes Calvin from a Arian a Jew, or at leaſt from an Arianizar a Judaizer, and every where bitterly inveighs againſt him, as one who, thro' meer ambition, a perverſe bent, gameſter-like, with wicked ſubtilty, and deſultory raſhneſs, wreſt the ſacred ſcriptures from their genuine ſenſe to a foreign one; as one who, by baſe corruptions, impious gloſſes, treacherous eluſions, and turnings full of Jewiſh perfidy and malice, terribly perverts their meaning to his own, and the deſtruction of others; as one, who perplexes the proofs of the one-three God; as one, who is not afraid to throw Jewiſh darkneſs over the paſſages which confirm the Eternal Divinity of Chriſt; as one, who obſcures by Jewiſh perverſions the moſt illuſtrious prophecies concerning the Meſſiah, adulterates them to the prejudice of the Chriſtian religion, and, to blunt the edge of Jewiſh infidelity, and Arian impiety, wickedly turns the force of them, and renders them uſeleſs; as one, who impiouſly eludes the ſacred explications of the Evangeliſts and Apoſtles, and cenſures the Apoſtles themſelves; as one, who has a high contempt for, and laughs at the pious interpretations of the eccleſiaſtical writers, both ancient and modern, &c. . . . . . . He not only bitterly ſcoffs at him every where, but even ſlanders him moſt virulently, calling him a ſharp inſtrument of the devil, a cenſor, an Ariſtarchus, a dictator, more learned than the apoſtle Paul, a ſelf-taught interpreter of ſcripture, a ſupercilious doctor, an architect of Jewiſh witchcrafts, a ſerpent, an angel and ſpirit of darkneſs emerging from the abyſs of Hell, and a thouſand other ſlanderous appellations, ſhocking both to hear and read.' Note, that he declares, that if he does not give a demonſtration of John Calvin's Judaiſm, he never deſires to be believed upon any thing elſe (41). One cannot forbear asking this queſtion; was he perſuaded of what he ſaid, or was he not? Chriſtian charity obliges us to ſay he was; for otherwiſe we muſt take him for the moſt wicked man alive. Let us ſay then, that he ſpoke according to his perſuaſion, and conclude from thence, that in hot conſtitutions like his, zeal is a ſort of drunkenneſs, which ſo diſorders the mind, that a man ſees every thing double, and the wrong way (42). The prieſteſs of Bacchus, who fell upon her own ſon, whom ſhe took for a wild boar (43), whilſt he looked on the ceremonies of the feaſt without any faith, or rather with contempt, is an image of the giddineſs which ſeizes the zealots. Pareus aſcribes all this outrage of Hunnius to the devil; it is the devil, ſays he (44), who employed Hunnius as a proper artiſt to write ſuch calumnies. 'En vero tandem, Chriſtiane Lector, extremæ improbitatis Satanæ exemplum. Quaſi enim hactenus Neſtorianiſmis, Arianiſmis, Turciſmis, Paganiſmis, Atheiſmis, & id genus impuriſſimis ſputis ſuis Eccleſias noſtras parum conſpurcarit: nuper eaſdem etiam JUDAISMI ſtercoribus petulantiſſimè conſpergere eſt aggreſſus, conflato per idoneum artificem libello mendaci juxtà & maledico, qui titulo CALVINI JUDAIZANTIS circumfertur. —— Behold, Chriſtian reader, an inſtance of the extreme malice of the devil. As though hitherto he had not ſufficiently defiled our churches with Neſtorianiſm, Arianiſm, Turciſm, Paganiſm, Atheiſm, and the like; he has lately endeavoured to throw upon it Jewiſh filth, by the means of a lying and ſlanderous book, drawn up by an artiſt fit for the purpoſe, and handed about under the title of Calvin turn'd Jew.' The deſign was, according to Pareus, to extirpate the Calviniſts, that the Ubiquitarian doctors might be in great repute. 'Hinc Pſeudo-Calvinus Judaïzans cujus hoc eſt argumentum & ſcopus. Calvinus eſt Judaïzans Arianizans: Ergo & Calviniſtarum Eccleſiæ (quas vocant) ſunt tales: ergo extirpandæ: ergo ceſſabunt Ubiquitati faceſſere negotium: ergo ſtabit Ubiquitas: ergo in pretio erunt Ubiquitarii Doctores. Hæc eſt Satanæ Dialectica (45). —— Hence the Falſe-Calvin turn'd Jew, of which this is the argument and ſcope. Calvin both judaizes, and arianizes; therefore the churches of the Calviniſts (as they are called) are ſuch; therefore to be extirpated; therefore they will ceaſe to diſturb Ubiquity; therefore Ubiquity will maintain it's ground; therefore the Ubiquitarian doctors will be eſteem'd. This is the devil's Logic.'

[M] There are ſome things in the remark [K], which ought to be rectified.] The two paſſages in that remark, in which I ſuppoſed, that Lipenius is not miſtaken in placing under the year 1594, the edition of Hunnius's Anti-Pareus, muſt be thrown out. At preſent I am of opinion, that Mr Baillet was not wrong in ſaying, that we ought to correct that date of Lipenius; for I have a copy of the Anti-Pareus, the title of which bears, that it was printed at Frankfort, ex officina Paltheniana, in the year 1598. The title of the book, ſuch as I have given it from Mr Baillet, is imperfect, and in ſuch a manner as to render it obſcure; but here it is entire: Anti-Pareus: hoc eſt invicta refutatio venenati ſcripti a D. Davide Pareo, Heidelbergenſi Theologo, editi in defenſionem ſtrophorum & corruptelarum quibus Johannes Calvinus illuſtriſſima Scripturæ teſtimonia de myſterio Trinitatis, necnon oracula Prophetarum de Chriſto, deteſtandum in modum corrupit. Scriptus per Ægidium Hunnium. Hunnius declares, that being ſufficiently taken up with other matters, he ſhould not have ſo much as caſt an eye on Pareus's book, if the advice of his friends, and the vanity with which his ſilence inſpired his enemies, had not determined him to reply (46). It is thus he excuſes his not replying ſooner. Now it being certain, that the book, which he refutes, is that which David Pareus intituled Calvinus Orthodoxus, it follows that this work of Pareus was not firſt publiſhed in 1599, and is not a Reply, as Mr Baillet thought it was. Let us now affirm, that it appeared either in 1594, or 1595.

Note, that Hunnius complains, that Pareus accuſes him of having maintained, that John Calvin was an Arian. He declares that he had acknowledged the very reverſe, and that he had only ſhewn, that the ſenſe, which Calvin gives to ſeveral paſſages of the Bible, is favourable to the Arians. I am going to cite a diſtinction which he makes uſe of. I am of opinion, ſays he, that Calvin had no intention to favour Arianiſm or Calviniſm, but the ſpirit (47), which ſuggeſted to him theſe falſe gloſſes, aimed at that end. 'Eſto autem, Calvinus ipſe ſtrophis ſuis non hoc ſibi habuerit propoſitum, ut Judæorum Arianorumque cauſam proveheret, ſed tantum ut interpretationis novitate & inſolentia ſibi præ cæteris doctoribus, veteribus & recentioribus, famam nominis conciliaret: Tamen ſpiritus, qui has ei gloſſas & eluſiones ſuggerebat, hunc ſibi ſcopum præfixum habuit abſque controverſia, ut nimirum ambiguis & lubricis hiſce ſtrophis unum poſt alterum de Trinitate teſtimonium, aut de Meſſia ora-

---

(41) Hac lege diſertè ſe adſtrinxit (pag. 6.) ut niſi Calvinum judaïzantem ad oculum demonſtret, nolit ſibi ulla unquam in re poſthac fidem adhiberi. Id. ib. pag. 16.

(42) Eumenidum veluti demens vidit agmina Pentheus
Et ſolem geminum & duplices ſe oſtendere Thebas. Virgil. Æneid. lib. iv, ver. 469.

(43) Ille aper in noſtris errat qui maximus agris, Ille mihi feriendus aper. Ovidius, Metam. lib. iii, ſub. fin.

(44) Pareus, in Præfat. pag. 3.

(45) Id. in Calvino, Orthod. pag. 344.

(46) Hunnius, in Prolegomenis ad Anti Pareum.

(47) That is, the Devil.

‘ culum redderet incertum, atque ſic hominum animos paulatim a petra certitudinis dejectos in dubitationum fluctus conjiceret (48). ——— Be it granted, that Calvin did not intend by his ſubtilties to favour the Jews or Arians, but only, by the novelty of his manner of interpreting, to raiſe his own character above that of other doctors, both ancient and modern: Yet the ſpirit, which ſuggeſted to him theſe gloſſes and eluſions, had doubtleſs this deſign, namely, by theſe ambiguous and ſubtile diſtinctions, to weaken, one after another, the evidences for the Trinity, and render the prophecies concerning the Meſſiah uncertain, and thus to plunge the minds of men, caſt down gradually from the rock of certainty, into a ſea of doubts.’ Here is another paſſage, in which he ſays, that the devil diſcovers all his malice in Pareus's book. He expreſſes it very groſsly. ‘ Cum igitur hoc Parei ſcriptum ita comparatum ſit, ut in eo Satanas non dicam Diabolicæ ſuæ malitiæ veſtigia quædam oſtendat, ſed impurum ſuum podicem (ſalva venia) denudatum lectoribus conſpiciendum exhibeat, dubitavi, fateor, eſſetne quicquam operæ impendendum tam flagatioſi ſcripti refutationi: donec vel tandem & inimicorum inſulſis gloriationibus, & inprimis amicorum crebris admonitionibus excitatus, hunc quoque laborem, quamlibet moleſtum, ad vindicandam gloriam dei, & ſacro ſanctam veritatem ipſius, ſuſcipiendum mihi & exantlandum eſſe duxi (49). ——— As therefore this work of Pareus is ſo drawn up, that Satan does not ſhew ſome footſteps only of his deviliſh malice, but (if I may ſay ſo) expoſes his filthy buttocks to the reader's view, I was in ſome doubt, I own, whether ſo vile a piece deſerved an anſwer: 'till at laſt, rouſed by the empty boaſtings of my adverſaries, and eſpecially by the repeated advice of my friends, I determined to undertake and go through with this toil, to vindicate the glory of God, and his ſacred truth.’

(48) Hunnius, in Prolegomenis ad Anti-Pareum, pag. 30. I mark the page, tho' the Prolegomena are not paged.

(49) Id. ibid. pag. 3.

HUTTEN (Ulric de) a gentleman of Franconia, was born at Steckelberg (a) in the year 1488. He ſtudied firſt at Fulde, then at Cologne, after that at Francfort upon the Oder, where he was admitted Maſter of Arts in 1506, in the firſt promotion that was made in that univerſity newly erected. As he had a genius for Poetry, he began that way to ſet up for an author: it was in the year 1513 [A], when he publiſhed a work intituled, Vir bonus. The year following, prince Albert of Brandenburg making his firſt entry into Mentz, of which he was archbiſhop, occaſioned his writing a ſecond piece. Hutten made a large panegyric upon him in verſe, in which he included ingeniouſly that of all Germany. He had a couſin named JOHN DE HUTTEN, who was marſhal of the court to duke Ulric of Wirtemberg, and who was killed by this duke in the foreſt of Beblingen in the year 1515. Our poet waiting for an opportunity to expreſs his reſentment againſt this prince with ſword in hand, publiſhed ſeveral pieces againſt him (b). He was then in Italy [B], where he had given many proofs of his courage [C], in the war that the emperor Maximilian maintained nine years in that country. At his return into Germany (c) he was ſo recommended to this emperor by Conrad Peutinger, that this prince gave him the poetical crown [D]. From that time Hutten cauſed himſelf to be painted, armed, with a crown of laurel on his head, and was infinitely pleaſed with that equipage. He went ſoon after to the court of the elector of Mentz, where he compoſed a dialogue, intituled Aula, in 1518. A little after he went to the diet of Augſburg with the elector his maſter, who received there a cardinal's cap. In that diet complaints were made againſt the duke of Wirtemberg; nor was the murther of the marſhal of his court forgotten. Theſe complaints produced no great effect; but at laſt this prince having ſeized the imperial town of Reutlingen in January 1519, a league was formed againſt him in Suabia, which did not lay down their arms, till he was driven out of all his dominions, which he did not enter again, till fifteen years after. Our Hutten bore arms in that war. Luther's cauſe appearing to him to be good, he warmly embraced it, and publiſhed Leo X'ths bull againſt Luther in (a) It was the ſeat of the family, which ſubſiſts ſtill, and makes a figure.

(b) See the liſt of them in the remark [B].

(c) In 1517.

[A] It was in the year 1513.] He was therefore twenty five years old when he began to ſet up for an author: Moreri is miſtaken then, and did not know how to copy Melchior Adam, when he ſays that Hutten at eighteen years of age publiſhed ſeveral works in verſe.

[B] He was then in Italy.] I have followed the chronology of my author Melchior Adam; but I ought to caution my readers, that I ſuſpect it a little. I do not believe that all the pieces, that concern the death of John Hutten, were publiſhed before Ulric Hutten's return into Germany. I find in Geſner's Bibliotheca, that the collection of all theſe writings was printed in the caſtle of Steckelberg, in 1519 in 4to. It contained Ulrichi Hutteni ſuper interfectione propinqui ſui Joannis Hutteni equitis à Wirtenbergienſi Duce Ulricho deploratio, heroicis verſibus. Ad Ludovicum Huttenum ſuper interemptione filii conſolatoria Oratio. In Ulrichum Wirtenbergienſem orationes quinque invectivæ. In eundem dialogus, cui titulus Phalariſmus. Apologia pro Phalariſmo, & aliquot ad amicos epiſtolæ. Ad Franciſcum Galliarum regem epiſtola, ne cauſam Wirtenbergienſis tueatur exhortatoria. Inſeruntur etiam epiſtolæ aliquot ad amicos. I ſee moreover that Melchior Adam cites a ſpeech of Ulric Hutten againſt the duke of Wirtemberg, which was not compoſed till 1519, that is, two years after the author's return from Italy into Germany: have I not reaſon then to queſtion the exactneſs of Melchior Adam? What he quotes out of this ſpeech, is too curious to be omitted. We learn from it, that John Hutten was digged up near the foreſt where he was killed, whilſt the confederates were at war with duke Ulrich of Wirtemberg. It was four years after the murther was committed, and yet the corps was not corrupted; it bled when it was touched, and the face was ſtill to be known. Ulric Hutten draws from hence a proof of his couſin's innocence (1).

[C] . . . . he had given many proofs of his courage.] Thoſe which he gave in the war, were doubtleſs inferior to that which he gave on a particular occaſion. He went from Rome to Viterbo, at a time that an embaſſador of France had made a ſtop in this laſt town. There happened a quarrel, in which Hutten, forſaken by his comrades, had five Frenchmen upon him at once, and put them all to flight, in ſpite of the wounds he had received. He made an epigram thereupon, in quinque Gallos à ſe profligatos, which may be ſeen in Melchior Adam.

[D] The emperor Maximilian . . . gave him the poetical crown.] He owned himſelf indebted for that honour to Peutinger's good offices, and expreſſed his acknowledgment of it in one of his books (2). He ſays alſo that that crown was made in Peutinger's houſe by his daughter Conſtantia, whoſe virtue and beauty he very much extols. ‘ Illam ajo coronam, illam lauream quam tuante domi tuæ, accurate contexente & adornante filia tua Conſtantia, omnium quæ iſtic ſunt puellarum & forma & moribus præſtantiſſima, apparaveras.’ For a poet who loved the fair ſex, like Hutten, this was a ſubject for new words, and a great many thoughts; and it had been a great chance if the fair Conſtantia Peutinger had not been praiſed in many epigrams.

[E] He

(1) Rem admirandam, & cujus prope nullius fides capax ſit, vidiſſes. Quartum jam annum defoſſum corpus non conſumtum, non putrefactum, totam adhuc faciem cognoſcibilem: quin etiam ſanguine commaduit attactum. En igitur innocentiæ teſtimonium! Depoſuimus Eſlingæ, inde ad patriam ſepulturam devecturi. Hutten, in Orat. contra Wirtemb. apud Melchior. Adam. in Vitis Juriſcon. pag. 17.

(2) Præfatione ad Principes German. ut Bellum Turcis inferant, apud Melch. Adam. in Vitis Juriſconſ. pag. 15.

in 1520, with interlineary and marginal gloſſes (d), in which he turned the Pope into ridicule. The liberty wherewith he wrote againſt the diſorders of the court of Rome [E], extreamly provoked Leo, and induced him to command the elector of Mentz to ſend him to Rome bound hand and foot. Hutten retired from that court [F], and went into the Low-Countries to that of Charles V; but he ſtaid not long there, having notice that his life was in danger. There is ſome probability, that he retired then into the fortreſs of Ebernburg; for there he wrote in 1520 his complaint to the emperor, to the electors of Mentz and Saxony, and all the ſtates of Germany, againſt the attempts that were made upon him by the Pope's emiſſaries. It was from the ſame place he wrote to Luther, in May 1521 (e), and ſent out ſeveral pieces in favour of the reformation. It is not well known, when he left this caſtle; but it is certain, that in the month of January 1523, he was gone from Baſil [G], where he thought to find a ſafe retreat; but he found himſelf expoſed to great dangers there. Eraſmus having excuſed himſelf from receiving his viſit, for fear of heightening the ſuſpicions that were raiſed againſt him, and for fear of ſomething elſe, which he afterwards confeſſed [H], found himſelf attacked ſoon after by a paſſionate piece of Ulric Hutten. He anſwered it [I]. Hutten had doubtleſs replied, had he lived long enough; but he died in an iſland in the lake of Zurich the twenty ninth of Auguſt 1523 [K]. He was a little man of (d) They are in the ſecond Tome of the Works of Luther, pag. 53, & ſeq.

(e) That Letter is in the ſecond Tome of the Works of Luther, Edit. Witt. pag. 102.

[E] He wrote againſt the diſorders of the court of Rome.] Amongſt other works, he publiſhed an hiſtorical tract in High-Dutch upon the continual diſobedience of the Popes to the emperors. At the end of it we find that Maximilian I, who had been deceived by Leo X, uſed theſe words. 'This Pope has already 'baſely cheated me, and I can truly ſay, that no Pope 'ſince I have been in the world has been a man of 'his word; but with the grace of GOD I hope that 'this will be the laſt.' Cochleus (3) ſays, that before Luther had been ſpoken of, Ulric Hutten had publiſhed many things againſt the vexations, which Germany ſuffered from the Popes, and that in 1519, he made a little treatiſe called Trias Romana, of a very ingenious invention, which rendered the court of Rome extremely odious.

(3) Act. & Script. Lutheri, ad ann. 1519.

[F] Hutten retired from the court of the elector of Mentz.] I do not find in his life that the elector of Mentz ever cauſed him to be arreſted, as Moreri affirms; but only that he baniſhed him from his court, excluſus itaque aula & urbe Moguntina (4), and that he forbad all people to ſell and read his books under pain of excommunication.

(4) Melch. Adam. in Vitis Juriſconſult. pag. 19.

[G] In the month of January 1523, he was gone from Baſil.] This appears from theſe words of a letter of Oecolampadius (5): 'Sunt hic ex ſacerdotibus & 'theologis qui de me peſſime loqui cupiant, nec deſiſtunt ubi clam conveniunt. Tantum machinati ut 'Hutteno non fuerit diutius tutum hic agere, unde '& nudius tertius hinc diſceſſit, quorſum autem 'neſcio. —— There are here ſome of the miniſters 'and divines who may deſire to have me ill ſpoken of, 'and who fail not to do ſo when they meet privately. 'Such were their contrivances, that it was not ſafe for 'Hutten to ſtay here any longer, on which account he 'went from hence three days ago, but whether I know 'not.'

(5) Dated from Baſil the twenty firſt of January, 1523, lib. iv, Epiſt. pag. 968, apud Melchior. Adam. pag. 21.

[H] Eraſmus refuſed . . . his viſit for fear . . . . of ſomething elſe, which he afterwards confeſſed.] Writing to Melanchthon in September 1524 (6), he tells him that he would willingly have received his viſit without caring much what people ſhould ſay of it; and that the reaſon of his refuſing Hutten's viſit, was not ſo much for fear of rendering himſelf odious, as on another account, which was that he would have found himſelf obliged to lodge in his houſe that boaſter abounding with poverty and itch, who ſought only a neſt to abide in, and who borrowed of every body he met with. So that the intereſt of his purſe had more force upon Eraſmus on that occaſion than that of fame. 'Quod Hutteni colloquium deprecabar non invidiæ 'metus tantum in cauſa fuit: erat aliud quiddam quod 'tamen in Spongia non attigi. Ille egens & omnibus 'rebus deſtitutus quærebat nidum aliquem ubi moraretur. Erat mihi glorioſus ille miles cum ſua ſcabie '(7) in ædes recipiendus, ſimulque recipiendus ille 'chorus titulo Evangelicorum, ſed titulo duntaxat. 'Sletſtadii mulctavit omnes amicos ſuos aliqua pecunia. A Zuinglio improbè petiit, quod ipſe Zuinglius 'mihi ſuis literis perſcripſit. Jam amarulentiam & 'glorias hominis nemo quamvis patiens ferre poterat. '—— That I ſhunned an interview with Hutten, my 'regard to my reputation was not the only cauſe, there 'was indeed another which I have not touched upon in 'my Sponge; he being poor and deſtitute of all things, 'ſought only a neſt where he might remain, this boaſting ſoldier with his ſcabs, was to be received into my 'houſe, and received under the name of one of the Evangelics, though but in name only. He borrowed of 'all his friends at Schleſtadt what he could, he ſaucily 'importuned Zuinglius, as Zuinglius himſelf wrote me 'word. Since then the bitterneſs and vain glory of 'this man could not be born well by a perſon of the 'greateſt patience.' You ſee then that our Hutten did not put Eraſmus in any fear on account of his being a good Lutheran, but conſidering him as a ſtripped officer, who would take up his winter quarters with him. There is no doubt but his viſits that were attended with borrowing of money, proved ungrateful to many, who were profeſſed Proteſtants.

(6) That Letter is the xxiiith of the ninth book, pag. 949.

(7) It is very likely he means the pox by ſcabies.

[I] Eraſmus anſwered it.] This anſwer is inſcribed to Zuinglius, and intituled Spongia Eraſmi adverſus aſpergines Hutteni. Eraſmus there ſincerely confeſſes, that he requeſted Hutten not to come to ſee him, unleſs ſome important reaſon obliged him to it; but he ſhews that his requeſt was ſo ſoftened, and that afterwards he made ſo many propoſals to that friend, that any reaſonable man would have been ſatisfied with them. The worſt is, he writ to Mark Laurinus, dean of Bruges, that if Hutten had come to ſee him, he would not have refuſed to diſcourſe with him (8). He adds, that the reaſon which hindered them from ſeeing one another, was, that Hutten could not be without a ſtove, and that Eraſmus could not endure one. By this inſtance we ſee, how liable the moſt honeſt men are not to ſay always in their letters things as they know them. Hutten was deſperately enraged againſt Eraſmus, and heaped up many diſobliging reproaches. Eraſmus juſtified himſelf the beſt he could. After Hutten's death, a Phyſician named Otho Brunfels, replied to Eraſmus for him.

(8) Fuit hic Huttenus paucorum dierum hoſpes: interim nec ille me adiit, nec ego illum; & tamen ſi me conveniſſet non repuliſſem hominem à colloquio. Eraſm. Epiſt. vi, lib. xxiii.

[K] He died in an iſland in the lake of Zurich.] He was alſo buried there, and after ſome years a gentleman of Franconia got this diſtich engraved on his ſepulchre.

Hic eques auratus jacet, oratorque diſertus
  Huttenus, vates carmine & enſe potens (9).

A knight, an orator renown'd,
  Here earth doth room afford,
Hutten, for various conqueſts crown'd
  Gain'd by his wit and ſword.

(9) Geſner. in Biblioth. folio 342.

The worſt of all is, that he died of the pox. If Varillas was the firſt that had ſaid it (10), I ſhould not be concerned for it: but I find this particular in Geſner's Bibliotheque: and who after this can chuſe but deplore the extravagance of man? Hutten running from place to place for religion, Hutten perſecuted for his great zeal, carries the pox with him wherever he goes, and dies of it at laſt. What a diſagreeing medley is this! He publiſhed a book in Latin in 1519, concerning the wood Guaiacum, and the venereal diſeaſe. At that time, he could treat of it like a maſter, for in all appearance, he had not got that diſtemper ſince his abjuration of Popery. For the reſt, Mr Varillas reckons of a weak and ſickly conſtitution; but of great courage, and ſomewhat too paſſionate [L]. A collection of his poems was publiſhed at Francfort in 1538 (f). He is thought to be the author of many libels [M].

(10) Hiſt. de l'Hereſie, livr iv.

Part of his library fell into the hands of a Phyſician, who, as is ſaid, ſold ſome books to Frobenius. See the beginning of the ſecond book of Joachim Camerarius's letters.

The conjecture which the reader has ſeen in the foregoing editions, to wit, that John Hutten was ſuſpected to have too great a ſhare in the good graces of the ducheſs of Wirtemberg, is falſe. It was the duke who loved the wife of that gentleman (g). The duke has been introduced in a dialogue ſpeaking thus, Nobilem juvenem, meum comitem, cum ejus uxorem puellam venuſtam deperirem, obtruncavi (h). —— I killed my companion, a noble youth; being paſſionately in love with his wife, a beautiful young woman.

(f) Taken from his Life in Melch. Adam, in Vitis Juriſconſultor. Germaniæ, pag. 13, & ſeq.

(g) See the fourth volume of Obſervationum Selectarum ad Rem Litterariam ſpectantium, printed at Hall, 1701, pag. 169, 170.

(h) Ulr. Hutten. in Phalariſmo, fol. A iii.

---

reckons ill. He ſays that Hutten eſpouſed Luther's intereſt five years before his death, and two years after the diet of Augsburg, where he oppoſed the league that the court of Rome had a mind to form againſt the Turks. That diet was held in 1518. Hutten then muſt have turned Lutheran in 1520. Now he lived but three years after that. Varillas's remark, that he was obliged to live continently, becauſe he had received holy orders, is not perhaps altogether falſe; for we find theſe words in Melanchthon's life. ‘Interceſſerat Hutteno cum Croto Rubiano ſingularis uſus à prima adoleſcentia, quo autore vel certe adjutore reliquit ille contubernium Fuldanum, in quod pene puer magis diſciplinæ quam religionis cauſſa datus eſſet. —— Crotus Rubianus was of ſingular uſe to Hutten from his infancy; for by his advice, or at leaſt aſſiſtance, he left the abbey of Fulda, where he had been put when almoſt a child, for the ſake of letters more than religion.’

[L] He was ſomewhat too paſſionate.] Geſner (11) obſerves that at the beginning of the reformation, Hutten ſaid and wrote many things boldly and freely againſt the Roman Catholics, as alſo againſt the princes and magiſtrates of towns. He embraced Capnio's party againſt the Monks with ſo much violence, that after he had attacked that faction with the pen, he aſſaulted it with the ſword (12). He ſent news to Luther of the double war he made with the clergy. ‘Hutten literas ad me dedit ingenti ſpiritu æſtuantes in Romanum Pontificem, ſcribens ſe jam & literis & armis in tyrannidem ſacerdotalem ruere, motus quod pontifex ſicas & venenum ei intentarit, ac Epiſcopo Moguntino mandarit, captum ac vinctum Romam mittere (13). —— Hutten ſent me a letter full of rage againſt the Pope, ſignifying he would now fall upon the tyranny of the prieſthood, both with his pen and arms, provoked that the Pope had threatened him with aſſaſſins and poiſon, and commanded the biſhop of Mentz to ſend him bound to Rome.’ Since Luther diſapproved this man's violence (14), we need not wonder that it gave Melanchthon ſome uneaſineſs: He eſteemed Hutten's wit and learning; but he was afraid of his haughtineſs, and of his impetuous and innovating humour. ‘Ut virum magni facere & admirari propter doctrinæ eruditionem & præſtantiam ingenii, ſic ab illius natura vehemente & excelſo animo, & voluntate ad novas res propenſa . . . . nonnihil timere Philippum Melanchthonem licuit animadvertere.’ Camerarius (15) who tells us this, adds, that Ulric Hutten was very paſſionate, and that by his look and diſcourſe one might diſcover the inclination he had to cruelty. He applies to him what was ſaid of Demoſthenes; for he ſays that Hutten would have overturned all Europe, if his ſtrength could have ſeconded his deſigns and enterprizes. Judge of his humour by this ſpecimen. Having heard that the Carthuſians had made uſe of his printed picture in the houſe of office, he fined them two thouſand piſtoles (16). This was to make them pay dear for the little conſideration they had for the laurel that crowned that image. Mr Varillas (17) ſays, that Luther cauſed it to be placed in the front of his books. I have elſewhere (18) mentioned how Ulric Hutten threatened the nuncio, and ſo I can eaſily believe that he writ to the elector of Mentz, If you burn my books, I will burn your towns (19).

[M] He is thought to be the author of many libels.] Of theſe amongſt others; Dialogus Philalethis civis Utopienſis. Oratio ad Chriſtum pro Julio ſecundo Ligure pontifice (20). Bullicida (21): Prædones: Momus: Carolus: Pietatis & ſuperſtitionis pugna: Conciliabulum Theologiſtarum adverſus bonarum literarum ſtudioſos. Apophthegmata Vadiſci & Paſquilli de deprevato Eccleſiæ ſtatu. Huttenus captivus, Huttenus illuſtris, authore S. Abydeno Corallo Germano (22). A burleſque ſatire, intituled Nemo, was fathered upon Eraſmus, but it was Hutten that made it (23): he declared he was the author of it, and was angry that he ſhould be robbed of it. Some affirm that he is the author of the Epiſtolæ Obſcurorum Virorum (24). That fiction would be more tolerable than another that is imputed to him: it is pretended he forged the letter which he publiſhed in the name of the univerſities of Paris, Oxford, and Prague (25). If he had lived thirty five years longer (26), with what a deluge of books and libels, would not he have overflowed Europe?

(11) Biblioth. folio 342.

(12) Litigantes Monachos cum Capnione varie exagitavit, & illam factionem tum quidem vehementiſſimis ſcriptis, ſed aliquando poſt armis quoque expeditis adortus eſt. Camerar. in Vit. Melancht.

(13) Luther. Tom. I, Epiſt. pag. 282, & 285.

(14) Quid Huttenus petat vides, nollem vi & cæde pro Evangelio certari: ita ſcripſi ad hominem. Idem, Tom I, Epiſt. pag. 332.

(15) In Vita Melancht.

(16) Huttenus Carthuſianos, quia imagine ſua pro anitergiis uſi ſunt, in duobus millibus aureorum nummûm multavit. Nicolaus Gerbelius, Epiſt. ad Jo. Schwebelium, apud Melchior. Adam.

(17) Hiſt. de l'Hereſie, Livr. iv.

(18) In citat. (18), of the article ALEANDER (JEROME).

(19) Palavicin. Hiſt. Concil Trident. lib. i, cap xxv, n. 1.

(20) Melch. Adam. in Vitis Juriſconſ.

(21) Epitome Geſneri.

(22) Geſner, in Biblioth. who takes that Abydenus Corallus to be a ſuppoſititious name.

(23) See Eraſmus's Letters, pag. 543, & 575.

(24) See remark [F], of the article HOCHSTRATUS.

(25) See Father Labbe, de Script. Eccleſ. Tom. I, pag. 922.

(26) Melchior Adam and Moreri, place his birth in the year 1488, and his death in the year 1523, and yet they ſay, that he lived thirty ſix years.

HUTTERUS (LEONARD), profeſſor of Divinity at Wittemberg, was born in 1562 at Ulm, where his father was miniſter. He was ſo well inſtructed in the ſciences, and made ſo great a progreſs, that at thirty three years of age he was made profeſſor of Divinity in one of the moſt famous univerſities (a). He diſcharged all the parts of his office in ſuch a manner, that he was accounted a very laborious man, and very fit to teach (b). He expreſſed an ardent zeal for orthodoxy, being a moſt rigid and violent Lutheran. His writings breathe that zeal throughout [A]: and if what he ſaid of the martyrs of the Geneva confeſſion [B], be conſidered never ſo little, it muſt be (a) That of Wittemberg.

(b) Taken from Spizelius, in Templo Honoris reſerato, pag. 32, & ſeq.

[A] His writings breathe that zeal throughout.] See eſpecially his book intituled Concordia concors, ſive de origine & progreſſu formulæ Concordiæ Eccleſiarum Auguſtanæ Confeſſionis liber unus, Rudolpho Hoſpiniano oppoſitus. It is in Folio and printed at Wittemberg in the year 1614 (1). See alſo his diſputation pro formula Concordiæ (2); his Collegium Theologicum de articulis confeſſionis Auguſtanæ, & libro Chriſtianæ concordiæ (3); his Irenicum vere Chriſtianum, ſive de Synodo & unione Evangelicorum non fucata concilianda Tractatus Theologicus; his Sadeel Elenchomenus, hoc eſt Tractatio pro majeſtate humanæ naturæ Chriſti. He wrote againſt Popery with great vigour. See his diſputes de Sacrificio Romanenſium Miſſatico, ejuſque horrenda abominatione: de Tranſubſtantiatione & Proceſſionibus Pontificiis, pro aſſerendo integro Sacramento Cœnæ Dominicæ contra Jeſuïtas. See alſo Refutatio duorum Librorum Rob. Bellarmini de Miſſa: Triumphus de regno Pontificio: Ilias malorum regni Pontificio-Romani, ſive Hiſtorica Diſſertatio de injuſtiſſimo Pontificis Romani in Eccleſia Dei dominatu: Actio in Jacobum Gretſerum de Imperatorum, Regum, ac Principum Chriſtianorum in ſedem Apoſtolico Romanam munificentia pro Nicolao Clemangis (4). I omit the titles of many other books both in High-Dutch and Latin. His Calviniſta Aulico-Politicus, which was printed at Wittemberg in the year 1615, ſhall be cited in the following remark.

[B] What he ſaid of the martyrs of the Geneva confeſſion.] The elector of Brandenburg had alledged amongſt other things, in his edict of toleration, the vexations and puniſhments which the Calviniſts had

(1) See the article HOSPINIAN, remark [E].

(2) Printed at Wittemberg, in the year 1605.

(3) Printed at Wittemberg, in the Year 1610.

(4) Taken from Spizelius, in Templo Honoris reſerato, pag. 37, 38.

undergone

be confeſſed that he ran into extreams. That humour of his expoſed him to ſeveral vexatious diſputes, in which he was forced to bear the ſtrokes of ſlander [C]. He died in the year 1616. He muſt not be confounded with him that publiſhed a Polyglot Bible [D].

undergone from the common enemy; but our Hutterus ſaid againſt it, that the Arians, the Anabaptiſts, and the Anti-Trinitarians, might make uſe of the ſame argument to obtain a toleration. He maintained, that the Calviniſts had not ſuffered death for believing that the blood of JESUS CHRIST would ſave them, but for refuſing to obey the Pope, whom they called Antichriſt. Scripſerat quondam in Edicto Sereniſſimus Elector Brandeburgicus, non excludendos eſſe à Chriſtiana communione Reformatos, qui idem ſentiunt in fundamento fidei, in Evangelio cum Lutheranis laborant, certant, luctantur, eoque nomine à communi hoſte innumeros cruciatos ſuſtinuerunt, ſuſtinentque, quique etiam ſanguinem pro confeſſione illa largiſſimè profuderunt. Cornua illi obvertere auſus Hutterus in Aulico-Politico cap. 2. pag. 176. &c. ubi regerit, à Papiſtis etiam Anabaptiſtas, Arianos, Antitrinitarios, alioſque ſupplicio affectos eſſe: cauſam ſupplicii noſtrorum non fuiſſe, quòd crediderint, ſe per Chriſtum ſervatum iri, ſed quòd Romanum Pontificem non agnoverint Paſtorem univerſalem ſed Antichriſtum, ejuſque jugum detrectaverint ferre (5). The Swiſs divine, who ſupplies me with this paſſage, judiciouſly obſerves, that this method of diſparaging the martyrdom of the Calviniſts might equally be imployed againſt the Lutheran martyrs. This he ſays, after having obſerved that a divine of Strasburg makes uſe of the ſame cavil as Hutterus. ‘ Gemella his effutivit Dannenhawerus, ‘ Argentinenſis Theologus, Colleg. Decalog. p. 394. ‘ ubi Reformatorum Martyrium larvatum vocare, & ‘ cum Judæorum, Ethnicorum, Arianorum ſub Atha‘laricho Gothorum Principe religionis cauſa occiſo‘rum Martyrio comparare non erubuit. Certè μεθοδεία talis etiam Lutheranæ Eccleſiæ Martyrii ‘ veri palmas laudemque præcideret (6). —— To this ‘ purpoſe, Dannenhawerus, a divine of Strasburg, pub‘liſhed two pieces, wherein he does not bluſh, to call ‘ the martyrdom of the Reformed Masked, and to com‘pare it with the martyrdom of the Jews, Heathens, ‘ Arians, put to death under Athalaricus, prince of ‘ the Goths, on account of religion; certainly ſuch a ‘ fradulent conſtruction would alſo cut off from the ‘ Lutheran church, the honour and praiſe of true mar‘tyrdom.’ Can we ſufficiently admire the effects of prepoſſeſſion? Is it not a deplorable thing, that a Popiſh miſſionary can object to the Proteſtants, that the martyrdom of their brethren is looked upon as a falſe martyrdom by ſome Lutheran doctors. See one of the remarks (7) of the article WESTPHALUS (JOACHIM). Note, that Pappus calls thoſe ſlanderers, who accuſe the Lutherans of looking upon the Calviniſt martyrs as the martyrs of the devil (8).

[C] His humour expoſed him to ſeveral diſputes, where he was forced to bear the ſtrokes of ſlander.] He is compared in his elogy, to the prophets and apoſtles, who were perſecuted for the truth; and it is affirmed that he anſwered calumny only with ſilence and contempt. I will not diſpute about theſe matters, being not ſufficiently acquainted with them; but I will ſay in general, that there are ſome doctors ſo paſſionate, ſo moroſe, and violent, that they get enemies, not becauſe they maintain orthodoxy, but by reaſon of their rude way of maintaining it. Their adverſaries take their revenge by perſonal reproaches, and publiſh the mcſt vexatious truths of them, and convict them of many ſcandalous things; and they know not how to juſtify themſelves. What muſt they do then? Why, they value themſelves extremely for their patience; they compare themſelves to the prophets and apoſtles, and to JESUS CHRIST himſelf. ‘ Being perſecuted, ſay they, like them for the truth, ‘ we open not our mouth, when the enemies of ‘ the truth abuſe us.’ Moliere ſhould have inſerted this in ſome ſcene of his Tartuffe, for it muſt be well obſerved, that theſe gentlemen are never ſilent, when they have ſcandals to publiſh againſt their neighbour, or when they can alledge any thing plauſible for their juſtification. Be it how it will, our Hutterus's panegyriſt crowns him with this fine elogy. ‘ Sicuti verò ſummis quibuſque Viris non omnia om‘ninò ex animi fluxere ſententia, ſed cruces, ca‘lumniæ & perſecutiones variæ illos exercuerunt, ita ‘ Hutterus certiſſimo hoc fidelium Dei Servorum cha‘ractere neutiquam caruit, quippe quo ab omnipo‘tente Deo, Prophetæ, Apoſtoli, & ſinceri Eccleſiæ ‘ Doctores olim ſunt ſignati . . . . Idem prorſus no‘ſtro fatum; quod æquo & patienti pertulit animo, ‘ magiſque de abſtergendis calumniis, ſuis anteceſſo‘ribus impactis, quam famæ & exiſtimationis propriæ ‘ vindicatione fuit ſollicitus, haud ignorans, omnes ‘ injurias oblivione melius, quam commemoratione ſa‘nari, & inimicorum calumnias contemptu potius ‘ quam lingua eſſe vindicandas (9). —— But as all ‘ things have not altogether ſucceeded according to the ‘ wiſh of every great man, but croſſes, calumnies, and ‘ various perſecutions have exerciſed them; ſo Hutte‘rus did in no wiſe want this moſt certain mark ‘ of the faithful ſervants of GOD, as being that with ‘ which the prophets, apoſtles, and true doctors of the ‘ church were of old, ſealed by Almighty GOD . . . . ‘ The ſame was wholly the fate of ours; which he ‘ bore with an equal and patient mind, and was more ‘ ſollicitous to wipe out the reproaches levelled at his ‘ predeceſſors; than to vindicate his own fame and reputa‘tion, knowing that all injuries are better cured by ‘ oblivion than remembrance, and that the calumnies ‘ of foes are to be reſented with contempt, rather than ‘ the tongue.’

[D] He muſt not be confounded with him that publiſhed a Polyglot Bible.] His name was ELIAS HUTTERUS. He firſt publiſhed a Bible in four languages, Hebrew, Greek, Latin, and High-Dutch, at Hamburgh, in the year 1597. Afterwards he added to it the Italian, French, Sclavonian, and Saxon. His New-Teſtament was printed in the year 1600, in twelve languages, which are the Syriac, Hebrew, Greek, Latin, German, Bohemian, Italian, Spaniſh, French, Engliſh, Daniſh, and Poliſh. He reduced them to four in the edition of the year 1603, namely, Hebrew, Greek, Latin, and German. This Polyglot Bible is very ſcarce. There is a collection of letters, containing the judgment of learned men about this work (10).

HUYBERT (PETER DE) lord of Burgh, Crayeſtein, &c. made himſelf famous by the great ſervices he did the Republic of the United Provinces of the Netherlands, and particularly to the province of Zealand. His family is very antient, and has produced many very conſiderable perſons [A]. He was born at Middleburg the firſt of Auguſt

[A] His family is very antient, and has produced many very conſiderable perſons.] He deſcended from CORNELIUS DE HUYBERT, and Joan de Haemſtede. The family of Haemſtede, is deſcended from Witte de Haemſtede, natural ſon to Floris earl of Holland and Zealand, lord of Frieſland, &c. and from a daughter of the lord Heuſden, a very conſiderable houſe at that time. That lady had too much complaiſance for count Floris, but it was under the promiſe of marriage. JACOB and HERMAN de HUYBERT, ſons of Cornelius, commanded the fleet, that carried the archduke Philip and his wife into Spain in the year 1506. Theſe two auguſt perſons were on board theſe two brothers: the fleet, which was very numerous, met with a dreadful tempeſt in the channel; ſeveral ſhips were loſt in ſight of the archduke, and yet by reaſon of ſome difference betwixt him and the king of England, he would not conſent to put into any Engliſh port. But when the two brothers HUYBERT repreſented to him the extream danger they were in, and that it was abſolutely neceſſary to make into Weymouth haven, he and his queen ſubmitted to their advice and good conduct. Then it was that he gave them this motto

WAECKT

---

(5) Heideggerus, Diſſertat. Select. Tom. II, pag. 352.

(6) Heideggerus, ibid.

(7) The remark [H].

(8) Nullo modo eos habemus pro martyribus Diaboli quemadmodum accuſamur. Joh. Pappus, Epit. Hiſtor. Eccleſ. pag. m. 49.

(9) Spizelius, ubi ſupra, pag. 35.

(10) Taken from Hottinger. Bibl. quadripartita, lib. i, cap. ii, pag. 141, 142.

Auguſt 1622, and was elected counſellor of that town the twenty fourth of March 1646. He gave ſuch proofs of his capacity, that the province of Zealand deputed him to the aſſembly of the States-General, and then to the firſt conferences (a) that were held between the deputies of the king of Spain, and thoſe of the United Provinces, after a long and bloody war of eighty years, and gloriouſly terminated at Munſter the thirtieth of January 1648. He was ſent in quality of embaſſador extraordinary to the king of Sweden, the king of Poland, and the elector of Brandenburg, during the famous war in which the Swedes invaded Poland, and made ſo many conqueſts upon the king of Denmark, that they forced him to give up to them three fine provinces on the other ſide of the Sound. In March 1659, he was choſen ſecretary of ſtate for the province of Zealand, and in May the ſame year was named plenipotentiary for the treaty of peace, which was concluded between Sweden and Denmark (b), by the mediation of France, England, and the United Provinces in 1660. The ability and fidelity that he ſhewed in thoſe illuſtrious employments, gave ſuch ſatisfaction, that, in March 1664, he was raiſed to the dignity of great penſionary of Zealand. The inſtructions of that poſt import, amongſt other things, that they ſhall maintain, on all occaſions, and at all times, the rights and preeminences of the ſtate, and the laws and privileges of the province, againſt all thoſe that ſhould attempt to violate them: whereby this becomes a very delicate as well as laborious employment. Nevertheleſs he diſcharged the duties of it twenty three years and an half with a general applauſe, and to the great ſatisfaction of his maſters, who deputing him, the twenty ſeventh of September 1687, to the great council of ſtate, expreſſed, in his commiſſion, that they were very well ſatisfied with his long and faithful ſervices, of which they ſhould ever preſerve a grateful remembrance. We muſt not forget, that he was created plenipotentiary of the United Provinces in the year 1667, for the treaty of Breda (c). He died at the Hague the ſeventh of January 1697. He was always obſerved to have an unſhaken zeal for the religion eſtabliſhed by the laws of the ſtate. He was it's defender on all occaſions, and could never ſuffer any alteration to be made in it, either in the doctrine or diſcipline (d). I ſhall ſpeak of his three ſons in the remarks [B]. His ſons buried him in a chapel of the church of Burgh in Zealand, and cauſed an epitaph to be engraved on his tomb (e), which may be ſeen below [C].

WAECKT HUYBERTS. That is to ſay, WATCH HUYBERTS. The emperor Maximilian, and the archduke Charles, to expreſs their great ſatisfaction for the ſervices they had done to the king of Caſtile, their ſon and father, on the thirteenth of March 1513, honoured the three brothers JOHN, Jacob, and Herman DE HUYBERT, and their poſterity with the privilege of wearing a ſword, permitting to each of them to have three domeſtics that ſhould wear it likewiſe: which was a very great honour at that time. John and Herman were ſent, the nineteenth of December 1512, to Henry VIII, king of England, by Margaret, archducheſs of Auſtria, then governeſs of the Low-Countries: It was about ſome negotiations, which ſhe was pleaſed to truſt them with. The emperor Charles V being in the town of Ziriczee, lodged in the houſe of LIVIN JACOBSEN DE HUYBERT, who was overſeer of the Dikes. The three brothers ſettled in the ſame town, and built each of them a houſe, which are ſtill the largeſt and moſt conſiderable buildings of Ziriczee (1).

Juan Chriſtoval Calvete de Eſtrella makes honourable mention of this family: y no poco nombrados, ſays he (2), eran los Huybertos de Cirixea por ſu valor y riqueza, that is, The Huyberts were very famous for their valour and their riches.

The author of the ſupplement to the chronicle of the abbot of Urſperg mentions him who conducted the archduke Philip into Spain: the name he gives him does not agree with the memoir which I have quoted: however, here is what he ſays. ‘Carolus Quintus rediit in Hiſpanias, Johannes Cornelius nauta navigatione decem dierum ab Anglico littore vehit. Hic nauta regem Philippum illuſtriſſimi Auguſti patrem, ultima navigatione in ſumma tempeſtate in Hiſpanias vexerat, & reginam Danorum una cum principe Ultrajectino in Daniam vexerat. Vir dives & peritiſſimus rei nauticæ (3). —— Charles V returned by ſea to Spain. John Cornelius, a ſailor, conducted him thither in ten days from the Engliſh coaſt. He had formerly carried king Philip, the emperor's father, to Spain, in a great ſtorm, and had likewiſe before had the honour of conducting the queen of Denmark, together with the prince of Utrecht, into Denmark. He was a very rich man, and eminent for his ſkill in navigation.’

[B] I will ſpeak of his three ſons.] The eldeſt is ANTHONY DU HUYBEBT, lord of Cruyningen, counſellor in the ſovereign court of juſtice. The ſecond is JOHN DU HUYBERT, lord of Nootgawe. He took to arms, in which his good conduct and valour advanced him to the poſt of lieutenant-general of horſe (4). The third has been counſellor in the council of Flanders, and at preſent is one of the directors of the Eaſt-India Company (5).

[C] His ſons .... cauſed an epitaph to be engraved on his tomb, which may be ſeen below.] It contains, in very noble expreſſions, an abſtract of his life and the character of his ſoul.

D. M.
Viri. Nobliſ. &. Ampliſſimi.
PETRI. DE. HUYBERT.
DOMINI. DE. BURG. ET CRAYSTEIN.
antiqua. &. multis. imaginibus. clara. familia.
Zeelandica. oriundi.

Natus. eſt. Middleburgi. propter. ingenii. præſtantiam. oris. facundiam. &. induſtriam. ſingularem. invigilandi. bono. publico. in. ſenatum. illius. urbis. cum. vix. adoleviſſet. eſt. cooptatus. omnium. expectationi. cum. ſatisfeciſſet. poſt. pacem. Monaſterienſem. ad conventum. Mechlinenſem. controverſiis. non. deciſis. inter. Hiſpanos. &. Batavos. componendis. dein. ad. Reges. Sueciæ. Poloniæ. Daniæ. &. Elect. Brandeb. miſſus. fuit. publice. graviſſimis. de. rebus. iiſque. confectis. ex. ſententia. Reip. redux. a. Præpot. Ordd. Zeeland. perſpecta. ejus. fide. & prudentia. delectus. fuit. ut. iis. eſſet. a. ſecretis. poſt. advocatus. perpetuus. Reip. Zeeland. eſt. factus. ſummo. omnium. conſenſu. dehinc. ab. Unitis. Belgis. Ablegatus. fuit. ad. Pacificationem. Bredanam. tandem. ne. tantæ. prudentiæ. fructum. ſoli. caperent. Zeelandi. paſſi. ſunt. eum. adſcribi. Conſilio. communi. ord. Sociatorum. ſeptem. populorum. ut. omnium. utilitatibus. ſerviret. ad. has. dignitates. illum. evexit. non. ambitio. populi. &. potentium. ſed. teſtata. cunctis. incredibilis. vigilantia. in. obeundis. ſtationis. ſuæ. muniis. ſumma. conſilii. præſentia. in. celeriter. inveniendis. quæ. tempora. Reip. exigebant. mira. dexteritas. in. efficiendis. quæ. in. rem. ſapienter. conſuluerat. ſingularis. ſagacitas. in. arduis. &. impeditiſſimis. negotiis. explicandis. &. ingens. robur. animi. in. iis. libere. oppugnandis. qui. rectæ. ſententiæ. de. Rep. cujus. ſæpe. auctor. fuit. adverſabantur. partes. nec. fecit. nec. fovit. in. omni. varietate. rerum. &. Reip. viciſſitudinibus. ſtatum. &. dignitatem. ſuam. tenuit. illibatam. ſatur. vitæ. defletus. bonis. omnibus. &. valde. deſideratus. Θ. D. VII. Januar. An. Ch. CIↃ. IↃC. XCVII. ætat. LXXV. mœſtiſſimi. liberi. P. C.

(a) Viz. The conferences held at Mechlen, in 1652. and 1653.

(b) The king of Sweden had begun a new war, and conquered all Denmark except Copenhagen.

(c) That treaty, which was made by the mediation of Sweden, put an end to the war between Charles II, king of England, and the United Provinces.

(d) Taken from a Memoir communicated to the Bookſeller.

(e) He himſelf cauſed this tomb to be made, and beſides his large contributions towards the repairing of the church wherein he is buried, he directed the building of it, which paſſes for a good piece of architecture.

(1) Taken from a Memoir imparted to the Bookſeller.

(2) In the deſcription of the journey of Don Philip, prince of Spain, through the Netherlands, in the year 1548, printed at Antwerp, 1552, in fol. pag. 263.

(3) Paralipomena ad Abbat. Urſpergenſ. apud Anton. Matthæum. Veter. ævi Analect. pag. 249.

(4) His Britannic majeſty raiſed him to that poſt after the peace of Reſwic.

(5) Taken from the abovementioned Memoir.

TO
The memory of
PETER DE HUYBERT.
Lord of Burg and Crayſtein.
Of an ancient and noble family in Zealand.

He was born at Middleburg, and admitted, while very young, into the ſenate of that city, on account of his great genius, eloquence, and ſingular attention to the good of the public. After he had ſatisfied the expectations of all men in that ſtation, he, after the peace of Munſter, was ſent to the congreſs at Mechlen, in order to ſettle all controverſies remaining betwixt the Spaniards and Dutch. He was afterwards ſent in the quality of embaſſador, to the kings of Sweden, Poland, Denmark, and to the Elector of Brandenburg, to treat of matters of the higheſt importance; and after happily terminating all that, he was, on his return, in conſideration of his eminent fidelity and prudence, choſen ſecretary by the ſtates of Zealand, and afterwards, with univerſal approbation, perpetual Penſionary. Some time after he was ſent by the States-General, in quality of embaſſador, to the treaty of Breda; and laſt of all, that the Zealanders alone might not enjoy the fruits of his wiſdom, he was allowed by them to accept of a place in the council of ſtate of the United Provinces, that he might there be a common good to the whole common-wealth. To all theſe high honours he was advanced, not by courting the favour either of the people, or of the nobles, but by his univerſally known and admirable vigilance, in performing the duties of his charge, his great preſence of mind in contriving the moſt proper expedients in all exigencies of the ſtate, and ſingular dexterity in executing what he had ſo wiſely counſelled. His great ſagacity in unravelling the moſt arduous and perplexed affairs, and great ſtrength of mind in oppoſing thoſe who were enemies to ſuch reſolutions as were entred into for the public good, of which he was frequently the author. He neither formed nor encouraged parties; and in all viciſſitudes of affairs and changes in the ſtate, he preſerved his ſtate and dignity unblemiſhed. Being bewailed by all good men, he died VII January, An. Ch. CIↃ. IↃC. XCVII. in the LXXV year of his age, his ſorrowful children erected this monument.

JACCETIUS.

I.

JACCETIUS (Francis Cataneus) was born at Florence on the ſixteenth day of November, 1466. He was the diſciple of Marſilius Ficinus, and he made ſo great proficiency by the leſſons of this learned maſter, that he became one of the beſt Platoniſts of his time, and an excellent orator. He ſucceeded the ſame Ficinus in his profeſſorſhip of Philoſophy, who judged him excellently well qualified for it, even ſo far, as to believe, that nature had produced him for that purpoſe. He publiſhed ſeveral books [A], and died at Florence in the year 1522. He was buried in the church of the Holy Croſs, in the tomb of his anceſtors, and he left thirteen ſons [B]. Benedetto Varchi made his funeral oration: his life was moſt elegantly written by Euphroſynus Lapinus (a). His true Italian name Diacceto, has received a thouſand alterations from the writers who ſpeak of him or of his poſterity [C]. There is another FRANCIS CATANEUS JACCETIUS, who is an author [D]; but I think he is known only by the name of Diacettius, or Diacetius. I believe the count de Châteauvilain, who married one of Catherine de Medicis's maids of honour, was deſcended from our Francis Jaccetius [E]. That maid was call'd Madam d' Atri, and has been both well and ill ſpoken of (b).

[A] He publiſhed ſeveral books.] Theſe are the titles of ſome of them: De pulchro libri tres. De amore libri tres. Paraphraſis in Politicum, & Theagenem Platonis, & in Ariſtotelem de cœlo & meteoris. Enarratio in Platonis ſympoſium. Oratio in funere Laurentii Medices. Epiſtolæ variæ, &c. An edition of his works in Folio, was printed at Baſil, in the year 1563. Mention is made of it in Geſner's Bibliotheque, under Franciſcus Cataneus Jaccetius. The catalogue of Oxford and Konig ſpeak of it only under the word Cataneus. Ghilini calls this author only Franciſco Catanio (1). He has very well paraphraſed what Pocciantius ſaid of him, and adds nothing beſides.

[B] He left thirteen ſons.] I make no doubt one of them was the perſon I ſpeak of in the article of MACHIAVEL (2) and whoſe miſerable end has been deſcribed by Pierius Valerianus in this manner: ‘Jacobus Jacettus juvenis & Græcè & Latinè egregiè peritus, pangendi carminis auctor non illepidus ‘Florentinam cathedram obtinebat; ſed infelici ſuo ‘ſidere conjurationis in Julii Cardinalis Medices cædem certo die patrandam conſcius fuit; qua patefacta, captus ipſe, & tam nefandi ſceleris convictus ‘Senatus Florentini judicio ſecuri percuſſus eſt (3). ‘——— James Jaccetus, a youth perfectly well ‘skilled both in Greek and Latin, a graceful author ‘in compoſing verſes, was promoted to a profeſſorſhip ‘at Florence, but, by the malice of his ſtars, was an ‘accomplice in a conſpiracy to compaſs the murder of ‘Julius Cardinal Medicis, upon a certain day; which ‘coming to light, being apprehended and convicted of ‘ſo horrid a wickedneſs, he was, by judgment of the ‘ſenate of Florence, beheaded.’ Paul Jovius, who gives him no other title but that of a poet (4), is to be cenſured. I fancy that Brother Angelus de Cataneis Diacetius (5), who after he had gone through all the dignities of the Dominican order, was made biſhop of Fieſoli, in the year 1566, was one of the thirteen ſons of our Jaccetius. He died the fifth of May, 1574, being eighty one years old (6). He is called in his epitaph (7) Angelus Cataneus Diacetius.

[C] His true name Diacceto, has been very much altered by the writers that ſpeak of him or his poſterity.] See the remark [C] of the article MACHIAVEL, and note, that the reaſon why I make Diacceto his true name, is becauſe I have found this word in the ſubſcription of a letter (8), which our Jaccetius's grandſon wrote to Varchi the ninth of September, 1561, upon ſending him two copies of a book of his grandfather (9). He had received four from Venice. The edition pleaſed him as to the character, but he found it uncorrect. Michael Pocciantius has not been altogether exact, having written that name Franciſcus Cathaneus Diacetius (10). Note, that the author of the notes upon the book, intituled, La Confeſſion de Sanci, informs me (11), that Carolus Zenobii de Ghiaceto unus ex Decemviris Baliæ Florentinæ civitatis, ſignified in that quality with J.... ſon of Coſmo de Medicis, in a contract made at Florence, in 1453, which he ſaw amongſt the archives of Lorrain. This ſhews, that the ancient name of this family was not Diacceto. It is very probable that Diacceto was made by joining the article and the name together. I have ſpoken in another place (12) of the life of one Paul Ghiacetti.

[D] There is another FRANCIS CATANEUS JACCETIUS, who is an author.] Michael Pocciantius calls him Franciſcus Cathaneus Diacettius, and ſays, that he was canon of the cathedral of Florence apoſtolical protonotary, doctor of the civil law, and biſhop of Fieſoli, and that amongſt other works, he compoſed in Italian, the life of Jesus Christ, that of the Holy Virgin, and of St Dominic, and of ſome biſhops of Fieſoli, ſeveral ſermons, and the epiſtles and goſpels for all the year (13). Ughelli calls him Franciſcus Cataneus Diacetius, and ſays, that he was the ſucceſſor of Angelus de Cataneis Diacetius his uncle, in the biſhopric of Fieſoli, in the year 1570; that he ſate amongſt the fathers of the council of Trent; that he wrote ſome tracts De authoritate Papæ & Concilii, de ſuperſtitione artis magicæ, &c. that he diſcharged all the duties of a good prelate, and died the fourth of November 1595 (14).

[E] The count de Châteauvilian . . . deſcended from our Francis Jaccetius.] Mezerai, ſpeaking of the exploits of the king's troops againſt the League, obſerves, that Sanci made himſelf maſter of Châteauvilain in Champagne, in the year 1589, at the ſollicitation of the lord of the place. It was, adds he (15), a Florentine, named Lewis Dijaceti, who, as many others of his nation, had got vaſt wealth by farming the impoſts and cuſtoms of the king.

JANSENIUS (Cornelius) biſhop of Ipres, was one of the moſt learned divines of the XVIIth century. He was born near Leerdam [A] in Holland, in 1585. He

[A] He was born near Leerdam.] In a village called Accoy, as Mr Leydecker obſerves ‘Fallunt, ſays he (1), operis poſthumi editores quando referunt eum natum eſſe Leerdami modico Bataviæ oppidulo, ſed tanti,

(a) Ex Michaele Pocciantio, de Scriptor. Florentinis, pag. 67, 68.

(b) See the notes upon the Confeſſ. Catholique de Sanci, pag. 459, & ſeq. Edit. 1699.

(1) Ghilini, Teatro, Tom. II, pag. 88.

(2) In the remark [C].

(3) Pierius Valerian. de Litterator. infelicit. lib. ii, pag. 77.

(4) See the article MACHIAVEL, remark [C].

(5) So he is called in the third volume of the Italia Sacra of Ughelli, pag. 340.

(6) Id. ibid.

(7) Ughelli, ibid. bas it.

(8) Bulifon has inserted it in page 199, of his Lettere Storiche Politiche et Erudite, printed in Pozzoli 1685.

(9) Viz. his book de Amore.

(10) Mich. Pocciantius, de Script. Florent. pag. 67.

(11) Page 461, of the edition of 1699.

(12) In the remark of the article FONTIUS.

(13) Pocciant. ubi ſupra, pag. 71.

(14) Ughelli, ubi ſupra.

(15) Mezerai, Hiſt. de France, Tom. III, pag. 784, Edit. 1685.

(1) Leydecker, de Vita & Morte Janſenii, pag. 2.

He has been often reproached as if his family had been Proteſtant, and he had for ſome time profeſſed that religion [B]; but this is not true. He went to ſtudy at Louvain in 1602, and he purſued his ſtudies with ſo much application, that he fell ſick (a), ſo that he was adviſed to remove to another place for the benefit of the air. He went from thence to Paris, where he found John du Verger de Hauranne (b), with whom he had entered into a ſtrict friendſhip at Louvain. Upon the recommendation of this good friend, he was made tutor in a good family (c); and being a learned man, he quickly became acquainted with ſome illuſtrious perſons. Some time after he went to Bayonne, to his good Friend, who had retired thither. They ſtudied together with an extraordinary application [C], and got ſo far into the eſteem of the Biſhop of Bayonne, that he procured a canonſhip in his Cathedral for du Verger, and the direction of a college for Janſenius (d). The biſhop being raiſed to the archbiſhopric of Tours [D], invited du Verger to Paris; and then Janſenius being parted from his friend, and being not ſure of the protection of the new prelate, left Bayonne, and returned to Louvain, where he was made principal of the college of St Pulcheria; a poſt which he diſliked, becauſe it did not allow him time to apply himſelf as much as he deſired to his ſtudies, which was alſo the reaſon why he would not undertake to teach Philoſophy (e). He was admitted doctor of Divinity in the year 1617 (f), and taken into the number of the ordinary profeſſors, and he acquired ſuch a reputation, that the univerſity ſent him twice into Spain [E] upon matters of importance.

‘ti viri natalibus jam magno. Etenim ſciant ejus Aſſeclæ eum in Comitatu quidem Leerdamenſi natum, non tamen in oppido LEERDAMO (Lingerdamo aliàs, quòd ad Lingam fluvium ſit ſitum) ſed in quodam Pago, quod Urbeculæ ſubeſt, & ACCOY appellatur: ſic Nepotes & Conſanguinei, qui ibi adhuc degunt, teſtantur, ſuperſtite humili Domuncula, in qua primum lucem adſpexit. —— For be it known to his followers, that he was indeed born in the county of Leerdam, but not in the town of LEERDAM, (alias Lingerdam, becauſe it ſtands by the river Linga) but in a certain village which is under the little town, and called ACCOY: ſo teſtify his poſterity and relations, who live there ſtill, the little cottage being as yet remaining in which he firſt ſaw light.’ We muſt not ſeek a myſtery in his calling himſelf Leerdamenſis (2), for he called himſelf ſo, according to the uſual cuſtom of taking the name of the town, in whoſe territory one is born. This may be proved by a thouſand inſtances (3).

[B] He has been reproached as if he had for ſome time profeſſed the Proteſtant religion.] A Jeſuit of Bourdeaux, called Moſes du Bourg, publiſhed a little book (4) in the year 1658, in which he ſaid (5) ‘that the father of Cornelius Janſenius profeſſed the Hereſy of the Calviniſts, though his ſon being of age, declared himſelf a Catholic.’ Father Labbe had publiſhed the ſame thing before him (6): ‘Princeps eorum extitit Cornelius Jansenius qui gente Hollandus, patria Leerdamenſis, inter hæreticos educatus à puero, tum Lovanii, &c. —— The chief of them was Cornelius Jansenius, who, being a Dutchman, a native of Leerdam, was from a child educated among the Heretics then at Louvain, &c.’ Father Hazart renewed the ſame calumny in a Flemiſh book, intituled, The triumph of the Popes of Rome, which he publiſhed at Antwerp, in 1681. His father, ſays he, was a Calviniſt; and as for himſelf, being grown, he made an outward ſhew of being a Catholic (7). When he was proſecuted as a ſlanderer, he alledged, amongſt other reaſons, that he was not the author of this reproach, ſince he publiſhed it only after Moſes du Bourg (8). It has been evidently proved in the Caſes which I quote, that this is a very falſe charge. Here is a paſſage of Mr Leydecker, which contains ſome particulars, that are not in the Caſes. ‘Parentes habuit honeſtos, Pontificiæ Religioni addictos, licet Evangelica lux Belgio affunderetur, quibuſque modicæ opes. Ut male Hazardus Jeſuita in Hiſtoriis Eum Patre Calviniano natum retulerit, illum falſi poſtulantibus, qui id non ferrent, Nepotibus. Pater appellatus fuit vernaculo nomine Jan Ottiie (9), fabrili opere victum quæritans, Mater autem Lyntje Gysberts, ceu referunt ſuperſtites, unde hic Filius Cornelis Jansen dictus eſt, antiquo vulgi in Belgio more, at Latina vel erudita terminatione, Cornelius Jansenius (10). —— He was deſcended of honeſt parents addicted to the Romiſh religion, though the light of the goſpel had then ſhone in Holland, and who had a ſmall eſtate, ſo that Hazart the Jeſuit unjuſtly reported his father was a Calviniſt, for which he was ſued in an action of ſcandal by his relations who would not bear it. The father was in the language of his country, called Jan Ottiie, gaining his livelihood at Carpenter's work, the mother Lyntje Gysberts, as thoſe who know them give out, from whence this ſon was named Cornelius Jansen, after the antient cuſtom of the vulgar in Holland, but in the Latin, or learned termination, Cornelius Jansenius.’

[C] They ſtudied together with an extraordinary application.] ‘It was at Mr d'Hauranne's houſe, who was afterwards abbot of St Cyran, that Janſenius ſpent the five or ſix years that he was at Bayonne, applying himſelf to the reading of the holy fathers and St Auguſtin, ſo aſſiduouſly, that he appearing to be of no ſtrong conſtitution, Mr Hauranne's mother uſed to ſay to her ſon, that he would kill that honeſt Fleming, by making him ſtudy ſo hard (11).’

[D] Being raiſed to the archbiſhopric of Tours.] According to Mr Leydecker (12) this archbiſhopric became vacant by the ceſſion of Sebaſtian Galigai, brother (13) of the marquis d'Ancre: Vacante Cathedra per ſpontaneam Sebaſtiani Galigaji Florentini, infelicis Marchionis Ancræi fratris, ceſſionem.

[E] The univerſity ſent him twice into Spain.] His enemies gave out a great many lies hereupon. They ſaid, ‘that he fled from Spain, juſt as he was going to be taken by the Inquiſition for venting his new doctrine there (14).’ This is what Father Hazart has aſſerted after Moſes du Bourg. Here is the anſwer that is to be found in the Caſes (15.)

‘His ignorance (16) of Mr Janſenius's affairs, plainly ſhews, that it is a calumny forged at pleaſure. He ſpeaks of his journey to Spain, as if he had made but one, whereas he has made two †: one in the year 1624, and the other in 1625. This would have perplexed the Jeſuit of Bourdeaux; for if he had fixed his ſtory to the firſt voyage of Janſenius, the falſhood would have been viſible, becauſe Janſenius would have taken care, not to return thither a ſecond time. And if he had fixed it to the ſecond, it would have been viſible another way; it being certain, that ſo unlucky an accident would have ruined all his negotiation, and that he would have returned in diſgrace to Louvain: inſtead of which it is moſt true, that he returned glorioufly, having obtained of his Catholic majeſty, all that the univerſity of Louvain deſired, to put a ſtop to the enterprizes of the Jeſuits. Laſtly, an author, who deſerves ſo little credit upon other accounts, is not at all to be credited about a thing which of itſelf is ſcarce credible, when in the ſame place he advances three other manifeſt falſities againſt the ſame perſon. This is what this Jeſuit of Bourdeaux has done; the firſt is, that Janſenius's father was a Calviniſt, &c. a calumny, the falſity whereof is unanſwerably proved in the firſt and third Caſe. The ſecond is, That Janſenius being returned to Louvain, after the excurſion he had made into France, obtained, by his intrigues, under the notion of a poor Dutch Catholic, a penſioner's place in a college, in which a diſtribution of ſome money was made for the maintainance of ſuch poor ſcholars. An impudent

---

(a) Valer. Andr. Deſſelius, Bibl. Belg. pag. 154.

(b) He who made himſelf ſo famous under the name of the abbot of St Cyran.

(c) Leydecker, ubi infra, citat. (g), pag. 8.

(d) Ib. pag. 10.

(e) Ibid. pag. 12.

(f) Valer. Andr. ubi ſupra.

(2) Janſenius patria fuit Batavus, atque ut ipſe ſcribit, quaſi in honore id poneret, Leerdamenſis —— Unde verò iſte error? an quod, &c. Id ibid. & pag. 3.

(3) See the remark [A] of the article CASTELLAN.

(4) Intituled, Hiſtoire du Janſeniſme, contenant ſa conception, ſa naiſſance, ſon accroiſſement & ſon agonie.

(5) See the Factums, or Caſes, of Janſenius's relations, in the eighth Tome of the Morale Pratique, pag. 317.

(6) In præfatione Triumphi Catholicæ Veritatis, printed at Paris, 1651.

(7) See the Caſes of Janſenius's relations, pag. 307.

(8) Ibid. pag. 317.

(9) It is obſerved at the beginning of the firſt Caſe, that he was called John Otto Acquoy.

(10) Leydecker. de Vita Janſen. pag. 3.

(11) The Caſes of Janſenius's relations, pag. 410.

(12) De Vita Janſenii, pag. 10.

(13) Or rather brother-in law; for the marquis d'Ancre's name was Concini, and his wife's name Galligai.

(14) Caſes, pag. 450.

(15) Pag. 451.

(16) That is, of Moſes du Bourg.

† Valer. Andr. in Faſtis Academicis, pag. 393.

importance. The king his maſter made him profeſſor of the Holy Scripture in 1630, in the univerſity of Louvain; and five years after he preferred him to the biſhopric of Ipres. A book, that Janſenius publiſhed againſt France [F], mightily contributed to his getting this dignity. He enjoyed it but a ſhort time; for he died the ſixth of May, 1638. He had been above twenty years upon a work, in which he explained St Auguſtin's Syſtem concerning the Doctrine of Grace. This book, publiſhed after his death, has raiſed great diſturbances in the church of Rome [G], and found a great deal of work for the Popes.
The

‘ impudent lie, confuted by the public acts †; for as ſoon as he returned to Louvain in the year 1617, he took his degree of doctor of Divinity, and was made preſident of the college of St Pulcheria: Lovanium revocatus novo Collegio D. Pulcheriæ præficitur.’ The third is an infamous calumny, viz. that ‘this penſioner ſtole money from the college to pay the penſion of the abbot of S. Cyran's two nephews. I. The abbot of S. Cyran had but one nephew at Louvain. II. If Janſenius was only penſioner, how could he diſpoſe of the college money? III. This pretended theft is an horrid calumny, diſperſed in many of the Jeſuits libels, of which they have been convicted in the ſixteenth Provincial letter, in theſe words; I will tell you, &c.’

† Faſti Acad. pag. 138.

It has been ſaid a thouſand times, that there is no fiction but is grounded upon ſome truth. And this may be ſaid of that ſtory of Moſes du Bourg; for it appears by a letter of Janſenius, that the Spaniſh inquiſition made ſome informations againſt him after his departure. The words of his letter are theſe (17): ‘They write to me from Spain, that the Inquiſition has been ſet on againſt a doctor of Louvain, who had been in that kingdom; and that they have applied themſelves to a doctor of Salamanca, in whoſe houſe he lodged, who is the firſt doctor of that univerſity, called Baſil de Leon, to take information againſt him as an Hollander, and conſequently an Heretic: but he anſwered them ſo much to the advantage of this doctor, as put them out of countenance (18).’ I ſhall conclude this remark with the words of Valerius Andreas (19). ‘Brevi quoque tempore eam de ſe opinionem apud Academicos omnes excitavit, ut præ Janſenio alius magis idoneus non fuerit judicatus, qui nomine ejuſdem Academiæ bis Legatus in Hiſpanias mitteretur. Ubi quâ prudentiâ ac dexteritate ſeſe geſſerit, tum apud Regem Catholicum, tum in Academiis Salmanticenſi ac Valliſoletana, feliciſſimus utriuſque Legationis eventus docuit. —— Alſo in a ſhort time he raiſed that opinion of himſelf, amongſt all the members of the univerſity, that none was reckoned ſo fit as Janſenius, to be ſent embaſſador in the name of the ſame univerſity into Spain, where with what prudence and dexterity he behaved himſelf both with the Catholic king and the univerſities of Salamanca and Valladolid; the moſt happy event of both embaſſies is a proof.’ Conſult Mr Leydecker (20) concerning the ſubject and ſucceſs of theſe Spaniſh voyages.

(17) Dated the thirty firſt of December, 1627.

(18) Caſes, pag. 462, 463.

(19) Bibl. Belg. pag. 154.

(20) Pag. 23, & ſeq.

[F] A book that Janſenius publiſhed (21) againſt France.] It is written with great ſtrength of argument, and intituled Alexandri Patricii Armacani, Theologi, Mars Gallicus, ſeu de juſtitia armorum & fœderum Regis Galliæ libri duo. It contains the moſt malicious and odious outcries, againſt the continual ſervices which France did to the Proteſtants of Holland and Germany, to the great prejudice of the Catholic religion. The Hollanders are there called rebels who enjoy a republican liberty by an infamous uſurpation. They have anſwered that reproach a hundred times, and Mr Leydecker has not forgot to anſwer it ſolidly (22). He tells us (23), that there was a report that Janſenius being conſulted by the duke of Arſchot, and the archbiſhop of Mechlen, after the loſs of Boiſleduc, and Maeſtricht, adviſed them to ſhake off the Spaniſh yoke, and to canton in the way of the Swiſs. It was diſcovered, that he had given that counſel, and he was in great pain about it. Hereupon the preſident Roſe taught him an expedient to come off: he adviſed him to write againſt France, and gave him the plan of the Mars Gallicus (24). Mr Leydecker alleges a letter of the Nuncio Fabio Chigi. ‘Et ne mentiri viderentur, literas produxêre Fabii Gighii, Nuntii Apoſtolici (qui deinde Alexander VII. fuit) ad F. Barberinum, Cardinalem, datas Coloniæ 25. Martii, 1641. ubi hæc ſcripta; Cardinalis Richelius admodum ſtomachatur in Janſenium, quod cum Roſæo Martem Gallicum conſcripſerit. Nimirum hæ literæ adhuc in Collegio S. Officii Romæ aſſervantur (25). —— And that they might not ſeem to tell a lie, they produced the letters of Fabio Chighi apoſtolic Nuntio, (who afterwards was Alexander VII) to F. Barberini cardinal, dated at Cologn the twenty fifth of March 1641, where theſe words were written, Cardinal Richelieu is very angry with Janſenius, becauſe he wrote the Mars Gallicus with Roſe, theſe letters are ſtill kept in the college of the Holy Office at Rome.’ The Jeſuits failed not to exaſperate the court of France againſt the followers of Janſenius, as being a man who had defamed the nation and their monarchs, almoſt from the firſt to the laſt. Mr Leydecker cites a long paſſage out of a book which he believes to be Father Annat's (26); but in all probability it was written by Father Vavaſſeur (27), I will only ſet down ſo much of it as concerns the ingratitude that Janſenius was reproached with. ‘Ante omnia Janſenio exprobrat ingratum in Galliam animum, quæ ipſi valetudinem, quam recipere non poſſet in patria, concreto & pingui cœlo, reſtituerat puro & ſalubri; quæ victum, cum egeret, præbuerat, tum domeſtico Præceptori Lutetiæ Pariſiorum, tum ludi publici Magiſtro Bajonæ; quæ notitiâ Virorum illuſtrium atque doctorum animum fecerat ad majora, aditumque & viam muniverat. Quin in Galliis quod beneficii loco ſine dubio numeravit, magnam adeptus erat librorum Calvinianorum copiam, quorum de fontibus hauſit Auguſtini interpretationem, & invenerat homines à Calvini diſciplina non alienos quibuſcum liberiores de Gratia ſermones contulerit (28). —— But above all he taxes Janſenius with ingratitude towards France, which had by its pure and good air, reſtored him to health, which he could not obtain from the groſs and thick air of his own country, which had in his neceſſity given a livelihood to him, both as a domeſtic præceptor at Paris, and a maſter of a public ſchool at Bayonne, which by an acquaintance with illuſtrious and learned men, had formed his mind to greater things, and added ſtrength to his intereſt. Nay, in France, with no doubt, he regarded as a benefit, he got a large quantity of Calviniſtical books, from which fountains he drew his interpretation of St Auguſtine, and found men not averſe to the doctrine of Calvin, with whom he had more free conferences concerning Grace.’

(21) In the year 1635.

(22) Leydecker, de Vita Janſenii, pag. 94, & ſeq.

(23) Pag. 92.

(24) Opportune ſuam operam offerebat P. Roſæus, vir eruditiſſimus Sanctioris Conſilii Præſes, cujus ante meminimus, ſuppeditato voluminis argumento, quo vel pœnitentiam ageret, vel famam falſi accuſaret. Iſtud autem erat Mars Gallicus, ſtylo quidem Janſenii ornandus, cujus tamen materia ipſius opus, eruditionem & ingenium excedebat. Leydecker, de Vita Janſenii, pag. 93.

(25) Ibid.

(26) Ib. pag. 89.

(27) It is aſcribed to him, page 31, of Sebaſtian Mabre-Cramoiſy's Catalogue, printed in 1678. The Janſenius ſuſpectus was printed in 1650, by Sebaſtian and Gabriel Cramoiſy.

(28) Autor libri cui titulus, Janſenius ſuſpectus, apud Leydeckerum, pag 89.

Let us admire the viciſſitude of human affairs. Janſenius was rewarded with a mitre for having confounded France upon her entring into alliances with Proteſtant ſtates; and at preſent (29) the court of Spain would doubtleſs give a good prelacy to a doctor of Louvain, who ſhould write as ſtrong a book for the juſtification of ſuch a league, as that book was which Janſenius wrote againſt France: ſo true it is, that one may attain to the ſame end by quite contrary means, and that what is good at one time may become very bad at another (30). The confutation of a book may deſerve the reward that was given for the book itſelf. What a pretty ſcene would it be for unprejudiced people; ſhould they ſee a doctor of Louvain made a biſhop for ſolidly confuting our Cornelius's Mars Gallicus?

(29) I write this in the year 1695.

(30) See remark [I], of the article HOTMAN.

Naudé (31) makes him the author of the Admonitio (32), and of Myſteria Politica, two works, ſays he, that had wonderful effects againſt the deſigns of Lewis XIII. I believe he is miſtaken.

(31) Naudé, Coups d'Eſtat. chap. iv, pag. m. 610.

(32) See, above, remark [F] of the article BOUCHER (JOHN).

[G] This book . . . . . has raiſed great diſturbances in the church of Rome.] It has given birth to an infinite number of other books, ſome of which contain all that can be ſaid on both ſides upon the ſubject, by men of great acuteneſs, ſubtilty, and learning; but after all, a man is not one jot the wiſer than he was before; which will ever be the fate of diſputes of this kind: the more they are handled, the more they are confounded, and give the reader occaſion to ſay, Feciſtis probe, incertior ſum multo quam dudum (33). — Very well,

(33) Terent. Phorm. Act. II, Scen. III.

The followers of Janſenius's doctrine have been call'd Janſeniſts, and the Jeſuits have been their greateſt adverſaries. Perhaps the ſhuffling and foul play that attends controverſies of this nature, was never ſo notorious as in this [H]. This doctor engaged in controverſy with the Proteſtants [I]; but he left them the field of battle. We have ſome other works written by him [K]. I have not ſaid that the court of Room proceeded againſt the epitaph of this biſhop [L]. Conſult Mr Leydecker's book lately publiſh'd.

It

well, I know leſs now than I did before. It has been ſaid, that the doctrine of grace is a ſea that has neither ſhore nor bottom. Perhaps it had been better to compare it with the Faro of Meſſina, in which there is always danger of running upon a rock, by endeavouring to avoid another: Incidit in Scyllam cupiens vitare Charybdim. The whole controverſy comes at laſt to this. Did Adam ſin freely? If you anſwer, yes: then, it will be replied, his fall was not foreſeen: if you ſay no: then it will be replied he was not culpable. You may write an hundred volumes upon either of theſe conſequences, and at laſt you muſt be forced to own either, that the infallible foreſight of a contingent event, is an inconceivable myſtery; or that the way how a creature ſins, though it acts in a neceſſary manner, is wholly incomprehenſible. I deſire no more: for to what purpoſe is it to write ſo many books, ſince you muſt own one of theſe two incomprehenſible myſteries?

[H] The ſhuffling and foul play was never ſo notorious as in this.] Thoſe that have never ſo little penetration ſee plainly that in the diſpute about Liberty, there are but too ſides to be taken: one is to ſay, that all the cauſes diſtinct from the ſoul, which concur with her, leave her the power of acting, or not acting; the other is to ſay, that they determine her in ſuch a manner to act, that ſhe cannot do otherwiſe. The firſt opinion is that of the Moliniſts; the other is, that of the Thomiſts, Janſeniſts, and the Proteſtants of the confeſſion of Geneva. Here are three ſorts of people that oppoſe Moliniſm, and who at the bottom muſt be of the ſame mind; and yet the Thomiſts have contended might and main, that they were no Janſeniſts, and the Janſeniſts have maintained with equal heat, that upon the point of liberty they were not Calviniſts. There are no artifices or ill-grounded diſtinctions, but what have been made uſe of to colour that pretence; and all this with deſign to avoid the dangerous conſequences they foreſaw, would follow their confeſſing any conformity, either with the Janſeniſts, or the Calviniſts. On the other hand, there is no ſophiſtry bnt what the Moliniſts have made uſe of, to ſhew, that St Auguſtin did not teach Janſeniſm, as being unwilling to own, that their doctrine is contrary to that of this great ſaint. Thus the Thomiſts refuſing to confeſs their conformity with people called Heretics; and the Moliniſts, to own themſelves againſt a doctor, who has been always reckoned orthodox in his opinions, have plaid an hundred tricks, without a grain of ſincerity in their conduct.

[I] He ingaged in controverſy with the Proteſtants.] Here follows the ſubſtance of that diſpute (34). The States-General made an edict in 1629, by which they prohibited the public exerciſe of the Romiſh religion in Boiſleduc, and appropriated the eccleſiaſtical revenues of the mayoralty of that town to the uſe of the Proteſtant religion, which they cauſed to be preached there by four miniſters. The latter having notice that many virulent ſlanders were ſecretly ſcattered againſt their doctrine, publiſhed a maniſeſto to declare, that they taught nothing but the pure goſpel, and to exhort their adverſaries to propoſe in public what they had to object. This was only anſwered in a piece (35) that Janſenius was the author of. Gisbert Voetius, one of the four miniſters who preached in Boiſleduc, made ſome remarks upon this work (36), which were confuted by a new book of Janſenius (37). The author of the remarks replied, and confuted his adverſary in a great book, publiſhed in the year 1635, and intituled deſperata cauſa papatus. Janſenius did not reply, but one of his friends replied for him, this was Libertus Fromondus. His book (38) was printed at Antwerp in the year 1636, and refuted by Martin Schoockius, profeſſor of Hiſtory and Eloquence at Deventer, who intituled his anſwer deſperatiſſima cauſa papatus. It was printed in the year 1638. Mr Leydecker ſays this was the end of that diſpute (39). But I find in the Bibliotheca of Valerius Andreas amongſt Fromondus's works, a piece intituled Sycophanta: epiſtola ad Gisbertum Voetium, printed in 1640. And ſince the firſt impreſſion of this article, I have ſeen a letter, in which this profeſſor of Utrecht is taxed with being miſtaken. 'Falleris, ô Præclare, 'ſecus res habet . . . . Fromondus . . . . ultimo ictu 'proſtravit adverſarium, nunquam quod ſciam refutatus (40). —— Thou art miſtaken great man, the 'thing is of another ſort . . . Fromondus . . . with the 'laſt blow ſtruck down his adverſary, and as far as I 'know has never been refuted.'

Janſenius had another war to maintain, which we may call a Proteſtant one. For Theodorus Simonis (41), a wavering Catholic, who wanted a maſter, came to Louvain to deſire him to explain ſome doubts about the infallibility of the Pope, the adoration of the Euchariſt, and ſome other points. Janſenius, being hampered with this man's objections, told him one day that he would no longer diſpute vivâ voce, but in writing, perceiving he had to do with a Catholic, who would quickly go into Holland, and boaſt that he had vanquiſhed him. Simonis, who had much ado to bring himſelf to diſpute in writing, reſolved upon it at laſt. But after each of them had wrote twice upon thoſe ſubjects, Simonis found himſelf beſieged with ſoldiers in his lodgings, and threatned to be puniſhed as an heretic. The ſecretary of the duke of Arſchot, cryed out againſt him, and ſaid there was wood enough in his maſter's foreſt to burn that Heretic. But he who examined Simonis, in the name of the archbiſhop of Mechlen, having reported that he had found him a good Catholic, and firmly reſolved to continue ſo, the priſoner was ſet at liberty, and Janſenius was obliged to pay the expence of the ſoldiers, &c. Simonis, two years after turned Proteſtant, and publiſhed a book (42) intituled, De ſtatu & religione propria papatus adverſus Janſenium (43). I have lately read, that this man having left Lutheraniſm, to embrace Popery, turned Lutheran again, and at laſt Socinian. He was made principal of the Socinian college of Kiſſelin, in Luthuania (44). He underſtood Greek very well, and tranſlated Comenius's Janua Linguarum into that language.

[K] We have ſome other books written by him.] An oration de interioris hominis reformatione. Tetrateuchus ſive commentarius in IV Evangelia. Pentateuchus ſive Commentarius in V libro Moyſis. The anſwer of the Louvain divines, de vi obligandi conſcientias quam habent edicta regia ſuper re monetaria, and that of the divines and civilians, de juramento quod publica auctoritate Magiſtratui deſignato imponi ſolet, are Janſenius's works (45). Mr Leydecker (46) complains that in Moreri's dictionary, the harmony of the goſpels is aſcribed to our Janſenius, whereas it ought to be attributed to another Janſenius, biſhop of Ghent. I have not found this in Moreri. The error, wherewith Mr Arnauld (47) taxed George Hornius of believing that our Janſenius was biſhop of Ipres, and afterwards of Ghent, is corrected in Mr Leydecker's edition (48).

[L] The court of Rome proceeded againſt the epitaph of Janſenius.] The tenth of December, 1655. 'Francis de Robes (49), of the family of the counts of 'Annap, biſhop of Ipres, cauſed the tomb-ſtone of his 'predeceſſor Cornelius Janſenius to be taken away 'ſilently by night, on which were written the praiſes 'of his virtue and learning, and particularly of his book 'intituled Auguſtinus, importing that this moſt faithful 'interpreter of St Auguſtine's moſt ſecret thoughts, had 'employed upon that work a divine wit, an indefatigable labour, and all the time of his life; and that the 'church would receive the fruit of it upon earth, as he 'did the reward of it in heaven. Words that were 'injurious to the Bulls of Pope Urbin VIII, and Innocent X, who had condemned that book. The de'ſtruction of this grave-ſtone was made by an expreſs 'order of Pope Alexander VII, and with the conſent 'of the archduke Leopold, governor of the Low'Countries, notwithſtanding the reſiſtance of the chap'ter; which went ſo far that one of the principal 'canons

(34) Leydecker, de Vita Janſenii, pag. 57, & ſeq.

(35) Intituled Alexipharmacum, printed in the year 1630.

(36) Intituled, Philonius Romanus correctus.

(37) Intituled, Notarum ſpongia, printed in the 1631.

(38) Intituled, Cauſæ deſperatæ Giſb. Voëtii adverſus Spongiam, . . . Cornelii Jenſenii Criſis oſtenſa.

(39) De Vita Janſenii, pag. 64.

(40) Epiſtola Chriſtiani Philireni ad Janum Palæologum, pag. 5.

(41 He was a natvie of Holſtein.

(42) Printed at Leyden, in 1638.

(43) See the Hiſtory of all this at large in Mr Leydecker, pag. 68, & ſeq.

(44) See Mollerus, Iſagoge ad Hiſtoriam Cherſoneſi Cimbricæ, Part. III, pag. 108.

(45) Taken from Valerius Andreas, pag. 155.

(46) Pag. 2.

(47) Morale Pratique, Tom. III, pag. 130.

(48) In Notis ad Hiſt. Eccleſiaſt. Hornii, pag. 517.

(49) Mr Leydecker, pag. 133, call's him, Johannes Robleſius.

It is a very good book (g).

(g) It is intituled, De Hiſtoria Janſeniſmi Libri VI, quibus de Cornelii Janſenii Vita & Morte, nec non de ipſius & ſequacium Dogmatibus diſſeritur. At Utrecht, 1695, in 8vo.

‘ canons made bold to ſay, that it was not in the Pope's ‘ or the king's power to ſuppreſs this epitath : ſo much ‘ was Janſenius in the affection of that canon and his colleagues (50).’ See Mr Leydecker (51), who mentions this more at large I can ſcarce believe what he obſerves (52), that the Jeſuit La Chaiſe adviſed to break the ſtone on which Janſenius's epitaph was engraved ; but that the biſhop of Ipres was contented to throw it into a corner. I do not think that in the year 1655, Father la Chaiſe was in a condition to adviſe ſuch a thing. Let us add this curious particular : ‘ The laſt time the moſt Chriſtian King was at Ipres, ‘ an hoſpitaler nun who had aſſiſted him (53) in his laſt ‘ ſickneſs, and who ſpoke of him as of a ſaint, related ‘ with tears in her eyes to ſome lords of the court, ‘ that ſhe held him by the arm when he wrote his ‘ will, and ſhe intreated them at the ſame time to beg ‘ of the king that he would cauſe the injury to be ‘ repaired, which had been done to ſo holy a man in ‘ taking away his tomb-ſtone (54).’

JAPAN. This is a name of a great country ſituated eaſtward of China, and divided into ſeveral iſlands. There is ſo much ſaid of it in Moreri's Dictionary (a), that I have but few things to obſerve. Nor will I collect all that he has omitted ; but confine my ſelf to ſome points of the Theology of thoſe iſlanders. ‘ The monarchy of Japan ‘ is divided into two ſtates, the eccleſiaſtical and the ſecular. The firſt is compoſed of ‘ the Bonzes, and the ſecond of the nobility and commons : The name of Bonzes is ‘ common to all the miniſters devoted to the ſervice of the gods which the Japoneſe wor‘ſhip. They profeſs celibacy [A], and . . . have a Pontiff, whom they call Jaco or ‘ Xaco, who has authority over all the reſt, and judges of the affairs of religion, and ‘ determines what ought to be practiſed concerning the worſhip of the gods, and be‘lieved concerning the nature of them. He elects the Tundes, who diſpoſe of things ‘ leſs important, and repreſent in ſome manner our biſhops (b) . . . . The Japoneſe have ‘ two ſorts of gods. The firſt are the demons, whom they worſhip under ſeveral figures, ‘ not in hopes of receiving good from them, but for fear of being hurt by them. ‘ The ſecond ſort are the kings, the conquerors, and the learned, whom they have ‘ placed in the number of their gods. The chief are Amida and Xaca [B] . . . They ‘ reckon a dozen ſects, or a dozen religions in Japan ; and every perſon is at liberty to ‘ chuſe which he pleaſes : which occaſions no diviſions ; becauſe, ſay they, underſtand‘ings have no tye of relations or kindred like bodies. Amongſt theſe ſects there are ‘ three principal ones. The firſt hopes not for a life after this, and knows no other ſub‘ſtance, than what ſtrikes the ſenſes . . . . The ſecond, which believe the immortality of [A] The Bonzes profeſs celibacy.] But ‘ they do not ‘ always obſerve it very exactly. They abſtain from ‘ fleſh and fiſh, ſhave their beards and hair, and conceal ‘ their debaucheries under the appearance of an au‘ſtere life (1).’ Their greateſt profit ‘ is the burying ‘ of the dead. The people being perſuaded, that in ‘ the other life the ſouls of their relations may fall un‘der ſome neceſſity; ſpare nothing to procure them ‘ the comfort, which the Bonzes promiſe them by ‘ means of their great alms. They uſe another ar‘tifice to enrich themſelves, viz. to borrow money, ‘ which they promiſe the ſimple people to pay again in the ‘ other world with great intereſt ; and borrowing it ‘ in this manner, they ſay among themſelves, that the ‘ term is worth the money (2).’ they who would draw a parallel betwixt the eaſt and the weſt, would find it defective as to the article of theſe debts payable in the other world ; but then celibacy ill-obſerved, cheats hid under the appearances of a rigid morality, the profit of burials, and the aſſiſtances ſent to ſouls ſeparated from the body, would afford them a great many compariſons. I am perſuaded that many people in reading Mr Couſin's (3) extracts, could not chuſe but ſay inwardly to themſelves, thus it is with us. It would be very curious to ſee an account of the weſt written by a Japoneſe, or a Chineſe, who had lived many years in the great cities of Europe. They would pay us in our own coin. The miſſionaries, who go to the Indies, publiſh relations, in which they particularize the falſities and frauds they have obſerved in the worſhip of theſe idolatrous nations. But whilſt they ridicule them for it, may they not fear that it ſhould be replied to them, ‘ Quid rides ? mutato nomine de te fa‘bula narratur (4). —— Why doſt thou laugh, chang‘ing the name, the ſtory is told of thee,’ or that they ſhould be upbraided as they deſerve, who wink at their own faults, and diſcover with the utmoſt ſagacity the vices of others ?

Cùm tua pervideas oculis mala lippus inunctis,
Cur in amicorum vitiis tam cernis acutum,
Quàm aut aquila, aut ſerpens Epidaurius ? at tibi contrà
Evenit, inquirant vitia ut tua rursùs & illi (5).

When thou art blind and ſenſeleſs to thine own,
How doſt thou ſee thy friend's diſeaſe ſo ſoon :
That ſcarce a ſerpent can ſo quickly ſpy,
Nor any eagle hath ſo good an eye.
Well then, go on, purſue thy mean deſign,
As thou doſt find their faults, ſo they will thine.

CREECH.

[B] The chief are Amida and Xaca.] ‘ The firſt is ‘ repreſented under ſeveral monſtrous figures. In one ‘ of his temples which is at Iedo, he is carried on a ‘ horſe with ſeven heads. The fineſt of his temples ‘ is near Meaco, and is five hundred feet in length. ‘ There are in it a thouſand idols of maſſy gold. As ‘ for Saca, or Xaca, the Bonzes tell a thouſand imper‘tinent ſtories of him. They ſay that he was born ‘ eight hundred times in different ſpecies, before he ‘ was born of a woman, and that when he was born, ‘ he came out of his mother's ſides, eating his way with ‘ his teeth. The truth is, that Xaca was a ſophiſter, ‘ who perſuaded people every thing he had a mind to. His ‘ mother, when ſhe was big with child of him, dream‘ed, that a white elephant came out of her mouth : ‘ for which reaſon the elephants of that colour are had ‘ in veneration in the Indies, in China, and Ton‘quin, at Siam, and Pegu. They are ſerved in veſſels ‘ of gold, and the great lords go in crouds to viſit ‘ them, and pay them the ſame honours as they do to ‘ kings (6).’ One of the three principal ſects of the Japoneſe, is that of the worſhippers of Xaca. ‘ They ‘ live in common, riſe at midnight to ſing hymns, and ‘ meet every evening to hear the diſcourſe, which their ‘ ſuperior makes to them upon ſome ſubject of mora‘lity ; then he gives them ſome points to meditate up‘on. Sometimes he repreſents to them a dying man, ‘ and relates the reproaches, that the ſoul and body ‘ make to one another in this laſt moment. The me‘ditation laſts an hour. When it is over, every one ‘ gives the ſuperior an account of the thoughts which ‘ came into his mind, and of the reſolutions he has ‘ taken (7).

---

(50) St Romuald, Journal Chronologique & Hiſtorique, Tom. II, pag. 612.

(51) Ubi ſupra, pag. 132, & ſeq.

(52) Pag. 135.

(53) That is, Janſenius.

(54) Morale Pratique, Tom. VIII, pag. 462.

(a) Eſpecially in the edition of 1699.

(b) Journal des Sçavans, July 18, 1680, pag m. 492, in the Abſtract of the Hiſtory of the Church of Japan, by the abbot de T.

(1) Journal des Scavans, July 18, 1680, pag. 492. Dutch Edit.

(2) Ibid. pag. 493.

(3) Author of the Journal des Sçavans, quoted above and hereunder.

(4) Horat. Sat. I, lib. i, ver. 69, 70.

(5) Idem, Sat. III, lib. i, ver. 25.

(6) Journal des Sçavans, ubi ſupra, pag 495.

(7) Ibid pag. 496.

‘ of the ſoul, and another life, is followed by the beſt ſort of people, and is called the ‘ ſect of the men of the moſt high God. The third is that of the worſhippers of Xa‘ ca (c).’ The Bonzes may be compared to our Monks (d). Some authors ſay (e), that the moſt general diviſion, that can be made of the ſects of the Japoneſe, is to divide them into ſuch as make profeſſion of adhering to appearance, and ſuch as ſeek reality which does not ſtrike the ſenſes, and which they call truth. They who adhere to appearance believe another life after this [C], for the eternal recompence of good men, and the eternal puniſhment of the wicked; but thoſe who ſeek the internal and inſenſible reality, reject heaven and hell, and teach things that have a great affinity with Spinoza's opinion [D]. They ſymbolize with the Epicureans, in taking from God the government of the world as a thing contrary to the ſupreme tranquillity, which, according to them, is his whole felicity. Nay, they go farther than Epicurus; for they deprive God of underſtanding and reaſon. They fear doubtleſs that theſe qualities would diſturb his repoſe, as they experience, that reaſoning is attended with ſome fatigue (f). The chriſtian religion which Francis Xavier, and afterwards ſeveral other miſſionaries, preached to the Japoneſe, found no greater obſtacles than what the Bonzes raiſed againſt him; not ſo much by their diſputes and arguments, as by a method uſual with eccleſiaſtics; I mean, by having recourſe to the ſecular power, and by their care of exciting the kings and the people to the maintenance of the old religion, and the perſecuting the followers of the new (g). It muſt however be confeſſed, that the Japoneſe prieſts entered into a conference with the

Chriſtian

(c) Ibid. pag. 494.

(d) See the remark [B].

(e) See Poſſevin. Biblioth. Select. lib x, cap ii, pag. m. 410, Tom. I.

(f) See Poſſevin. ibid. cap. iii, pag. 415.

(g) See the Journal des Sçavans, ubi ſupra, pag. 499.

[C] Thoſe that adhere to appearance, believe another life after this.] It appears that their opinion is that of Amida, Xaca, and Fotoque. They ſay that in the four cardinal points of the world, there are certain countries, where the inhabitants are in a plenary ſatisfaction, which makes them enjoy a ſupreme felicity; that Fotoque made all the laws of Japan, and that they who obſerve them, ſhall no ſooner leave this life, but they ſhall go into thoſe places, where they ſhall be born again, and Fotoque ſhall transform them, and give them 32 figures, and 80 qualities, with which they ſhall live eternally in a perfect beatitude, well ſatisfied with their condition, and very joyful (8). The women ſhall not be admitted into thoſe countries; but thoſe who ſhall be ſaved for having obſerved the laws of Fotoque, ſhall be transformed into men: for without that, they could not receive the reward of their good life, they being of their own nature, ſay they, unclean and execrable (9). As for the tranſgreſſors of Fotoque's laws, they ſhall go from this life into certain infernal places, and they ſhall ſuffer ſix ſorts of puniſhments, which ſhall never have an end. This is the general doctrine of the followers of appearance. The other ſect ſay thereupon what they think fit, but theſe agree in this center of unity, and their opinion is that of the ignorant and the vulgar. Et quamvis de hiſce rebus una quæque Japoniorum ſecta loquatur, ut vult, communi tamen conſenſu quicunque extrinſecam rerum faciem ſectantur, in hoc, quod diximus, conveniunt, & hanc opinionem rudes & vulgares homines amplectuntur (10). I borrow all this from the Jeſuit Poſſevin (11), who did not think himſelf obliged to refute the doctrines of this ſect; for ſince they profeſs, ſays he, to ſtick only to appearances, what they ſay has no reality nor truth, it is at beſt but a phantom, or the ſurface of truth. The Bonzes themſelves manifeſtly confeſs, that the whole ſyſtem of Camus and Fotoque was built, or rather forged, in favour of the ignorant, and of weak minds: Nam (ut ipſimet Bonzii, qui ſuæ ſententiæ Magiſtri & Doctores ſunt, apertè fatentur) totam de CAMI & FOTOQUE diſciplinam propter rudes & inſcios rerum homines, captu, & ingenio imbecillos eſſe compoſitam, vel potius confictam, non quod aliquid eorum, quæ in ipſa docentur verum ſit (12). Poſſevin however confutes the doctrines of this ſect in his fifth chapter (13).

[D] Thoſe who ſeek . . . reality, reject heaven and hell, and teach things that have a great affinity with Spinoza's opinion.] They neglect externals and apply themſelves only to meditations; they caſt off all diſcipline that conſiſts in words, adhering only to the exerciſe, which they call SOQUXIN SOQUBUT, that is, the heart. They maintain that there is but one principle of all things, and that this principle is found every where, and that the heart of man, and the internals of other beings, do not differ from this common principle, and return to it, when they are diſſolved. It exiſts, ſay they, from all eternity, being one only principle, clear and luminous, and uncapable of increaſe or diminution: it has no figure, and does not reaſon, it lives in idleneſs and a perfect repoſe (14). They teach, that they, who in this life have very well known this principle, ſhall obtain the perfect glory of Fotoque and of his ſucceſſors; and that they who arrive not to this high degree of knowledge, muſt be born again ſeveral times, and go from place to place, but in the other world they ſhall be all abſorbed in this common principle of all things. They ſay alſo, that knowledge does not differ from ignorance, that good and evil are not two beings, and that the one is not ſeparated from the other (15). Poſſevin reduces this ſyſtem to theſe four points. I. That there is but one principle of all things, that this principle is moſt perfect, that it is wiſe but underſtands nothing, and takes no notice of the affairs of this world, ſince it lives in perfect repoſe, and like a man that is very attentive to one thing, and neglects all others. II. That this principle is in all particular beings, and communicates it's eſſence to them, ſo that they are the ſame thing with it, and return to it when they have an end. III. That the heart of man does not differ from this common principle of all beings, and that when men die, their hearts periſh, and are conſumed; but that the firſt principle, which gave them their life, ſubſiſts ſtill in them: from whence it follows, that there is neither heaven nor hell, rewards nor puniſhments after this life. IV. That man may in this world raiſe himſelf to the condition and ſupreme majeſty of the firſt principle, for as much as by the force of meditation he may perfectly know it, and ſo arrive to the ſupreme tranquillity which that principle enjoys in itſelf; that this is all the good that man can acquire, and that till he has obtained it by meditation, and a perfect knowledge, he is tormented with perpetual diſquiet? he often paſſes from one hell to another, and finds reſt no where. It is very certain, that in this are ſeveral things, which Spinoza has not taught: but otherwiſe it is manifeſt, that he has taught as well as theſe Japoneſe prieſts, that the firſt principle of all things, and of all beings, which compoſe the univerſe, are but one and the ſame ſubſtance; that all things are God, and that God is all things in ſuch a manner, that God and all things that exiſt, make but one and the ſame being. One cannot ſufficiently admire that ſo extravagant a notion, and ſo full of abſurd contradictions, ſhould inſinuate itſelf into the mind of ſo many people ſo remote from one another, and ſo different in their humours, education, cuſtoms, and genius. Poſſevin (16) brings many arguments againſt the hypotheſis of theſe Bonzes, and confutes it principally by the contradictions it contains; and firſt he obſerves, that they have but very few doctrines about the nature of the firſt principle; that they ſay nothing upon it with any perſpicuity, that they cannot reſolve queſtions, and anſwer the objections propoſed to them, nor confirm their opinions, and that their only ſhift is to ſay, that it does not concern men to enquire into the nature and power of the firſt principle (17). Omnia unico verbo putant ſe diſſolvere, dicentes hominum non intereſſe hujus principii vim, & naturam perſcrutari inquirendo aut diſputando: quod totum manifeſte conſtat ex ignoratione profectum & natum (18). Note, that part, of his objections (19) oppugn alſo the ſyſtem of Spinoza.

[E] The

(8) In omnem æternitatem vivent læti admodum felices & ſua ſorte contenti. Poſſevin. ubi infra.

(9) Eo quod fœminæ ſint natura deteſtabiles, execrandæ & immundæ. Id. ibid.

(10) Id. ibid.

(11) Taken from Poſſevin. Bibl. Select. Tom I, lib. x, cap. ii, pag. m. 410, 411.

(12) Id. ibid. pag. 411.

(13) Ibid. pag. 429, & ſeq.

(14) Figura carens, ratiocinationis expers, vitam agens otii, quietis & tranquillitatis pleniſſimam. Poſſev. ibid pag. 411.

(15) Taken from Poſſevin, ibid.

(16) Poſſevin. ubi ſupra, Tom. I, pag. 412, 413.

(17) This is a groſs contradiction, which Poſſevin ſhould have charged them with; for ſince they ſay that the greateſt happineſs of men proceeds from the perfect knowledge they may have of the firſt principle, it concerns them to inquire into the nature of that firſt principle.

(18) Poſſev. ubi ſupra, pag. 412.

(19) Ibid pag. 419, 420.

Chriſtian prieſts, and made ſome objections againſt them, which ſhew they wanted no wit (b). They could not hinder the Chriſtian religion from making great progreſs in a little time; but at laſt they drove the emperor to ſuch violences as wholly extirpated it in Japan, and very much enlarged the Martyrology [E]. Father Poſſevin has very ſharply cenſured the laws of the Japaneſe legiſlator [F].

[E] The violences of the Japaneſe very much enlarged the Martyrology.] Read the Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory of Japan, written by the Jeſuit Francis Solier, and the hiſtory of the church of Japan, by the abbot of T (20). ‘ This abbot admires the depth of the judgments of God, and wonders that he has permitted the blood of ſo many martyrs to be ſhed, without making uſe of it, as in the firſt ages of the church, as of a fruitful ſeed for the production of new Chriſtians (21).’ Without taking the liberty of enquiring into the reaſons the divine wiſdom may have for permitting at one time, what it does not at another, it may be ſaid that the Chriſtianity of the XVIth century had no right to hope for the ſame favour and protection of God, as the Chriſtianity of the three firſt centuries. The latter was a gentle, meak, and patient religion, that recommended to ſubjects ſubmiſſion to their ſovereigns, and never aſpired to raiſe itſelf to the thrones by the way of rebellion; but the Chriſtianity which was preached to the infidels in the XVIth century was no ſuch thing: it was a murthering and ſanguinary religion, uſed to ſlaughter for five or ſix hundred years. The Chriſtians had contracted a very long habit of maintaining and aggrandizing themſelves, by putting to the ſword all thoſe that reſiſted them. Fire, and hanging, the dreadful tribunal of the Inquiſition, cruſades, and bulls exciting ſubjects to rebel, ſeditious preachers, conſpiracies, and aſſaſſinations of princes, were the ordinary means they made uſe of againſt thoſe that ſubmitted not to their orders. Could they promiſe to themſelves the benediction that heaven granted to the primitive church, to the goſpel of peace, patience and gentleneſs? The beſt choice the Japaneſe could have made was to be converted to the true God; but having not a ſufficient knowledge to renounce their falſe religion, there remained nothing to chuſe but an active, or a paſſive perſecution. They could not preſerve their antient government, nor their antient worſhip, but by ridding themſelves of the Chriſtians, who ſooner or later would have ruined both, and as ſoon as they had been capable of making war, would have armed all their proſelytes, would have introduced into the country, the ſoldiers, and the cruel maxims of the Spaniards, and by killing and hanging, as in America, would have brought all Japan under their yoke. Thus conſidering things only by political views, we ſhall be obliged to own, that the perſecutions the Chriſtians ſuffered in that country were a prudential means to prevent the overthrow of the monarchy, and plundering of the ſtate. The ingenuous confeſſion of a Spaniard juſtifies the precaution of thoſe infidels. ‘ It gave a ſpecious pretence to the Bonzes to exerciſe their hatred, and to ſollicit the extirpation of the Chriſtians. Being aſked by the king of Toſſa, how the king of Spain became maſter of ſo great tracts of land in both the hemiſpheres, he too honeſtly anſwered, that he ſent Monks to preach the goſpel in foreign nations, and that after they had converted a good number of Pagans, he ſent his troops, which joining with the new Chriſtians, ſubdued the country. This indiſcretion coſt the Chriſtians dear (22).’

[F] Father Poſſevin has ſharply cenſured the laws of the Japaneſe legiſlator.] The firſt fault he finds with them is, that they command idolatry, and particularly the worſhip and adoration of Camus and Fotoque. He very well repreſents the enormity of idolatry, and ſets it in the higheſt degree of injury done to God. He proves this by the example of rebellions; for he ſays, the greateſt crime that can be committed againſt a prince, is to take away his power, and to confer it on another. ‘ Sicut nullum crimen in Regem ac Principem poteſt gravius admitti, quam eum è ſuo regno pellere, è regiæ dignitatis gradu dejicere, & alium in ſummum regiæ amplitudinis faſtigium evehere; ita ſumma eſt in Deum injuria, ſummum in eum ſcelus admittitur, cùm divinus honor, & cultus qui ipſi ſoli debetur, in alium transfertur, ipſi detrahitur, alii tribuitur (23). As no greater crime can be committed againſt a king or prince than to expel him his own kingdom, to degrade him from his royal dignity, and to raiſe another to his throne, ſo it is the higheſt injury againſt GOD; and the greateſt wickedneſs is acted againſt him when divine honour and worſhip which are due to him alone, are taken from him and given to another.’ The ſecond defect of thoſe laws is, that whilſt they ſeverely forbid the Bonzes the uſe of women, they allow pederaſty; they forbid them the former as a filthy and abominable thing, and approve the other practice as honeſt and holy. In Bonziis omnem cum fœminis concubitum, ut rem fœdam, turpem, & deteſtabilem damnant: at uſum puerorum permittunt, imo in eiſdem Bonziis coitum cum pueris approbant, ut rem honeſtam & ſanctam (24). Poſſevin ſhews by many reaſons that pederaſty is a moſt horrid crime. The third fault is, that forbidding to kill certain beaſts conſecrated to Camus and Fotoque, they permit men to kill one another, and even to be their own murderers. They not only ſuppoſe it to be an action acceptable to thoſe deities, but alſo the true way to deification; hence it is that great numbers of the Japaneſe kill themſelves either precipitating themſelves into the water, or burning, or burying themſelves alive, or throwing themſelves headlong from the top of a rock. Many alſo rip open their bellies upon ſlight occaſions; and many mothers kill their own children. Poſſevin ſhews the ſinfulneſs of ſuch conduct (25). The laſt fault he cenſures is, that the laws of Japan declare, that by the meer invocation of NAMUAMIDABUT, or by crying FORENGUELIO, men expiate all ſorts of ſins without any need of repentance. The Japaneſe, continues he, make no mention of ſatisfactory pains, or good works; they pretend that theſe things are injurious to the merit of XACA and AMIDA, who have been ſufficiently afflicted for the crimes of men, and have fully expiated them by their ſufferings. This doctrine opens the way to ſin; for there being nothing eaſier than to make an invocation, or a cry, men are ſure of eaſily avoiding all the puniſhments they have reaſon to fear, after they have given up themſelves to the greateſt crimes. Poſſevin (26) does plainly ſhew the enormity of that doctrine, and the pernicious effects that reſult from it.

There is no reader that can be afraid of being miſtaken in condemning ſuch a doctrine; but if he ventures to affirm, that the doctrine of the Bonzes is exactly ſuch as Poſſevin repreſents it, he may juſtly be afraid of making a raſh judgment: for after all, we ought never to condemn others upon the teſtimony of their enemies; it is fit to be informed, whether they own that their doctrine has been faithfully repreſented. It would not be a faithful repreſentation of it, if one ſhould inſiſt upon the literal ſenſe of ſome laws, without any regard to the interpretations of the doctors: for at this rate, the moſt reaſonable religions might be charged with abundance of abſurdities. There are ſome harſh things in the Scripture, which it would be wrong to conſider as the laws of the Chriſtians; for they take them not in the literal ſenſe, they explain, and ſoften them by other paſſages, and according to the analogy of faith. We ſhould know whether the Bonzes do not the ſame thing with reſpect to ſome laws of their legiſlators. I make no difficulty to believe what is ſaid of the tricks and hypocriſy of thoſe idolatrous prieſts; but I think it probable, that they cover their doctrines as well as their conduct with an outward ſeverity; and perhaps we ought to impute but to ſome of them, what Poſſevin charges upon the whole body of their ſects. Some Monks have taught, that the moſt wicked wretches have been ſaved by the bare invocation of the Holy Virgin. The extravagance of thoſe, who talk of the treaſure of indulgences, and who ſay that the merits of the ſaints, and their works of ſupererogation, ſupply the want of repentance in many men, would afford good chapters for a relation that a Japaneſe traveller ſhould publiſh. Were it not an unjuſt thing, ſhould he relate all this as ſo many articles of the Chriſtian faith? Once more, I would know what the Bonzes would anſwer to this queſtion; do you teach what Poſſevin imputes to you? I ſhould be glad alſo to ſee a hiſtory written by them of

(b) See the Hiſtoire des Ouvrages des Sçavans, September 1691, pag. 8, & ſeq in the Extract of the Hiſtory of the Church of Japan.

(20) It was printed at Paris, in two volumes, in 4to, in the year 1689.

(21) Journ. des Sçavans, July 25, 1689, pag. m. 507.

(22) Hiſt. des Ouvrages des Sçavans, Sept. 1691, pag. 13, & 14.

(23) Poſſev. Bibl. Select. Tom. I, libr. x, cap. vi, pag. 435. See thereupon, Penſées diverſes ſur les Cometes, pag. 349, 390.

(24) Poſſev. ibid.

(25) Poſſev ubi ſupra, pag. 436.

(26) Id. ibid. pag. 437.

of the eſtabliſhment of Chriſtianity in their iſlands, and of it's extirpation. And if they ſhould write it, after having read thoſe of Francis Solier and the abbot de T. it would ſtill be very proper to compare them together.

JARCHI, or JARHI (Solomon) a famous Rabbi, who lived in the XIIth century [A], His true name is Iſaaki (a). ‘ Nevertheleſs, becauſe of that pretended name Jarhi, ſome believe that he was of Lunel in Languedoc ; but he was of Troyes in Champagne, as R. Ghedalia, and the greateſt part of the Jewiſh Chronologers affirm . . . . . His books are much eſteemed by the Jews [B], and he may be ſaid to be their great author.’ They ſometimes join to the Books, which they call the five volumes, the Commentaries of Raſci, who is their great author upon the Bible, becauſe he is very much skilled in their divinity and traditions (b). Mr Simon, who ſays all this, had done well to obſerve, that Rabbi Raſci is the ſame with Rabbi Jarchi or Iſaaki. He is alſo called Iſaacites. See the margin (c).

(a) Simon. Hiſt. Critique du Vieux Teſtam. pag. m. 545.

(b) Id. ibid. pag. 514, col. 2.

(c) I give the article of this Rabbi at the word ISAACITES.

[A] He lived in the XIIth century.] Mr Simon places him in that century (1). Some ſay he died in the year 1105 (2). Others ſay he lived in the XIIIth century, and make him cotemporary with Maimonides (3). Others ſuppoſe he lived in the XIVth century (4) ; for they ſay he was expelled from France with the other Jews, by king Philip the fair. Now the edict of that king againſt the Jews is of the twenty ſecond of July 1307 (5). Mr Hoornbeek ſuppoſes that this Rabbi was baniſhed from France at that time. He makes him to be a native of Lunel in Languedoc, and obſerves, that it is a town in which there have been always many Jews. See how he proves it : ‘ Unde in epiſtolis Gregorii, libr. 3. epiſtol. 21. Venantio Epiſcopo Lunenſi inſcripta ita incipit: multorum ad nos relatione pervenit, à Judæis in Lunenſi civitate de gentibus ad ſervitium Chriſtiana detineri mancipia (6). —— In the letters of Pope Gregory III, book 3. epiſt. 21. addreſſed to Venantius biſhop of Lunel, we find the beginning runsthus : We have it from many hands, that the Jews in the city of Lunel, detain for their ſervice certain Chriſtian ſlaves ranſomed out of captivity under the infidels.’ It is a groſs fault ; for Lunel in Languedoc was never an epiſcopal ſee. Pope Gregory in that place, means Luna a city of Italy in Tuſcany. The ruins of it are to be ſeen at the mouth of the Magra. It's epiſcopal ſee was transferred to Sarzana by Pope Nicolas V (7).

[B] His books are much eſteemed by the Jews.] ‘ We have his commentaries upon the Scripture, in the Bibles of Venice and Baſil. They have alſo printed with the body of the Talmud his gloſſes or commentaries upon this great book (8).’ Mr Brun (9) ſays, that he ſaw ſome Jews at Bourdeaux, who were ſtill ſo fond of the memory of Solomon Jarchi, the moſt famous of all their Rabbies, for the learned commentaries he made, both on the holy Scripture and the Talmud, that they told me, ſays he, that they reſolved to make ſhortly a journey to Lunelle (10) near Niſmes, to ſee the place where that great man was born, and from which he had his name *, and that they would endeavour to live there, which they believed would eaſily be granted them.

(1) Simon, Hiſt. Crit. du Vieux Teſtament, pag. 545.

(2) See Konig. Bibl. pag 423.

(3) Idem, but note that Konig, ibid. pag. 496, who after Hottinger places Maimonides in the XIIIth century, differs from moſt authors, who place him in the XIIth.

(4) Hoornbeek, contra Judæos, pag. 7.

(5) Mezer. Abr. Chronol Tom. II, pag. m 799.

(6) Hoornbeek, ubi ſupra.

(7) See Miræus, Geogr. Eccleſ. pag. 236.

(8) Simon, ubi ſupra.

(9) Brun, Veritable Religion des Hollandois, pag 224.

(10) It ſhould be Lunel.

* Jarcha ſignifies the Moon in Hebrew ; ſo that they call him Jarchi for de Lunelle.

JARDINS (Mary Catherine des) famous for her romances [A], flouriſhed in the XVIIth century. ‘ She was born at Alençon a little Town, whereof her father was provoſt. When ſhe came to be about nineteen or twenty years old, ſhe began to conſider her ſmall eſtate ; and being poor, and having as much wit as ambition, ſhe came to Paris with a deſign to make her ſelf known, and to change her fortune. She was not altogether miſtaken in this : Having a great genius, ſhe was quickly talked of, and people were ambitious to be acquainted with her. Mr de Ville-Dieu, a gentleman well made, and in pretty good circumſtances, was one of the firſt that knew Mrs des Jardins : he eſteemed and loved her, and tho' ſhe was not handſome, he married her. But by ill fortune he died ſome time after. The poor woman retired for grief into a nunnery ; but when ſhe had a little recovered from her affliction, ſhe left it, and married Mr de la Châte for her ſecond husband, whom ſhe buried alſo. Being ſenſibly touched with this new misfortune, ſhe utterly renounced marriage, and reſolved to ſpend the reſt of her days in gallantry. She began to hearken to the love-diſcourſes of the ſparks, and anſwered them in verſes and letters, which have a fine and delicate turn (a).’ The author who furniſhes me with this narrative has omitted ſeveral things [B], and has not

(a) Richelet, Vie des Auteurs François, pag. lviii. Hague Edit. 1699.

[A] She is famous for her romances.] The firſt, or one of the firſt which ſhe made (1), was to contain ſeveral volumes in 8vo, according to the cuſtom of that time. But ſhe did not carry it on ſo far as ſhe deſigned ; and I have heard the reaſon of it was, becauſe it was known, that ſhe intended to repreſent under fictitious names, and with ſome diſguiſes, the adventures of a great lady, who had under-matched herſelf. She was threatened with the reſentment of thoſe concerned, if ſhe carried on the intrigue to the end of the romance ; whereupon ſhe went no farther. But ſhe did not bury her talent ; on the contrary, having found out a new way of writing romances, ſhe publiſhed a great many with very good ſucceſs. She brought into faſhion thoſe little gallant novels, which quickly ſhew the good or ill ſucceſs of a ſoft paſſion, and ſhe put out of requeſt thoſe tedious and vaſt relations of heroical, warlike, and amorous adventures, which had brought ſo much profit to the Printers of Caſſandra, Cleopatra, Cyrus, Clelia, &c. The new taſte ſhe created does ſtill prevail ; and tho' that ſort of books quickly loſe the grace of novelty, yet the firſt romances, that ſhe compoſed upon this new model, are ſtill read with pleaſure ; as her Journal amoureux, her Annales Galantes, her Galanteries Grenadines, and many others. She publiſhed in 1672 Les Exilez de la Cour d'Auguſte ; a romance which an illuſtrious lady (2) thought very pretty. That which is intituled Les Deſordres de l'Amour (3), and another intituled Portrait des Foibleſſes humaines (4), are not inferior to the former. It is an unhappy thing that Mrs des Jardins ſhould have opened a way to a liberty, that is daily more and more abuſed ; which is, to father one's inventions and love-intrigues upon the greateſt men of the later ages (5), and to mix them with matters of fact, that have ſome foundation in hiſtory. This mixture of truth and fiction is ſpread in abundance of new books ; it ſpoils the taſte of young people, and makes one unwilling to believe what is really credible. See the remark [C] of the article NIDHARD.

[B] Mr Richelet . . . . has omitted ſeveral things.] Since I obſerve this, it would be proper for me to ſupply thoſe things ; but I am not in a fit place to conſult thoſe who could inform me, and ſo I cannot repair the fault, of which I give notice to my reader. I may be excuſed : but Richelet cannot ſo well come off ; for as he lived in Paris, and led no ſedentary life, it was an eaſy thing for him to inform himſelf of the time that Mrs des Jardins left the country, and ſettled in the capital city of the kingdom. He might as eaſily have learned what acquaintances ſhe firſt contracted, what patrons ſhe got, at what time, and with what book

(1) I think it was intituled Alcidiane, or Alcidamie. I do not remember it well.

(2) Madam de Sevigni. See the Letters of the count de Buſſy-Rabutin. Part. III, Letter cc, pag m 362.

(3) See the Nouvelles de la Rep. des Lettres, Sept. 1686, in the catalogue of the new books, n. 1.

(4) See the ſame Nouvelles, Novemb 1685, art. i, and the Journal des Sçavans, Novemb. 19, 1685, pag. m. 494.

(5) See the Nouvelles de la Rep. des Lettres, Oct. 1684, in the Catal. n. 8.

not been exact in the circumſtances of time; for he will have it that ſhe did not begin to lend an ear to love-diſcourſes, till after the death of her two huſbands: But I am aſſured from many hands, that this date is very ill placed, and that this woman's gallantry was infinitely leſs than ever at the time he ſpeaks of. There was in the Spaniſh Netherlands one Mrs DES JARDINS, cotemporary with this, whoſe name and picture have for ſome years together been placed in the front of the Almanack. She that makes the ſubject of this article, died in the year 1683 (b).

(b) See the Mercure Galant for November, 1683, pag. 267.

book ſhe firſt came out; what was the date of her firſt marriage and firſt widowhood, of her ſecond marriage, and of the death of her ſecond huſband; the chronological ſeries of her romances; the time of her death, and many things of this nature, of which he has not ſaid a word; and yet you ſee at the top of the pages, The lives of the French authors. Can a title be more ſhamefully abuſed? Can we call that a narrative, in which ſo many eſſential things are wanting? You will tell me doubtleſs, that many readers will not be angry at thoſe omiſſions; but this does not juſtify the writer. They would not have been diſpleaſed to find in his book the things that he has forgotten. Abundance of other readers would have been very glad to have ſeen them. He has not then taken the beſt method; for it is much better to do what pleaſes many people and diſpleaſes no body, than to do what diſpleaſes ſome, and does not diſpleaſe others.

JARRIGE (PETER), a native of Tulle in Limouſin, one of the moſt famous preachers among the Jeſuits, but otherways a very ill man [A], did ſo reſent the not obtaining in his order the imployments he thought he deſerved, that he reſolved to turn Proteſtant. He communicated his deſign to a miniſter (a), who contrived expedients for his retiring into Holland (b), and he made his abjuration in the conſiſtory of the church of Rochelle on Chriſtmas-day 1647. Being arrived at Leyden, he preached before a numerous congregation, concerning the motives of his converſion; and afterwards endeavoured to make people believe that he was no longer a Papiſt. The States granted him a penſion (c). But ‘ the Jeſuits made informations againſt him with the utmoſt fury, and ‘ uſed all poſſible means to defame him. They got him condemned by the judge of Ro‘ chelle to be hanged, and afterwards burnt .... But all theſe proceedings ſerved only ‘ to make public the vexation this loſs gave them, and to furniſh Jarrige, who was violent ‘ and vindicative, with a pretence to revenge himſelf upon them. He did it by a book ‘ intituled Les Jeſuites mis ſur l' Echafaud, (The Jeſuits brought upon the Scaffold) in which ‘ he treated them in ſo bloody a manner, that their ſociety never had ſuch a mortifica‘ tion (d).’ He publiſhed alſo a particular anſwer to Peter Beauſés, who had ſlandered him in a heinous manner (e). One would have thought, that he and the Jeſuits, whom he had ſo ſtrangely defamed, could never be reconciled; and yet the Jeſuit Ponthelier (f), who was then at the Hague in the retinue of an embaſſador, did not deſpair of bringing him back; and he managed him in ſuch a manner, that he brought him to a reſolution of returning to the church of Rome. The thing was executed in 1650. Jarrige left Leyden, and went to the Jeſuits of Antwerp, and immediately publiſhed his recantation [B]; but it

(a) To Mr Vincent, miniſter of Rochelle.

(b) Hiſtoire de l'Edit. de Nantes, Tom. III, pag. 93.

(c) Jarrige, Retractation, pag. 101.

(d) Hiſt. de l'Edit. des Nant. ubi ſupra.

(e) In a book intituled, Les Impietez & Sacrileges de Pierre Jarrige. Retract. de Jarrige, pag. 70.

(f) See the remark [C].

[A] He was a very ill man.] This is indiſputable from what he confeſſes himſelf in his Retractation. So that I need not uſe the argument which a very worthy man enforced one day in the preſence of ſeveral Proteſtants. He ſaid, that a man of letters, as Jarrige was, and perpetually taken up with preaching, could not have remembred at Leyden all the little adventures he diſplayed in his Jeſuites mis ſur l'Echafaud, and in his anſwer to James Beauſés, unleſs he had writ them down, as he heard of them, with the names and ſirnames of the perſons, and with all the little circumſtances of time and place. Now this was a ſign of a corrupt mind, and the character of an ill man; for he would never have been at the pains of keeping ſuch a regiſter, if he had not deſigned to lay up arms for the time to come, in caſe he ſhould break with the Jeſuits. He was thinking of revenge, and of the means of making himſelf dreaded, even before he knew whether he ſhould ever have occaſion for them. There are ſome men who keep even the leaſt notes of their friends, and eſpecially take care of ſuch notes which they might take advantage of in caſe of a rupture. They conſider the inconſtancy of our paſſions, and they love, as if one day they were to hate (1), and take their meaſures accordingly. It is certain, that thoſe who keep with that view the letters of their friends, their moſt free converſations, and ſtricteſt confidences, are diſhoneſt men. The perſon I ſpeak of, uſed this compariſon againſt Peter Jarrige's diary. I will not vouch for this thought; I relate it only as a meer matter of fact, every one may judge of it as he pleaſes. I have no occaſion for it to comment upon my text, as will appear from the following remarks.

A REFLEXION on the conduct of thoſe, who keep all the notes and letters of their friends.

(1) Ita amicum habeas, poſſe ut fieri inimicum putes. Publius Syrus, apud Macrob. Saturn. lib. ii, cap. vii.

[B] He immediately publiſhed his recantation.] He confeſſed (2) ‘ that a virulent paſſion of rage had made ‘ him leave the Jeſuits, and that there was nothing ‘ (3) in the curſed and ſcandalous ſermon he preached at ‘ Leyden, but what was truly ſpeaking a blaſphemy, ‘ ſo much the more puniſhable in the judgment of ‘ GOD, becauſe his conſcience gave the lye to his ‘ words.’ He accuſed himſelf (4) ‘ of having cloathed ‘ his firſt and impudent lye with circumſtances no leſs ‘ falſe than criminal, namely, that GOD had for ſix‘ teen years before put into his heart the firſt foun‘ dations of the work he had begun ſome months be‘ fore in his own country, and which he ſo happily ‘ and ſatisfactorily accompliſhed in Holland.’ He confeſſed (5) ‘ that by a further malice, he had defam‘ ed many innocent perſons, to revenge himſelf of ‘ two men whom he thought culpable; that upon ‘ the reading of the ſentence by which he was con‘ demned to die (6) for a religion, which he deteſt‘ ed in his heart..... Rage deprived him of his ‘ judgment, and that not knowing what he did, he ‘ had done like thoſe mad dogs, who bite their ma‘ ſters without knowing them. Being therefore de‘ ſtitute of reaſon, ſays he (7), and ſeized with a ſpi‘ rit of vengeance, I wrote a virulent book againſt ‘ the province of Guienne, from whence I came ‘ ....I uſed all manner of artifices to beſpatter ‘ their reputation. Rhetoric is like proſpective glaſſes, ‘ which make little things appear great, and repreſent a ‘ frog as big as an ox. It was ſufficient for me to have ‘ ſome ſlight foundation to build a great crime upon; ‘ I did not care to ſpeak truth, provided I had ſome ‘ judicious ſubterfuge to cover my lyes with. I in‘ duſtriouſly laboured upon a little matter, and by the ‘ circumſtances I added, I made a great elephant ‘ of a little fly. Thoſe who know the little acci‘ dents, and of ſmall conſequence, that happened in ‘ that holy province, ſee better than others, that the ‘ deſire of revenge ſupplied me with a great deal of ‘ art to magnify little things, and with too much in‘ vention to make them probable. The reverend Fa‘ ther Ponthelier warmly, but modeſtly, reproached ‘ me with it, when I was in the moſt violent heat ‘ of my anger, and received no other anſwer from me

(2) Pag. 8.

(3) Pag. 11.

(4) Pag. 22.

(5) Pag. 69.

(6) The provincial of the Jeſuits obtained a ſentence in the Preſidial of Rochelle, whereby Jarrige was condemned to be hanged, and then burnt. He carried me, ſays Jarrige, pag. 72 of his Recantation, to the gallows, and from the gallows to a wood pile; he cauſed the ſentence of the Preſidial to be printed, and the cauſes of my puniſhment to be explained; he ſent the ſentence into all the provinces, and what was done againſt my effigies, had been done againſt my body, had not God protected me in a country, where I was only to ſin againſt him

(7) Pag. 73.

it is not known what became of him afterwards. Many people believe that the Jesuits impriſoned him for life [C]. This might be ; but other reaſons may be given why ſuch a man ſhould be ſeen no more [D]. I am perſuaded, that the hiſtorian quoted by me, will

'but this, that ſince Father Rouſſeau and Father Beaufais had uſed a thouſand tricks and inventions to get me condemned to the flames, it was very reaſonable, that I ſhould find inventions to revenge my ſelf, and that I ſhould build upon a little foundation heinous accuſations, as they had built theirs upon appearances. I added, that they had not only written as I did, but that they had actually hanged and burnt me in effigy . . . . Like a revengeful man, I took the wrong way to exerciſe my reſentment . . . . . If I met with any ſlight occaſion to gloſs upon, I failed not to make my conjectures paſs for proofs ; and if it happened that any were ſuſpected, right or wrong, either at home or abroad, I took thoſe ſuſpicions for truths, and endeavoured to make worthy men paſs for great villains, who, upon a ſerious inquiry, would be found guilty of meer indiſcretion or at moſt of an inconſiderable fault. Any one that ſhall ſeriouſly and impartially examine my diſcourſe, will find, that I made ſpecious and artful preludes to make my forgeries go down the better. I have ſaid too much to be believed, and the Heretics themſelves, though for the time to come they will lay great ſtreſs upon my defamations, diſapproved them in the ſynod of Middleburg : and a man muſt needs be as much incenſed as I was, when I wrote that book, to give credit to my contumelies. Certainly, if any thing did happen, thoſe that were guilty were diſmiſſed from the ſociety, which having the qualities of the great ocean, cannot keep dead carcaſſes in it's boſom. My accuſations are therefore unjuſt, having charged an illuſtrious order with the faults of thoſe they have expelled as unworthy to live amongſt the ſaints, and to entertain the thoughts of the devil amongſt angels. My fury prompted me to diſcover the evil, and to ſay nothing of the remedies applied to it. I have indeed ſaid in ſome places, what ſome had done : but I did not add that they were immediately, and without any delay, expelled as peſtiferous men. I made a ſatire to revenge my ſelf, and not a panegyric to praiſe them. Thoſe who know the Jeſuits, will no doubt believe, that the crimes of Regicide, Infanticide, Sodomy, and ſuch other abominable tranſgreſſions, are meer forgeries . . . . (9). How often have I, againſt good reaſoning, made uſe of captious reflexions to draw a general inference from a particular thing, and to aſcribe to the whole ſociety, what could have been verified but of one private perſon, if I had been reduced to a judicial evidence ? What ſtories have I not forged and altered a thouſand ways, in order to cut more ſenſibly, and to make deeper and more dangerous wounds ? if I would refute every thing in particular, or give a reaſon of my accuſations, I ſhould trouble you, dear reader, with a thouſand circumſtances, which would render my retractation very tedious and irreligious. It ſuffices then to ſay, that I retract that pernicious book in general, and in all it's parts, without taking in the things which I have ſaid of Father Rouſſeau and Father Beauſais for my juſtification and defence. I beſeech the equitable readers to take this preſent book as one of my declarations, and I entreat them through the merciful bowels of JESUS CHRIST, never to read the other, becauſe it is heretical, and never to caſt their eyes upon it, becauſe it is a work which an evil conſcience has conceived, melancholy has formed, and revenge has produced.'

I leave my reader to judge, whether the gentlemen of Port Royal have any good reaſon for maintaining, that Peter Jarrige publiſhed an inſufficient recantation, and that he indeed accuſes himſelf of having written his book againſt the Jeſuits with too much paſſion, but that he does not diſown, in particular, any of the ſcandalous ſtories he had related. Thoſe who anſwered Maimbourg's hiſtory of Calviniſm, failed not to take advantage of this reflexion of the gentlemen of Port-Royal (10).

[C] Many people believe the Jeſuits impriſoned him for life.] As he foreſaw that this would be ſaid, or ſomething worſe, he affected to make it known, that the Jeſuits had given him a very good reception, and that they who would not believe it, might come and ſee him. Here is what he wrote to a merchant. 'I know very well, that the miniſters and gentlemen I have left, will ſay, that I am dead or impriſoned ; but do me this favour, to deſire thoſe who ſhall come to Antwerp, to come and ſee me in the college, and I promiſe you, I will not only ſpeak to them with freedom, but, if they pleaſe, I will wait on them through the town, and travel with them into the Catholic territories (11). To which you may add this paſſage of his recantation (12). 'I know very well, that the Heretics, meaſuring the actions of others by their own, will ſpread falſe reports, that I have been poiſoned, or clapt up in a dungeon, where I can only ſee the light through a hole ; that the reverend father John Ponthelier, who was the principal inſtrument God made uſe of to take me out of the abyſs, has ſeduced me, and cunningly conveyed me from the United Provinces, where I was ſafe, to deliver me into the hands of my enemies, or to death. But this concerns the converſion of all the apoſtates of ſeveral orders, who are ſtill in the mire of error, and only kept in it by the fear of puniſhment, to know that theſe ſtories are falſe, and that I am eſcaped out of the power of the wolves, to enter into the boſom of a merciful paſtor, who glories to carry the ſtraying ſheep upon his ſhoulders. Certainly, if I was treated according to my crimes, an impriſonment of ten years would not be ſufficient to expiate them. But ſince I return into the boſom of my father voluntarily, and without conſtraint, where ſin has for two years abounded, grace at preſent doth much more abound.' He affected to make it known how many ſecurities had been granted him. 'I have obtained from his majeſty, ſaid he (13), one of the fineſt patents of pardon and abſolution that ever was granted : ſo that I neither fear Bourdeaux, for the book, nor Rochelle, for the ſentence of death. I have received in the ſecond place, letters of aſſurance from our holy father the Pope, with power to retire into any Catholic town I pleaſe, in which he has commanded all magiſtrates and eccleſiaſtics to protect me, being contented that I ſhould only wear the habit of a prieſt. I have received thirdly, a paſſport from the arch-duke Leopold, through all his territories. Fourthly, the general of the ſociety of Jeſus, Francis Picolomini, has ſent me a patent to enter again among the Jeſuits, where I am with an entire abolition of my fault, without impoſing upon me any penance or ſatisfaction, except what I ſhall take upon myſelf : the ſame has given me other patents to go into what kingdom or province of the world I pleaſe, ſo that I have the choice of all the colleges of the ſociety : all this is ſigned with the great ſeals of his office, and nothing is more authentic. And to compleat my happineſs, Father Ponthelier, who has procured me all theſe favours and wonders, has leave to live with me as long as he pleaſes, and he will never leave me till I am entirely ſatisfied, I can aſſure you of it. Beſides (which is a thing granted to no body) I have the choice to be either a ſecular prieſt, or to live in the ſociety of the Jeſuits ; and I expect a definitive anſwer from Rome.'

[D] Other reaſons may be given why ſuch a man ſhould be ſeen no more.] His recantation proved him to be the greateſt rogue upon the earth ; for in it he acknowledged, that to revenge himſelf of two Jeſuits, he had defamed the whole ſociety with falſe accuſations of regicide, infanticide, ſodomy, and ſuch other abominable crimes (14). When a man owns himſelf a public calumniator, with reſpect to ſuch crimes as theſe, the beſt thing he can do, is to conceal himſelf all the reſt of his days. If he has any conſcience, he ought to confine himſelf to a place of penitence as long as he lives ; if he has none, and has any ſenſe of honour left, he ought to ſhun all company, and, like Bellerophon, avoid the very footſteps of men.

Ἀλλ' ὅτε δὴ κἀκεῖνος ἀπήχθετο πᾶσι θεοῖσιν,
Ἤτοι ὁ καππεδίον τὸ Ἀλήϊον οἶος ἀλᾶτο,
Ὃν θυμὸν καΐέδων, πάτον ἀνθρώπων ἀλεείνων.

Sed

(8) Pag. 77.

(9) Pag. 79.

(10) See the Apologie pour les Reformateurs, &c. livr. i, chap. ix, pag. 154, Edit. in 4to, and the Critique Generale, Letter ix, pag. 147, of the third edition.

(11) Lettre de Jarrige au Sieur G. M. Marchand à Leide, dated from Antwerp the eighth of May, 1650. It was printed at Leyden the ſame year, with an anſwer, which I ſhall mention hereunder, in the remark [F].

(12) Pag. 4.

(13) Letter to the merchant of Leyden.

(14) Retractat. pag. 79.

will not take it ill, if for the inſtruction of the public, I rectify his account [E]. In the anſwers that were made to Jarrige's retractation, it was ſaid that his morals had not been

Sed quando jam & ille inviſus fuit omnibus diis,
Ille quidem per campum Aleïum ſolus errabat,
Suum animum exedens, veſtigia hominum vitans (15).

Afflicted by the gods he roams alone
O'er the Aleïan plains, and ſeeks mankind to ſhun.

He ought then to practice what Balzac ſaid he would do for a much leſſer reaſon. I would go, ſays he (16), and eat my heart in the deſerts of Thebais, Ipſe meum cor edens, hominum veſtigia vitans.

[E] The hiſtorian quoted by me, will not take it ill that I rectify his account.] Jarrige 'was a turbulent 'and ambitious man, and poſſibly he converted him'ſelf more out of ſpite to ſee himſelf croſſed in the 'deſign he had to arrive to the dignities of his order, 'than out of any zeal for the truth. He made an abju'ration of the Romiſh religion, in the conſiſtory of Ro'chelle, on Chriſtmas day, after which he retired in'to Holland. This was the firſt breach made in their 'ſociety, none of which, before this man, was ever 'known to forſake the Catholic religion. At leaſt, 'if others have left it, there was no noiſe made about 'it, either becauſe the Jeſuits prudently thought fit to 'be ſilent, or becauſe theſe Perſons did not deſerve that 'any complaints ſhould be made of them (17). . . . 'Some time after his book was publiſhed, Jarrige diſ'appeared, and the Jeſuits boaſted, that as he left their 'order, only out of anger, he was returned to it out 'of repentance; that he had ſhut himſelf up in one of 'their houſes, to hide himſelf from all worldly com'merce, and to do penance all his life. But becauſe 'he was never ſeen afterwards, it was believed on the 'contrary, that the Jeſuits had cauſed him to be car'ried off, and that they had ſecretly revenged them'ſelves upon him, for the diſpleaſure he had given 'them by his change. Indeed, it is not imaginable, 'that after they had made ſo much noiſe for the loſs 'of him, they would not draw ſome advantage from 'his return, and produce him at leaſt ſome times in 'the provinces, where his diſertion was known, to 'leſſen the joy that the Proteſtants conceived upon 'that conqueſt. Beſides, we have had ſince many 'other experiments of what they can do againſt thoſe 'that deſert them, and we are no longer ignorant, that 'they know how to ſteal them away from their ſafeſt re'treats, and make them expiate with long ſufferings, 'the crimes of violating their vows (18).' I ſhall only make three remarks upon this narrative.

The firſt will be ſhort: This author ſhould not have expreſſed himſelf by a poſſibly upon the motives of Jarrige's change. It is evident that anger was the only cauſe. Mr Spanheim was convinced of it at the firſt converſation he had with him (19), and his whole retractation ſhews it.

My ſecond obſervation is, that it was not the firſt breach made in the ſociety of the Jeſuits, attended with conſequences that made a great noiſe. In the XVIth century, a Jeſuit called Elias Haſenmullerus, left the order to turn Lutheran. He was a man who had curiouſly obſerved both the ſtrong and weak ſide of that ſociety; ſo that for fear of his publiſhing the hiſtory of it, the Jeſuits did all that was poſſible to ſeize him. He had the good luck to avoid their ſnares, by hiding himſelf ſometimes in one place, and ſometimes in another but at laſt, to put himſelf out of the reach of their conſpiracies, he retired to Wittemberg, in the year 1587 (20), where he ſpent his time, in putting the laſt hand to a hiſtory of the Jeſuits, which he deſigned to publiſh. He died before he could do it: his manuſcript was publiſhed ſome time after by Polycarp Lyſerus (21). It is a very ſtrong piece againſt the Jeſuits (22), and take it altogether, it is more provoking than the books of Jarrige, though perhaps there are not ſo many particular adventures in it. This work was received with great applauſe. The Jeſuits cauſed it to be refuted by James Gretſerus, which occaſioned ſeveral books pro and con.

I have ſaid, that perhaps Haſenmullerus does not tell ſo many adventures as Jarrige; but it is certain, that in the chapter of the vow of chaſtity, he relates ſome that are very ſcandalous; and doubtleſs to make the impurities of which he accuſes the Jeſuits, the more abhorred, he has laid open many precautions, with which he ſays they fortify themſelves againſt this ſin. He ſays, they make uſe of foods that mortify and enervate the fleſh, and that they order watchings, faſtings, whippings, and hair-cloths, to thoſe that confeſs their temptations. 'In cibis & potu variis utuntur herbis & 'pharmacis, quibus naturæ vim enervant, & ſobolem, 'ut ita dicam, intra viſcera propria occidunt μισάνθρωποι, & à Deo ordinatæ humanæ propagationis 'hoſtes. Si qui fratres in confeſſionibus conquerun'tur de carnis infirmitate, flammis atque uſtione, eam 'ut extinguant ordinant illis vigilias, jejunia, cilicia, '& flagella, quibus carnem ſuam doment, caſtigent, & 'in ſervitutem, ut loquuntur, ſpiritus redigant (23). '—— In their meat and drink, they make uſe of ſe'veral ſorts of herbs, and other drugs, whereby they 'enervate the ſtrength of nature; and thus theſe man'haters, if I may uſe the expreſſion, deſtroy their 'children even in their own bowels, and are enemies 'to the propagation of the human ſpecies, as ordained 'by God. If any of the brotherhood complain, in their 'confeſſions, of infirmities in the fleſh, of luſtful flames 'and burnings, they direct them, in order to extinguiſh 'theſe, to make uſe of watchings, faſtings, ſack-cloth 'garments, and ſcourges, whereby they may tame and 'correct the fleſh, and reduce it, as their phraſe is, 'into ſubjection to the ſpirit.' He adds, that there are ſome who ſtudy to raiſe and cheriſh in their ſoul, a great hatred for the fair ſex, 'Nonnullos vidi qui ni'hil voluerunt edere, quòd a muliere coctum ſciebant. 'Alios dicentes audivi, quoties de fœmina cogito, 'toties ſtomachus meus & bilis commoventur & con'turbantur. Alius dicebat, tædet pudetque me quod 'à muliere ſum in hanc lucem editus; dignus certe 'cui vacca fuiſſet genitrix. Alii nihil prorſus boni in 'tota mulieris ſubſtantia eſſe dicunt, ſique ex illis 'quidam cæteros in harum calumniarum palæſtra vin'cere conantur, illi ad mentionem mulieris expuunt, '& in tabula maledicos & in ſexum fœmineum con'tumelioſos Mantuani verſus (quos tamen is non niſi 'de malis cecinit) deſcriptos ob oculos ponunt, ut ſic in 'ſeipſis majus in mulieres odium excitent (24). —— 'I have known ſome of them who would eat nothing 'that they knew to have been dreſſed by a woman; others 'I have heard ſaying, as often as I think of the ſex, 'my very ſtomach and bile are diſtorted and diſturbed. 'Another ſaid, it vexes and makes me aſhamed, that 'I was born of a woman; worthy ſure to have had 'a cow for his mother. Others aſſert, that there is 'nothing good in the whole ſubſtance of a woman; 'and when ſome endeavour to outdo the reſt in breath'ing out theſe calumnies, they ſpit at the very mention 'of a female, and when at table, ſet before their eyes 'Mantuan's bitter verſes on the ſex (though his ſatire 'is pointed only againſt the bad) that they may ſtir 'up in themſelves the greater averſion to women in ge'neral.' By this we ſee that all ſorts of extravagancies may enter into the mind, under a falſe devotion; for what can be more abſurd, and more reſembling a lunatic, than the diſcourſes of thoſe people? My ſtomach riſes, ſay they, and my choler is ſtirred as often as I think of a woman; I am ſorry and aſhamed, to owe my birth to a woman; I ſpit when I hear a woman mentioned. I have not found in Haſenmullerus's book, a paſſage quoted by a modern author (25): he pretends to have read in it, that a workman who was at work for the Jeſuits, though they gave him meat and drink enough, could not careſs his wife; and yet when he laboured at other people's houſes, did very well perform his nocturnal duty, even when he drank nothing but water: for which reaſon his wife would not ſuffer him to work for the Jeſuits any longer, and afterwards the magiſtrates of Landsberg (26) did not permit any body to buy their beer. If it had that ill quality, the magiſtrates were to be praiſed for forbidding laymen to drink it; for the conjugal duty is ſo privileged a caſe, that many caſuiſts ſubmit the laws of the church to it. They pretend, that when faſting hinders a man from paying his duty to his wife, he is ipſo facto, diſpenſed from faſting. See the margin (27).

If the converſion of the Jeſuit Haſenmullerus made a great noiſe, that of the Jeſuit Reihing made ſtill a greater (28). It is he, who is thought to have contributed been edifying whilſt he appeared a Proteſtant [F]. Konig (g) calls him Jarrichius, and will have him to have publiſhed in 1665, the Jeſuit upon the Scaffold (b); which implies three faults.

---

(15) Homer. Iliad. lib. vi, ver. 200.

(16) Letter xxxiv, to Chapelain, book v. See Cicero Tuſc. Quæſt. lib. iii, fol. 263, D.

(17) Hiſt. de l'Edit. de Nantes, Tom. III, pag. 93.

(18) Ibid. pag. 94.

(19) Jarrige, Retractation, pag. 7.

Of Haſenmullerus, an Ex-Jeſuit, and of his Hiſtoria Ordinis Jeſuitici.

(20) Taken from the preface of Polycarp Lyſerus, prefixed to Haſenmullerus's book.

(21) At Francfort, in the year 1593, in 4to.

(22) Haſenmullerus qui fuit Jeſuita, & ſcripſit triumphum Papalem, habet multa bona. Scaliger, in Scaligeranis, poſterioribus, pag m. 105. It is not true that he is the author of the Triumphus Papalis, prefixed to his Hiſtoria Jeſuitici Ordinis. Maximilian Philo is the author of it. Scaliger's miſtake is alſo to be found in the Catalogue of the Bodleian library.

(23) Haſenmullerus, Hiſtoria Ordinis Jeſuitici, pag. 127, Edit. Francof. 1605.

(24) Ibid. pag. 131.

(25) The author of the Polygamia Triumphatrix. The following words are to be found, pag. 130. Haſenm. Hiſt. Jeſ. cap. vi, pag. 99, ubi jocoſam, ſed tamen veram hiſtoriam narrat de opifice quodam, qui apud Jeſuitas laborans, comedens & bibens, uxori benevolentiam debitam non potuit reddere, ſed apud alios vel aquam bibens virum ſe valuit præſtare, eamque ob cauſam non voluit, ut amplius Jeſuitis inſerviret, uti & poſtea Landſbergenſes prohibuerint in Bavaria, ne amplius cereviſiam apud Jeſuitas emerent.

(26) A town in Bavaria.

(27) Thoſe are not obliged to faſt, who . . . when they faſt, cannot pay a due benevolence to their wives. Emanuel Sa, Aphoriſ verbo Jejunium n. 9. Tolet. Inſtruct. Sacerdot. lib. vi, cap iv. Thomas 2. ſecundæ Queſt. 147. art. iv. Du Moulin in the book of Traditions, pag. m. 343.

(28) He turned Lutheran about the year 1620.

In the Catalogue of the Bodleian Library, he is confounded with another Jeſuit, whoſe work is aſcribed to him, and whoſe name was Peter Jarric.

(g) Biblioth. Vetus & Nova, pag. 424.

(b) Jeſuitam . . ferâli pegmate conſtitutum. It ſhould be Jeſuitas.

buted to bring the duke of Newburg to the Romiſh communion. See the Article of REIHING. Thus you ſee two eminent converſions of Jeſuits which preceded that of Peter Jarrige. I ſay nothing of Daniel Peirol, miniſter of the church of Montauban, and profeſſor in the academy of the ſame town. He had been a Jeſuit, and he wrote ſomething againſt Father Coton. I have found this in the twenty-firſt page of Gilbert Voetius's Confraternitas Mariana.

My third obſervation is, that Jarrige was not carried off: he retired voluntarily, being moved to it by the ſuggeſtion of the Jeſuit Ponthelier. This appears by the authentic pieces that have been printed Such is the letter he wrote to the merchant of Leyden, and much more his recantation (29).

[F] His morals had not been edifying whilſt he appeared a Proteſtant.] I have ſeen two anſwers to his recantation; one written by Ezekiel Daunois of Compeigne, a miniſter of the goſpel: The other by John Nicolai, of Luxemburg, a member of the French church at Amſterdam. In the preface of his ſecond anſwer, I have read, that Peter Jarrige endeavoured in vain to be admitted into the miniſtry, before the four years of trial were expired, which the synods have appointed for thoſe who come from Popery. ‘ That ‘ touch, ſays he, filled you with indignation after your ‘ laſt rejection in the ſynod of Harlem, where you ‘ was alſo accuſed (your conſcience knows whether it ‘ was wrongfully) of an action as infamous as thoſe ‘ filthy things, of which you accuſe the Jeſuits of your ‘ province to put them upon the ſcaffold. Now, tho’ ‘ it was not then examined to the bottom, foraſmuch ‘ as the witneſſes were not preſent; yet the ſuſpicion ‘ remained, conſidering the great knowledge and ex- ‘ perience you have expreſſed in your book, of ſuch ‘ ſort of impurities.’ The letter which the Leyden merchant wrote to him, will explain all this: theſe words are to be found there: ‘ You may remember ‘ with what ſpirit you was led, when you returned from ‘ the ſynod of Middleburg, which you had in vain ‘ ſo vehemently ſollicited, to obtain an exception to ‘ the order made againſt admitting to the holy miniſtry ‘ (which you was fond of to cauſe a greater ſcandal) ‘ thoſe that come from Popery, till after a trial of four ‘ years. Being refuſed, you made your preſumption, ‘ pride, and vanity, plainly appear; and in your way ‘ home you happened to be at night in the cabin of ‘ the veſſel, where were many women, whom not ‘ being able to talk with but by ſigns, you ſhewed ‘ them by candle-light your obſcene parts, and made ‘ them ſet up a cry againſt this villanous and abominable prieſt, as they called you; which not only ‘ awaked a good ſervant of God, who was there, ‘ but all the reſt of the crew, who running at the ‘ alarm, upon hearing the women talked of nothing ‘ but throwing you into the water; which they would ‘ have done, had it not been for that good man, ‘ who pacified them; but the boatman proteſted ‘ that he would tell it in the place from whence ‘ you came.’

(29) See the remark [C], citations (11), (12), and (13).

JAVERSAC (N.) was one of the authors that entered the liſts during Balzac's great quarrel with father Goulu. He was a native of a town near Angouleſme (a), and he removed to Paris with a book againſt Phyllarchus (b) and Narciſſus (c), under the name of Ariſtarchus to Nicander. His criticiſms are worth nothing in ſome places; for inſtance, he maintains, we ought to ſay Ruette, and not Ruelle; livraire, and not libraire, ſince they ſay in French, un livre, and not un libre. This new author found himſelf attack'd in his lodgings, and even in his bed, with ſword and piſtol; but as he was young and valiant, he took his ſword, and purſued his enemy into the ſtreet, and got great honour, for this courageous defence. Neverthelefs, the very next day this adventure was ſung upon the Pont-Neuf, quite otherwiſe than it happened [A]. A libel was publiſhed, intituled, La Defaite du Paladin Javerſac par les alliez, & confederez du Prince des feuilles (d). (The defeat of the knight errant Javerſac, by the allies and confederates of the Prince of the leaves [Phyllarchus]. I have heard a man of great wit ſay, that Balzac was the author of that piece, and that it is the beſt that came out upon that diſpute. A ſacrilegious calumny was found in the title of that libel (e); for father Goulu was charged in it with that attempt, notwithſtanding the ſacredneſs of his profeſſion. Javerſac declared him innocent of it, and imputed it only to Balzac (f); but diſcreet perſons could neither accuſe Phyllarchus nor Narciſſus of it (g). That which is certain, is, that it has been publiſhed (b) that Balzac being on his death-bed, remembring, that in his younger years ſomething bad paſſed betwixt Javerſac and him, ſent one of his friends to his houſe, which was ſeven or eight leagues, diſtant from Angoulême to deſire him to make him a viſit, that he might have the ſatiſfaction of embracing him before he died. That he really embraced him with an incredible tranſport of joy, and poured into his boſom an effuſion of love, which agreeably put out of their minds the remembrance of their antient quarrel. That Mr de Javerſac was ſo ſenſibly touched with it, that immediately being all in tears, he made a ſonnet to lament for ever the loſs of his friend.

Since the firſt edition of this Dictionary, I have learned ſome circumſtances, of which I will give an account to my readers [B].

(a) Sorel, Bibl. Françoiſe, pag. pag. 132, Edit. 1667. Note that Coignac is the town mentioned by Sorel.

(b) It is the name that Father Goulu took.

(c) It is the name Father Goulu gave to Balzac.

(d) Sorel, ubi ſupra.

(e) Sorel, ibid.

(f) See the laſt remark, citation (14).

(g) Sorel, ubi ſupra.

(b) Moriſcet, in the account of Balzac's death. It is in the edition of Balzac's works in folio.

[A] This adventure was related quite otherwiſe than it happened.] Never were two things more different, than the manner how this adventure is related by Sorel, and by him that publiſhed La défaite du Paladin Javerſac (1). This pamphlet ſays, that the Paladin was of Coignac, where he had pleaded ſome cauſes; that after the publication of his book, there was a conſpiracy to fall upon him in the open ſtreet; but that they were forced to attack him in his chamber, becauſe he kept himſelf ſhut up all the day long; that he was ſurprized aſleep in the arms of his landlord's wife, on Thurſday the eleventh of Auguſt, 1628, at nine of the clock in the morning, and awaked by a ſalvo of baſtinadoes, which laſted as long as it pleaſed the aggreſſor, ſince Paladin wholly reſigned himſelf to providence. The concluſion of the libel is, that the friends of Phyllarchus ‘ joining in this with thoſe of the con- ‘ trary party, have ſworn to root out as many Javer- ‘ ſacs as they can meet with, and to make it plain to ‘ bad poets, that beſides the golden, braſen, and iron, ‘ ages, ſo celebrated in the fables, there is ſtill a ‘ wooden age to come, which the ancient poets have ‘ not mentioned, in the miſeries and calamities where- ‘ of they ſhall have a greater ſhare than other men.’ I make uſe of the edition of 1665 (2). See the following remark.

[B] I have learned ſome circumſtances which I will give an account of to my readers.] Javerſac's book was printed and reprinted in 1628, with this title, Diſcours d'Ariſtarque à Nicandre, ſur le jugement des Eſprits

(1) It is a pamphlet of ſixteen pages in 8*vo. It has been reprinted in the folio edi- of Balzac's works, with ſome other pieces made in his favour.*

(2) That is, of the folio edition of Balzac's works.

Eſprits de ce temps, & ſur les fautes de Phyllarque. The firſt thing to be met with in it, is an advertiſement of the Printer, full of lies; for it is there given out, that they were forced to uſe all ſorts of artifices to over-reach the vigilance, wherewith the author hindered the publication of his work. He did not love it ſo little as to be willing to expoſe it to the rage of envy. Afterwards you find an abuſive letter, which he writ to Mr Bergeron, counſellor to the king, and referendary in Chancery. As he ſuppoſes that this Mr Bergeron had made difficulties againſt the granting the king's licence, in order to deprive him of the advantage of being the firſt that ſhould publiſh any thing about the diſpute of Balzac and Goulu, and to give time to la Motte Aigron to be before him, he expreſſes a great rage in that letter. In the third place, you ſee his preface, wherein he mentions the great efforts his enemies had made to ſtop the impreſſion of his book. At laſt you find the book itſelf. This is not the only work that Javerſac has publiſhed. In the ſame year, 1628, came out the Diſcourſe d'Ariſtarque à Calidoxe ſur ce qui s'eſt paſſè entre lui & Balzac. The impreſſion coſt him a hundred crowns (3); and it was not poſſible for him to get it done at Paris, 'either with licence or without it.' He ſays (4), 'that his father 'had had ſeveral honourable deputations, and ſome of 'the moſt important poſts of the aſſembly of the Pro'teſtants before the rebellions . . . . and (5) that he 'can prove, that his anceſtors have acquired their no'bility by the right of veterans, in ſeveral honourable 'poſts of the crown of Navarre.' He ſays alſo (6), that he had offered to give Balzac ſatisfaction, either as a gentleman, or a Philoſopher. He relates at large, the misfortune that happened to him, of being aſſaulted in his bed (7). He did a little ward off the blow of one of the three villains that came into his chamber; but it is too honourable a thing for me, ſays he (8), not to confeſs that he ſtruck me in the arm, ſaying, you was forbidden to write againſt Balzac. He adds (9) that his landlady was wounded in her little-finger; and that he purſued them with ſword in hand into the ſtreet, and that two hundred witneſſes, who ſaw him in his ſhirt upon the threſhold, had ſaid it every where before him; that he made a paſs at the breaſt of him who had ſtruck him, and that fifty perſons who ſaw his ſword bend to the hilt, knew that this rogue had a coat of mail (10). He obſerves (11), that two or three days before, he had had the honour to ſerve a marquis in a quarrel. Truly, I believe he was fitter to fight than to write books, and that he would quickly have worſted Balzac in a diſpute to be decided with ſword in hand. He ſpreads upon the paper ſome ſtrong rhodomontades againſt him (12), but he expreſſes ſome fear, that his adverſary would accuſe him of ſome youthful mad pranks in love (13). We muſt remember, that he never ſuſpected Father Goulu to be the cauſe of that inſult. I know not, ſays he (14), why Balzac is afraid of me, if he is not guilty; and ſince he thinks to clear himſelf ſo well every where from that crime, by throwing it upon Phylarchus, who has ſhewed himſelf much more generous, and who has a better opinion of his wit than to vindicate himſelf. I had ſo many convincing proofs againſt Balzac, and ſo good an opinion of Phylarchus's honeſty, that I could not ſuſpect him in the leaſt. My book I think, gave him more diſturbance than my perſon.

Note, that it is eaſy to know he was born a Huguenot, but not whether he was not ſo ſtill; for what I am going to quote, is ambiguous. Having heard from my landlady, that I lodged there, after they had made inquiries about it, they asked what religion I was of. She anſwered, that ſhe did not know it, but that I went often to church. She might have ſworn that there is no Catholic, who has a more orthodox faith than I have (15). Bergeron publiſhed a letter againſt the impertinencies and falſities printed by the Sieur de Javerſac, in a letter prefixed to a book, &c (16). There came out alſo (17) a piece intituled, Le non paſſionné ſur le livre intitulé la defaicte du Paladin Javerſac. This piece is infinitely more favourable to the Paladin than to his adverſary. As to the book intituted Acbates a Palemon pour la defenſe de Phyllarque (18); it is a thundering one againſt Javerſac. I have cited a piece of it in the remark of the article ARTABANUS IV (19).

(3) Ariſtarque avis aux lecteurs.

(4) Diſcours d'Ariſtarque à Calidoxe, pag. m. 166.

(5) Ibid. pag. 168.

(6) Ibid. pag. 174.

(7) It was upon a Thurſday, the ſecond of Auguſt, 1628, according to the octavo edition of the Défaite du Paladin Javerſac.

(8) Diſcours d'Ariſtarque. pag. 183.

(9) Ibid pag. 184.

(10) Ibid. pag. 185.

(11) Ibid. pag. 189.

(12) See eſpecially, pag. 198.

(13) Ibid. pag. 201.

(14) Ibid. pag. 199.

(15) Ibid. pag. 176.

(16) It was written to Balzac, and printed in 1628.

(17) In the year 1628.

(98) Printed the ſame year.

(19) See alſo the article MUSAC.

JENISCHIUS (Paul) was born at Antwerp the ſeventeenth of June, 1558, and died at Studgard the eighteenth of December, 1647. He was a learned man, and underſtood ſeveral languages. His book, intituled, Theſaurus Animarum, expoſed him to a grievous perſecution: he was baniſhed, and his baniſhment laſted above fifty years. He bore it very patiently, and enjoyed an extraordinary good health to the laſt year of his life, eating well, ſleeping well (a), and ſpending his time in Muſic, which he underſtood to perfection, and in the ſtudy of the Holy Scripture, and in Mechanics. He had nineteen children, whereof four only were living when he died. He was grievouſly ſick the laſt year of his life, and he died in acute pains (b). He has been unknown to the Bibliographers of the Low-Countries.

(a) Perfruitus animi tranquillitate & corporis valetudine firma cum orexi, ſuavi ſomno uſus. Job. Valent. Andreas, ubi infra.

(b) Taken from the cxcth Letter of John Valentinus Andreas.

IGNATIUS, founder of the Jeſuits. See LOYOLA.

ILLYRICUS (Matthias Flacius) one of the moſt learned divines of the confeſſion of Augsburg, was born at Albona in Iſtria (a) the third of March 1520. He ſtudied claſſical learning at Venice, under Egnatius; and at ſeventeen years of age, finding in himſelf a ſtrong inclination for the ſtudy of Divinity, he reſolved to become a Monk, becauſe he could not maintain himſelf in the univerſities, and ſo the only way to ſatisfy his inclination, was to ſtudy in a monaſtery. He communicated his deſign to a provincial of the Franciſcans, a relation of his mother. But this provincial who was inclined to the Proteſtant religion [A], adviſed him to go into Germany, and not to ſhut himſelf up in a convent. Flacius followed his advice, and went to Baſil in the year 1539 [B]. He ſtaid there ſome months, and then he went to Tubingen, and from thence to Wittemberg in the year 1541, and became a diſciple of Luther and Melancthon. He maintained himſelf by teaching Greek and Hebrew. Having communicated to Pomeranus, and afterwards to Luther, the temptations that tormented him, about

(a) Part of the country formerly called Illyrium, or Illyris: hence it is that Matthias Flacius was ſirnamed Illyricus. It is not true, as Melchior Adam, and many others affirm, that he was born in Sclavonia.

[A] This provincial, who was inclined to the Proteſtant religion.] He deſerves a place in the Proteſtant Martyrology, ſince after he had been impriſoned twenty years becauſe he was ſuſpected of Hereſy, he was thrown into the ſea. He was called Baldus Lupatinus. See the margin (1).

[B] He went to Baſil in the year 1539] He was therefore nineteen years old. Verheiden (2) is therefore miſtaken in ſaying, that Illyricus made a journey to Baſil at ſeventeen years of age, Mr Teiſſier (3) has followed Verheiden.

(2) In Effigiebus, pag. 157.

(3) Addit. to the Elog. Tom. I, pag. 471.

---

(1) Baldus autem iſte, ut hoc ἐν παρόδῳ addamus, paulo poſt in ſuſpicionem hæreſeos venit: ac Venetiis viginti ipſos annos ſitum ſqualoremque carceris, tandem in mari ſummerſus ſupplicium fortiter pertulit. Melchior. Adam, in Vit. Theol. pag. 472. See alſo Verheiden in Effigiebus, pag. 157.

about ſin, the wrath of God, and Predeſtination, public prayers were put up for him, and ſcriptural comforts were adminiſtred to him, ſo that theſe temptations ceaſed. He received a thouſand tokens of kindneſs and liberality from Melanchthon. They married him, and gave him a public employment in the univerſity in the year 1544 (b). The War having diſperſed the ſcholars in Saxony, he removed to Brunſwic, where he made himſelf famous by his lectures: He went and re-aſſumed his firſt employment at Wittemberg, in the year 1547, and a little after he ſtrongly oppoſed the Interim, and all the gentle means that Melanchthon was for; and that he might have more liberty to declaim againſt Popery, he retired (c) to Magdeburg, which was then put under the ban of the empire. He publiſhed ſeveral books there, but the moſt conſiderable of his labours was doubtleſs that eccleſiaſtical hiſtory called the Centuries of Magdeburg, of which he had the chief direction. He accepted the employment that was offered him in the year 1557, in the new univerſity of Jena, where he was a profeſſor for five years; after which, not being able to agree with Victorinus Strigelius his colleague [C], he retired to Ratisbonne, where he continued to publiſh many books. He was invited into Brabant, with ſome others in the year 1567, to model ſome churches after the Augſburg confeſſion: but the perſecution diſperſed all theſe churches ſoon after, ſo that he removed from thence to Straſburg, and then to Francfort, where he found a great declenſion of his glory; for he was forſaken by moſt of his adherents, becauſe he was accuſed of Manicheiſm, under pretence that he taught, that ſin was not an accident, but the very ſubſtance of the ſoul (d). He died at Francfort the eleventh of March 1575 (e). He was a man that had excellent talents, a vaſt wit, a great deal of learning, and a mighty zeal againſt Popery; but his turbulent, furious, and quarrelſome temper, ſpoiled all his good qualities, and occaſioned a thouſand diſorders in the Proteſtant church. He made no ſcruple to declare, that princes were to be kept in awe, by the fear of inſurrections (f). There was no reaſon to lament his death; for diviſions which are always ſcandalous, were then very pernicious, becauſe of the advantages which the church of Rome drew from them, to inſult the growing reformation. Some have ſaid, that the only good thing he did was to die (g). But this is overdoing things. He publiſhed a vaſt number of books (h); and no man in his time, knew how to rummage old libraries to better advantage. He got from thence an antient maſs book [D], which he printed in the year 1557. This will give us an (b) Micrælius, Syntagm. Hiſt. Eccleſ. pag. m. 751, is therefore miſtaken, when he ſays that he was profeſſor at Wittemberg, in 1540.

(c) In April 1549. Bucholc. pag. m. 564.

(d) See the remark [C].

(e) Taken from Melch. Adam, in Vitis Germanorum Theologorum, pag. 472, & ſeq.

(f) Metu ſeditionum terrendos eſſe Principes. Melantcht. Epiſt. cvii, pag. 134.

(g) Nequidquam recti feciſſe niſi cum moreretur. Guil. Budæus, Centur. XVI. θανατολογίας ad ann. 1575, apud Quenſtedt de Patriis Erudit. pag. 263.

(h) Simler, in the Abridgment of Geſner's Bibliotheque, and Teiſſier, Addit. Eloges. Tom. I, pag. 472, gives a catalogue of them.

[C] He could not agree with Victorinus Strigelius his colleague.] They differed about the converſion of man, and the power of free-will. They diſputed upon it before the dukes of Saxony at Weimar (4). They went into two extreams. Strigelius inclined to the ſide of thoſe who were called Adiaphoriſts, and Synergiſts, who aſcribed a great power to free-will, and pretended that original ſin did only ſlightly touch the ſoul (5). Flacius on the contrary maintained, that this ſin was the very ſubſtance of the ſoul. The diſpute laſted thirteen ſeſſions: the acts of it were publiſhed with a preface of Muſæus, who was one of Flacius's followers (6). We have here a viſible effect of the deſire of contradicting others; which is a paſſion that commonly carries men of a lively wit beyond all bounds. Flacius not being able to content himſelf with a moderate oppoſition, ſet himſelf at the greateſt diſtance poſſible from his antagoniſt; and ſeeing him maintain that the ſoul was not wounded by original ſin, but in it's accidental faculties, he undertook to prove, that the very ſubſtance of the ſoul is corrupted, whence it followed that ſin is the very ſubſtance of the ſoul. Flacius had never thought of that doctrine, if his colleague had not taught the contrary. But if the diſpute which aroſe betwixt theſe two profeſſors ſhews what the ſpirit of contradiction, and the ἀμετρία τῆς ἀνθολκῆς, can do, it ſhews alſo how fit the peripatetic Philoſophy is to foment the diviſions of the divines. For Illyricus's doctrine would have offended no body, if they had believed, as the new Philoſophers do, that there are no accidents diſtinct from ſubſtances, but that for example, pain is nothing elſe but the ſoul itſelf, as it is modified in ſuch a manner: which being granted, it is plain that Illyricus's doctrine is moſt true. Sin is not a diſtinct being from a ſinful ſoul, and virtue is not a diſtinct being from a virtuous ſoul. I do not apprehend how the divines, who ſuppoſe a real diſtinction between the ſoul and it's modifications, can ſay there happens a change in man, when he paſſes from a ſtate of innocence, to that of guilt, and from a ſtate of ſin, to that of grace. According to theſe divines, when man ſins, a new entity, diſtinct from the ſoul, is produced, which, being joined with the ſoul, compoſes together with it a whole, which contains two beings really diſtinct from one another, one of which is called ſubſtance, and the other accident. I maintain, that this conjunction does not change the ſoul, and that it continues to be preciſely what it was before that conjunction. Mix as much as you pleaſe grains of wheat with grains of barley, you will never make them ceaſe to be wheat: and in all natural and artificial mixtures, it is true, that the compounds become capable of a new action; but each part of them, as it is diſtinct from every other, retains preciſely the ſame nature it had before. In like manner, if the ſoul was really diſtinct from it's ſin, that is to ſay, from the ſin to which it were joined, it would not paſs into another ſtate. A ſoul once innocent, would always be ſo. See what the Nominaliſts ſay (7) againſt thoſe, who teach that modes are really diſtinct from ſubſtances.

(4) In the year 1560, according to Micrælius, Syntagm. Hiſtor. Eccleſ. pag. m. 827, 828; but according to Melchior Adam, in Vitis Theol. Germ. pag. 420, it was in the year 1557.

(5) Spondanus ad ad. ann. 1560, n. 32.

REFLEXION upon Flacius's doctrine concerning the nature of ſin.

(6) See Micrælius, Syntagm. Hiſtoriar. Eccleſ. pag. m. 827, 828.

(7) Caſimirus Tholoſas in Atomis Peripateticis, Tom. III, pag. 249, & ſeq.

[D] He got from thence an ancient maſs-book.] Here is the title of this work printed at Straſburg by Chriſtopher Mylius, in the year 1557. Miſſa latina, quæ olim ante Romanam circa ſeptingenteſimum Domini annum in uſu fuit, bona fide ex vetuſto authenticoque Codice deſcripta à Matthia Flacio Illyrico. So Mr Colomiés gives it (8), and poſſibly he had it from du Peyrat (9). He adds a great many curious things about this miſſal. He ſays, ‘that the Lutherans believing it to be contrary to the opinion and practice of the Catholics, expreſſed upon all occaſions how glad they were of that diſcovery; that the Catholics on their part, without any ſtrict examination of this Miſſal, prohibited it in their indexes (10)..... That the Lutherans coming to examine this miſſal with more care, and finding it not favourable to them, ſuppreſſed all the copies they could find, ſo that it is grown extreamly ſcarce, and that the Catholics taking advantage of that retractation, have ſince cauſed it to be reprinted (11), notwithſtanding the prohibition of the Pope and the king of Spain.’ I make no doubt that he took from du Peyrat what he ſays of the Lutherans about the ſuppreſſion of the copies; in which I think he has been too credulous for du Peyrat gives no other reaſon for what he imputes to the Lutherans, but the ſcarcity of the copies of this miſſal. I confeſs he quotes a paſſage of Wicelius, in which Illyricus is ſaid to have been ſo indiſcreet as to ſupply the Catholics with arms againſt his own ſect, by the impreſſion of this miſſal. But this makes much more againſt du Peyrat than for him. And indeed Wicelius does not ſay that the Lutherans mended their fault by the ſuppreſſion of the copies; and yet if du Peyrat was in the right, they had been already

(8) Colomiés, Bibliotheque choiſie, pag. 12.

(9) Du Peyrat, Antiquitez de la Chapelle du Roi, pag. 561.

(10) Philip II, by the advice, and at the requeſt of the duke of Alba, and afterwards Sixtus V. Colomiés, Bibliotheque choiſie, pag. 12.

(11) Father le Cointe has inſerted it in the ſecond volume of Eccleſiaſtical Annals of France, and cardinal Bona at the end of his work de rebus Liturgicis. Id. ibid.

an opportunity of diſcuſſing ſeveral things. Thoſe libraries afforded him vaſt collections, which have been ſerviceable to many people. I mean the memoirs which he gathered to compile his Catalogus teſtium veritatis [E]. It is ſaid that ſometimes he diſguiſed his name already ſuppreſſed by them, when Wicelius publiſhed his book, which was in 1564. Now du Peyrat's proof is taken from the ſilence of Caſſander and Pamelius his contemporary about Illyricus's Miſſal in their liturgical books. Nevertheleſs, ſays he (12), they have curiouſly inquired into every thing that related to that matter, and they had a great credit in Germany . . . to get all the books that might be neceſſary for them. He therefore argues thus: if the Lutherans had not deſtroyed the copies of the miſſal, publiſhed by Illyricus, Caſſander would have mentioned this maſs-book; for he would doubtleſs have ſeen a copy of it. But he has made no mention of it; therefore it is certain the Lutherans had deſtroyed them. Note that Caſſander's book about liturgies was printed (13) ſome years before that of Wicelius. We ſhall ſee below, that Caſſander's ſilence is a very bad proof of the ſcarcity of thoſe copies, and that it is not a ſign that this maſs-book was unknown to him. At preſent I ſhall only obſerve, that Wicelius's reproach is a proof againſt du Peyrat. But let us ſee what he alledges (14).

'Flavius (15) Illyricus having printed it in the year 1557, at Strasburg by inadvertency, not conſidering what he did, and the Lutherans and other German Heretics being ſenſible of the prejudice this antient miſſal did to their new opinions, collected all the copies they could meet with, and ſuppreſſed them, that it might not come to the knowledge of the Catholics, and be uſed againſt them, being intirely contrary to the ſects of Luther and Calvin. George Wicellius †, an old diſciple of Luther, who at laſt forſook him, and returned into the pale of the church, ſpeaking of Flavius Illyricus in his defence of the Eccleſiaſtical Liturgy, printed in the year 1564, ſeven years after that Gallican Miſſal was publiſhed, falls ſharply upon Flavius Illyricus on account of that Latin miſſal, ſaying that a blind man may clearly ſee, that by printing it, he ignorantly and imprudently engaged againſt the ſects of Luther and Calvin, and greatly obliged the Catholics. Wicellius's words are theſe: Mathias Flavius Illyricus edidit repertam Miſſam Latinam, non triumphans tamen de Theſauro tanto adverſus Catholicos, quùm vel cæcutienti homini appareat totum illud quod edidit, contra Lutheri, Calvinique ſectas edidiſſe, ſed & Catholicis nobis rem longe gratiſſimam feciſſe; quid enim ibi niſi Miſſam Latinam, quæ hodie in uſu generali eſt, inſciens, imprudenſque defendit? Tantùm abeſt, ut ſuo ſectæque more oppugnet; locupletior eſt illa quidem, pluſque precum continet, ſed omninò tamen eadem cùm uſitatâ, cujus etiam dicta, factaque omnia paſſim ſequitur, ut diverſam eſſe confirmare nemo audeat. This undoubtedly was the reaſon why Flavius Illyricus and his adherents of Germany, being ſenſible of the fault they had committed, burnt, or otherwiſe ſuppreſſed, this Latin or Gallican Miſſal, fearing they ſhould be laughed at by every body. That which confirms me in this opinion is, that tho' it was printed at Strasburg in the year 1557, George Caſſander who died but in February 1566 ‡, and Pamelius, his commentary . . . . make no mention of it.' Du Peyrat repeates the ſame thing at the 623 page. 'I maintain, ſays he, that ſince Caſſander and Pamelius, who have been moſt curious in ſearching out all ſorts of liturgies, have never ſeen this tho' it was printed in their life-time, eight or nine years before the death of either of them (16), and ſince it is ſcarce to be met with at this day in France and Germany; that the Lutherans and Calviniſts burnt it as ſoon as it ſaw the light, to hinder the Catholics from making uſe of it againſt them, as of a ſharp knife coming from them to cut their throats, and juſtify their blind obſtinacy againſt the antient and true doctrine of the Catholic, Apoſtolic, and Roman Church.' Let us now ſee whether Caſſander's ſilence proves any thing.

Colomiés, who confutes Cardinal Bona, ſhould have known that du Peyrat had deceived the cardinal. Therefore his cenſure ſhould have been levelled firſt of all againſt du Peyrat: however here are Colomiés's words (17), 'Cardinal Bona is miſtaken in believing that Caſſander never ſaw the Miſſal publiſhed by Illyricus: beſides that in a collection of antient prayers made by Caſſander, there are ſome that are alſo in Illyricus's Miſſal; Fr. Baudouin, a famous civilian, writing to Caſſander from Francfort in the year 1557, that is, the ſame year that this Miſſal was printed, uſes theſe words: Francofordiam reverſus, reperi Illyrici ad me literas cum libello de Miſſæ ad Palatinum noſtrum. (He means Otho elector Palatin, to whom this book was dedicated.) Rogat ille meum judicium de ſuis Miſſæ antiquitatibus. Ego id ad te nunc refero, & libellum ipſum mitto de quo quid ſentire debeamus familiariter nos moneas, ut de qua re tam multi multa confuſè balbutiunt, rectè & diſtinctè reſpondere aliquando poſſimus. —— When I returned to Franckfort, I found letters from Illyricus to me, together with a book, concerning the Maſs inſcribed to the Prince Palatine. (He means Otho elector Palatine, to whom the book is dedicated) He demands my judgment on his Antiquities of the Maſs. Now I refer that matter to you, and ſend you alſo his book, of which let us hear your ſentiments freely, that on a ſubject, whereon many talk confuſedly, and beſide the purpoſe, we may be able to offer ſomething that is clear and diſtinct.' I have a better reaſon than this, to prove that Illyricus's Miſſal was not unknown to George Caſſander; and that which is very remarkable, is, that du Peyrat ſupplies me with it, the marginal note (18), which he has put in the 622d page, informs me, that mention is made of this Miſſal at the end of a book printed in 1561, and intituled, De officio pii ac publicæ tranquillitatis vere amantis viri, &c. Now it is certain Caſſander was the author of this book. If du Peyrat had known this, he would not have affirmed that this author never ſaw Flacius's Miſſal. By this we ſee that he uſed a very bad argument, as to what concerns Caſſander, to prove that the copies of this Miſſal were grown very ſcarce. But will ſome ſay, it is certain that they grew ſcarce, and that Caſſander makes no mention of that Miſſal in his book of liturgies. I anſwer as to the laſt point, that perhaps this book of Caſſander was printed off before the author received Illyricus's book. The Bibliotheque of Valerius Andreas ſhews, that this book of Caſſander was printed in the year 1558; it may be ſaid ſo in the title page though the book had been made public in the autumn of 1557, a time in which perhaps Caſſander had not received Illyricus's book publiſhed in the year 1557. Upon the other point, I ſhall only ſay, that there are ſeveral works of Illyricus as hard to come by as his Gallican miſſal, and yet no body went about to ſuppreſs them. There are many other cauſes of the ſcarcity of a book, beſides the care of gathering up all the copies to throw them into the fire.

[E] I mean the memoirs which he gathered to compile his Catalogus Teſtium Veritatis.] The worſt of it is, that he is accuſed of having ſtolen ſome manuſcripts. Let us hear Melchior Adam. 'Tertium locum facile obtinet Martyrologium illud, quod hac occaſione compilatum ferunt. Contexuit Abbas Joannes Trithemius Catalogum auctorum. Hunc cùm vidiſſet Flacius, temperare ſibi non potuit, quin diſſimulatâ perſonâ & habitu aliquot in Germaniâ Monaſteriorum bibliothecas perluſtraret: quos commodè poſſet Hiſtoricos clam auferret, atque iſto adminiculo librum qui Catalogus teſtium veritatis indigitatur, conſcriberet (19). —— That Martyrology eaſily obtains the third place, the occaſion of compiling of which is thus reported. The abbot John Trithemius drew up a catalogue of authors. This when Flacius had ſeen he could no longer contain himſelf, but diſguiſing his perſon and habit as well as he could, he went round to the ſeveral libraries of German monaſteries, carrying away privately from them ſuch hiſtories as were for his purpoſe, and with this aſſiſtance, he compoſed his book, called a Catalogue of the Witneſſes of Truth.' The Catholic writers have not failed to take advantage of that remark. 'Egregium ſcilicet opus, ſays Spondanus (20), quod ex furto & ſacrilegio impii tranſfugæ confectum eſt, ut mirum videri non debeat, ſi tot mendaciis & falſiloquiis ſcateat à patre omnis nequitiæ & immunditiæ eructatis. —— An extraordinary work indeed, which is compoſed out of the theft and ſacrilege of an impious turn-coat; whence

' it

---

(12) Du Peyrat, ubi ſupra, pag. 618.

(13) In the year 1558. See Valer. Andr. Biblioth. Belg. pag. 261.

(14) Du Peyrat, ubi ſupra, pag. 617.

(15) So he calls him always.

† Vide Georgium Wicellium in defenſione Liturgiæ Eccleſiaſticæ.

‡ Caſſander's epitaph made by Cornelius Galterus of Ghent, and placed in the church of St Francis of Poland, witneſſes it: it is prefixed to the Liturgies of Caſſander.

(16) This is falſe with reſpect to Pamelius, who died in September 1587, being in the fifty ſecond year of his age. His book of Liturgies was printed in 1571. See Val. Andr. ubi ſupra. pag. 425.

(17) Colomiés, ubi ſupra, pag. 14.

(18) Here it is; I have corrected in it ſome errors of the preſs: Ad calcem libelli de officio pii ac publicæ tranquillitatis vere amantis viri in hoc Religionis diſſidio typis excuſi, anno 1561. referuntur doctorum aliquot ac piorum virorum libri, ex quibus videri poteſt quam non ſit difficilis controverſiarum in Religione conciliatio, ſi controvertendi ſtudium vitetur, inter quos fit mentio ejuſmodi Miſſæ his verbis, Miſſa Latina vetus, quæ ante 700. annos in uſu fuit in Eccleſia Gallicana, & Germanica. Argentorati apud Chriſt. Mylium, 1557.

(19) Melch. Adam, in Vit. Theol. pag. 475. He quotes Keckerman in Method. Hiſtor.

(20) Spondan. ad ann. 1560, n. 32. He is miſtaken in calling Melchior Adam a Lutheran.

name [F]. Moreri is much in the wrong to place him under the letter T, at the word Trancowitz [G].

Spondanus has committed a great fault, ſpeaking of the Centuries of Magdeburg [H]: you may ſee it in the remark (i), where I ſhall mention ſome things relating to the hiſtory of it need not ſeem ſtrange that it ſo much abounds with lies and falſhoods, belched out by the father of all wickedneſs and uncleanneſs.' See in the 120th page of Colomiés's Opuſcula, what is ſaid of Lindenbroch. But Spondanus goes too faſt, when he concludes from a man's ſtealing manuſcripts, that he falſifies them afterwards, and publiſhes them with a thouſand alterations; Spondanus is not well grounded in ſuch a conſequence. Beſides, he is miſtaken when he ſuppoſes that Illyricus publiſhed his Catalogus Teſtium Veritatis, only in oppoſition to William Eiſengreinius's book. It is juſt the contrary, Eiſengreinius publiſhed his Catalogus Teſtium Veritatis in oppoſition to that of Illyricus. This is plain from the dates of the impreſſions. Illyricus's catalogue, printed at Baſil in the year 1556, was re-printed at Straſburg in the 1562, that of Eiſengreinius was printed at Dillingen in 1565. Which confutes the following paſſage (21). ‘ Nec vero tam illud æmulatione Trithemii, cujus opus omninò diverſum eſt, ſuum concinnaſſe putamus; quam turpiori flagitio ad obſcurandum illud, quod Gulielmus Eiſengreinius itidem Germanus Catholicus ediderat eodem Titulo Catalogi Teſtium Veritatis, quo patrum & Eccleſiaſticorum omnium qui ad eam uſque diem hæreſes expugnaverant, non parvo labore teſtimonia pro veritate fidei Catholicæ protulerat. In cujus invidiam, ſimul & ut fucum faceret imperitis, Flacius commentarium ſuum eodem titulo edidit ſed abſque nomine auctoris (22), fabulis & mendaciis refertum. ——— Nor do we think he compoſed his book in emulation of Trithemius, whoſe work is indeed of quite a different kind, as with a baſer deſign to obſcure that of Gulielmus Eiſengreinius, who was alſo a German Catholic, and who had publiſhed a treatiſe under that title a Catalogue of the Witneſſes of Truth; in which from the fathers and other eccleſiaſtics, who to this day had written againſt hereſies, he had with no ſmall labour drawn out proofs of the Catholic faith, in ſpite to whom, and with a deſign to deceive the ignorant, Flacius ſent out his book under the ſame title, but without the name of the author, and ſtuffed with fables and lies.' Note, that this work of Illyricus was very much enlarged by Simon Goulart of Senlis in the editions of 1597, and 1608.

But he is juſtly complained of (23) for having taken the liberty to change the method of it, and to add and leave out what he pleaſed, without ſhewing what was his and what Illyricus's. This perhaps was the reaſon why a Lutheran procured a new edition of the Catalogus Teſtium Veritatis, altogether like that of Illyricus, except that he prefixed to it what learned men have ſaid in praiſe or diſpraiſe of it. This new edition came out at Francfort in the year 1666 in 4to. without the name of John Conrad Dietericus, who procured it; but it was publiſhed with his name in 1672 (24). I muſt obſerve, that Melchior Adam has not well abridged the author he quotes: I have conſulted the original ſince the firſt edition of this Dictionary, and I have found in Keckerman a circumſtance, which ſhould not have been ſuppreſſed. Illyricus having learned from John Trithemius's book, that many authors, who lived in the darkneſs of Popery, had left ſome monuments of it's corruption, reſolved to render uſeleſs the care that was taken to conceal the books of thoſe authors. The paſſage of Keckerman runs thus: ‘ Cæterum quod attinet ad inſidioſos occultatores Hiſtoriarum, certum eſt in Bibliothecâ Vaticanâ, & aliis Bibliothecis Italiæ, imprimis autem in Bibliothecis Monaſteriorum, clam ſervari multos Hiſtoricos ſuperiorum ſeculorum, qui de fraudibus Pontificum, deque abuſibus Eccleſiæ Romanæ, & contra de conſervatione veræ doctrinæ, etiam ſub mediis tenebris Papatus ſcripſerunt: id quod manifeſte patet ex Catalogo autorum, edito ab Abbate Johanne Trithemio, qui iſtos autores ex Bibliothecis ante annos paulo plus centum collegit; quem catalogum cum vidiſſet Mathias Flacius, temperare ſibi non potuit, quin diſſimulatâ perſonâ & habitu aliquot in Germania Monaſteriorum Bibliothecas perluſtraret, artemque arte eluſerit, quos commodè poſſet Hiſtoricos clam auferret, atque adeò eximium iſtum librum, qui dicitur Catalogus Teſtium Veritatis, iſto adminiculo conſcriberet (25). ——— As to what concerns the frudulent concealers of hiſtories, it is certain that in the Vatican, and other libraries of Italy, and eſpecially in thoſe belonging to monaſteries, there are privately kept many hiſtorians of the former ages, who wrote plainly againſt the frauds of the Popes, the abuſes of the church of Rome, and maintained the true doctrine, even in the midſt of Papal darkneſs, as is manifeſt from the Catalogue of Authors, publiſhed by abbot John Trithemius, who collected his liſt of writers out of thoſe libraries, ſomewhat more than a hundred years ago, which catalogue when Mathias Flacius ſaw, he could no longer contain himſelf, but diſguiſing his perſon and habit, he went to viſit the libraries of ſeveral monaſteries in Germany, and eluding art by art, he laid hold of ſuch hiſtorians as he could privately carry away, and then wrote his admirable book, called a Catalogue of the Witneſſes of Truth, from the helps which he had thus procured.'

[F] It is ſaid, that ſometimes he diſguiſed his name.] They pretend that Achilles Gaſſarus, who publiſhed a book of Otfridus a monk of Weiſſemburg (26), is the ſame with Flacius Illyricus. This book is an harmony of the four goſpels, in German verſe. It was dedicated to Solomon and Luitbert, archbiſhops of Mentz, and to Lewis king of the eaſtern France (27). Mr Wharton, who pretends (28) that Illyricus publiſhed it under the name of Achilles Gaſſarus, will give me leave to inform my readers, that there was in the XVIth century a German Phyſician, called Achilles Gaſſarus, who publiſhed ſome books (29) when Illyricus was a ſchool-boy.

[G] Moreri is much in the wrong to place him unde the letter T, at the word Trancowitz.] Mr Teiſſier was the occaſion of it, by theſe words of the 471ſt page of his firſt volume. The name of MATTHIAS FLACCIUS was Trancowitz. He cites Verheiden's Effigies: But Verheiden does not ſay ſo, Let us ſee what the curious Mr Colomiés has diſcovered upon this ſubject (30). ‘ I muſt ſet down the true name of Illyricus, which is Francowitz, as Bucholcerus the ſon gives it at the 831ſt page of his Chronology; or rather of the continuation of his father's, printed at Gorlitz in 1599. Verum & integrum, ſays he, Flacii nomen ego ex certis authoribus cognovi eſſe tale: Mathias Francowitzius, cognomento Flacius, gente Illyricus, patria Albonenſis. Konig (31) calls him alſo Francowitzius; but Quenſtedt (32) names him Trancowitzium.

[H] Spondanus has committed a great fault ſpeaking of the Centuries of Magdeburg.] He ſays that they began to be publiſhed in the year 1560, and that the fourth tome was the firſt that came out (33). This is very falſe; for the three firſt centuries were printed before the fourth. The catalogue of the library of Francfort publiſhed in the year 1604, by Becman (34), mentions the year 1559, for the time of the publiſhing of the three firſt centuries, and the year 1560, for the publiſhing of the fourth. Draudius (35) places likewiſe the edition of the three firſt in 1559. Mr Sagittarius ſays, that according to his copy, the three firſt centuries were printed in 1562, the fourth in 1560, the fifth and ſixth in 1562, the ſeventh and eighth in 1564, the ninth in 1565, the tenth and eleventh in 1567, the twelfth in 1569, and the thirteenth, which is alſo the laſt, in 1574. It is very probable that Spondanus's edition was like that of Mr Sagittarius, that is, that neither of them had the firſt edition of the three firſt centuries: but this does not excuſe Spondanus, for if he had read the preface of the firſt, he would have ſeen that the centuriators complain of a ſatire, in which their work was ill ſpoken of, though nothing had been publiſhed of what they had written. ‘ De ſumptibus vere profitemur, ſay they, nos pauciſſimos habere, qui annuatim aliquid conferunt: nec pro laborum conditione operarii ſatis ſuſtentantur, ſicut ipſimet optimi teſtes ſunt: imo niſi Deus nobis quoſdam Mecœnates adhuc excitarit (quod tamen ne

‘ fiat

(i) In the remark [H].

(21) Spondanus, ubi ſupra, pag. m. 602. Poſſev. Apparat Sacr. Tom. I, & alii paſſim, as Mr Baillet ſays in his quotations, affirm the ſame thing. He affirms it likewiſe in his Jugem. des Sçavans, Tom. I, pag. 537, 538.

(22) This is falſe. See, below, citat. (59).

(23) See Joh. Albertus Faber, Decade in Decadum, n. 96.

(24) Idem. ibid.

(25) Keckerm, de Natura & Proprietat. Hiſt. in Auctario, cap. i, pag m. 151.

(26) He lived in the IXth century.

(27) See the Acta Eruditorum of Leipſic, 1691, pag. 295, in the Extract of a book of archbiſhop Uſher, intituled, Hiſtoria dogmatica controverſiæ de ſcripturis & ſacris vernaculis.

(28) Apud Act. Lipſienſ. ibid.

(29) His Epitome Chronicorum Mundi was printed in 1532. See Geſner's Bibliotheque.

(30) Biblioth. choiſie, pag. 15.

(31) Biblioth. Vet. & Nova, pag. 306.

(32) De Patriis Illuſtr. pag. 262.

(33) Spondan. ad ann. 1560, n. 31, pag. 601.

(34) See Caſpar Sagittarius, Introduct. in Hiſtor. Eccleſiaſt. pag. 279.

(35) Ibid.

of thoſe centuries. Varillas, who has faithfully tranſcribed this fault of Spondanus has added ſo many others to it [I], that it is hard to conceive how a man of wit could be guilty ‘fiat, multi invidi ſtrenue laborant) neque progredi ſatis expedite poterimus: neque forte totum Opus, ut eſt inſtitutum, abſolvere. Impudens igitur, planeque diabolicum eſt mendacium, & criminatio tetra iſtius ſcurræ, qui nuper in maledico & famoſo ſcripto, ſine nomine edito (ubi tamen aliam ſaltat fabulam) Sardonio riſu, & virulento ſarcaſmo noſtrum opus hiſtoricum Aureum appellat: eo quod ex multo auro Germanico ſit conflatum. Non vidit ſceleratus iſte ſcurra Opus, & tamen non veretur canino, aut viperino potius dente arrodere. Deinde non habet cognitas rationes noſtras iſte conviciator ac criminator: & tamen ut Semei, nos ſalſe irridet, ac mentitur ſplendide. Nam quam pauci, & quam parce dent, quam frugaliter alantur hujus inſtituti operarii, poterat iſte irriſor explorare, non à profugis, ſceleratis, pollutis, mendacibus, quibus gubernationis noſtræ ratio ne nota quidem eſt, ſed à nobis ipſis. —— As to the expences, we truly declare that we have few who contribute any thing to them yearly, nor are thoſe concerned in the work rewarded in a manner adequate to their labour, as they themſelves can teſtify; nay unleſs God raiſe up to us ſome patrons (which yet many envious perſons labour earneſtly to prevent), we can neither proceed expeditiouſly enough, nor perhaps finiſh the whole after the manner at firſt intended. Impudent therefore, and plainly diabolical is that falſe charge and black imputation of the buffoon, who in a late lying and ſcandalous writing, without the name of it's author (wherein he advances a new tale) calls with a cruel ſneer, and a ſarcaſm full of venom, this hiſtorical work of ours Golden, as if it were collected with great expence of German gold: this villainous libeller never ſaw our work, and yet he attacks it with a dog's, or rather with a viper's tooth. Beſides, this railer, this accuſer of ours, knows nothing of our affairs, and yet, like Shimei, falſely mocks us, and lies moſt glaringly. For how few and how ſparingly they give, and with what frugality, ſuch as have any hand in this work are maintained, this defamer might have known, not from runaways, villains, infamous fellows, liars, who know nothing of our manner of proceeding from ourſelves.’ This long paſſage may ſerve to two purpoſes; for beſides that it is an argument againſt the falſe date of the centuries, it informs us, what account ought to be made of theſe words of Spondanus: ‘Quod opus vocatum eſt ab aliis Evangelicis Aureum, non quidem in laudem, ſed ironice, propterea quod multo principum quorundam Germaniæ, & civitatum auro, oſtiatim emendicato, ſit editum. —— Which work has been called by ſome of the Evangelics themſelves Golden, not by way of praiſe but ironically, becauſe the publication thereof coſt the princes and cities of Germany conſiderable ſums of gold, which were for that purpoſe collected from door to door.’ He ſays, that the other Proteſtants called theſe centuries a golden work, by way of ridicule, and to ſignify that it had been compiled at the expence of the German princes; but theſe Proteſtants dwindle into an anonymous author, who publiſhed a piece under the falſe name of the ſtudents of Wittemberg (36). See in Mr Sagittarius (37) ſeveral extracts of the Epiſtles Dedicatory of the centuries, deſigned to ſhew that it was not without reaſon that Illyricus, Wigandus, Judex, Faber, and the other aſſiſtants in that undertaking, demand the encouragement of the public. Note, that the third century was enlarged, when it was reprinted at Baſil (38). Acceſſerunt caſtigationes & additiones locorum aliquot in prima editione depravatorum vel omiſſorum (39). Obſerve alſo, that the four firſt centuries, and part of the fifth, were compoſed at Magdeburg; that the fifth was compleated at Jena; that the ſixth was compoſed in the place where Illyricus, Wigandus, and Judex were in exile; that the ſeventh was written in the country of Mecklenburg, and the reſt in the town of Wiſmar, in the ſame country (40).

I had written all this, before I found a copy of the firſt editions of thoſe centuries; for the edition of Baſil 1624, in three volumes in folio, procured by Lewis Lucius, being more eſteemed than any other, every body will have it, and ſo it is hard to find the others in private libraries. At laſt, I have been able to conſult the edition, which the centuriators cauſed to be made at Baſil, by Oporinus; but becauſe the copy of the three firſt centuries, which was lent me, has been bound more than once, I could not find in it the date of the impreſſion. I imagine that the laſt leaf was torn off before the laſt binding, and it was probably in that leaf, that Oporinus placed the date 1559 (41). However, this copy of the three firſt centuries is in Italic characters, and has no additions nor corrections. But we have ſeen that the edition which Sagittarius made uſe of, which is that of 1562, contains ſome additions and corrections. It is not therefore the firſt, nor that which I have at preſent in my hands. Note, that the copy of the fourth century, printed by Oporinus, in 1560, is in Roman characters.

[I] Varillas . . . has added to this fault of Spondanus many others.] Melanchthon, ſays he (42), was ſcarce dead, when the centuriators of Magdeburg began to publiſh their work on Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory with the fourth volume. This is his firſt fault. This volume, continues he, is indeed the beſt of the thirteen, in the opinion of the Lutherans, or the moſt tolerable according to the Catholics. I challenge him to prove that (43). There were at firſt but four miniſters of Magdeburg concerned in it, Matthias Flacius, John Wigandus, Matthew Judex, and Baſil Faber; but afterwards the moſt learned Lutherans put their hand to it, though we only know the names of four others; viz, Nicolas Gal, Celeſtin Hutten, Gaſpar Nidpruc, counſellor of ſtate to the emperor, and Baptiſt Hoincel (44). Conſult Mr Sagittarius, and he will inform you (45) that Andrew Corvin, Thomas Holthuter, Pancratius Veltbeck, Nicolas Amſdorf, Nicolas Gallus, Martin Copus, Ebeling Almannus, Ambroſe Hidfeld, David Cicelerus, Gaſpar Leunculus, William Radenſis, Nicolas Beumeller, Bernard Niger, Peter Schrader, and Conrad Agrius had a ſhare in this work. So that Varillas names three perſons, who do not appear in this liſt, and falſly ſuppoſes, that we only know the names of eight centuriators. I have ſeen indeed in Mr Sagittarius, the names of John Baptiſt Heinzelius and Gaſpar Nidpruc, counſellor to the emperor; but he does not ſay, that theſe two perſons had a hand in the centuries, but only that they countenanced Mark Wagner, who went from library to library, in queſt of materials (46). This Wagner did great ſervice to the centuriators: he viſited the libraries of Germany and Denmark, and that of Edinburg in Scotland, &c. He had a very particular talent for this ſort of enquiries, and they gave him a very glorious teſtimonial, in which they acknowledged his faithfulneſs, diligence and exactneſs (47). This teſtimonial was dated the thirtieth of September 1557, and imports, amongſt other things, that he had made ſeveral journies with Illyricus, to collect materials (48), and that having ſhewn his capacity, he was thought able to continue his travels alone, and that they had committed that truſt to him with letters of recommendation, wherein they deſired learned and pious perſons to communicate to him ſuch manuſcripts and monuments, as he could draw any advantage from. Illyricus, was one of thoſe who ſigned this teſtimonial. Varillas affirms, that the authors of the other ſects, ſprung from that of Luther, criticiſed the centuries ſeveral ways, and publiſhed ſeveral extracts of the errors, which they pretended had crept into them. No body, that I know of, has mentioned thoſe extracts. Varillas would have been very much puzzled, had he been obliged to give proofs of what he ſaid. Conrad Brunus, whoſe invective againſt the centuries was confuted by Illyricus in 1566, was a Roman Catholic. Eiſengreinius, who wrote againſt them, was ſo too. Let us ſee ſome other faults of Varillas. Illyricus, ſays he (49), undertook the year following 1561, in Thuringia, in the town of Weimar, a public diſputation againſt the famous Victorinus Spingel. He is miſtaken, both as to the time of this diſpute (50), and the name of Illyricus's antagoniſt (51). The Catholics obſerved, that more Hereſies had ſprung from that of Luther in leſs than fifty years, than there had ever been from our Saviour's time to Luther (52). This hyperbole, which he took from Spondanus, but not without leſſening it, is very childiſh. Et videas hinc etiam quam fecundus fuerit Lutherus, qui plures protulerit peſtiferarum hæreſum auctores, quam ab orbis ortu fuerint ante in univerſo mundo (53). You will find in Moreri, that the liſt of the principle Heretics from the firſt century to Luther amounts guilty of ſo many blunders. I muſt not forget to ſay, that the Clavis ſacræ Scripturæ is one of Illyricus's beſt books. See what Mr Simon ſays of it in his Critical Hiſtory of the Old

---

(36) See Sagittarius, ubi ſupra, pag. 256, & 266.

(37) Ibid. pag. 260, & ſeq.

(38) In the year 1562, if I am not miſtaken.

(39) Sagittar. ubi ſupra, pag. 259.

(40) Id. ibid. pag. 245.

(41) Mr Hill, miniſter of the Engliſh church of Rotterdam, who has a fine library, and a great knowledge of books, has aſſured me that the firſt centuries were printed in that year.

(42) Varillas, Hiſt. de l'Hereſ. livr. xxiv, pag. m. 229, ad ann. 1561.

(43) Id. ibid.

(44) Spondanus, ad Ann 1560, n. 32, pag. 602, calls him Joannem Baptiſtam Hencelum.

(45) Sagitt. ubi ſupra, pag. 247, 248, 249.

(46) Id ibid. pag. 252, 255. Note, that Melchior Adam, in Vit. Theol. pag. 474, ſays, that Gaſpar Nidpruck and John Baptiſt Hencelius helped Flacius and his colleagues.

(47) Ibid. pag. 253, 254.

(48) Cum D. Illyrico aliquot monaſteria perluſtraſſe, & cum ipſo nulla alia de cauſa peregrinatum fuiſſe, quam ut pium hunc conatum pro ſua tenuitate juvaret. Ibid. pag. 254.

(49) Varillas, Hiſt. de l'Hereſ. livr. xxiv, pag. 231, 232.

(50) See the remark [C].

(51) His name Strigelius, and not Spingel.

(52) Varillas, ubi ſupra, pag. 232, 233.

(53) Spondan. ubi ſupra.

mounts to 183. Whereas we can ſcarce find ten or twelve ſchiſms in the firſt fifty years of Lutheraniſm. Varillas goes on (54). ‘It was probably with a deſign to eſcape for ſome time the perſecution which Flacius expected from his friends, becauſe of his outrage at Weimar, that he diſguiſed himſelf, and went incognito into all the libraries of the German monaſteries: he took the moſt ſcarce books * he could ſteal, and made extracts of others. The author of his life ſays, that he did it in emulation of Trithemius, and to compoſe like him, a collection of thoſe who had written books. But the thing will not appear probable to one, that will be at the pains to compare thoſe two works together, ſince they are in nothing alike. That of Trithemius, is properly ſpeaking, a table of eccleſiaſtical authors, and of books compoſed by them; whereas that of Flacius is a collection of paſſages, which ſeem to be contrary to the Catholic religion, and to favour the rigid Lutherans.’ There are many faults in theſe words; for in the firſt place, Illyricus viſited the libraries before the year 1560. He did it to collect materials for his Catalogus Teſtium Veritatis. Melchior Adam, the only author cited by Spondanus and Varillas, declares it in expreſs words. Now that catalogue was printed in the year 1556 (55). Therefore, &c. In the ſecond place it is falſe, that Melchior Adam ſays, that Illyricus undertook ſuch a work in imitation of Trithemius, and to compoſe like him, a collection of thoſe who had written books. If Melchior Adam had ſaid ſo, he would have been very much miſtaken, and conſequently Spondanus (56) would have ſaid a thing which is really falſe. See in the remark [E] how the reading of Trithemius's book contributed to Illyricus's deſign. In the third place, Varillas ſpeaks of Trithemius's book, and of that of Illyricus, in ſuch a manner, as plainly ſhews that he knew neither of them; for Trithemius does not confine himſelf to Eccleſiaſtical Authors, nor the other to the paſſages that ſeem to countenance rigid Lutheraniſm. Varillas ſuppoſes that Illyricus's jealouſy of William Eiſingrem, a Catholic divine, who had wrote a book, intituled, The Catalogue of thoſe, who have given teſtimony to the truth, determined him to undertake the ſame taſk for his Sect (57). It is juſt the contrary, as we have ſeen above (58). Laſtly, Varillas charges him with publiſhing this book, without putting his name to it, either becauſe he would no longer quarrel with the other ſects, who he knew would not like it, or becauſe he ſuppoſed it would be well enough known in the world, that he was the author of the book, though he did not name himſelf (59). All chimeras! He put his name to that bock, and had no reaſon to fear, that the other Proteſtants would diſapprove his compilation.

There is another thing, which deſerves to be cenſured: it concerns the Epiſtle Dedicatory to queen Elizabeth. Varillas (60) affirms, ‘that it gave more vexation than honour to that princeſs, and that there are few examples of ſo extravagant a miſs-timing, in the hiſtory of men of letters, though they are otherwiſe accuſed of not being always the beſt bred. The centuriators, who ſigned the Epiſtle Dedicatory, could not be ignorant of a thing ſo notorious, that Elizabeth was a Calviniſt in her doctrine, though ſhe was a Lutheran, as to the diſcipline; and yet they inſerted in the ſame epiſtle, by which they courted this queen's protection, a ſatire againſt the Calviniſts. They accuſed them of rendering, as much as in them lay, the Teſtament of JESUS CHRIST uſeleſe, by reaſons borrowed from Philoſophy; of rejecting the real preſence, and communion of the body and blood of that holy Saviour, againſt his own words, though moſt perſpicuous; and of endeavouring to dazzle thoſe, who read the goſpel, by confounding with ſubtle and ſtudied interpretations, the natural ſenſe of abundance of paſſages, ſo evident of themſelves, as to need no explanation. They proved afterwards unanſwerably in this volume, and the twelve following, that the church had always believed that preſence; and whoever will be at the pains of reading them, will eaſily obſerve, that though thoſe who paid them for their labour, had deſired them to write with leſs nicety and more moderation upon that point, that they might not oppoſe the accommodation, which was then negotiating afreſh betwixt the Lutherans and Zuinglians; they had ſo little complaiſance for their Mæcenas's, that they treated no point with greater vehemence and heat than that.’ Theſe things were all forged in the brains of that hiſtorian. He has added this romance of his own invention, to an incident remark of Spondanus, and it is very certain, he ſaid this without any authority for it, and without having read the Epiſtle Dedicatory, which he cenſured. There was no incivility, or imprudence, in the conduct of the centuriators. They did not as yet know, how the queen of England would determine herſelf; they only knew that ſhe laboured to eſtabliſh a good form of religion. They praiſed her, and congratulated her for it, and powerfully exhorted her to apply herſelf to it, by a total ſuppreſſion of the evils, which the followers of Antichriſt had brought in. ‘Ad te igitur nunc Regina potentiſſima & ſereniſſima, convertimur. Audimus enim, te poſt accepta Regia ſceptra, etiam de præcipuo fine ac munere tui officii, ſocietatis ac vitæ totius omnium ſubditorum tuorum cogitare. Itaque non tantum lætis acclamationibus Regiæ tuæ dignitati gratulamur: ſed toto etiam pectore patrem Domini noſtri JESU CHRISTI invocamus, ac rogamus, ut . . . . Sed quia non ſatis eſt bene cœpiſſe, hortamur etiam te, illuſtriſſima & potentiſſima Regina, ut totis viribus in id opus incumbas, ut Religio pura, integra, inviolata in toto regno tuo inſtauretur, omnibus Antichriſti crudelitatibus, vulneribus, peſtibus, ac carcinomatis rectè curatis, atque ſublatis. Debes enim hunc honorem Deo conditori ac redemptori tuo, debes tibi ipſi, debes ſubditis tuis (16). —— To you therefore, moſt potent and moſt ſerene queen, we now turn ourſelves, for we hear that no ſooner you received the royal ſcepter, than you applied yourſelf to the great end of your high office, the taking care of all your ſubjects. We therefore think it not enough with joyful acclamations to congratulate your acceſſion to the royal dignity, but we alſo invoke, with all our hearts, the father of our Lord JESUS CHRIST, and beſeech, that . . . . But becauſe it is not enough to have begun well, we exhort you, moſt illuſtrious and moſt powerful queen, that you endeavour, with your utmoſt force, to eſtabliſh in your dominions the pure, ſound, and undefiled religion; all the cruelties, wounds, plagues, and cankers of Antichriſt, being thoroughly cured, and taken away. For this honour, you owe to God your creator and redeemer, to yourſelf, and likewiſe to your ſubjects.’ It was not improper that the divines of the confeſſion of Augsburg ſhould add to this a word of advice about the doctrine of the real preſence; which they did in this manner (62): ‘Illud verò etiam non prætereundum eſt, cum jam variæ paſſim graſſentur quaſi factiones opinionum, inter quas aliqui etiam teſtamentum Domini planè philoſophicis rationibus ita evacuant, ut corpus & ſanguinem Chriſti, quod ad præſentiam & communicationem, juxta clariſſima, evidentiſſima, veraciſſima & potentiſſima verba ipſius CHRISTI, prorſus removeant, miraque verborum perplexitate fucum faciant: in primis videndum tibi eſt, ut & articuli fidei ſine phariſaico fermento, & Sacramenta à Chriſto inſtituta citra omnem adulterationem inſtaurentur: id quod te facturam eſſe, omnes pii ſperant, ſummiſque votis à te contendunt. —— But moreover we ought not to paſs by, that at this time there rages various factions in opinion, among which ſome there are which quite make void the Teſtament of our Lord, by philoſophical reaſons, whereby they remove the body and blood of CHRIST, as to that preſence and communication, which is clearly, truly, and moſt evidently taught in the moſt expreſs words of CHRIST himſelf, impoſing on us by a wonderful perplexity of words, that you may reſtore this article of faith free from phariſaical leaven, and as it was inſtituted by CHRIST without any adulteration is what you ought to perform: what the faithful hope from you, and what with the moſt ardent wiſhes, they expect and deſire.’ When Varillas ſuppoſes that they could not be ignorant of ſo notorious a thing, as queen Elizabeth's being a Calviniſt in her opinions, he betrays his own ignorance; he does not conſider, that they wrote their Epiſtle Dedicatory, at a time, in which it was not yet known upon (54) Varil. ubi ſupra, pag. 233.

---

* In Flacius's Life.

(55) See Joh. Albertus Faber, in Decade Decadum, n. 96.

(56) Nec vero tam illud æmulatione Trithemii . . . ſuum concinnaſſe putamus, quam, &c Spondan. ad ann. 1560, pag. 602.

(57) Varillas, ubi ſupra, pag. 233.

(58) In the remark [E].

(59) Varillas, ubi ſupra, pag. 234.

(60) Ibid. pag. 230.

(61) Epiſt. Dedicat. Centur. IV, Magdeb. pag. 8.

(62) Ibid. pag. 9.

Old Teſtament (k). See likewiſe John Albert Faber, in the XCVIth article of his Decas Decadum.

[k] In the thirteenth chapter of the third book, pag 428, & ſeq. of the Rotterdam edition, 1685.

on what foot the Engliſh Reformation would be eſtabliſhed. I know indeed, that their volume bears the date of the year 1560, and that queen Elizabeth's Reformation was eſtabliſhed in 1559. But every body knows, that the bookſellers put the date of the year following to the books that come out towards the end of Auguſt. I believe therefore, that this Epiſtle Dedicatory, which has no date, was ſent in 1559 to Oporinus, the Bookſeller of Baſil, before it was known in Germany, what eccleſiaſtical regulations queen Elizabeth had made: however, it could not appear at that time, that this princeſs had declared for Calviniſm with reſpect to the real preſence. Read theſe words of Dr Burnet: ‘ Some Proteſtant divines were ‘ named, to reviſe the Luturgy of Edward. The only ‘ conſiderable change they made in it, was in the ‘ article of the Euchariſt. The deſign was to prepare ‘ an office for the communion, whoſe expreſſions ‘ ſhould be ſo well contrived, that, by avoiding the ‘ condemnation of the corporeal preſence, all the En- ‘ gliſh might be united in one and the ſame church; ‘ moſt people were imbued with that doctrine. So ‘ the queen charged the divines to ſay nothing that ‘ might abſolutely condemn it, but to leave it unde- ‘ cided, as a ſpeculative opinion, which every one was ‘ at liberty to embrace or reject, To this end, they ‘ left out of Edward's Liturgy, the rubric, which ex- ‘ plained for what reaſons the church of England or- ‘ dained, &c (63).’

(63) Burnet's Hiſtory of the Reformation of England, ad ann. 1559.

INCHOFER (Melchior) a German Jeſuit, born at Vienna in the year 1584, was admitted into the ſociety at Rome in 1607. He had already ſignalized himſelf in the ſtudy of the Civil-Law. He taught Philoſophy, Mathematics and Divinity, a long time at Meſſina; and there publiſhed a book in 1630, which brought him into trouble [A]. He was obliged to go to Rome to anſwer the complaints that were made againſt him in the congregation of the Index. His judges were well ſatisfied with the reaſons he alledged in his juſtification, and only enjoyned him to change the title of the book, and to explain ſome things more at large. This he did in a ſecond edition. He lived many years at Rome, and at laſt died at Milan the twenty eighth of September 1648 (a). Beſides the works we have of his [B], which ſhew he had a great deal of learning, he intended to publiſh ſeveral others (b), which would have ſhewn the great extent of his knowledge, if death had not prevented it. He is thought to be the author of a ſatire againſt the Jeſuits, intituled Monarchia Solipſorum [C]. He was not pleaſed with them (c).

(a) Taken from Nathaniel Southwell, Biblioth. Scriptor. Societ. pag. 608.

(b) See the titles of them in Nathan. Southwell, ibid.

(c) It appears ſo from theſe words of his preface: Illud conſtat niſi inter ſolipſos rubiginaſſ t, & copia & ſplendore inter ſummates literarum viros fuiſſe radiaturum.

[A] He publiſhed a book .... which brought him into trouble.] The title of it is, Epiſtolæ B. Mariæ virginis ad Meſſanenſes veritas vindicata, (A letter from the bleſſed virgin Mary, to the inhabitants of Meſſina) in Folio. The congregation of the Index having heard Father Inchofer's reaſons, gave him leave to reprint that work, with this title, Conjectatio ad Epiſtolam Beatiſſimæ Mariæ Virginis ad Meſſanenſes. This ſecond edition was made at Viterbo, in the year 1633. He obtained leave to ſtrike out, and to add what he ſhould think fit. S. Congregatio non ſolum permiſit eidem dictum opus de novo edere, mutato tamen juſtis de cauſis titulo in hunc modum, Conjectatio, &c. & quibuſdam magis explicatis ..... ſed etiam demendi & addendi ſi quæ viderentur, liberam & amplam facultatem permiſit (1). The meaning of it is, that provided it be not affirmed in too poſitive a manner, that the holy Virgin wrote to the inhabitants of Meſſina the letter that goes under her name, one may be allowed to believe it, and to perſuade others of the truth of it. A German writer (2) obſerves, that Baronius and Theoplius Raynaud are not of Inchofer's opinion concerning this letter. I will not diſpute it as to Baronius; for tho' that annaliſt does not ſpeak particularly of the pretended letter received by the inhabitants of Meſſina, he declares in general, that all the letters the holy Virgin is ſaid to have written to ſome towns, ought to be reckoned apocryphal. Traduntur & aliæ ab ipſa ad alias ſcriptæ civitates, quas cunctas cum careant Eccleſiæ auctoritate, nonniſi in Apocryphorum claſſem rejiciendas eſſe omnes facile judicabunt (3). But as for Theophilus Raynaud, he ought not to be cited upon this ſubject; for he only ſpeaks of the letter, which it is ſaid the holy Virgin wrote to St Ignatius, and of his pretended anſwers (4). The German author is not more happy in quoting Rivetus (5), who without making any mention of the letter of Meſſina, is contented to reject the ſtory of the epiſtolary correſpondence between the holy Virgin and Ignatius.

(1) Nath. Sotuel. Bibliot. Script. Societat. pag. 608.

(2) Placcius de Pſeudonymis Jo. Rhodii, n. 59, pag. 44.

(3) Baronius, ad ad ann. 48, n. 25.

(4) Theophil. Raynaudus de Malis & Bonis libris, n. 235, pag. m. 148.

(5) In Critico Sacro, lib. ii, capp. primis.

[B] The works we have of his.] I no not repeat what concerns his book relating to the pretended letter of the holy Virgin to the inhabitants of Meſſina. His other writings are, Tractatus Syllepticus in quo quid de terræ ſoliſque motu vel ſtatione ſecundum ſacram ſcripturam & SS. Patres ſentiendum, quave certitudine alterutra ſententia tenenda ſit, oſtenditur, Rome 1633, in 4*to*. De ſacra Latinitate, hoc eſt de variis linguæ Latinæ myſteriis, ex origine, progreſſu, fine, cæteraque inſtituti ſui ratione ad Evangelii prædicationem, Latinæ Eccleſiæ exaltationem, Romanique Imperii magiſtatem ſpectantibus, Meſſino, 1635, in 4*to*, and Munich, 1638, in 8*vo*. Hiſtoria trium Magorum, Rome, 1639. Annalium Eccleſiaſticorum Regni Hungariæ, Tomus I. Rome, 1644, in Folio. The funeral Oration of Nicolas Ricardi, a Dominican, maſter of the ſacred palace. He publiſhed ſome other books, to which he did not put his name (6).

(6) Alia quædam ipſius prodierunt ſub alienis nominibus R. P. E. L. &c. & ſub nomine Academici Vertumnii, adjectum prælectionibus Joannis Baptiſtæ Corteſii poëma in laudem Medicinæ, & contra malos Medicos. Sotuel, ubi ſupra.

[C] Intituled Monarchia Solipſorum.] The author of this ſatire (§ α) calls himſelf Lucius Cornelius Europæus. It was printed in in Holland, 1648, juxta exemplar Venetum, as the title imports; there is added to it a key to the ſeigned names. The edition of Venice 1651, aſcribes this work to Melchior Inchofer (7). Chriſtopher Pellerus, mentioning this conjecture, ſays likewiſe, that this German Jeſuit went to Rome after his writing this book, and returned no more. Monarchia Solipſorum quam perhibent ſcripſiſſe quempiam patrem ex Societate N, Inckhoferum Germanum, poſtea Romam profectum nunquam reverſum (8). He is miſtaken as to that journey to Rome, for Inchofer had quitted Germany long before he wrote that ſatire. He did not write it till after he had bore many diſcontents in the order, the habit whereof he took at Rome, at twenty three years of age. This paſſage of Pellerus has occaſioned Konig (9) to make two authors of one. He ſpeaks of Melchior Inchofer, and Nicolas Inchofer. He ſays of the firſt, part of what Alegambe ſays of him, and aſcribes the Monarchia Solipſorum to the other. He cites Chriſtopher Pellerus, but he makes him ſay more than he ſays, viz. that this piece was compoſed in 1648. Pellerus does not ſay ſo. If Konig had obſerved, that for want of knowledge of a man's Chriſtian name, an N. is put inſtead of it, he would not have forged a pretended Nicholas Inckhofferus upon Chriſtopher Pellerus's authority. He obſerves, that others aſcribe this work to Scioppius. It is certain, that Ottor Tabor, a German civilian, believed Scioppius might be the author of it; but he has not affirmed it. ‘ Lucius Cornelius ‘ Europæus, ſays he (10), ſive is ſit Gaſper Scioppius, ‘ ſive quis alius ex genere Scriptorum ſatyricorum, ‘ in Monarchia quam dicit Solipſorum Leoni Alla- ‘ tio dedicata, &c. ——— Lucius Cornelius Europæ- ‘ us, whether he be Gaſper Scioppius, or whoever ‘ elſe of the claſs of ſatiric writers, in his Monarchy ‘ (as he calls it) of the Solipſians, dedicated to Leo ‘ Allatius, &c.’ Deckherus (11) neither rejecting Pellerus's

[(§ α) It was tranſlated into French, and printed at Amſterdam, in 1722, in 12mo. The tranſlator has added ſome remarks, and ſome other pieces. The preface contains ſeveral particulars concerning that work, and it's author. Rem. Crit.]

(7) Vide Placcium in Rhodianis, n. 59, pag. 43.

(8) Chriſtoph. Pellerus in Politico ſcelerato impugnato, pag. 9, Edit. 1665.

(9) Bibl. Vet. & Nova, pag. 417.

(10) Otto Tabor, in præfat ad Diſputationes de Confrontatione apud Placcium in Rhodianis, pag. 43.

(11) De Scriptis Adeſpotis, pag 95, Edit. 1686.

Pellerus's (12) nor Tabor's conjecture, propoſes another without any foundation. He believes, that Gabriel Bariacus Lermæus, a gentleman of Languedoc, might be the author of the Monarchia Solipſorum. I ſhall ſet down two paſſages of Mr Arnauld, one of which will ſolve our doubts, and the other teach us Inchofer's deſign, and the meaning of the word Solipſi. 'The Monarchia Solipſorum, ſays Mr Arnold (13), ſhould be Scioppius's work, becauſe it 'was printed in Germany, with ſome books that 'are undoubtedly that author's. And yet IT IS CERTAIN that this Monarchia Solipſorum is the work of 'a German Jeſuit, called Melchior Inchofer. And 'we know where there is an original letter of a 'Spaniſh Jeſuit, who acknowledges it, and makes 'great complaints of it.' The other paſſage is this (14). 'It is well known, (ſays Mr Arnauld, ſpeaking to the Jeſuits) that it is your character to be 'zealous to do good, provided you can do it alone, 'and that no body may ſhare the glory of it with 'you; and if you would be ſincere, you would confeſs, that one of your ſociety, who wrote the Monarchia Solipſorum, knew you very well.' See the Theſes of Gisbert Voetius (15).

There was handed about a pretended letter of Innocent XII to the emperor, in the year 1696, in which the Pope calls the ſociety of the Jeſuits Monarchiam Monopanthorum. Upon which Father Papebroch made this reflexion: Forſitan quaſi μόνοι πάντα ſoli omnia velint eſſe & æſtimari Jeſuitæ, ſcilicet alludendo ad vetus ſcomma ſatyrici cujuſdam commenti quo ſcripſit anonymus aliquis Monarchiam Solipſorum, veluti innuere volens quod Societas ſoli ſibi arrogare nitatur omnia (16).

(12) There is Pecler in Deckherus's edition of 1686.

(13) Morale Pratique, Tom. III, pag. 686.

(14) Ib. pag. 86.

(15) Vol. III, pag. 685, 686.

(16) Papebroch. Elucid. Hiſtor. Actor. in controverſia Carmelitica, cap. x, pag. 138.

INNOCENT VIII, created Pope in the year 1484, was of Genoa, and his name was John Baptiſt Cibo. Authors are not agreed about the illuſtriouſneſs or the obſcurity of his family [A]; but it is acknowledged that he was ſent to the court of Naples in his youth, and that he ſerved king Alphonſo. He was afterwards one of cardinal Bologna's domeſtics at Rome, which I think was of ſome uſe to him, in order to be promoted to the biſhopric of Savona (a). Pope Sixtus IV, who was much his friend, beſtowed on him the biſhopric of Melfi, and afterwards a cardinal's cap. One of the firſt actions of Innocent VIII, after his advancement to the pontificate, was to conſpire with the grandees of the kingdom, againſt Ferdinand king of Naples; he ſent for Robert Sanſeverino to give him the command of the troops in the expedition againſt that king; but being not ſatisfied with the conduct of this general, he turned him out of that poſt, and made peace with Ferdinand. The conditions of the treaty were, that the king of Naples ſhould pardon the rebels, and pay to the holy ſee the tribute that he owed: he performed neither the one nor the other, and fruſtrated the Pope's deſigns, who endeavoured to revenge that infraction [B]. Afterwards Innocent VIII thought no more of war, and applied himſelf to make Rome enjoy the fruits of peace [C]. He procured there a great plenty and cheapneſs of proviſions, and cauſed robbers to be ſeverely puniſhed. He created new offices, the ſale whereof brought him a great deal of money, and he was the firſt

(a) You will find in Moreri, that he was promoted to it by Paul II.

[A] Authors are not agreed about the illuſtriouſneſs or the obſcurity of his family.] We ſhall ſee below (1), that, according to Volaterranus, he had been a poor boy. Onuphrius Panvinius affirms the ſame thing in one of his books (2), and makes him of a middling family, and the ſon of a Phyſician; but he ſpeaks otherwiſe in another work (3), wherein he ſets forth the antiquity and nobleneſs of the houſe of Cibo, and makes him the ſon of Aaron Cibo, a noble Genoeſe, illuſtrious for his military actions, governor of Naples, under king Renatus and king Alphonſo, and famous for having glorioully diſcharged the office of a Roman ſenator (4). It is conjectured (5), that Panvinius corrected his firſt account upon reading the funeral Oration of Innocent VIII, made by Leonelli, biſhop of Concordia, who forgot not to ſpeak of the nobility and employments of Aaron Cibo. It is ſomewhat ſtrange, that ſo learned an hiſtorian as Panvinius was, and a Monk beſides, who flouriſhed a little after this Pope, ſhould have been ignorant of the merit, and the great employments of Innocent VIII's father, and ſhould rather have known him under the falſe title of a Phyſician, than under the glorious character of a noble Genoeſe, governor of Naples, and ſenator of Rome. Many people will believe, that in his retractation, he leſs followed the truth than the notions of the preacher, who made this Pope's funeral oration, a ſort of diſcourſe which allows of an open flattery. Every one may think of it as he pleaſes; but we muſt remember, that it is a common thing to debaſe the firſt condition of ſuch as riſe to the higheſt poſts (6).

[B] Ferdinand .... fruſtrated the Pope's deſigns, who endeavoured to revenge that infraction.] The author who ſupplies me with this article, does not ſay that Innocent VIII excommunicated king Ferdinand; he only obſerves that the Pope's deputies returned without doing any thing: 'Quorum neutrum Ferdinandus 'quum poſtea minime præſtaret, miſſus Petrus Vincentinus cameræ auditor audaciſſimus, una ſimul cum 'Jacobo Volaterrano ſecretario apoſtolico ac cubiculario viro prudente ad res repetendas re infecta revertit (7). ——— When afterwards Ferdinand performed neither the one nor the other, Peter Vincentin, Camerlengo, a perſon of great boldneſs, with 'James Volaterran, apoſtolic ſecretary, and a very prudent man, was ſent to demand reſtitution, but they 'returned without having been able to effect any thing.' To ſupply this omiſſion, I ſhall ſet down the words of Coeffeteau. 'Ferdinand not obſerving the treaty 'he had made with him, the Pope demanded the tribute he owed to the church; upon which Ferdinand having but ill ſatisfied his embaſſadors, Innocent thundred againſt him, deprived him of the kingdom, and declared Charles, King of France, the 'lawful heir of it, who had the right of Renatus, 'king of Sicily, and of his brother the count Du 'Maine (8).'

[C] He thought no more of war, and applied himſelf to make Rome enjoy the fruits of peace.] We ſhall ſee how difficult it is to exerciſe the papacy; for if the Popes are blamed for meddling with the politic affairs of Europe, they are alſo blamed when they do not concern themſelves with them, and it is then ſaid that they are uſeleſs to the public good. Guicciardin gives us this idea of Innocent VIII. It is true, he adds ſomething that ſoftens his cenſure; for he obſerves, that the indolence this Pope fell into, produced this advantage, that no body feared his giving any diſturbance to Italy. This matter of fact is to be found in the following words, with a parentheſis of a Proteſtant divine. 'Guicciardin deſcribes Innocent 'VIII in theſe words, that his life in other reſpects 'uſeleſs to the public good (an excellent quality for a 'Pope) was at leaſt uſeful in this, that having ſuddenly 'laid down his arms which he had unfortunately taken 'up in the beginning of his pontificate againſt Ferdinand, at the inſtigation of ſeveral barons of the kingdom of Naples, and afterwards turned his mind to 'IDLE PLEASURES; he had neither for himſelf, nor 'for any that belonged to him, any thoughts that tended to diſturb the repoſe of Italy (9).' Thoſe who ſhall conſider the parentheſis, will perceive, that the reaſon why I quote Rivet's reply, rather than the original words of Guicdiardin, is becauſe the paſſage of Rivetus ſerves me for a proof. Would to God there were no other faults committed but ſuch as contribute to the public peace!

[D] He

(1) In the remark [E].

(2) In Commentario de Pontificibus & Cardinalibus.

(3) In Vita Innocentii VIII.

(4) See Spondanus, Ann. Eccleſ. ad ann. 1484, n. 5, pag. m. 180.

(5) Id. ibid.

(6) See the remark [A] of the article TOUCHET.

(7) Volaterranus, lib xxii, pag. 821.

(8) Coëffeteau. Reponſe au Myſtere d'Iniquité, pag. 1209.

(9) Rivet, Remarques ſur la Reſponſe au Myſtere d'Iniquité, Par. II, pag. 626, 627. What he quotes out of Guicciardin, is towards the beginning of the firſt book.

firſt Pope who gloried in having baſtards, and loaded them with wealth [D]. He was a handſome man, obliging even to exceſs; but covetous, ignorant, and of little wit [E].

He

[D] He was the firſt Pope who gloried in having baſtards, and loaded them with wealth.] Volaterranus ſpeaks of it in this manner. ‘Pontificum etiam primus, qui novum & ipſe exemplum introduceret palam liberos nothos jactandi, ac ſoluta omni antiqua diſciplina divitiis eos omnibus cumulandi (10). — He was the firſt of the Popes who introduced that new and extraordinary proceeding of owning publickly his ſpurious iſſue, and without any reſpect to the antient diſcipline, heaping upon them riches without meaſure.’ He mentions but one ſon, and one daughter of this Pope, and he ſays, that the one obtained of his father ſome towns in the neighbourhood of Rome, and the advantage of being ſon-in-law to Lawrence de Medicis, and that the daughter (11) was married with a prodigious fortune to a Genoeſe (12). Moreri has ſtumbled here; he ſays, that Innocent VIII left two rich ſons, which he had before his pontificate. This is an error both as to the ſex, and the number of theſe baſtards. They were ſixteen, eight ſons, and eight daughters; whence this epigram:

Quid quæris teſtes, ſit mas an fœmina Cibo,
  Reſpice natorum, pignora certa, gregem:
Octo nocens pueros genuit, totidemque puellas.
  Hunc merito poterit dicere Roma patrem.

Of Cibo's ſex, if you full proofs require,
  Look on the pledges he has left below,
Eight lads, eight laſſes, own him for their ſire,
  The ſtile of father well might Rome beſtow.

According to du Pleſſis (13), theſe four verſes are an epitaph upon Innocent VIII, compoſed by Marullus, but I do not find them in my edition (14) of this poet's works, and I cannot believe they were left out to pleaſe the court of Rome; for the following epitaph was left in it.

Epitap. Innocentii Octavi.
Spurcities, gula, avaritia, atque ignavia deſes
  Hoc Octave jacent quo tegeris tumulo (15).

Luſt, glutt'ny, av'rice, ſloth, beneath this ſtone,
Are with the corps of our Octavus thrown.

I find alſo the following diſtich in it:

De Xyſto & hærede.
Exhauſit Xyſtus bellis & cædibus urbem;
Tercentena hæres reſtituit ſobole (16).

By wars, by tumults, Xyſtus thinn'd the place,
His heir reſtor'd it by his numerous race.

Mr du Pleſſis ſays, that the firſt of theſe two diſtichs, is the concluſion of the epitaph, or of the four verſes firſt mentioned. I know not whether he made uſe of an edition of Marullus, different from mine, or whether he followed an unexact tranſcriber; but I make no doubt that the author of the Prejugez contre le Papiſme, advanced without any examination (17), that the elogy of Innocent VIII, was included after his death in ſix Latin verſes, which he ſets down. It is an epigram, the laſt diſtich whereof is the epitaph which is actually in Marullus's poems: the two firſt diſtichs are thoſe that are not found in my edition, either before the epitaph, or in any other place. Mr Zuinger (18), profeſſor at Baſil, ſuppoſes that theſe ſix verſes are two epigrams of Marullus: he has been however more judicious than the author of the Prejugez, having not joined what ought to be divided. As for Sannazar's epigram,

Innocuo priſcos æquum eſt debere Quirites,
  Progenie exhauſtam reſtituit patriam,

In debt to Innocent, Rome may be ſtil'd,
Whoſe loins her long exhauſted country fill'd.

He is in the right to mention it, ſince it is to be found among the verſes of this poet (19). Coëffeteau found himſelf very much perplexed in that part of his anſwer to du Pleſſis, as you will ſee. ‘Du Pleſſis, ſays he, not being able to find fault with Innocent about his lawful marriage, (for he was married before he was Pope) produces a nameleſs author, who ſays, that he was the firſt that gloried in having baſtards. And to confirm this, he produces an epitaph of Marullus, in which the poet ſpeeks only of the children which Innocent had in a lawful marriage. Now all thoſe authors are not to be credited, and the licentiouſneſs of their pen well deſerved a ſevere puniſhment, for taking the liberty to defame the head of the church. It is certain, that good hiſtorians do not accuſe Innocent VIII of any of theſe impurities, which the filthy poet Marullus taxes him with. However, we will let him enjoy the privileges of thoſe of his profeſſion (20).’ Rivet's reply will plainly ſhew the abſurdity of Coëffeteau's anſwer. The pleaſures of this Pope were not always idle, for he had a great many children. If it was in a lawful marriage, before he was an eccleſiaſtic, no body could blame him for it; and if Coëffeteau had produced good authorities for it, he had done a ſervice to his memory; but I find no body that ſays he was married. As for the author who affirms that he was the firſt Pope who introduced the new example of boaſting publickly of his baſtards; it is not an obſcure author, as the adverſary would have it, but the ſame Volaterranus, whom a little before he calls a great man, and an orthodox writer . . . . . . Coëffeteau could not but know this author; but he had a mind to diſſemble it, to fall upon the poor poet Marullus, as if he had divulged this news, calling him a filthy poet. *Let him conſult his Poſſevin, and he will teach him, that this * Marullus is in eſteem with the church of Rome for his piety, and his works have been often printed at Antwerp, Cologne, and elſewhere* (21). I find both a fault and an omiſſion in theſe words of Rivetus. The later conſiſts in not having cenſured Coëffeteau's boldneſs concerning Marullus's verſes (22). He affirms, that this poet ſpeaks only of the children which Innocent had in a lawful marriage. What then is the meaning of the word Nocens in the third verſe? does it not ſignify, a criminal fatherſhip? the other fault conſiſts in his taking Marullus of Spalato, whom Poſſevin praiſes, for Marullus, whoſe verſes are ſo well known: they are two different perſons.

[E] He was a handſome man, obliging even to exceſs, but covetous, ignorant, and of little wit.] I will quote a Catholic writer, becauſe a Proteſtant would be ſuſpected. ‘Fuit Innocentius corpore excelſo, ac candido, decoroque: ingenio tardo, ac literis procul (23). —— Innocent was tall, well made, and of a fine perſon, but ſlow of underſtanding, and had no learning.’ A little before he had ſaid (24), ‘Pauper olim puer, forma tamen præſtanti inter Alfonſi regis Siciliæ miniſtros (25) inde Romam veniens in contubernio Philippi Cardinalis Bononienſis fuit . . . . . Quum Xyſto plurimum dilectus eſſet ob dulces mores & humanitatem qua omnes uſque ad vitium ſuperavit. Nam & infimæ conditionis homines ſæpe exoſculabatur, amplectebaturque. Verum quum omnibus blandus eſſet, nemini tamen benignus, innatamque avaritiam jocis atque dicteriis tranſigebat. —— Formerly bring a poor boy the beauty of his perſon introduced him to the courtiers of Alphonſo, king of Sicily, afterwards coming to Rome he lived in the houſe of Philip, cardinal of Bologna . . . Xyſtus loved him exceedingly for the ſweetneſs of his diſpoſition, and his exceſſive humanity in which he excelled every one, even to a fault, for he would kiſs and embrace the vileſt and meaneſt of the people. But as he was civil to all, he did good to none, diſguiſing his innate avarice, by familiar expreſſions, and a pleaſant behaviour.’ Du Pleſſis Mornai thought that Volaterranus expreſſed here in modeſt words, the filthineſs of Innocent the eighth's private life (26); whereupon Coëffeteau fell into a paſſion: It is a ſtrange thing, ſays he (27), that he ſhould make a vice of his natural beauty, and from thence render him ſuſpected of the ſin, for the puniſhment of which fire fell from heaven; which againſt all charity, and even a- gainſt

---

(10) Volaterr. ubi ſupra.

(11) Her name was Theoderina.

(12) Gerardo Uſumari Genuenſi nuptam opibus per quam magnis ornavit. Volater. ubi ſupra.

(13) Du Pleſſis Mornai, Myſtere d'Iniquité, pag. 559.

(14) It is that of Spires, 1595.

(15) Marull. Epigram. lib. iv, pag. m. 84.

(16) Idem, lib. iii, pag. 60.

(17) Jurieu, Prejugez ligitimes, Part. I, pag. 247.

(18) Jo. Zuinger, de Feſto Corporis Chriſti, pag. 135.

(19) It is the thirty eighth of the firſt book, page 124, of the Amſterdam edition, 1689.

(20) Coëffeteau, ubi ſupra, pag. 1209.

* Marcus Marullus Spalatinus.

(21) Rivet, ubi ſupra, pag. 627.

(22) That is, the Verſes which he acknowledged to have been written by Marullus.

(23) Volaterr. ubi ſupra, pag. 821.

(24) Id. ibid. pag. 820.

(25) Rocolles, pag. 123, of the Life of Sultan Gemes, ſays, that he was a domeſtic to an officer of the court of Alphonſus; and in the following page, that he was a ſervant in his youth. See the remark [A].

(26) Du Pleſſis Mornai, Myſtere d' Iniquité, pag. 558.

(27) Coëffet. ubi ſupra, pag. 1208.

He died in July 1492, at ſixty years of age. He received from the Sultan a conſiderable preſent; I mean, the iron of the lance that pierced the body of our Saviour [F]. It is ſaid, that the inſcription of the croſs was found at Rome in the time of his pontificate (b). See in father Gretſer how they endeavour to anſwer the objections that were made to prove it ſuppoſititious (c.)

(b) Taken from Volaterranus, lib. xxii, pag. m. 820, & ſeq.

(c) Gretſer. Exam. Myſterii Pleſſæani, pag. 549, & ult.

gainſt good manners, he would confirm; becauſe this prelate was ſo affable, as to embrace even thoſe of a mean condition. Muſt not one have a ſoul ſtrangely corrupted with Hereſy to make ſuch an odious judgment of a Pope, recommended for his ſingular innocence?

[F] He received from the Sultan . . . . the iron of the lance that pierced the body of our Saviour.] Bajazet II, being in fear of his brother, even after he had forced him to retreat to Rhodes, omitted nothing to engage the grand maſter Peter d'Aubuſſon to deliver him up to him, or at leaſt to prevent his keeping intelligence with the Turks. The grand maſter engaged upon very advantageous conditions, to have him well obſerved. This agreement was ſigned the eighth of December 1482 (28). He permitted him to go into France ſome time after, and at laſt conſented, that Innocent VIII ſhould have him in his power, and enjoy the great ſums which Bajazet diſburſed (29). He obtained a cardinal's cap for his reward, and was ſo cautious as to make uſe of the king of France's authority; for the court of France put the Turkiſh prince into the hands of the Pope's embaſſadors, in the year 1488 (30). Bajazet had made great offers to the king of France, 'only to oblige 'him to keep him in his kingdom, under a ſtrict 'guard, that he might have no opportnnity of eſcaping, to return into his country, and begin a new war. 'Theſe offers were to give up all the relicks of GOD 'our creator, and of the apoſtles and ſaints, men and 'women, which his late father Mahomet had found 'at Conſtantinople, when he took that city, and in the 'other towns he had conquered in Chriſtendom: he 'repeated the ſame offers which he had made before 'to the grand maſter of Rhodes, to uſe his endeavours 'to conquer the Holy Land, and put it into the hands 'of the king; he alſo offered a vaſt penſion for his 'maintenance (31). Bajazet's letter came too late; the court of France had already promiſed to put his brother in the cuſtody of Innocent VIII. When he knew this, he wrote to the Pope, and endeavoured to gain him by preſents, and amongſt others, by the iron of the lance, that pierced our Saviour's ſide, which he had before offered to the grand maſter, and aſſured him of the punctual payment of 40000 ducats every year on condition he would not let him go upon any pretence whatſoever (32). Volaterranus ſpeaks of this: it is worth while to ſet down the paſſage, in which we ſhall ſee other particulars; as that Innocent VIII. was buried near the ſhrine, which contained the iron of the lance, that was found in Antioch at the time of the cruſades '(33). Sepultus in Baſilica Petri æreo monumento juxta 'arcam ab eo deſignatam in qua ferrum haſtæ conditur 'quod latus dominicum perfodit. Hoc ſiquidem olim 'apud ædem ſancti Andreæ Antiochiæ repertum, capta jam civitate, Bohemundus in prælio corripiens, arcem quæ expugnari non poterat illico cepit, ſimul '& hoſtium L. millia prodigioſe trucidavit. Inde 'Conſtantinopolim dono imperatori advectum. Poſtremo Turca illi ſuccedens, Innocentio ut eum 'fratris captivi cauſa leniret pro munere miſerat (34). '—— He is interred in the Baſilic of St Peter, under 'a monument of braſs, not far from the cheſt, which 'he himſelf had placed there, wherein is laid up the 'iron of that ſpear, which pierced our Lord's ſide. This 'is reported antiently to have been found in the church 'of St Andrew, at Antioch, when that city was taken 'by Boïmond, who after he had reduced the caſtle 'in a wonderful manner, deſtroyed fifty thouſand of the 'enemy; thence it was carried to Conſtantinople, 'and preſented to the emperor, laſtly falling there into the hand of the Ottoman prince, he ſent it as 'a preſent to Innocent, that he might ſoften him in 'reſpect to his brother who was then a captive, 'and in his power.' See the article VIGERIUS (35).

(28) See Rocolles, Vie du Sultan Gemes, pag. 91.

(29) Bajazet remitted every year 4000 ducats to the grand maſter, and alſo 35000 for his brother's maintainance. Id. ibid. pag. 92.

(30) Id. ibid. pag. 126.

(31) Id. ibid. pag. 127, 128.

(32) Ib. pag. 142.

(33) See Maimbourg's Hiſtory of the Cruſades, book ii. pag. 175, & ſeq. Dutch Edit. ad ann. 1098.

(34) Volaterr. ubi ſupra, pag. 821, 822.

(35) Rem. [A].

INNOCENT XI, created Pope the twenty-firſt of September 1676, was of Como in Lombardy, and called Benedict Odeſcalchi, as may be ſeen in Moreri, with many other things, which I paſs over in ſilence for that reaſon. His firſt profeſſion was that of a ſoldier [A]. He left it to devote himſelf to the eccleſiaſtical ſtate, and went to ſtudy at Naples; where he received his doctor's degree, after which he retired to Rome, in the pontificate of Urban VIII, who made him firſt apoſtolical ſecretary. He diſcharged ſo well the duties of that place, that he was made preſident of the chamber, and afterwards apoſtolical commiſſary, and governor of Marca di Roma. He obtained a cardinal's cap the ſixth of March 1645, and the legation of Ferrara ſome time after, and after that the biſhopric of Novara (a). The French ſay, his liberality and courtlineſs procured him the cardinalſhip, by the intereſt of Donna Olympia [B]: but they cannot deny

(a) Taken from a ſmall piece of ſixteen pages in 4*to*, intituled, La Vie d'Innocent XI, Pape de Rome écrite par D. G. B. P. à l'illuſtre Seigneur le Baron Giovanelli couſin de ſa Sainctleté.

[A] His firſt profeſſion was that of a ſoldier.] Here follows what we find in the pamphlet of ſixteen pages (1). 'Benedict in his youthful years took an inclination 'to martial affairs, being a man of greater courage, 'and valour than of ſtature; and foreſeeing at a diſtance the wars which he ſhould have in his old age, 'eſpecially deſiring to have the knowledge of arms, 'to introduce them advantageouſly into the church 'militant. And becauſe he knew what are the conſequences of war, and that ſkill in arms could not 'be obtained, but by a continual exerciſe, he went 'into Poland to engage in the war, with the Turks, 'and to give proofs of his bravery.' This author gives us to underſtand that Benedict bore arms only in Poland; other writers affirm (2), that he was in Flanders in the Spaniſh ſervice againſt France, and there received a muſket-ſhot in his right ſhoulder, which incommoded him all his life-time. I have read in a certain newſmonger, that Innocent XIth's hatred againſt France, proceeded from an affront, a Frenchman offered him in the war; an affront, that Benedict Odeſcalchi left unpuniſhed, but revenged it upon the whole nation, when he was Pope.

[B] His liberality and courtlineſs procured him the cardinalſhip by the intereſt of Donna Olympia.] See the Mercure Galant (3), in which you will find that our Benedict Odeſcalchi, the ſon of a rich banker of Como, played with Donna Olympia and loſt his money on purpoſe, in complaiſance to this lady. This puts me in mind of a paſſage in Menagiana (4). 'Pope 'Innocent XI, was the ſon of a banker, he was elected on St Matthew's day and the ſame day 'Paſquin ſaid, Invenerunt hominem ſedentem in telonio. —— They found a man ſitting at the receipt of 'cuſtom.'

The following words are to be found in a little book printed at Avignon for John Bramereau, in the year 1652, with this title La juſte Balance des Cardinaux vivans. 'After the death of Urban VIII. Odeſchalchi began to make his court to Donna Olympia, niece '(5) to Pope Innocent X, and having treated her 'ſeveral times, ſhe began zealouſly to eſpouſe his intereſt; and eſpecially for a thing, which this prelate did, that is worthy to be taken notice of. Going to ſee her in the beginning of the pontificate of 'her uncle (6) Innocent X, it happened that a Goldſmith came to ſhew her a noble and rich cheſt of 'ſilver drawers, which he had to ſell; Donna Olympia having taken a view of it in the preſence of 'Odeſchalchi, and ſeveral lords, who heard the anſwer 'that ſhe made, that it was a noble piece of plate, but 'that being a poor widow, ſhe could not lay out ſo 'much

(1) See the title of it in the margin of the text of this article, citat. (a).

(2) Mercure Galant for Auguſt 1689.

(3) Ubi ſupra.

(4) Pag. 18[illegible], of the firſt Dutch Edit.

(5) It ſhould be ſiſter-in-law; which is the ſignification of the Italian word cognata in the original.

(6) It ſhould be brother-in-law.

deny that he appeared very remote from a voluptuous life. He was of rigid morality, and looked upon as a devout man. He was much more favourable to the Janſeniſts than his predeceſſors had been; which was the reaſons why the Janſeniſts more zealouſly adhered to the cauſe of the Popes, than they had done before [C]. He offended abundance of people by the ſuppreſſion of an office of the immaculate conception, and alſo by that of ſeveral indulgencies. There was no body in France, beſides the Janſeniſts, that was edified with this. They diſperſed thoſe two decrees, and added ſome notes to them [D]. I do not believe that every body approved his forbidding to honour the name and bones of Anthony Cala [E]. He expreſſed ſuch an inflexible ſtiffneſs in his quarrel with France, that he has convinced the world that in point of revenge [F] there are no men comparable 'much money, and after having ſaid ſo, ſhe retired into her chamber. Immediately Odeſchalchi called the Goldſmith, asked the price of the cheſt, and bargained with him for 8000 crowns; after which, without ſaying any more, he ordered it to be preſented in his name to Donna Olympia, who ſeeing ſuch a preſent, was perfectly aſtoniſhed at ſo extraordinary a generoſity. Upon which ſhe went to the Pope, and begged the office of clerk of the chamber, as a pure gift, for this prelate, and afterwards a cardinal's cap, which he obtained likewiſe by the mediation of cardinal Palotta. I ſet down theſe words according to the copy, which has been communicated to me (7). I have the ſame book in Italian: intituled La giuſta ſtatera de' Porporati, and printed at Geneva in 1650. I have conſulted it, and not only found in it the original of what you have juſt now read, but alſo that our Benedict Odeſcalchi had made his court to Don Barberini, to be promoted to the office of clerk of the chamber; that he had paid the requiſite ſums, and yet had not obtained his end; that he was a perſon of an indifferent capacity (8), and that tho' he had been profuſe, he was a rich and magnificent cardinal; that whilſt he was a biſhop, he loved walks, plays, and feaſts, but that he lived a very retired life after he became a cardinal.

[C] The Janſeniſts more zealouſly adhered to the cauſe of the Popes, than they had done before.] This is what Mr Talon taxes them with in the famous plea he made againſt Innocent XI, the twenty third of January 1688. A ſtrange thing! ſays he (9), that the Pope, whoſe principal care ought to be to preſerve the purity of the faith, and to hinder the progreſs of new opinions, has not ceaſed ever ſince he came to St Peter's chair, to keep up a correſpondence with all thoſe who had publickly declared themſelves Janſenius's diſciples, whoſe doctrine his predeceſſors have condemned. He has loaded them with his favours; he has given them commendations; he has declared himſelf their protector: and that dangerous faction, which has omitted nothing theſe thirty years to leſſen the authority of all eccleſiaſtical and ſecular powers, that were not favourable to them, at preſent erect altars to the Pope, becauſe he upholds and foments their cabal; which would have anew diſturbed the peace of the church, if the foreſight and indefatigable pains of a prince, whom heaven has raiſed up to be the ſhield, and the defender of the faith, had not put a ſtop to it. I do not believe that any Janſeniſt did ever write in defence of the four propoſitions, decided by the clergy of France, in the year 1682, againſt which the favourers of the Ultra-montain doctrines made ſuch out-cries, and publiſhed ſo many books. If the ſame thing had happened in the pontificate of Innocent X or of Alexander VII, it is certain the Janſeniſts would have written a hundred volumes in defence of the deciſions of the clergy, and in confutation of the Ultra montaines. Humane nature diſcovers itſelf every where: the rule of our conduct changes according to the times, and as we find our ſelves diſpoſed towards other men. Out of gratitude to a benefactor, men ſpare thoſe doctrines, which they would have condemned out of a reſentment againſt an oppreſſor.

[D] They diſperſed thoſe two decrees, and added ſome notes to them.] The one was made at Rome the ſeventeenth of February 1678, and imports the condemnation of the book intituled, Officio dell' immacolata concettione della Sanctiſſima Vergine noſtra Signora, approvato dal ſommo Pontefice Paolo V, il qualè à chi devotamente lo recitarà concede indulgenza di cento giorni, come appariſce nel ſuo breve dato in Roma li x. Juglio MDCXV. in Milano per Franceſco Vigone. The other was made at Rome the ſeventeenth of March 1678, which ſuppreſſes abundance of indulgences. The Janſeniſts cauſed thoſe two decrees to be ſecretly printed in France, and added ſome rules to them, by which their uſefulneſs might be diſcovered. They conſiſt of a collection of paſſages. It will not be unneceſſary to inſert here the reflexion of a Jeſuit upon the Janſeniſts zeal for thoſe decrees, and the little account they make of the conſtitutions of the Popes againſt Janſenius. 'Some years ago a little Italian book printed at Milan, was put in the index at Rome; in which book the office of the immaculate conception of the mother of GOD was to be found. The prohibition did not concern the office of the conception, which is known and authorized long ago in the church, and which alſo has been lately approved by Innocent XI, but this decree reſpected other things, which were falſly and raſhly ſaid, and printed in the ſame book: and beſides it was only for Italy, and not for the reſt of the world, where that book was not like to appear. Neverthelefs this decree was ſeen immediately, printed in Latin and French, by the care of ſome of the party with a rhapſody of uſeleſs paſſages, to make a conſiderable libel of it. It was diſperſed all over France and the Low-Countries with as much zeal, as if it had been a canon of a general council, upon a capital point of religion: and it is well known to what exceſs the indiſcreet zeal of ſome of their directors went. Thus you ſee how far theſe gentlemen can carry when they pleaſe their ſubmiſſion to the orders of the church. Would not one believe after this, that the Pope (10) needed only prohibit the verſion of Mons, to hinder them from diſperſing and crying it up in the world? And was not there reaſon to expect they would do as much for his new decree in favour of the office of the conception, as they had done for the former, which I have been ſpeaking of? but we ſhould have been very much miſtaken in our hopes of it: they have other principles for their conduct in what concerns them (11).

[E] He did forbid to honour the name and bones of Antony Cala.] A veneration had been a long time paid to this man in the kingdom of Naples, on account of his having been a holy hermit: but Innocent XI, in 1680, commanded all this worſhip to be aboliſhed, and Antony Cala's bones to be carried into the common church-yard, to be there mixed with others, and never to be taken up again. He enjoined alſo that his images, his habits, and all his other relics, ſhould be removed from all conſecrated places (12). Father Papebroch by this example juſtifies the liberty he took to ſuppreſs ſome ſaints.

[F] In point of revenge.] The court of France under Lewis XIV, and the court of Rome under Innocent XI, were acted with the ſame ſpirit of haughtineſs and inflexibility, whereby they afforded all Europe inſtances of that ſpirit for a long time. They ſtrove on both ſides to carry revenge as far as ever they could; but at laſt the world was forced to yield to the church. The Pope has ſhewn that it is not for nothing that he calls himſelf the vicegerent of GOD on earth; of GOD I ſay, who reſerves vengeance, to himſelf, and who has declared (13) that it is he to whom it belongs, and that he will pay it. The Pope, as the vicegerent of the GOD of vengeance, has admirably maintained the rights of his deputation. I will not adopt the thoughts of thoſe ſatirical wits, who pretend that, in point of revenge, the laity are novices in compariſon of the clergy; but we have ſcarce ſeen any quarrels between the church and the world, in which

(7) By Mr Pallardy, abovementioned citation (e) of the article GLEICHEN.

(8) E ſogetto di mediocre intelligenza.

(9) Talon, Plaidoyer, pag. 42, Dutch Edit.

(10) He means Innocent XI, who had condemned the verſion of the New Teſtament of Mons. See the Nouvelles de la Rep. des Lettres, May 1685, pag. 495.

(11) Father le Tellier, Obſervations ſur la Nouvelle defenſe de la Verſion de Mons, pag. 422.

(12) See Father Papebroch, in Reſponſ. ad exhibitionem errorum, pag. 18, 19.

(13) Deuteron. chap. xxxii, ver. 35.

comparable to thoſe who pretend to be rigid moraliſts. It is thought that a voluptuous Pope, who could have ſacrificed his paſſions to politic intereſts, would have been more uſeful to the catholic religion [G]. The French are inraged againſt him, and it is ſaid this will contribute much to his canonization [H]. He which the Popes have not at laſt had the better in point of revenge, they are the vicegerents of God, who has reſerved vengeance to himſelf, that is ſaying all. If I well remember, the protection that was granted by Innocent XI to ſome biſhops of France, perſecuted for not conſenting to the extenſion of the Regale, was the firſt ſtep that provoked the court of France (14); becauſe the briefs of Innocent XI (15) in favour of thoſe biſhops, were expreſſed in very ſtrong and vigorous terms. This haughtineſs put the court of France upon the moſt effectual ways to vex him. The clergy declared (16) their opinion about the authority of the church, and formed four propoſitions thereupon, which reduced the power of the Pope, to ſuch bounds as were very odious to the court of Rome. This was not at the bottom a new doctrine; the clergy decided nothing but what was agreeable to the maxims of the Gallican church, and what the Sorbonne had taught a hundred times; ſo that one might have thought that another Pope would not have taken exceptions at it, and that Innocent XI would perhaps diſſemble his reſentment: but to put him under a neceſſity of confeſſing that he had received a very great affront, the deciſions of the clergy were propoſed by royal authority, as a doctrine that no body was allowed to oppoſe, and which was to be maintained by all thoſe, who would take their licences in Divinity and the Civil-law, and be advanced to a doctor's degree. They ſtudied all the formalities, that might give the greateſt luſtre to the king's declarations upon this affair. Theſe doctrines were maintained by the rector of the univerſity of Paris, in a diſputation where the archbiſhop of Paris preſided, and in which the reſpondent was inveſted with all the marks of his rectorſhip, that it might appear, that it was the whole body of the univerſity, repreſented by their head, that maintained theſe deciſions. The theſis was poſted upon the door of the nuncio's houſe, notwithſtanding the oppoſitions he threatened to make againſt it. The Pope expreſſed his reſentment againſt the clergy; he anſwered harſhly the letter he had received from them, and would never grant his bulls to thoſe who aſſiſted at the aſſembly of 1682. He aboliſhed the franchiſes of the embaſſador of France, like thoſe of others, and would never receive the marquis de Lavardin, who was ſent embaſſador to him (17). France did then a very remarkable thing. This embaſſador entred Rome almoſt by main force, and having taken poſſeſſion of his quarters, he ſet a guard about it, as if it had been a fortified town (18). The Pope, without being aſtoniſhed, revenged himſelf by a ſurpriſing blow: he caſt an interdict upon the church of St Lewis, becauſe the marquis de Lavardin had been admitted into it, and excommunicated this embaſſador, and obſtinately refuſed to acknowledge him.

Things were at this paſs, when his moſt Chriſtian Majeſty perceiving that the continuation of theſe differences, would be prejudicial to him, ſecretly diſpatched a truſty man to whom he gave a letter of his own writing as a credential to his Holineſs (19). This man was to diſcover to the Pope the moſt ſecret intentions of the king. But the Pope would neither receive the letter nor give him any audience. Hereupon the king writ a letter to cardinal d'Etrée, which was communicated to the cardinals. He complained in it of the Pope's conduct, and ſhewed, in particular, the prejudice that Europe and the church might ſuffer, from what the Pope had already done againſt cardinal Furſtenberg. He aſcribed to this partiality the intrigues that were forming againſt king James, in favour of the Proteſtant religion, &c. This letter diſperſed in Rome was perhaps a new motive, which induced the Pope to countenance more and more prince Clement of Bavaria, to the prejudice of cardinal Furſtenberg. Now by the excluſion of this cardinal, he revenged himſelf a hundred-fold, for all the affronts he had received. He deprived the king of France of being the arbitrator of peace and war, and involved him neceſſarily in a war with almoſt all Europe. He quickly ſaw the effect of this conduct; and if he lived not long after ſo terrible a revenge, he lived long enough to have the ſatisfaction of ſeeing France attacked by ſo many enemies, that according to the general conjectures, ſhe was to ſink the very firſt campaign. Tell me now whether the church did not obtain the victory over the world, in a long diſpute where both parties contended, in point of revenge. If Alexander the Great had been a Catholic, he would have had much ado to draw out of the Pope's mouth what he did from the prieſteſs of Delphi, My ſon, thou art invincible (20).

[G] It is thought that a voluptuous Pope . . . would have been more uſeful to the Catholic religion.] Thoſe, who do not love this Pope, ſay, that he was well enough acquainted with the general affairs, to know that, in the ſtate they were in when cardinal Furſtenberg ſued for the electorate of Cologne, he might have ſaved the king of England, and enabled France to execute all her projects; for with the aſſiſtance of ſuch a cardinal, who would have ſucceeded to all that his predeceſſor poſſeſſed, ſhe would have tied the arms of the princes of Germany that were ill affected to her. She experienced it, in the year 1684, when ſhe deſired a truce. Now it is certain that the victories of this crown, would have extended the Catholic religion, and ſtrangely weakened the Proteſtant: whence comes it then that the Pope was ſo contrary to that cardinal? It is, ſay they, becauſe he hated the king of France, and choſe rather to renounce the advantages of the Catholic religion, than the pleaſure of croſſing his enemy, or the ſweetneſs of revenge. Theſe ſame perſons ſay, that he knew very well there was a league forming, of which the Proteſtants would be the chief directors, and which might be able in it's turn to oppreſs the Catholic religion, almoſt all over Europe; and that the moſt effectual means to prevent this league, was to put the whole ſucceſſion of the late elector of Cologne into the hands of a cardinal, who would never join with Heretical princes. Why then was Innocent XI ſo contrary to the intereſt of this cardinal? Becauſe, ſay they, he was overjoyed to expoſe the French monarchy to the greateſt dangers; and provided he could revenge himſelf of the court of France, he cared but little for the loſſes of the Popedom. This is what is ſaid by his enemies: but it is not too much to be relied on; their paſſion ought to make their conjectures ſuſpected. It is perhaps much more reaſonable to ſay, that being very intent upon the reformation of manners, and pious exerciſes, he was neither capable of knowing what was uſeful to his religion, nor of preferring the profitable before the honeſt part. Now he believed he was bound in juſtice to preſer the duke of Bavaria's brother before the cardinal candidate. Some apply to Innocent XI what was ſaid of Hadrian VI: he was an honeſt man; but did not underſtand politics (21). It was the good fortune of the Proteſtants, that in the year 1688, the ſee of Rome was poſſeſſed by a Pope who did not well underſtand his own intereſts, or who was too ſtiff to take advantage of the preſent junctures, to the prejudice of his particular paſſions.

But after all, who can aſſure us, that Innocent XI did not in ſome reſpects behave himſelf like a good politician? Has the court of Rome nothing to fear from the too great power of princes, that are moſt violent againſt the ſects ſeparated from her communion? Did not Sixtus V who ſo well underſtood politics, chooſe rather to countenance Henry IV and queen Elizabeth, than to ſuffer the king of Spain to grow too powerful (22)? Who can affirm that Innocent XI was not moved by ſome ſuch ſpring, when he entered upon meaſures ſo contrary to the intereſts of France, and ſo uſeful to the Proteſtants? One thing ſeems very certain, that an anonymous author of a little book (23), intituled, The extravagant reproach; in which is ſhewn, that the Pope cannot without folly be reproached, with the ruin of the Catholic religion in England, has no reaſon to call this reproach a folly.

[H] The anger of the French . . . . . will contribute much to his canonization.] It is not long ſince (24) the news-writers of Holland, have publiſhed in their monthly accounts, that many miracles were wrought at this Pope's tomb, and that this is a great mortification

---

(14) See a liſt of ſeveral other occaſions of complaint given to France after this, in the Anſwer to the Proteſtation of the Marquis de Lavardin, pag m. 97, & ſeq.

(15) Written to the king of France in 1678, and 1679.

(16) In the year 1682.

(17) In the year 1687.

(18) See Leti, Monarchie Univerſelle, Part. II, pag. 346, & ſeq.

(19) A letter of the French king to cardinal d'Etrée of the ſixth of September 1688. It is in Leti's Monarchie Univerſelle, ubi ſupra, pag. 447, & ſeq.

(20) Delphos inviſit, Apollinem de eventu belli, quod moliebatur, conſulturus. Sed virgo fatidica negabat per eos dies adiri deum fas eſſe; donec ipſe eo profectus, vi conripuit virginem, & ad templum traxit. Sed quum inter eundum illa patrium morem pertinacia regis victum reputans, exclamaſſet, invictus es, fili; accipere omen dixit: nec alio oraculo ſibi opus eſſe. Frienſh. Supplement. in Q. Curtium, lib i, cap. xi, n. 16, ex Plutarcho.

(21) See remark [Q] of the article HADRIAN VI.

(22) See the remark [R] of the article ELIZABETH.

(23) Printed at Cologne, for Peter Marteau, in 1689.

(24) I write this in the beginning of September 1695.

He was not learned [I]. He died the twelfth of Auguſt 1689. The French king's letter to the conclave, ſays a great deal in a few words againſt the memory of this Pope [K].

I find in the Valeſiana a Paſſage which deſerves to be ſet down here at length [L]. I ſhall alſo inſert ſome Verſes of Mr de la Fontaine, which ſhew how freely they wrote againſt to the court of France; and that probably the enemies of that crown, will endeavour out of ſpite to get this Pope canonized. This will then be a ſaint made out of ſpite. It is commonly prudence to take the ſtrongeſt ſide: but that maxim is ſometimes falſe. There are ſome princes who owe their elevation only to their nice policy, of declaring themſelves betimes irreconcileable enemies to a potent ſtate, which terrifies all it's neighbours; for all thoſe that are afraid of this power, countenance this declared enemy, and gratify him as far as they can in all his deſires: and we need not go ſo high as the ages of Paganiſm, to find ſome princes who have irrecoverably loſt themſelves, by preferring the alliance of the moſt potent of their neighbours, before that of others (25). A private perſon that falls from a proſperous ſtate into misfortune, does no longer ſee about him, that multitude of friends who encompaſſed him before: they forſake him, and leave him to himſelf.

Donec eris felix, multos numerabis amicos:
Tempora ſi fuerint nubila ſolus eris (26).

Serene your fortune, friends will then abound;
But once obſcur'd there will not one be found.

Sovereigns find it quite contrary: for if they grow too potent, they find no more allies; every body forſakes and confederates againſt them. It is certain that Innocent XI purchaſed a great many friends and admirers, meerly for his thwarting at much as he could the deſigns of the court of France. This will keep his memory ſweet, and make his pretended miracles more eaſily go down.

[I] He was not learned.] It is ſaid, he wanted his ſecretaries to explain to him in Italian what they wrote for him in Latin. See the Menagiana, wherein are theſe words (27): 'Favoriti, ſecretary to 'the late Pope, reading to him the briefs he had 'made, and explaining them in Italian; the Pope 'wept for joy, and ſaid, Coſa diranno di noi nella 'poſterita, quando vederanno coſi bella latinita noſtra. '—— What will poſterity ſay of us, when they ſee our 'Latin ſo elegant.'

[K] The French king's letter to the conclave, ſays a great deal in a few words againſt the memory of this Pope.] This is the beginning of it (28): We have learned from your letter of the thirteenth of this month, the deceaſe of our holy Father Innocent XI, and we have juſt reaſon to believe that it has pleaſed the divine majeſty to take him out of the world at a time when all the re-united forces of Hereſy, ſeem to conſpire againſt the ruin of our religion, to which the diviſion of the Catholic princes contributes not a little. This is to ſay in a few words, which have a great air of moderation, that the wants of the church requiring a Pope that ſhould lay her intereſts to heart, God had removed Innocent XI out of the world, who was ill-affected to the church, or unable to labour for her good.

[L] I find in the Valeſiana a paſſage which deſerves to be ſet down here at length.] It is pity ſaid the learned Hadrian Valois (29), 'that Innocent XI ſuffered him'ſelf to be influenced, as he was, by the enemies of 'France. If he had been ſeconded by people as well 'affected as himſelf, what advantages might he not 'have procured to the Chriſtian religion? what would 'he not have re-eſtabliſhed? what would he not have 'reformed? what promiſing hopes did not he give by 'his aboliſhing the office of the immaculate concep'tion, as Clement IX had done that of the ſlavery? 'what would he not have done, if he had heard of 'the impertinent devotion of that Monk, which 'M . . . . . . ſpoke of the other day? would he not 'have rigidly condemned the ſuperiors, who ſuffer 'one of their viſionaries to print oriſons, addreſſed to 'all the parts of the body of the holy Virgin (30). 'Are not religion, modeſty, and good ſenſe, wound'ed by ſuch an extravagance? Innocent XI would 'not have ſtopped there: he would have reformed the 'luxury and fineries of women. How many huſbands 'would have been obliged to him, had his deſign 'taken effect? I am aſſured alſo from good hands that 'he would have aboliſhed the privileged altars, as a 'very great abuſe. And indeed can ſome indulgences 'granted to an altar, make the maſs better? or does 'the blood of Christ, which is of infinite worth, 'want any acceſſion of merits to be more acceptable 'to God, and more efficacious to thoſe that are pray'ed for? the mendicant Friars have invented theſe 'things, to bring cuſtomers to their churches.'

Digression concerning the reformation of luxury.

What Mr Valois ſays concerning the deſign of reforming the luxury and fineries of women, puts me in mind of the great zeal Innocent XI expreſſed againſt thoſe who ſhewed their breaſts. 'This Pope finding 'he was not able to prevail with the fair ſex, by the 'many powerful means he uſed, not to ſhew their 'breaſts and their arms, and knowing withal that the 'terror which ſeized all Italy, when the Turks beſieg'ed Vienna, did not put a ſtop to that diſorder, had 'recourſe to the laſt remedy; namely, excommunica'tion. He publiſhed an order the thirtieth of Novem'ber 1683, which enjoined all maids and women to 'cover their ſhoulders and breaſts, up to their necks, 'and their arms down to their hands, with ſome thick 'and not tranſparent ſtuff, upon pain of being ſo fully 'excommunicated ipſo facto, if they did not obey in 'ſix days time, that, except at the laſt hour, no one 'but the Pope could abſolve them; for it was decla'red, that the confeſſors who ſhould preſume to abſolve 'them from that excommunication, ſhould incur it them'ſelves, and ſhould be liable to ſuch ſpiritual and tem'poral puniſhments as his holineſs ſhould think fit to 'inflict upon them: which temporal puniſhments, the 'fathers, huſbands, maſters, and other heads of fami'lies, by whoſe permiſſion or connivance their daughters 'and wives act contrary to his ordinance, ſhall likewiſe 'undergo (31).' I do not know what was the ſucceſs of theſe terrible menaces; but I believe that as they were renewed from time to time under the predeceſſors of Innocent XI (32), there was occaſion to renew them ſome time after. It is the fate of theſe ſumptuary laws: luxury, and the deſire of ſetting off ones beauty, quickly elude the wiſeſt regulations: we may ſay of this diſorder, what a grave hiſtorian has obſerved with reſpect to Aſtrologers; they were always commanded to depart Rome, but they never went out of it (33). King Lewis XIV has lately (34) put out fine edicts againſt luxury: if he can command obedience upon that head, it will be a more admirable thing, than the power he has had to leſſen very conſiderably in his kingdom the madneſs of duelling. The news-writers have told us lately, that the advocates of the parliament of Paris, have engaged to ſee this reformation of profuſeneſs obſerved in their own houſes. Time will inform us, whether by the concurrent authorities of the prince and the huſbands, the reformation will be eſtabliſhed for a continuance. Theſe gentlemen have been told (35) that as part of thoſe (36) that ſet up moſt for women of quality, would perhaps, have a great repugnance to retrench any thing from their ſumptuous habits, furnitures, coaches, &c. as alſo from the ſuperfluous number of their waiting-women, embroiderers, tapeſtry-workers, and footmen, which they have in their ſervice; it had been reſolved to oppoſe a licentiouſneſs ſo little conſiſtent with the ſtate and quality of thoſe ladies . . . . . . (37). The king's intention being, that they ſhould obey and reform themſelves the ſooneſt, without any diſtinction of birth and quality, and that they ſhould begin immediately, by not ſuffering their train to be born up. It is added, that two famous advocates (38) were charged to communicate this order to their brethren, and that the latter being overjoyed, expreſſed their acknowledgment for it, and unanimouſly reſolved to thank the firſt Preſident for procuring a regulation ſo juſt, ſo neceſſary, and ſo worthy of the king's wiſdom; and to aſſure him at the ſame time, that they would cauſe it to be obſerved in their own houſes, with the utmoſt exactneſs; they all looking

(25) Confer quæ ſupra, in the remark [X] of the article BELLARMIN.

(26) Ovidius, Triſt. lib i, Eleg. ix, ver. 5.

(27) Page 52 of the firſt Dutch edition.

(28) The Letter is dated from Verſailles the twenty fourth of Auguſt 1689. It is to be found at length in the Mercure Hiſtorique & Politique of October 1689, pag. 1026.

(29) Valeſiana, pag. 45, & ſeq. Dutch Edit.

(30) Mr Baudelot, pag 183, of his Ptolomy Auletes, ſays he has ſeen the printed book, which contains thoſe oriſons.

(31) Nouvelles de la Repub des Lettres, May 1686, art. ii, pag. 495.

(32) See t'e Nouvelles, &c. ibid. pag. 497.

(33) Genus hominum . . . quod in civitate noſtra & vetabitur ſemper & retinebitur. Tacit. Hiſt. lib. i, cap. xxii.

(34) I write this in May 1700.

(35) See the Lettres Hiſtoriques of May 1700, pag. 574.

(36) That is, advocates wives.

(37) Lettres Hiſt. ubi ſupra, pag. 575.

(38) Mr Iſalis and Mr Chardon.

againſt Innocent XI, in Paris [M]. You will find a noble encomium upon this Pope in the ſeventh ſpeech of Mr Malagonelli (b). The Latin ſtyle of it is admirable, and worthy of antient Rome.

(b) Concerning the harangues of this Orator, ſee the Acta Eruditorum, in the third Tome of the Supplements, pag. 43, & ſeq.

upon it as the moſt effectual means to free them from infinite diſcontent, and to prevent the fruits of their laborious employments from continuing to be ſacrificed to the extravagant ambition of their wives. It is very likely that they ſpoke as they meant; for indeed their fine, noble, and profitable employments, are attended with great toil. They ſometimes envy the happipineſs of a countryman, who can ſleep all night.

Agricolam laudat juris legumque peritus
Sub galli cantum conſultor ubi oſtia pulſat (39).

(39) Horat, Sat. I, lib. i, ver. 9.

The lawyer wak'd, and riſing with the ſun,
Cries happy Farmers that can ſleep till noon.

CREECH.

Is it not reaſonable, that they ſhould deſire that a gain, which coſts them ſo many watchings, ſhould not be ſquandered away by ſuperfluous expences; and that the royal authority ſhould enable them to remedy it, ſince otherwiſe they could never accompliſh it?

[M] I ſhall inſert ſome verſes of Mr de la Fontaine, which ſhew how freely they wrote againſt Innocent XI at Paris.] We find amongſt his poſthumous works a letter, part of which I will tranſcribe:

Pour nouvelles de l'Italie,
Le Pape empire tous les jours,
Expliquez, Seigneur (40), ce diſcours
Du coſté de la maladie.
Car aucun Saint-Pere autrement
Ne doit empirer nullement.
Celuy-ci veritablement
N'eſt envers nous ni Saint ni Pere.
Nos ſoins de l'erreur triumphans
Ne font qu'augmenter ſa colere
Contre l'Ainé de ſes Enfans.
Sa ſanté toûjours diminuë,
L'avenir m'eſt choſe inconnuë,
Et je n'en parle qu'à tâtons;
Mais le gens de delà les Monts
Auront bien-tôt pleuré cet homme;
Car il deffend les Jannetons,
Choſe très-neceſſaire à Rome (41).

(40) He ſpeaks to the prince of Conti.

(41) La Fontaine, Oeuvr. poſtumes, pag. 182, Dutch Edit.

From Italy, my lord, they ſay
The Pope grows worſe and worſe each day,
But let me beg you to apply
This language to his malady;
Since it ſounds odly, in diſcourſe,
To ſay the Pope grows worſe and worſe.
But as 'tis true, I ſay it rather,
To us, nor holy he, nor father,
Our triumphs over error here
Only augment his ſpleen and fear,
And ſerve to egg his anger on,
Againſt the church's eldeſt ſon:
Worſe as he grows . . . . I cannot tell
Whether he will do ill or well,
On this howe'er I'll pawn my word,
His loſs will not much grief afford
Beyond the Alps . . . . ſince he diſmiſs'd
Each girl who would be freely kiſs'd,
And baniſh'd by, too harſh a doom,
The ſweeteſt, ſlighteſt, ſin in Rome.

Here are ſome verſes of a freer ſtrain, and taken from the ſame work:

Je vois ces Heros retournez
Chez eux avec un pied de nez.

- - - - -

Et tout le parti Proteſtant
Du Saint-Pere en vain très-content.
J'ay là deſſus un conte à faire.
L'autre jour touchant cette affaire
Le Chevalier de Sillery,
En parlant de ce Pape-cy,
Souhaitoit pour la paix publique,
Qu'il ſe fuſt rendu Catholique,
Et le Roy JAQUES Huguenot.
Je trouve aſſez bon ce bon mot (42).

(42) Id ibid. pag. 171.

Theſe heroes I return'd have ſeen,
Succeſsleſs and o'ercome with ſpleen.

- - - - -

- - - - -

In vain the party Proteſtant,
Are with our holy Pope content.
But t'other day I heard a tale,
To make you laugh it ſcarce can fail,
The Chevalier de Sillery
Said for the public peace 'twould be,
If once the Pope turn'd Catholic,
And good king James a Heretic.
However this odd change might hit,
His ſaying ſurely wants not wit.

Racine (43) had a ſtroke at the Pope, but not ſo openly; however it was a ſtroke. Mr de Vize in his Mercure Galant, and in his books about the tranſactions of the preſent times, ſays many things to the diſhonour of Innocent XI.

(43) See his prologue to Eſther. Mention is made of it in the Avis important aux Réfugiez, pag. 343.

JOACHIM, huſband of St Anne [A], and father of the holy Virgin. His marriage was a long time unfruitful, by reaſon of which his oblations were rejected by the high-prieſt Iſſachar, who cruelly upbraided him for his infecundity. Joachim was ſo confounded to ſee himſelf treated in this manner by the high-prieſt, that he durſt return home no more. He went and concealed himſelf in the country, among his ſhepherds, and was there comforted by an angel, who came to tell him, that he ſhould have a daughter by his wife Anne, that ſhould be called Mary. This angel went immediately to tell the ſame news to Anne, who was lamenting and weeping, not knowing what was become of her huſband. This angelical news was no doubt very acceptable to her; for ſhe very much grieved at her having no children [B]. Many believe, that a bare kiſs of her

[A] Joachim, husband of St Anne.] Here is his genealogy: Levi, of the tribe of David, was the father of Panther, Panther was the father of Barpanther, who was the father of Joachim (1). Some have ſaid, that Joachim did not deſcend from David, but from the tribe of Levi, and even that he was a prieſt. The Manichees grounded an objection upon this, which St Auguſtin (2) has examined.

[B] She very much grieved at her having no children.] She found her ſelf deprived of a certain honour that was paid to mothers according to the laws; upon which ſhe had recourſe to extraordinary prayers, that ſhe might partake of that honour: ſhe entered into the holy of holies, and made earneſt ſupplications to GOD, repreſenting, that ſhe had done nothing againſt the law, and therefore ought not to be excluded from the privileges

(1) Joannes Damaſcenus, de Fide Orthod. lib. iv, cap xv, apud Barronium Apparatu, n. 42.

(2) Contra Fauſt. Manich. lib. xxiii, cap. ix. See the remark [D], citat. (11).

her huſband impregnated her; but others affirm, that the common way was made uſe of [C]; for otherwiſe, ſay they, the birth of Jeſus Chriſt would not be ſo wonderful as we hold it. What is moſt wonderful is, that though we know nothing for certain of the name, qualities, and hiſtory of the father and mother of the holy Virgin [D], yet all this that I have privileges which the law gave to women, who had children. Her prayer was heard; God giving her to underſtand, that ſhe ſhould bear a child (3). St Gregory Nyſſen relates this ſtory, which he read in an apocryphal book. They who know that none entered into the holy of holies, but the high-prieſt himſelf, and that he was not permitted to enter into it but once a year, need not have the falſity of this ſtory repreſented to them. If St Anne prepared herſelf on one hand, her huſband did no leſs on the other; for he faſted forty days upon a mountain, in order to obtain of God the deſired poſterity (4). See in the following remark, the words of St Epiphanius.

[C] Others affirm, that the common way was made uſe of.] St Bernard maintains, that it is the opinion of the church. ‘ Si licet, ſays he (5) loqui quod Eccleſia ſentit, (& verum ipſa ſentit) dico glorioſam de Spiritu Sancto concepiſſe, non autem conceptam fuiſſe: dico peperiſſe virginem, non tamen partam à virgine. Alioquin ubi erit prærogativa matris Domini qua ſingulariter dicitur exultare & munere prolis & integritate carnis, ſi tantundem dederis & matri ipſius? Non eſt hoc Virginem honorare, ſed honori detrahere. —— If I may be allowed, ſays he, to ſpeak what the church thinks, (and what ſhe thinks is truth) I ſay that the moſt glorious Virgin conceived by the HOLY GHOST, but was not conceived of it. I ſay that ſhe brought forth though a virgin, yet not that ſhe was born of a virgin. If it were otherwiſe, where would be the prerogative of the mother of our Lord, by which ſhe is ſaid ſingularly to rejoice, both in her offſpring, and in the purity of her body, if as much ſhould be granted to her mother? This is not to honour the Virgin, but to take from her honour.’ Pelbartus of Temeſwaer, notwithſtanding his bigotted credulity, embraces St Bernard's opinion. ‘ Simplicibus quibuſdam tribuit hanc opinionem quod Anna conceperit per ſolum oſculum Joachim. Agnoſcit tamen eam de viro concepiſſe concubitu matrimoniali (6). —— He atttributes to ſome fooliſh people this opinion, that Anna conceived by a bare kiſs of Joachim. However he acknowledges that ſhe conceived by her huſband, as married people do.’ The error of the pretended virginity of St Ann, is very ancient; for St Epiphanius was obliged to confute it. Εἰ γὰρ Ἀγγέλους προσκυνεῖσθαι οὐ θέλει, πόσῳ μᾶλλον τὴν ἀπὸ Ἄννης γεγεννημένην, τὴν ἐκ τοῦ Ἰωακεὶμ τῇ Ἄννᾳ δεδωρημένην, τὴν δὶ εὐχῆς, καὶ πάσης ἐπιμελείας κατὰ ἐπαγγελίαν πατρὶ, καὶ μητρὶ δοθεῖσαν, οὐ μὲν ἑτέρως γεγεννημένην παρὰ τὴν τῶν ἀνθρώπων φύσιν, ἀλλὰ καθὼς πάντες ἐκ σπέρματος ἀνδρὸς, καὶ μήτρας γυναικὸς; εἰ γὰρ καὶ ἡ τῆς Μαρίας ἱστορία, καὶ παραδόσεις ἔχουσιν, ὅτι ἐῤῥέθη τῷ πατρὶ αὐτῆς Ἰωακεὶμ ἐν τῇ ἐρήμῳ, ὅτι ἡ γυνή σου συνειληφυῖα, οὐχ ὅτι ἄνευ συζυγίας τοῦτο ἐγένετο, οὐδὲ ὅτι ἄνευ σπέρματος ἀνδρός. Nam ſi ne Angelos quidem adorari permittit, quanto minus id Annæ filiæ tribui conceſſerit, quam illi è Joacimo Dei bonitas indulſit? quam precibus, omnique animi ſtudio, ac contentione, parens uterque promeruit? ita tamen ut non aliam quàm cæteri mortales naſcendi conditionem habuerit; ſed, ut illi, è virili ſatu, ac matris utero prodierit. Quamvis autem ex Mariæ hiſtoria, ac Traditione illud habeatur: Joacimo ejus Patri divinitùs hoc in deſerto nunciatum fuiſſe, uxor tua concepit; non ita tamen accipiendum eſt, quaſi hoc citra nuptialem conſociationem, ac virilem ſatum acciderit (7). —For if he permit not the Angels to be adored how much leſs will he allow that honour to the daughter of Anna, whom GOD in his great mercy gave to Joachim, whom by prayers, by earneſt entreaties, and by extraordinary piety, her parents obtained? yet ſo as that ſhe was not born in any other manner than the reſt of human race, ſpringing from the ſeed of her father, nouriſhed in the womb of her mother, for though we have it in the hiſtory of Mary, and by tradition, that Joachim her father had it revealed to him from heaven, in the deſert, thy wife has conceived; yet are we not to underſtand thereby, that this happened without any conjugal converſation, or excluſive of the ſeed of man. The cavalier Bori had a ſtrange thought concerning the conception of the Virgin, he believed that St Joachim was impotent, and that the Holy Ghost did incarnate itſelf with the Virgin Mary in the womb of her mother, who by that means remained a virgin after ſhe had born her child. ‘ Cadde in propoſizioni più ridicole, inſegnando che la Vergine non era ſtata concetta con ſeme umano, mà per opra divina, avendo lo Spirito Santo pigliato carne nel ventre di S. Anna, e partorita dalla medeſima, che aſſeriva che nel parto era rimaſta Vergine, e tale eſſere ſtata avanti il parto, e aſſicurando che S. Gioachino foſſe ſtato impotente alla conſumazione del matrimonio (8).’

[D] Though we know nothing for certain of the name, qualities, and hiſtory of the father and mother of the Holy Virgin . . . .] St Epiphanius, who flouriſhed in the year 370, is the moſt antient author, that tells us the names of the Holy Virgin's father and mother. It is true, that he pretends to have received from the tradition and hiſtory of the Virgin Mary, what he ſays concerning the prayers of Joachim and St Anne, and the revelation of the angel (9); but does not he himſelf confeſs, that there went about very abſurd traditions concerning the birth of Mary? does he not quote a book upon this matter, in which were abominable things (10)? Does he not ſay, that the reaſon aſſigned there of Zachary's loſing his ſpeech in the temple, was becauſe he had ſeen a man in the ſhape of an aſs? He was preparing to go out, and to ſay, Woe be to you, what deity do you worſhip? But that deity, to hinder him, made him ſpeechleſs: when he had recovered the uſe of his ſpeech, and revealed what he ſaw, he was killed. St Epiphanius adds, that they found in the ſame book, that the reaſon why the legiſlator had ordered the high-prieſt to wear little bells, was this, that this deity might have time to hide himſelf, that he might not diſcover his figure of an aſs; ſo that to prevent being ſurpriſed, the ſound of the bells was to give him warning, that the high-prieſt was coming. I am ſenſible that all traditions do not deſerve to be rejected like theſe; but however, we have no ſolid reaſon to aſſure us, that thoſe which St Epiphanius has eſpouſed, had any good foundation. This is ſo true, that St Auguſtin makes no ſcruple to take thoſe traditions which made Joachim, the Holy Virgin's father, a prieſt, for uncertain and apocryphal. ‘ Quod de generatione Mariæ Fauſtus poſuit quod patrem habuerit ex tribu Levi ſacerdotem quendam nomine Joachim, quia Canonicum non eſt, non me conſtringit (11).’ He adds, that it was poſſible for one and the ſame perſon to deſcend from two tribes; and concludes, that if he was obliged to pay any deference to apocryphal writings, he would thus reſolve the objection of the Manichee: ‘ Hoc ego potius vel tale aliquid crederem, ſi illius apocryphæ ſcripturæ ubi Joachim pater Mariæ legitur, autoritate detinerer, quam mentiri Evangelium in quo ſcriptum eſt, &c.

Would you have any other proofs of the uncertainty of theſe traditions, do but conſider Baronius's conduct, he has rejected part of the things that are ſaid concerning the father and mother of the Holy Virgin; he ſays in expreſs words, that the book fathered upon St Jerome, is the work of an unknown and ignorant perſon, who was incapable of avoiding manifeſt falſities. ‘ Non tantum eam Hieronymi non eſſe dixerimus, ſed auctoris plane ut ignoti, ſic prorſus imperiti, qui in ea condenda & conſcribenda non novit aperta vitare mendacia, dum ait illis temporibus quibus ea acciderunt fuiſſe Iſachar ſummum pontificem (12). He declares, that though that book has many truths in it, he will not build upon it (13). He therefore overturns one part of the foundation. You may ſee how Caſaubon overturns the other: he ſhews, that the book de Nativitate S. Mariæ, falſly attributed to St Jerome, was written by a Manichee, and abounds with impious and impertinent things. A peſtilentiſſimo hæretico profectum, poſtremo nugarum & impietatum eſſe plenum (14). He wonders that the Jeſuit Chriſtopher de Caſtro durſt declare for ſuch a book, the impoſture whereof was ſo well known to Eraſmus, Melchior Canus, Sixtus Senenſis, and Baronius.

(3) Gregorius Nyſſenus, Orat. in Natal. Domini, apud Baronium, ubi ſupra, n. 44.

(4) Sophronius apud Rivetum, Apolog. pro Sanctiſſ. Virg. Maria, cap iii, Oper. Tom. III, pag. 605, col. 2.

(5) Bernard. Epiſt. clxxiv, ad Canon. Lugdun. apud Rivetum, ibid. pag. 608.

(6) Stellarii coronæ, lib. iv, Part. II, artic. i, apud Rivetum, ibid.

(7) Epiphanius Adverſ. Collyridianos, pag. m. 1062.

(8) Relazione della Vita del Cavagl. Borri, pag. 351.

(9) See his words in the foregoing remark.

(10) Γέννων μὲν γὰρ Μαρίας βιβλίον τί φασίν εἶναι, ἐν ᾧ δεινά τε καὶ ὀλέθρια ὑποβάλλοντες τινα ἐκεῖσε λέγουσιν. Cujuſmodi eſt qui de progenie Mariæ liber inſcribitur, in quo horribilia quædam ac deteſtanda illorum dicta continentur. Epiphan. adv. Hæreſ. pag. 94.

(11) Auguſtin. contra Fauſtum Manich. lib. xxiii, cap. ix, apud Rivetum ubi ſupra, pag. 604, 605.

(12) Baronias, ubi ſupra, n. 44.

(13) Nec innitimur ſcriptioni illi quæ hactenus Hieronymi nomine ad Cromatium & Heliodorum ſcripta vulgata eſt, nam licet in ea complura veritate conſtantia conſcripta reperiantur, quæ à dictis auctoribus ſibi vindicent auctoritatem & fidem, tamen, &c. Id. ibid.

(14) Caſaub. Exerc. ad Baron. I, n. 15, pag. m. 90.

I have mentioned, has been aſſerted, and feaſts have been conſecrated to St Joachim, and his wife [E]. Some (a) have believed that ſhe had three daughters by her marriage; others, that St Anne was married three times; and that ſhe had one daughter by every huſband.

us. He cites a paſſage out of it, which ſupplies me with a ſtrong proof. ‘ Illud liberè dico quod fidelium neminem negaturum puto; ſive hæc vera ſunt, ſive ab aliquo conficta ſacroſancta S. Mariæ miracula præceſſiſſe; maxima conſecuta fuiſſe; & idcirco ſalva fide, ab iis qui Deum facere iſta poſſe credunt, ſine periculo animæ ſuæ credi & legi poſſe (15).—— This I ſpeak freely, and I believe none of the faithful will deny it whether theſe miracles of the holy Mary were true, or whether they were forged before-hand, mighty things followed after, and in reſpect to theſe, they who believe that to GOD belongs the power of doing ſuch things, may ſafely, and without peril of their ſouls read and receive them.’ Theſe are not the words of the Manichean Seleucus (16), the author of the book, but of the Latin tranſlator; and it is worth while to obſerve, that he confeſſes there are many falſities in the book he tranſlates. ‘ Impietas iſtius Pſeudohieronymi excuſari ſalvo pudore non poteſt: nam quum fateatur, Seleucum, ſive Leucium de doctrina Apoſtolorum multa eſſe mentitum; ea tamen defendit, quæ ſunt ab eodem hæretico ſcripta de virtutibus & miraculis eorum. Poterat-ne hic planus apertiùs oſtendere, nullam ſibi eſſe curam veritatis, neque ullum ſe inter falſum & verum ſtatuere diſcrimen? Addit de eo ipſo libro quem vertebat: ita & his multa non vera de corde ſuo confingit (17). —— The impiety of this falſe-Jerom, cannot, with any modeſty, be excuſed; for altho' he confeſſes, that Seleucus, or Leucius, told many lies, as to the doctrine of the Apoſtles, yet he defends thoſe things which that Heretic has written concerning their virtues and miracles. Was it poſſible for him to have ſhewn more plainly, that he had no regard to truth, nor made any difference between truth and falſehood? He adds alſo, in reſpect to the book he tranſlated: He inſerts many other things of his own head which are not true.’ Do we need any more towards a full conviction of the uncertainty of all theſe traditions. That which St Gregory Nyſſen alledges, is palpably falſe (18). As to Nicephorus Calliſtus, Germanus patriarch of Conſtantinople, John Damaſcen, &c, they deſerve no credit, becauſe they lived in an age too remote from the fountain-head, to have theſe traditions uncorrupted. Beſides every one knows, that Nicephorus is a fabulous and injudicious writer (19). We are not obliged to believe that he has rightly quoted Hippolytus biſhop of Porto. However, what he cites out of him, contains ſome falſities, as Caſaubon ſhews. See the Bibliotheque Univerſelle (20). Rivetus is in the right to think it ſtrange, that Richard Mountague ſhould aſſent to moſt of the ſtories which Bernardinus of Buſti, Pelvartus of Temeſwaer, Coſterus, and ſuch like writers have adopted concerning our St Joachim (21).

I wonder how the abbot de Marolles could pay ſo much deference to the above-mentioned traditions. See the 235th page of his Memoirs.

[E] Yet feaſts have been conſecrated to St Joachim and his wife.] The huſband arrived to that honour later than the wife: it was not given him before the ſecond of December, 1622. The day appointed for him is the twentieth of March (22); but the feaſt of St Anne was inſtituted in 1584. At firſt it was not neceſſary by a neceſſity of precept to abſtain from work: It did not arrive to that prerogative till the year 1622 (23). In all other things the worſhip of St Joachim is very inferior to that of his wife. She is the patroneſs of an order of nuns, called the Daughters of St Joſeph (24), and there is much talk of her miracles. The village of Ker-Anne, in the dioceſe of Tannes in Bretagne, is very famous upon that account, and eſpecially, ſince an old image of this ſaint has been dug up, which had been long hid under ground. It was revealed to a huſbandman in the year 1625, where this image was to be found. As ſoon as it was dug up, it performed abundance of miracles. They were quickly in a condition to build her a fine church; the alms of devout ſouls, who flocked thither from all parts, furniſhed enough for the expence. The biſhop of Vannes procured from Rome the neceſſary indulgences for thoſe that ſhould viſit this image; and gave the direction of this new church to the reformed Carmelites, and permitted brother Hugh of St Francis, one of them, to publiſh the miracles which had been lately wrought in thoſe parts (25).

JOAN, Queen of Naples. See NAPLES.

JOB, whoſe patience has been deſcribed in one of the canonical books of the old Teſtament. Not to repeat what we find in Moreri, I content myſelf with obſerving ſome errors. It is a miſtake to affirm, that the Turks have a great veneration for the ſepulchre of this holy man [A], the firſt judge of Solomon's court [B]. It is a ſcandalous

[A] It is a miſtake to affirm, that the Turks have a great veneration for the ſepulchre of Job.] Here is a paſſage of Sir Paul Ricaut (1). ‘ It is the cuſtom of the Turks, as often as there is a new emperor, to conduct him with all imaginable pomp, to the place of the ſuburbs of Conſtantinople, which they call Job, where there is an antient ſepulchre of a certain prophet, or holy man, whom the Turks, who have no knowledge of antiquity or hiſtory, pretend to be the ſame Job, who for ſo many ages has been a pattern of conſtancy and patience.’ The French tranſlator of Sir Paul Ricaut, makes an obſervation upon theſe words, that deſerve to be mentioned: ‘ I believe, ſays he (2), that ſome Turks, unacquainted with Hiſtory and Chronology, may take the ſepulchre of Job, which is under the walls of Conſtantinople, for that of the holy man, whoſe hiſtory is related in the old Teſtament; but the Mahometan hiſtorians tell us themſelves, that this ſepulchre was built for another Job, who was a Mahometan, and one of the companions of Mahomet. He was killed at the ſiege of Conſtantinople, which was attacked by Jezid, ſon of the calif Moavias, in the fifty ſecond year of the Hegira, or the ſix hundred and ſeventy ſecond of Jeſus Chriſt. This is what Elmacinus obſerves in his hiſtory of the Saracens, chap. 7. book 1, and though Elmacinus was a Chriſtian, yet he only relates what he found in the Mahometan Hiſtorians, which he owns to have abridged.’ One of the moſt learned rabbies of the XVIIth century has been in the ſame error with theſe ignorant Turks; for he affirms (3), ‘ that the Mahometans have ſtill a great veneration for the ſepulchre of Job, which is at Conſtantinople (4). ‘ . . . . . Doubtleſs he did not know that it is the ſepulchre of a different Job, from that of the old Teſtament, and he was ſo ridiculous as to believe, that all the Mahometans took it for the ſepulchre of this holy man.’

[B] The firſt judge of Solomon's court.] Here is another paſſage of Sir Paul Ricaut. ‘ The Turks, ſays he (5), ſo confound hiſtory for want of underſtanding Chronology, that they ſay Job was the firſt judge of Solomon's court, and that Alexander the Great was the general of his armies.’ Here is a good criticiſm upon theſe words (6). ‘ The Engliſh author has taken this from Busbequius, but has not well underſtood his meaning. For Busbequius does not ſay that the Turks believed Job to be the firſt judge of Solomon's court, and Alexander to be the general of his army; but only that they underſtand Chronology and Hiſtory ſo little, that if ſuch a thing ſhould come into their heads, they would make no ſcruple to affirm, that Job was the firſt judge of Solomon's court, and Alexander the Great the general of his army. There is a great deal of difference betwixt theſe two things.’ See Busbequius, epiſt. 1. Sir Paul Ricaut's error has already crept into ſome books (7).

[C] It

(a) See Baronius, in Apparatu, n. 41.

(15) Id. ibid. pag. 91.

(16) Others call him Leucius, or Leontius. Id. ib.

(17) Id. ibid.

(18) See, above, remark [B].

(19) Nicephorum hunc fabuloſiſſimum eſſe ſcriptorem, & judicii in literis nullius, ſatis notum eſt eruditis. Caſaub. ubi ſupra.

(20) Pag. 143, & ſeq. of the eleventh Tome.

(21) Rivet. Apolog pro S. S. Maria, cap. iii, Oper. Tom. III, pag. 607.

(22) Spondanus, Annal. ad ann. 1622, n. 1.

(23) Id. ibid.

(24) See the book intituled, Les grandeurs de Sainte Anne. It is mentioned in the Bibliotheque Univerſelle, Tom. XI, pag. 141.

(25) Taken from Spondanus, ad ann. 1625, n. 3.

(1) Ricaut's Preſent State of the Ottoman Empire, tranſlated by Beſpier, book i, pag. 16.

(2) Beſpier, Remarques curieuſes ſur l'Etat Preſent de l'Empire Ottoman, pag. 4.

(3) Menaſſeh Ben Iſrael de Reſurrect. Mortuor. lib. i, cap xvi, apud Beſpier, ibid. pag 5.

(4) Beſpier, ibid

(5) Ricaut, ubi ſupra.

(6) Beſpier, ubi ſupra, pag 6.

(7) Berreman has copied it in his Variæ Lectiones, pag. 260.

lous impudence to ſay, that Job's diſtemper was the pox [C]. I confeſs, that in the church of Rome, he is the patron of thoſe who have the pox [D]; but this does not prove the other ſuppoſition. He was worſhipped in that church before the pox was known in Europe [E]. Tertullian is in an error, to ſay, that Job left no poſterity. See thereupon Mr Spanheim (a) in his hiſtory of Job, which is a very good book.

(a) Frideric. Spanhemius, F. Hiſtoria Jobi, cap. xv, pag. 481.

[C] It is a ſcandalous impudence to ſay that Job's diſtemper was the pox.] Guy Patin names two famous authors who have ſaid this. Theſe are his words: (8) 'Pour 'repondre à ce que vous me mandez, je vous dirai que Bolduc Capuchin a écrit auſſi bien que Pineda 'Jeſuite Eſpagnol que Job avoit la verole. Je croirois volontiers que David & Solomon l'avoient auſſi. '—— In anſwer to your queſtion, I will tell you that 'Bolduc, a Capuchin, and Pineda, a Spaniſh Jeſuit, 'have affirmed, that Job had the pox; I could eaſily 'believe that David and Solomon had it alſo.' Note, that it may be ſaid, that Job had this ugly diſtemper, without having committed any act of impurity that had brought it upon him.

[D] He is the patron of thoſe who have the pox.] Conſult Molanus's Diarium Medicorum Eccleſiaſticum, where you will find theſe words under the tenth of May, which is St Job's day. 'Volunt nonnulli Sanctum 'Job peculiarem patronum eſſe eorum qui lue venerea laborant aut eam curant (9). —— Some ſay 'that St Job is the particular patron of theſe that have 'the pox, or that cure it.'

[E] He was worſhipped . . . . . before the pox was known in Europe.] The ſame Molanus cautions us not to admit of Agrippa's error, who ventures to ſay, that the pox was the cauſe of Job's canonization. Before this, ſays Molanus, there was at Venice a church, and a feaſt appointed for this holy man, who from Charlemagne's time has been inſerted in the Martyrology. 'Cavendus eſt H. Cornelius Agrippa, qui vane ſcripſit 'luem Veneream Job in divos retuliſſe. Quaſi non 'multo ante Veneti memoriam ejus & templo & feſto 'die celebrarint, conſtet quoque Uſuardum Caroli Magni 'ætate & Wandelbertum non multo poſt, Martyrologiis ſuis eum inſeruiſſe. Et à Græcis ad ſextum 'diem Maii notatur ſanctus & juſtus Job, qui multa 'contra Satanam certamina ſuſtinuit (10). —— We are 'to take care therefore, of believing what H. Cornelius 'Agrippa has vainly written, that the Venereal diſeaſe 'brought Job into the number of the ſaints. Though a 'long while before, the Venetians had celebrated his memory, by dedicating thereto both a church and feaſt 'day, and it is certain that Uſuardus, in the time of 'Charles the Great, and Wandelbertus, a little after, 'inſerted his name in their Martyrologies: and by the 'Greeks, the ſixth day of May is diſtinguiſhed in honour of holy and righteous Job, who ſuſtained many 'and ſharp conflicts with Satan.' A famous Proteſtant divine, who has in ſome meaſure taken Agrippa's part in this reſpect, obſerves, that there is at Utrecht an hoſpital, where they take care of thoſe that are infected with the pox, and that it goes by the name of Job. 'Dici poteſt ad defenſionem Agrippæ, 'Jobum inter divos tutelares & quidem fœdi iſtius morbi, poſt ejuſdem morbi exortum, demum fuiſſe relatum. Quidquit ſit, tanquam divus alexicacus ab hujus morbi myſtis, annuente Romana Eccleſia ſalutatur. Hinc in hac urbe Xenodochium S. Jobi olim 'dominante papatu conſtitutum, ubi illo morbo laborantes curari ſolent (11). —— This however may be 'ſaid, in defence of Agrippa, that Job was received 'into the number of tutelar ſaints, and even of that 'filthy diſeaſe he mentions, within a ſhort time after 'it's firſt breaking cut. However it be, he is addreſſed for the cure of all evils of this kind, with 'the conſent of the Romiſh church, and hence it is, 'that a hoſpital, erected in this city, was put under 'his patronage, becauſe perſons inflicted with this diſeaſe, were received into it, and cured there.' It was not long ſince the queſtion was diſcuſſed at Rome, whether Job and the other ſaints of the old Teſtament, deſerved the worſhip that is paid to canonized ſaints, and whether altars ought to be built to them. Conſult upon this Acta Sanctorum Maii (12).

(8) Patin, Letter cccLxviii, pag. 102, of the third Tome.

(9) Molanus, in Diario Medicor. pag. 68.

(10) Id. ibid. pag. 69.

(11) Giſb. Voët. Diſputat. Theol. Tom. III, pag. 435, 436.

(12) There is a diſſertation upon this in the Appendixes to the ſixth and ſeventh volumes. See alſo Journ. des Sçav. March 5, 1703, in the extract of a book of Mr Baillet.

JODELLE (Stephen) a French and Latin poet in the XVIth century, was of Paris (a). He was one of the Pleiad invented by Ronſard (b). Some make him the firſt inventer of French verſes compoſed like the Latin, according to the quantity of ſyllables; but others aſcribe this to Baif (c). It makes little for their glory to ſettle the truth of this matter; for that invention quickly fell into contempt. There is more reaſon for pretending, that Jodelle was the firſt Frenchman, who gave in his language tragedy and comedy in the ancient form (d). He had an incredible facility in making verſes [A], and poſſeſſed ſeveral other talents. He was an orator, underſtood Architecture, Painting, and Sculpture, and was well skill'd in managing arms (e). He made profeſſion of being a man of the ſword (f). His birth gave him that privilege [B]. He died in July 1573, being forty one years of age. See the margin (g). His friends publiſhed a collection of his works the following year (h). It has been wrongfully ſaid that he died with hunger, as a puniſhment for his impieties [C], and he has been falſly cried down as a pagan

(a) La Croix du Maine, & du Verdier, Bibl. Françoiſe.

(b) Baillet, Jugem. ſur les Poëtes, artic. 1342. Menage, cap. cx, of the Anti Baillet.

(c) See the Anti-Baillet, chap. cxi.

(d) Du Verdier, Bibliotheque Françoiſe, pag. 285. See alſo Paſquier, Recherches, lib. vii, chap. vii.

(e) Du Verdier, ibid.

(f) Id. ibid.

(g) Mr Varillas is miſtaken when he ſuppoſes, Hiſt. de Henri III, livr. xii, pag. m. 267, that Jodelle was living under the reign of Henry III. He ſays, that the ſeven French Poets, who were called the Pleiad, having made merry for a whole month at that prince's charges, in a tavern near a gate of Neſle, went out ſinging: Long live tyranny, we have ſpent thirty ſix thouſand livres.

(h) Du Verdier, ubi ſupra, pag. 284, 285.

[A] He had an incredible facility of making verſes.] This I have from du Verdier Vau-Privas (1), in theſe words. 'He was admirable in one thing, which is al'moſt incredible, viz. that all his compoſures were 'quickly made, without ſtudy and pains; and we can, 'with ſeveral perſons that are now living, teſtify, 'that the longeſt and moſt difficult tragedy or comedy 'has not taken him up above ten mornings: nay, the 'comedy intituled Eugene, was made at four ſittings. 'He has been ſeen in his youth to compoſe and 'write in one night for a wager, five hundred good 'Latin verſes, on a ſubject given him on the ſpot. 'All his ſonnets, even thoſe that were meerly accidental, were made by him as he was walking, and amuſing himſelf with other things, ſo ſuddenly, that 'when he pronounced them, people thought he had 'not yet began them.' We need not wonder then at his numerous productions. It is ſaid that he compoſed about ten thouſand verſes upon the paſſage of the Rubicon (2). If his friends had publiſhed all his pieces, how many thouſands of verſes would they have amounted to? he made all ſorts of verſes, elogies, odes, ſonnets, ſongs, inſcriptions, and canticles (3). He made a Poem againſt the ſin of Sodomy (4).

[B] His birth gave him that privilege.] He was a gentleman who had a lordſhip; for he took the title of Seigneur du Lymodin (5). I believe it was a patrimonial eſtate.

[C] It has been wrongfully ſaid, that he died with hunger, as a puniſhment for his impieties.] Voetius relates (6), that upon his reading in Honſdorf's Theatrum, that Stephen Jodelle, a French Poet, an Epicurean and an Atheiſt, ſpent all his eſtate, and died of hunger (7), he carefully inquired whether the thing was true; but that his library could give him no light into it, which obliged him to conſult Rivetus. By which means he found that there was no track of Atheiſm to be ſeen in Jodelle's works; but on the contrary, ſeveral tokens of Orthodoxy; and that poſſibly, the

(1) Bibliotheque, Françoiſe, pag. 286.

(2) La Croix du Maine, Biblioth. pag. 78.

(3) Du Verdier, ubi ſupra.

(4) La Croix du Maine, ubi ſupra.

(5) Du Verdier, ubi ſupra, pag. 285. See alſo la Croix du Maine, ibid.

(6) Voët. Diſput. Tom. I. pag. 137.

(7) Meminit Honſdorf. dicto libro exemplorum ad Decalogum, Lipſiæ in fol. ann. 1570, Edit. dilapidatis bonis Stephani Jodelli Gallici Poëtæ, quem Epicureum & Atheum inedia confectum dicit. Voëtius, ibid.

a Pagan, becauſe in a carnival ſport his friends ſacrificed a goat to him [D]. I dare not give credit accuſation of impiety, which was charged upon him, had no other foundation than the ſacrifice of a goat (8), which was offered to Jodelle, as being the head of the tragic Poets ; and was only a meer ſport, if we will believe the author of Ronſard's life. Nevertheleſs, Rivetus durſt not determine whether for that one action Jodelle does not deſerve to be reckoned an Atheiſt. Voetius acquieſces in that judgment : he grants with his friend, that if there be no more authentic proofs of Jodelle's Atheiſm, one cannot affirm that he was guilty of it ; but in the mean time he will not acquit him, and leaves it as a diſputable thing. In medio relinquit (Rivetus) an ob idem factum Atheus ſit dicendus, niſi aliunde alia authentica teſtimonia ſuppetant. In cujus ſententia & nos acquieſcimus (9). It is not probable that the compiler Honſdorf, goes upon this pretended ſacrifice : he gives Jodelle the character of a debauchee, who had ſquandered his eſtate. It is therefore upon an habitual ſin that he goes, and not upon the farce of a pretended ſacrifice ; a thing done but once, and which may be as well imputed to the other wits of whom Honſdorf ſays not a word, as to Jodelle. We may therefore ſay, that this compiler of examples of the divine juſtice, is groſsly miſtaken ; and yet we ſee two famous divines, who equal his accuſation, though deſtitute of all ſorts of proof, againſt the teſtimonies of orthodoxy, which appear in the books of the accuſed : they fancy themſelves equitable enough, provided they neither condemn nor acquit him. How little do they follow theſe maxims, 'Quilibet præſumitur bonus donec probetur malus. Actore non probante abſolvitur reus ? —— Every man is preſumed to be good till he be proved to be bad. A man is acquitted if the crimes he was charged with cannot be proved.' We muſt take notice, that Honſdorf's tranſcribers, or thoſe whom he has tranſcribed, be they never ſo numerous, do not amount altogether to the authority of a ſingle witneſs, while they quote no body, or only cite one another (10). For the reſt, I do not pretend to deny that Jodelle died poor (11). I do not know but Gentillet was the firſt original of all thoſe compilers, who have mentioned Jodelle, as an inſtance of divine vengeance upon impious men. 'We might alledge, ſays he (12), infinite examples of the judgment and vengeance of GOD, exerciſed againſt Atheiſts, deſpiſers of GOD and religion, even of our own time ; as for inſtance, the tragic Poet Jodelle, who made a true tragical end ; for having eaten up his patrimony like an Epicure, he died miſerably of hunger.' I have found part of theſe words in a book printed at Morges, in the year 1581, intituled, Punitions & jugemens de Dieu, &c. and in a book printed in 1586, and written by John Chaſſanion, of Moniſtrol, in Vellay, with this title, Memorable Hiſtories of the great and wonderful Puniſhments and Judgments of GOD, &c. (13).

[D] His friends ſacrificed a goat to him.] Claudius Binet (14) tells us, how this farce was acted. 'They (15) blamed him, amongſt other things, for having ſacrificed a goat to Jodelle, in the village of Hercueil (16) ; but he gives a ſufficient anſwer to that particular accuſation, which is this. Jodelle cauſed the tragedy of Cleopatra to be acted before the king, which every body ſo applauded, that ſome days after, when the whole club of the Poets were together in that village, to paſs away the time, and enjoy themſelves in the licentious days of the carnival, every one of them made ſome verſes in imitation of the Bacchannalia of the antients. A goat happened to go in the ſtreet, which gave them an opportunity to play the fool, as well becauſe he was formerly ſacrificed to Bacchus, as becauſe they had a mind to offer him to Jodelle, as a recompence for his tragedy, according to the antient cuſtom, to which the Chriſtians themſelves, and eſpecially the Poets, have recourſe now and then, not out of any belief, but by way of alluſion : and that which gave occaſion to believe ſomething of it, was the verſes and pranks of thoſe Poets, which were publiſhed, particularly the Dithyrambics of Bertrand Berger, a Dithyrambic Poet, in which were theſe verſes. . . . . . . All this was but fiction and maſquerade.' Perhaps the reader will not be diſpleaſed to find here Ronſard's anſwer, which Binet has only pointed at. Here it is.

Tu dis en vomiſſant deſſus moy ta malice,
Que j'ay fait d'un grand Bouc à Bacchus ſacrifice :
Tu ments impudemment : cinquante gens de bien
Qui eſtoient au banquet diront qu'il n'en eſt rien.
Muſes qui habitez de Parnaſſe la crope,
Filles de Jupiter, qui allez neuf en trope,
Venez & repouſſez par vos belles chanſons,
L'injure fait à vous & à vos nouriſſons,
Jodelle ayant gaigne par une voix hardie
L'honneur que l'homme Grec donne à la Tragedie,
Pour avoir en hauſſant le bas ſtile François,
Contenté doctement lea oreilles des Rois.
La brigade qui lors au ciel levoit la teſte
(Quand le temps permettoit une licence honneſte)
Honorant ſon eſprit gaillard & bien appris,
Luy fit preſent d'un Bouc, des Tragiques le prix.
Jà la nappe eſtoit miſe, & la table garnie
Se bordoit d'une ſaincte & docte compagnie :
Quand deux ou trois enſemble en riant ont pouſſé
Le pere du troupeau à long poil heriſſé :
Il venoit à grands pas ayant la barbe peinte,
D'un chapelet de fleurs la teſte il avoit ceinte,
Le bouquet ſur l'oreille, & bien fier ſe ſentoit
Dequoy telle jeuneſſe ainſi le preſentoit :
Puis il fut rejetté pour choſe meſpriſée
Apres qu'il eut ſervy d'une longue riſée,
Et non ſacrifié, comme tu dis menteur,
De telle faulſe bourde impudent inventeur (17).

1.

In the height of your malice you tell it about,
That one day to Bacchus I offer'd a goat.
Why, good Sir, you lie, full fifty were there,
And ſaw no ſuch thing, as they all will declare.

2.

Ye Muſes who dwell on Parnaſſus's top,
Ye daughters of Jove, who run nine in a troop,
Come hither and lend me your aid to chaſtize
Whoever or you, or your ſcholars, belies.

3.

Jodelle having reach'd in the tragedy ſtrain,
That point of perfection the Greeks did ordain,
While his muſe in French verſe, with ſuch energy ſings,
As well might content an audience of kings.

4.

A brigade of bright wits, on this triumph thought fit
To make uſe of that freedom the age doth permit ;
And as the reward of his skill they deviſe
To preſent him a GOAT . . . the old tragedy prize.

5.

The cloth being laid, and the table deck'd out,
And a circle of honeſt and wiſe men about,
The old head of the herd, with form was brought in,
By folks who ne'er dreamt that their joke was a ſin.

6.

With a motion moſt ſolemn, the Goat too appear'd,
His head crown'd with ribbons, and painted his beard ;
At his ear ſtuck a noſegay, thus ſtalking along,
He ſeem'd joy'd with his honours, and pleas'd with the throng.

7.

At length the poor Goat was allow'd to turn tail,
When long they had laugh'd, and the jeſt was grown ſtale,
Nor never was offer'd, as you folks perſuade,
And baſely report the vile lie you have made.

Of

---

(8) See the following remark.

(9) Voëtius, ubi ſupra.

(10) You will find the following paſſage in Konig's Bibliotheca, at the word Jodellius: Georgius Richterus Gorlicenſis in Axiom. Eccleſ. n. 108, ſeqq habet : Memoria noſtra Jodellius, tragœdiarum ſcriptor, tragicum exitum invenit : nam luxu, ganea, ſtupris, ex Epicureorum diſciplina, patrimonium cum conſumpſiſſet, miſerrimo genere mortis fame periit.

(11) See the article FINÆUS, remark [D], at the end.

(12) Gentillet, Diſcours ſur les moiens de bien Gouverner contre Nicolas Machiavel, Part. II, pag. 179. Edit. 1576.

(13) Book ii, chap. xxiv, pag. 170.

(14) In Ronſard's Life, pag. m. 139.

(15) He ſpeaks of two miniſters, who had writ againſt Ronſard.

(16) I think it ſhould be Arcueil.

(17) Ronſard, in the Anſwer to ſome miniſters, pag. 92, of the ninth Tome of his works, Edit. of Paris, 1604, in 12mo.

credit to what I have read in Beza's life [E]. You will find a great many things relating

Of whatever party a man may be, he carries things too far; and we are often impoſed upon by popular reports. The miniſters did raſhly give credit to the ſtories that were ſpread concerning Jodelle's goat: and becauſe Ronſard ſet up for a perſecutor, for he wrote againſt the Proteſtants, and fell upon them at the head of the militia, they upbraided him with the ceremony of the goat, putting the worſt conſtruction upon it. They called it a Pagan ſacrifice, and maintained, that the goat had been ſacrificed to a falſe god. It was a calumny, but they were not the inventers of it. I ſhall quote Scaliger, who ſays, that a prieſt gave birth to that impoſture; and it is to be obſerved, that he has rejected this pretended ſacrifice as a fable. I know not whether he remembered, that ſome miniſters had accuſed Ronſard of it; but I know very well, that he believed his adverſary Scioppius had brought him (Scaliger) upon the ſtage with the others. Theſe are his words.

‘Aſt illud, quod adjiciemus, omnia portenta amphitheatrica ſuperat. Pariſienſes illos amicos tuos imitaris, quos Dionyſia agitaſſe, & hircum immolaſſe fama eſt. Dionyſia agitare, dicit eſſe hircum immolare. Hujus enim inſimulati ſunt illi, de quibus nunc agitur. Veſpillonis filius, qui nunquam Lutetiæ fuit, in media Suburra habitans Romæ, unde hoc mendacium expiſcari potuit, niſi à quibus reliqua portenta didicit? Quos putat Dionyſia agitaſſe, vel hircum immolaſſe, ut illi perſuaſerunt qui verum dicere, etiam ſi velint, non poſſint, ii ſunt, Petrus Ronſardus, M. Anton. Muretus, Janus Baïfius, Remigius Bellaqueus, Stephanus Jodellus, Nicol. Deniſottus, Joan. Auratus, alii, omnes poëtæ, præter Patoletum, qui in hiſtoriis conſcribendis omne ſtudium ſuum collocarat. Quos tam falſum eſt adeo execrandum, nefandum, impium facinus feciſſe, quam certum eſt, impune illis futurum non fuiſſe, ſiquidem jam Chriſtianæ pietatis, quam exiſtimationis ſuæ obliti tam deteſtabile ſcelus in ſe admiſiſſent. Si illi docti viri viverent, fur non inultum tuliſſet. Porro tam impudentis calumniæ auctor fuit ſacrificulus Gentiliaci vici, in quo illi doctiſſimi viri de conſtituto coierant, ut de ſymbolis eſſent. Totum drama exponerem, ſi opus eſſet, ut Joſephus me docuit, qui illud ad unguem tenet (18). —— But what we are going to relate exceeds all the wonders of the amphitheatre. You imitate thoſe friends at Paris, who are reported to have held feaſts in honour to Bacchus, and to have ſacrificed a goat to him. To celebrate the Dionyſia he ſays was to ſacrifice a goat, and this is what is inſinuated of thoſe of whom we are ſpeaking. The ſon of an Undertaker who never was at Paris, but lived in the middle of the Suburra at Rome, where could he pick up ſuch a ſtory as this, but from thoſe who told him the reſt of his wonders? Thoſe whom he thought to have kept theſe feaſts, and to have ſacrificed a goat being ſo perſuaded by perſons who could not tell him truth if they would, were Peter Ronſard, M. Anthony Muret, Janus Baïf, Remy Belleau, Stephen Jodelle, Nicol. Deniſot, John Dorat, and others, all poets except Patolet, who had applied himſelf wholly to writing hiſtory. That theſe were guilty of ſo execrable a villany, is a fact as falſe as it is certain that they would never have eſcaped unpuniſhed, if forgetting their duty as Chriſtians, and what they owed to their own reputations, they could have ſuffered ſo deteſtable a thing to have entered their hearts. If theſe learned men were living, this fellow would not have eſcaped ſo. The author of this impudent calumny was a prieſt in the village of Chantilly, where theſe learned men uſed to meet and converſe together. I could explain the whole affair, if there was a neceſſity for it, as Joſeph Scaliger himſelf told it me, who had the ſtory at his fingers ends.’ All goes well hitherto; I wiſh what follows was as juſt. ‘Sed ponamus verum eſſe. Quid hæc ad Joſephum, qui tunc puer Burdigalæ primis rudimentis Latini ſermonis initiabatur? An quia ſexto poſt, ſeptimo, & octavo anno omnes, præter Jodellum, illos vidit, & familiariter novit, ideo ejuſdem criminis poſtulandus erit? Hoc modo oporteret omnes, qui Muretum norunt, Dionyſia agitaſſe, hoc eſt, majorem partem eorum, qui hodie Romæ agunt. Quanta invidia Joſephum premerent, ſi verum crimen haberent, quod illi objicerent, quum aliorum facta, eaque falſa illi exprobrentur (19)? —— But admitting all this to be true, what has all this to do with Scaliger, who was at that time a boy learning the rudiments of the Latin tongue at Bourdeaux? or becauſe ſix, ſeven, or eight years after he ſaw and was intimate with all thoſe perſons except Jodelle, muſt the ſame crime therefore be imputed to him? at this rate, all who knew Muret muſt be ſuppoſed to have ſacrificed to Bacchus, which will tarniſh the reputation of the major part of the preſent inhabitants of Rome. With what joy would they attack Scaliger if they had any real crime to object to him, who thus impute the crimes of others, and thoſe too which have not in them any ſhadow of truth.’

The heat of the diſpute diſturbed Scaliger's head; he goes about to clear himſelf from a thing he was not accuſed of; he complains of being calumniated when he is not, and ſo he himſelf becomes a ſlanderer (20). When it is ſaid that a man imitates the faults of his good friends, it is not preſumed that he was with them in a certain place, where they have committed ſome crime; on the contrary, it is ſuppoſed he was not with them, for if he had been, he would be called an accomplice, and not an imitator. It is not therefore true that Scioppius involved Scaliger in Jodelle's buſineſs (21), and conſequently Scaliger ſhould not have complained of it, nor alledged his being in another place.

[E] I dare not give credit to what I have read in Beza's life.] I find in it, that Stephen Jodelle, one of the poets of the French Pleiad, made a ſtanza upon Beza's being ſtruck with the plague whilſt he was tranſlating the Pſalms. The ſtanza runs thus:

Beze fut lors de la peſte accueilli
Qu'il retouchoit cette harpe immortelle.
Mais pourquoi fut Beze d'elle aſſailli?
Beze aſſailloit la peſte à tous mortelle (§ α).

The plague o'er Beza did prevail
While he to ſacred ſong inclin'd.
Why did the plague this man aſſail?
He aſſail'd the plague of human kind.

Antony la Faïe, who wrote the life of this miniſter (22), gives Jodelle the firname of Modilinus. Stephanus Jodellus Modilinus, ſays he, non poſtremus inter poëtas Pleiadis Gallicæ, &c. One may eaſily perceive that Modilinus was put in for Limodinus, a title belonging to Jodelle, on account of his lordſhip (23). But as this ſtanza is aſcribed to one Stephen de Modelin in ſeveral editions of the Pſalms, where it is placed with the epitaph of Clement Marot, compoſed by the ſame Modelin, I queſtion whether it be Jodelle's. For ſuch a poet ſhould not have been called Stephen de Modelin. On ſuch occaſions as theſe, it is not uſual to make a man known by an anagram. But I have a ſtronger reaſon than this. Beza was at Lauſanne when he was ſeized with the plague; and was then looked upon in France as an apoſtate. The perſecution was terrible againſt the Reformed; can we then believe that a poet, who profeſſed himſelf a Catholic, would have compoſed an obliging ſtanza, in Beza's praiſe, ſo agreeable to the taſte and ſtile of the Reformers? that which is certain is, that the opinion of Antony la Faïe has been followed by Andrew Rivetus (24), and Jeremiah de Pours (25).

[(§ α) It is very poſſible, that this Tetraſtich was compoſed by Jodelle when he was very young. At that time he profeſſed the Reformed Religion, in Geneva; where by that wonderful fertility of genius, which, even in off-hand compoſitions, is aſcribed to him under the letter A. by Du-Verdier-Vau-Privas, one night among others, he was ſeen to have compoſed after this manner an hundred Latin verſes, in which he decyphered the maſs, with ſuitable railleries, ſays a Proteſtant author of that time. According to all probability, Jodelle's poetry met with no great encouragement at Geneva, ſince on a ſudden he was ſeen to retake the road to Paris, and the way of that maſs, he had ſo much cried down by his Latin verſes *. For the reſt, as the Romiſh religion was become in nothing better, ſince Jodelle had thought proper to embrace it, that might be the reaſon why the Proteſtants, whom he had left, treated him as impious, and even lating to this poet in the place which I have quoted out of Stephen Paſquier.

---

(18) Scaliger, in Confutat. Fabulæ Burdonum, pag. m. 338, & ſeq.

(19) Id. ibid. pag. 340.

(20) See the eighth Tome of the Morale Pratique des Jeſuites, chap. xviii.

(21) Pariſienſes illos amicos tuos imitaris.

(22) Melch. Adam has inſerted the greateſt part of it in his Lives of ſuch divines as were not Germans.

(23) He was lord of Lymodin.

(24) He writ to Voëtius, that Stephen Jodelle had praiſed the tranſlation of the Pſalms, and even imparted to him the Stanza. Voët. ubi ſupra.

(25) In the ſecond book of the Divine Melody, pag. 586, he inſerts the ſtanza, and aſcribes it to Stephen Jodelle Modelin.

* Memoirs of the State of France, &c. Vol. I, fol. 178, verſo.

even as an Atheiſt; to which, thirty ſonnets, which he made immediately after the maſſacre of Paris, to charge the miniſters with having occaſioned the puniſhments, wars, and maſſacres, which had been ſeen in France ſince, and upon account of the Reformation, contributed not a little. It is ſaid, continues the ſame author, that Jodelle had a round ſum of crowns for theſe ſonnets; which then he muſt have ſpent in leſs than a year, if it be true, as is pretended, that, in the month of July following, he died of hunger and poverty. As for Madelin or Modilin, perhaps Jodelle thus anagrammatized the name of his lordſhip, either following the practice of the times, or not to appear plainly the author of the Tetraſtich, in which the Romiſh religion is cenſured, and Beza commended. REM. CRIT.]

JOHN (SAINT) the Evangeliſt. Not to mention here what is to be found in Moreri, or in Mr de Tillemont (a), I ſhall only ſay, I. That in St Auguſtin's time, there went about a ſilly tradition concerning the condition St John was in [A]. II. That there is nothing more abſurd than what has been ſaid againſt the author of the tranſlation of the new Teſtament of Mons [B], under the falſe pretence, that decency did not allow this holy apoſtle, and the Virgin Mary to lodge in the ſame houſe. III. That what has been anſwered to Mr Mallet hereupon, deſerves to be mentioned [C]. IV. That [A] A ſilly tradition concerning the condition of St John.] 'Never was any people ſo credulous about traditions as the Aſiatics, and in particular the Epheſians. St Auguſtin relates upon this ſubject a very particular thing, which plainly ſhews the exceſs of their credulity, and the folly of their traditions. He ſays, that ſome Epheſians *, or ſome perſons that came from Epheſus, men of great ſenſe and merit, and who were not credulous, non levibus hominibus, had aſſured him, that St John was not dead; that indeed he was buried at Epheſus, but that he was in his grave as a man that ſleeps in his bed; and that as we ſee the bed-cloaths move up and down, according as a man in his ſleep breathes, ſo the earth of the grave wherein St John was buried, was ſeen to riſe and fall in ſuch like intervals.' Can any thing be more impertinent than ſuch a ſtory (1).' I have juſt now read that Mr de Tillemont is blamed for relating this ſtory, and ſeveral others like it. There would be reaſon to blame him, if he did relate it as a truth; but this he does not do (3). It is a fault then to cenſure him; for a collection of errors is a moſt uſeful part of hiſtory. I confeſs, he ſeems to believe the ſtory of the manna of our apoſtle's grave (4).

[B] Nothing is more abſurd than what has been ſaid againſt the author of the tranſlation of the new Teſtament of Mons.] I begin with the Greek text: Καὶ ἀπ' ἐκείνης τῆς ὥρας ἔλαβεν αὐτὴν ὁ μαθητὴς εἰς τὰ ἴδια, that is to ſay, according to the verſion of Mons, and from that hour the diſciple took her into his houſe. See how this tranſlation of that paſſage has been criticiſed: 'It is certain that St John, who had embraced the ſtate of the evangelical poverty, had no houſe to receive the mother of GOD; and though he had one, there are many reaſons of decency and honeſty, which eaſily perſuade us, that the Virgin would not have thought it proper to retire thither. This conduct might even have had ill conſequences in the times to come; for ſcandalous eccleſiaſtics would have been glad to juſtify themſelves by ſo noble an example of the dwelling of the youngeſt and the chaſteſt of all the apoſtles, with the moſt modeſt and innocent of all virgins. And this apprehenſion is not groundleſs; for St Epiphanus, who ſeems to approve the thought of the Mons tranſlators, had the ſame fear, and he aſſures that ſome libertines had already pretended to cover their ſcandalous conduct with the example of the virgin's abode with St John. In the ſeventy eighth Hereſy, where he ſpeaks of this abode, Vereor, ſays he, ne hoc ipſum, quod dicimus, fraudi ſit aliquibus, ut at contubernales & dilectas, quas vocant fœminas, retinendas, quod genus peſſimo ſibi errore animi, machinati ſunt, fucum inde aliquem, & colorem arceſſiſſe videantur (6).'

[C] That what has been anſwered . . . . . deſerves to be mentioned.] For it contains general and very inſtructive principles, for ſuch as will judge of things according to their true differences. I do not inſiſt upon the anſwer which relates to the objection of the evangelical poverty: I only ſet down the confutation of the other point. 'It is very ſtrange, ſays Mr Arnauld (7), 'that Mr Mallet has not ſeen what has been obſerved by the interpreters of the Scripture, upon a ſubject which might have appeared much more ſcandalous. It is that of the Apoſtle, carrying with them a Chriſtian woman to take care of their ſubſiſtence. Nevertheleſs St Paul 1 Cor. xv. 5. ſays (8) that they had that power, and made uſe of it: whereupon Eſtius make this moſt judicious reflexion, which ſhews the true principles, by which we ought to judge of this kind of things, which Mr Mallet ſhould have known before he undertook to ſubject the Virgin to his falſe rules of decency. "If you ask, ſays this learned divine, how the Apoſtles could without ſcandal take along with them women that were not their wives. I anſwer, that this cuſtom was ſo well eſtabliſhed among the Jews, that our Saviour himſelf did not think it amiſs to do it. This was not practiſed except by women, whoſe chaſtity and piety were ſo well known and experienced, as to leave no room for any ill ſuſpicion. To which it may be added, that the Apoſtles led ſo edifying a life, and had obtained ſuch a reputation of holineſs, that tho' theſe women attended them, no one durſt make an ill judgment of them, as the Jews never ſuſpected any thing of that nature, with reſpect to our Saviour, as much diſpoſed as they were to ſlander and calumny." Nothing can be more reaſonable, and indeed it is by this we ought to judge that a thing which might give offence, when it is not attended with favourable circumſtances, that leave no room for evil ſuſpicions, is truly edifying when it is attended with thoſe circumſtances. Now when will the conſideration of an experienced holineſs be able to ſtop the mouth of calumny, and even to prevent ſuſpicions in the ſhalloweſt minds, and thoſe that are moſt apt to be prepoſſeſſed by the leaſt appearances, if the veneration which the faithful have always had for the mother of JESUS CHRIST, and for his moſt dear diſciple had not had the power to make every body look upon their living together, in conſequence of the command received from their dying Saviour, as a moſt holy and moſt innocent thing . . . . Mr Mallet (9) is the firſt and only man who has had ſo mean a notion of the holineſs of the Virgin, and of the opinion the church has entertained of her, as to imagine, that being above fifty years of age, ſhe could not live with an Apoſtle, without ſtaining her reputation, and that it was an example of dangerous conſequence, as being capable of authorizing the ſuſpected living together of women and eccleſiaſtics, which is forbidden by the canons. For thus far he carries his extravagant imaginations againſt the honour of the Virgin, But if the authors of thoſe canons had been ſo exceſſive in their ſuſpicions, as this cenſurer of the Virgin and St John, why did they except out of their prohibitions, ſuch perſons as mothers, ſiſters, and nieces? Is it becauſe they thought inceſts were abſolutely impoſſible? No certainly: but becauſe being guided by the ſpirit of GOD, and knowing that in point of general laws, all exceſs ought to be avoided, and a wiſe moderation obſerved, which obliges to overlook what ſeldom or never happens, they judged on the one hand, that there was no need of great virtue to avoid being tempted with the ſight of thoſe perſons, becauſe natural modeſty is ordinarily ſufficient to prevent the motions of an impure affection upon their account; and on the other hand, that the proneneſs of men to judge ill of their neighbours, doth not commonly go ſo far, as to impute to them ſuch black crimes, without very evident proofs: ſo that they did not believe, that, upon

'theſe

(a) Memoires pour ſervir à l'Hiſtoire Eccleſ. Tom. I. p. 910, & ſeq. Bruſſels, in 12mo.

* Auguſt. Comment. in Joan. in hæc verba, Diſcipulus ille non moritur.

(1) The abbot Faydit, Extrait d'un Sermon prêché le jour de St Polycarpe, pag. 30.

(2) Hiſt. des Ouvrages des Sçavans, for May, 1695, pag. 427.

(3) See Tillem. Memoir. pour ſervir à l'Hiſt. Eccleſ. Tom. I, pag. 947.

(4) Ib. pag. 945.

(5) The Goſpel of St John, chap. xix, ver. 27.

(6) Mallet, Examen de quelques Paſſages, pag. 321, of the third edition.

(7) Nouvelle defenſe de la Traduction, pag. 430.

(8) It is in the fifth verſe of the ninth chapter of the firſt Epiſtle to the Corinthians, and not in the fifteenth chapter, as Mr Arnauld quotes it.

(9) See the abbot Faydit, ubi ſupra, pag, 37, he proves, ibid. pag. 36, that the Holy Virgin did not go with St John to Epheſus, he proves it I ſay, becauſe Celſus, who has ſo much ſlandered her, would have reflected on that journey, which however he has not jeſted upon.

IV. That the way it is pretended St John juſtified his cheriſhing of a partridge is very natural [D]. V. That there are ſome people who pretend that the marriage in Cana where the water was changed into wine was his own [E], and that upon ſight of that miracle, he renounced marriage to live in celibacy all his life.

'these occaſions, there was any ground to fear any 'ſuch thing, or the ſuſpicion of it.'

[D] His cheriſhing of a partridge is very natural.] A Huntſman was aſtoniſhed to ſee this great apoſtle, ſo venerable for his age and virtue, ſtoop to ſuch an amuſement. The apoſtle asked him whether he always kept his bow bent. He anſwered that would be the way to make it uſeleſs. If, replied St John, you unbend your bow to prevent it's being uſeleſs, ſo do I with reſpect to my mind for the ſame reaſon. I do not believe that this ſtory is very certain; but I fancy that they who never heard of it will not be diſpleaſed to know that ſuch a thing is related. The author of the tract De ludicra dictione has inſerted it in his work. His phraſes being nervous, will not be unacceptable to the learned readers. Let us therefore entertain them therewith. Nec malus, ut opinor, interpres Chriſti conſiliorum & voluntatum Joannes diſcipulus, qui ad leves luſus atque oblectamenta puerorum deſcendit ipſe jam ſenior, atque exemplo præivit, quatenus interjungere, & ex quotidianis occupationibus reficere ac recreare mentem licet. Hunc, manſuefactæ perdici blande & ſuaviter alludentem, quidam cum arcu & ſagittis venator offendit. Quod eum facere cum vehementer miraretur, hominem id ætatis, ſpectatum & cognitum diuturna virtute: ſenſit Joannes, & interrogavit, an illum ipſum, quem gereret, arcum haberet ſemper intentum. Cui ille, Nequaquam vero, inquit: flacceſcat enim arcus, & molliatur intentione perpetua, inutiliſque fiat. Tum Joannes, Tu, mi homo, arcum remittis ac relaxas, ne inutilis ſit: ego animum, ne ſit inutilis (10).

[E] Some people pretend that the marriage in Cana .... was his.] The curious and learned Thomaſius will ſupply me with all the materials of this remark. I ſhould be glad to have the theſis which he cauſed to be maintained (11) concerning St John's glaſs: but I have only the preface of it (12), from which I learn a cuſtom that I was ignorant of; which is that at great entertainments, they fill out to the gueſts a glaſs of wine, which they call the glaſs, or cup, of St John. This is not without ſome mixture of ſuperſtition, which has derived it's original from a legend, wherein we find that St John having ſwallowed poiſon by the order of Ariſtodemus found no inconvenience from it. This is the reaſon doubtleſs, why the Painters repreſent him with a cup in his hand. I proceed to the marriage of Cana.

The Legendaries ſuppoſe. I. That St John the Evangeliſt, and Mary Magdalen were the two betrothed perſons (13). II. That both of them agreed not to conſummate the marriage, but to engage themſelves to a perpetual virginity. III. That as ſoon as St John ſaw the miracle of water converted into wine, he conſecrated himſelf to the ſervice of Jesus Christ, and left his bride (14). IV. That Jesus Christ went on purpoſe to the wedding to prevent the accompliſhment of the marriage (15). One thing perplexes them, which is that the virginity of St John could not arrive to the higheſt degree of perfection, if he had a deſign to marry; for perfect virginity requires that a man ſhould always have reſolved to contain himſelf. 'Videbatur ejus (virginitatis) laudem 'hæc fabula non tollere quidem, labefactare tamen, 'aut in gradum inferiorem detrudere, cùm ea demùm 'numeris omnibus abſoluta perhibeatur virginitas, quam 'perpetua incorruptionis nunquam corrupta meditatio 'pariat (16).' In anſwer to this difficulty, they ſay, among other things, that the divine providence directed the thing ſo, to heighten the glory of St John's virginity: ſince thereby it became altogether like that of the Holy Virgin, and was conſecrated, being joined with marriage, which is one of the ſeven ſacraments. 'Quin ergò potiùs ita cogitemus, decuiſſe, ut eodem 'virginitatis gradu collocaretur Apoſtolus, quo Virgo 'mater, quæ ipſi erat à Chriſto morituro commendanda? Quid, quod ita demùm conſecrari virginitas 'cenſenda eſt, ſi cum ceremonia matrimoniali conjungatur? Neque enim virginitas, ſed conjugium eſt in 'numero ſacramentorum (17).' I muſt not forget to ſay that Baronius and Molanus reject theſe traditions of the Legendaries. Thomaſius cites their words (18), and ſays probably enough, that Abdias's book was the firſt original of theſe idle tales. That ſuppoſititious Abdias affirms, that Jesus Christ thrice diſſuaded St John from marrying. In two prefaces upon the goſpel of that Apoſtle, it is only ſaid in general, that Jesus Christ diſſuaded him from it: thoſe prefaces (19) are falſly aſcribed, one to St Jerom, and the other to St Auguſtin. As there never were bolder authors than the compilers of the lives of Saints, they have reſolved to be more deciſive than the authors of theſe two prefaces; and to that end they have ſuppoſed the time and the place, that is to ſay, the wedding at Cana, where Jesus Christ freed his diſciple from the conjugal bond. Thomaſius does in no wiſe diſpute the virginity of this Apoſtle; it is grounded upon a pretty good tradition, teſtified by St Jerom, St Auſtin, St Epiphanius, &c. But Baronius was in the wrong to cite Ignatius, who only ſpeaks of St John the baptiſt (20).

(10) Vavaſſor, de Ludicra Dictione, pag. 285.

(11) The thirtieth of January, 1675.

(12) Printed with ſeveral others, at Leipſic, in 1681. See the Journal of Leipſic, 1682, pag. 51.

(13) Molanus, lib. iv, de Hiſt. Sacrar. Imaginum, cap. xx, pag. 428, apud Thomaſium præfat. 78, pag. 511.

(14) Haymo, part. Hiemal. Homil. pag. 207. Baronius, Tom. I, Annal. ad ann. 31, n. 30, apud Thomaſ. ibid. pag. 512.

(15) Meffret, de Sanctis Serm. XXX, fol. 53, apud eumdem, ibid.

(16) Thomaſius, ibid, quoting Pelbartus, de Temeſwar de Sanct. Serm. XXX.

(17) Thomaſius, ibid. pag 513, quoting the ſame Pelbartus, ibid. & Franc Maro, Serm. de Sanctis, pag. 30.

(18) Taken from the above quoted places.

(19) Quas conjunctas exhibet quarta pars Gloſſæ in Biblia ordinariæ. Thomaſ. ubi ſupra, pag. 516.

(20) See the proof of it, apud Thomaſ. ibid. pag. 518.

JOLY (Claudius) chanter and canon of the church of Notre Dame at Paris, and official to the archbiſhop, was a very worthy and learned man. He had a canonry conferred on him in the year 1631, upon the reſignation of Mr Loiſel, his uncle by the mother's ſide, and counſellor in the parliament of Paris. He was carried to Munſter by the duke of Longueville plenipotentiary of France for the general peace of Europe, and faithfully aſſiſted him with his advice and counſels. He took a journey to Rome during the commotions of Paris. He was made official the firſt time by the cardinal of Rets, after the death of John Francis de Gondi archbiſhop of Paris, and afterwards by the chapter during the vacancy of that ſee, and laſtly by the preſent archbiſhop (a). He died at Paris the fifteenth day of January 1700, being ninety three years old (b). He enjoyed in his great age very good health, and the perfect uſe of all the faculties of his ſoul.

(a) I write this in the year 1700.

(b) Taken from the Mercure Hiſtor. for February 1700, pag. 205.

JONAS, one of the Jewiſh prophets. Since moſt of the things relating to him may be found in two other Dictionaries (a), I will only inſiſt upon a few particulars. Some Rabbies (b) have been ſo ſilly as to ſay, that being firſt ſwallowed by a male fiſh, he was afterwards diſcharged into the body of a female. Not finding himſelf preſſed in his firſt priſon, ſay they, he had no recourſe to the invocation of God; upon which the male fiſh had orders to diſgorge him into the ſtomach of a female, which was great with young (c). He there found himſelf very much ſtraitened, and made the excellent prayer which is ſtill extant (d), and which appeaſed the wrath of Heaven. They who confute that ſtory by this argument, that a whale which was impregnated would not have preſſed Jonas, unleſs he had lodged in her womb, make but a weak

(a) That of Moreri and the Dictionary of the Bible, by Mr Simon a prieſt.

(b) Solomon Jarchi, apud Martinum Lipenium in Jonæ Periplo thalaſſio, fol. B. verſo, Edit. 1678, in 4to.

(c) Ut ex impraegnat one & alvi tumore in anguſtias virum Dei redigeret. Id. ibid.

(d) It is in the ſecond chapter of Jonas.

objection [A]. We have ſeen in another place (e) that the heathen poets have told a ſtory of their Hercules ſomewhat reſembling this. They ſtole it from the ſacred ſtory, and falſified it, according to their fancy. This is at leaſt the common opinion of our authors (f). The ancient fathers thought it ſtrange that the Heathens ſhould reject this hiſtory of Jonas, after having adopted the fable of Hercules.(B) Thoſe who ſay that this prophet

[A] They who ſay that a whale great with young would not have preſſed Jonas, unleſs he had been lodged in her womb, make but a weak objection.] Here is a man, who thinks he has Rabbi Jarchi at his mercy, when he asks him, ‘ Nunquid arbitraberis in uterum quoque imprægnatæ balænæ immiſſum eſſe Prophetam, ut ex fœtus piſcini multitudine coangustaretur? In ſtomachum ceti credo deſcendiſſe Jonam non in matricem ejuſdem. Quomodo itaque Jonæ in ventriculo latenti plus anguſtiarum ex uteri intumeſcentia poterat ſurgere (1)? —— Do you believe that the prophet was thruſt into the womb of a pregnant whale, that he might there be ſqueezed among the multitude of her young ones? I believe that Jonah deſcended into the ſtomach, and not into the matrix of that fiſh. How then could Jonah lying in that ventricle, be ſtraitned for room, by the ſwelling and preſſure of the womb of the whale?’ Theſe queſtions ſpoil Lipenius's good cauſe: and give the Rabbies room to take off the ridicule to which they deſigned to expoſe them, they would ridicule him in their turn, if they ſhould ask him how he came to be ignorant of a thing which is known to every body viz. that the dilatation of the Uterus preſſes and ſtraitens the bowels and the ventricle, and ſometimes hinders conſiderably the reſpiration.

[B] The antient fathers thought it ſtrange, that the Heathens ſhould reject this hiſtory of Jonas, after haveing adopted the fable of Hercules.] Here is a fine paſſage of Theophilact. ‘ Devoratur ergo à ceto Jonas, treſque dies ac totidem noctes in eo permanet vates: quæ res omnem excedere fidem audientibus videtur, maxime iis qui ex Græcorum ſcholis ſapienteque doctrina, ad hanc hiſtoriam accedunt. Quos equidem non ſatis demirari poſſum qui fiat quod hæc non intelligant, cum ſuis ipſorum alis capiantur. Apud ipſos enim nonnihil tale de Hercule narratur: nempe quod & ipſe à balæna devoratus, incolumis remanſerit, niſi quod tantummodo depilatus redierit, idque ob ingenitum & internum belluæ calorem. Aut igitur noſtra ſuſcipiant, aut ſua rejiciant (2). —— Jonas therefore was ſwallowed by a whale, he remained therein three days and three nights, which fact ſeems to exceed the faith of the hearers, eſpecially thoſe who come from the Greek ſchools, and the ſtudy of the ſciences, to the conſidering this hiſtory. Yet I cannot ſufficiently admire at them. for pretending not to underſtand this, when they are ready to receive things of the ſame kind from their own writers. For by them a thing of the ſame kind is related of Hercules, viz. that he alſo was ſwallowed by a whale, and remained ſafe in her belly excepting only that he loſt his hair, when he came out from the ſtrong inward heat of the creature, let them therefore either receive our fact or reject their own.’ I doubt not but Theophilact would have found among the Greeks ſeveral perſons, who would have taken him at his word with all their heart. The Philoſophers and learned men of Greece would have anſwered: we accept of your terms; you would either have us re-reject the ſtory of Hercules, or adopt that of Jonas: we reject them both. But becauſe a great number of Heathens would have condemned this alternative, and maintained that in believing what the poets ſaid of Hercules, they might ſtill laugh at the Jewiſh ſtory of Jonas; it is certain that Theophilact's thought is very ſolid, and admirably ſhews the fooliſh prejudices of the Heathens. I proceed to St Auguſtin. He had a great love for a Heathen (3), and writ many letters to him, ſome of which remained unanſwered. This ſilence made him think that the other was no longer willing to keep correſpondence with him (4). Wherefore deſiring to anſwer ſome difficulties, which this Heathen had propoſed to the prieſt Deogratias, he wrote directly to this prieſt. By this anſwer we ſee that the Pagans made themſelves very merry with the hiſtory of Jonas. ‘ Poſtrema quæſtio propoſita eſt de Jona, nec ipſa quaſi ex Porphyrio (5), ſed tanquam ex irriſione paganorum (6). —— The laſt queſtion propoſed concerning Jonah is not put as if made by Porphyry, but as from the deriſion of the Pagans.’ The method of St Auguſtin's refuting this objection of his friend, is very proper. Either, ſays he, we muſt deny all the miracles of God, or acknowledge we have no reaſon to reject this. Should we believe the reſurrection of Jesus Christ, if we were afraid of the railleries of the infidels (7)? And ſince our friend has not ſuppoſed any doubts about our admitting the reſurrection of Lazarus and that of Jesus Christ, I very much wonder he ſhould look upon the adventure of Jonas as incredible. Is it eaſier to raiſe a dead man from the grave, than to preſerve a man alive in the belly of a great fiſh (8)? Will it be ſaid that the digeſtive faculty of the ſtomach cannot be ſuſpended? but they would urge us with a more conſiderable objection, if they ſhould alledge the three men who received no harm in the furnace of Babylon. If they will reject alſo that ſuſpenſion of the fire's activity, and all the other miracles of ſcripture, we muſt have recourſe to another conſutation. For the infidels ought not to form doubts about one particular fact, but they muſt either believe or reject in general all the facts of the ſame nature, even thoſe that appear ſtill more incredible. They would not be ſo nice with reſpect to Apuleius, or Apollonius Tyaneus; they would not droll; on the contrary, they would, with an air of inſolence, cry up their triumphs, if what we ſay of Jonas was aſcribed to the power of either of thoſe Heathens. I do not give a verbal tranſlation, but only a general notion of St Auguſtin's reaſons; and therefore for the ſake of thoſe who underſtand the Latin tongue, I will ſet down the greateſt part of the original. ‘ Sed habent revera, quod non credant in divino miraculo, vaporem ventris, quo cibi madeſcunt potuiſſe ita temperari, ut vitam hominis conſervaret! Quanto incredibilius ergo proponerent, tres illos viros, ab impio Rege in caminum miſſos, deambulâſſe in medio ignis illæſos? Quapropter ſi nulla iſti divina miracula volunt credere, aliâ diſputatione refellendi ſunt. Neque enim debent unum aliquid tanquam incredibile proponere, & in quæſtionem vocare; ſed omnia, quæ vel talia, vel etiam mirabiliora narrantur. Et tamen ſi hoc, quod de Jona ſcriptum eſt, Apulejus Madaurenſis, vel Apollonius Tyaneus feciſſe diceretur, quorum multa mira, nullo fideli auctore, jactitant; [quamvis & dæmones nonnulla faciant angelis ſanctis ſimilia, non veritate ſed ſpecie, non ſapientiâ ſed planè fallaciâ]: tamen ſi de iſtis ut dixi, quos magos vel philoſophos laudabiliter nominant, tale aliquid narraretur, non jam in buccis creparet riſus, ſed typhus (9).’ This method of confounding the Heathens, will perhaps appear to ſeveral perſons more ſolid, than that which St Auguſtin made uſe of in another book, where after having ſaid that thoſe who laughed at the ſtory of Jonas, did not queſtion the truth of what is ſaid of Arion, he propoſes this difficulty, whether the ſtory of Jonas be not more incredible. Yes doubtleſs, anſwers he; becauſe it is more miraculous: and it is more miraculous, becauſe it manifeſts a greater power. Verum illud noſtrum de Jona incredibilius eſt: plane incredibilius, quia mirabilius, & mirabilius, quia potentius (10). Theſe are witty conceits, will ſome ſay, and pretty thoughts, but not good arguments: for from hence it would follow, that the more impoſſible a thing appears to be, the more credible it is. The fable of Arion was this, that in order to ſave his life, he was forced to caſt himſelf out of the ſhip in which he was returning from Italy into Greece, and that he fell upon a dolphin which carried him to the ſhore. I do not ſay this in favour of thoſe who have never heard of it, for there are ſcarce any ſuch perſons; but in favour of thouſands of people who do not remember it, and would be ſorry, not to ſee at one view the difference betwixt the adventure of Arion and that of the prophet Jonas.

Reflexion on one of the effects of prejudice.

Let us conſider a little the partial conduct with which St Auguſtin upbraids the Heathens. It affords an inſtance of one of the moſt ridiculous effects of prepoſſeſſion. The managers of the Pagan religion had fed

(e) In the remark [O] of the article HERCULES.

(f) See Voſſius de Orig & Progr. Idolatr lib. ii, cap. xv, pag. 381, 382. Edit. Francof. 1675, in 4to.

(1) Martinus Lipenius, in Jonæ Periplio thalaſſio, folio B 2.

(2) Theophil. in Jonam, cap. ii.

(3) See the forty ninth Letter of St Auguſtin, at the beginning.

(4) Non inconvenienter arbiter eum quem video mihi reſcribere noluiſſe, nihil ſibi à me ſcribi voluiſſe. Auguſt. Epiſt. xlix, pag. m. 195.

(5) Lipenius is therefore miſtaken when he ſays, in Periplo thalaſſio Jonæ, folio A 3, verſo, that St Auguſtin diſputes ſtoutly againſt Porphyry in that place.

(6) Auguſt. ubi ſupra, pag. 207.

(7) Si fides Chriſtianorum cachinnum metueret paganorum Ib. p. 207, 208.

(8) Niſi forte facilius putat mortuum de de ſepulcro reſuſcitari quam vivum in tam vaſto ventre belluæ potuiſſe ſervari. Id. ibid. pag. 208.

(9) Id. ibid.

(10) Auguſt. de Civit. Dei, lib. i, cap. xiv.

prophet came out of the fiſh's belly in the port of Nineveh [C], are but little ſkilled in Geography; nor is it probable that he came out of it upon the coaſt of the Euxine [D], or of the Red-Sea [E]. It is much more credible he was caſt upon the dry land near the city of Joppa where he took ſhipping. Some confirm this conjecture by the fable of Andromeda; for they pretend (g) that Jonas's adventure laid a foundation for the poetical accounts concerning Andromeda's being expoſed to the fury of a ſea-monſter, which happened near Joppa (h). See the margin (i). Here is another idle ſtory of the Rabbies. The ſay (k) that the fiſh which ſwallowed Jonas had ſeven eyes, which ſerved as ſo many windows for the Prophet to ſee all that was in the ſea, and amongſt other things, the way which the Iſraelites took in croſſing the red-ſea. Thoſe who ſay that Jonas is the ſame young man who was ſent by Eliſha to Jehu [F], to give him the royal unction, deſerve not to be believed. In St Jerome's time the tomb of Jonas was ſtill ſhewn at the place of his birth (l). Mr Simon (m) affirms, that the Turks have built a very fine moſque to the honour of Jonas, in which there is a miraculous lamp, that burns continually without any oil or other liquor, if he will give credit to their reveries. He ſays that this moſque is in a little village (n), built to the honour and under the name of this Prophet. Mr d' Herbelot (o) ſays nothing of all this, though he relates many things which the Mahometans report concerning Jonas. I will name a modern author, who, according to Moreri, made a moſt ingenious poem upon the hiſtory of this Prophet [G].

(g) See Lipenius, ubi ſupra, fol. A 3.

(h) Plin. lib. v, cap. xiii, pag. m. 567, & xxxi, pag. 613, & lib. ix, cap. v, pag. 283.

(i) Hadrian Serieckius, Originum Indice III, fol. p. verſo, falſly believes, that it appears from the third verſe of the third chapter of Jonas, that the fiſh vomited up that prophet at the diſtance of three days journey from Nineveh, and that he went thither in one day.

(k) Apud Lipenium, ubi ſupra, fol. C. 1, verſo.

(l) That is in Ghath-Chepher, near mount Thabor Lipen. ubi ſupra; fol. præced. He quotes St Jerome, Proœm. in Jonam.

(m) Simon, Diction. de la Bible, pag. 433.

(n) In the tribe of Zabulon.

(o) D'Herbelot, Biblioth. Orient. pag. 495.

ſed the minds of the people with abundance of fables for many ages, and they would not have ſuffered that it ſhould be examined whether they were poſſible, or that they ſhould be deemed incredible. But when the Chriſtian miracles were propoſed to them, they ſet up for Philoſophers, they alledged impoſſibilities, they made uſe of all ſuch arguments as might be oppoſed to the current of a fooliſh credulity, and ridiculed the believers. What inconſiſtency, and partiality is this? The Chriſtian communions diſcover one againſt the other ſomething of this ſpirit. If the Greek church boaſts of ſome miracle, which ſhews that Neſtorius's ſchiſm is diſpleaſing to God; the Neſtorians leave no ſtone unturned to repulſe that attack. But as to the prodigies, that are proper to convict the Greek church of injuſtice, they blindly believe them without examination, and think it very ſtrange, that their adverſaries ſhould make any ſcruple about them. It is well known how eaſily the Roman Catholics give their aſſent to an infinite number of miracles. They piouſly believe thouſands of ſtories which are daily publiſhed, and look upon the moſt plauſible reaſons of thoſe who deny them as meer cavils of obſtinate Heretics. But if they hear that the Proteſtants ſpread abroad any miracles, they aſſume a quite different ſpirit. They have recourſe to all the common places by which the incredulous defend themſelves. They deny they fact, they challenge the witneſſes, they reproach them with impoſture, or a diſtempered brain. If they cannot deny the fact, they explain it by natural cauſes, and collect from the Naturaliſts, and the relations of travellers, a thouſand like events. In a word, what they call wrangling, obſtinacy, and an oppoſition to good ſenſe, becomes a moſt ſolid and reaſonable confutation of a falſity; for they make uſe of the ſame common-places that the Proteſtants had employed againſt the monks. There are every where perſons who readily believe what is grateful to them, and are the hardeſt in the world to be perſuaded of a thing that is unacceptable to them. If they alledge the reaſons of their incredulity, they cannot endure that they ſhould be thought wrong; and if you alledge the ſame reaſons againſt them another time, they cannot endure that they ſhonld not be allowed the liberty of ridiculing them. This is the way of human life: it is almoſt an unavoidable effect of prepoſſeſſion, two weights and two meaſures. And if this could not be avoided without laying aſide prejudices, the remedy would perhaps be worſe than the diſeaſe.

[C] Some have ſaid this prophet came out of the fiſh's belly, in the port of Nineveh.] Sulpicius Severus fell into a geographical blunder; 'Exceptus à ceto, 'marino monſtro, ac devoratus poſt triduum fere Ni-'nivitarum littoribus ejectus, juſta prædicat (11). — 'Taken up by a whale, a ſea monſter, and ſwallowed, 'he was, after three days, thrown upon the ſea ſhore 'near Nineveh, and preached righteouſneſs.' The learned Druſius perceived no fault in commenting upon theſe words, but only ſays, that the ſcripture does not tell us upon what ſhore the fiſh diſgorged the prophet (12). The other commentators upon Sulpicius, and particularly Hornius have perceived the fault, and ſo has Mr Lipenius; but he is groſly miſtaken in chronology, as believing that Sulpicius Severus Corrowed this from St Gregory's morals (13). This Pope flouriſhed 150 years after Sulpicius. Mr Simon has tranſcribed the fault of the later: A whale, ſays he (14), received Jonas in it's bowels . . . . . and proved a much ſafer veſſel than the firſt he was in, and put him a ſhore, or rather vomited him up, the third day in the port of Nineveh. Note, that Nineveh was built upon the river Tigris, which has no immediate communication with the Mediterranean ſea. Beſides, there is not water enough for ſuch a fiſh in this river at the port of Nineveh. This reaſon, together with the ſurprizing miracle, we muſt ſuppoſe, if we ſay that the whale went into the ocean, and doubled the cape of Good Hope, and entred into the mouth of the Tigris, and made that prodigious compaſs in three days. takes away all ſorts of ſubterfuge from ſuch as would excuſe Sulpicius Severus. That notion never came into his mind; he honeſtly believed that Nineveh was ſituated upon the Mediterranean ſea, and erred for want of ſkill in Geography.

[D] . . . . . It is not probable that he came out upon the coaſt of the Euxine.] Joſephus (15) relates this tradition; which has been followed by many moderns (16), tho' it claſhes with probability, and multiplies prodigies; for according to natural laws, a fiſh of that ſize cannot convey itſelf in ſo little a time from the Phenician Sea to the Black ſea. Beſides, the journey that Jonas was to make, either to return into Judæa, before he went to Nineveh, or to go directly to Nineveh, would have been too long and too difficult.

[E] . . . . Or upon the coaſts of the Red Sea.] Lipenius (17) attributes this opinion to Pineda, and to the Rabbies: and it is no difficult thing for him to confute it; for the whale muſt have entered into the ocean, and have gone round Africa. See the remark [C] towards the end.

[F] Thoſe who take him for the ſame young man, who was ſent by Eliſha to Jehu (18).] This is what the Rabbies do, and after them Mariana and Tarnovius (19). If this was ſo, he muſt have been then above an hundred years old. They are Mr Simon's words in his Dictionary of the Bible, which are very obſcure; for we do not know to what the word then relates. Does it relate to the time of Jehu's unction? Grammar will have it ſo, but the ſenſe will be abſurd. Does it relate to the time of his voyage to Nineveh, or to the reign of Jeroboam, the ſecond of that name? gueſs it if you can.

[G] I will name a modern author, who, according to Moreri, made a moſt ingenious poem on the hiſtory of this prophet.] He was a Gaſcon and a miniſter, named Coras. He was chaplain to marſhal de Turenne for ſome campaigns; afterwards he had a church in the lower Guienne, and there he turned Papiſt, and had a conſiderable office in the preſidial of Montauban. He publiſhed a book before he changed his religion, in which, if I well remember, he maintained, that the Proteſtants could not be re-united to the Roman church. He publiſhed another to confute this after his abjuration. The four poems, which he publiſhed upon the hiſtories of the Bible (20), ſold well enough, though Mr Boileau, ſays the contrary in his ninth ſatire.

---

(11) Sulpicius Severus, Hiſtor. Sacr. lib. i, pag. m. 79.

(12) Druſius, in Sulpic. Severum, pag. 179.

(13) Sulpicius Severus. . . . ex S. Gregorio, lib. vi. Moral cap. xii, arbitratur Jonam eſſe expoſitum in littoribus Ninevatarum. Lipen. ubi ſupra, cap. iii.

(14) Simon, Diction. de la Bible, pag. 432, 433.

(15) Joſeph. Antiq Judaic. lib. ix, cap. xi, fol. 355, verſo.

(16) See Lipen. ubi ſupra.

(17) Lipen. ubi ſupra, fol. C 1, verſo. He quotes Pineda, lib. iv, de rebus Solomonis, cap. xii.

(18) II Kings, chap. ix, ver. 1.

(19) Hebræi in Seder Olam, & ex iis Jo. Mariana in Scholiis, Bibl. & D Joh. Tarnovius Comm. Jon. pag. 2. Lipenius, ubi ſupra, fol. B.

(20) Upon Jonas, David, Joſhua, and Sampſon.

Le Jonas inconu ſeche dans la pouſſiere,

Le David imprimé n'a point veu la lumiere.

The Jonas uncall'd for, is bury'd in night,

And David, tho' printed, has ne'er ſeen the light.

The enemies of Coras ſent him by the poſt to Montauban, a pretended letter from his Bookſeller at, Paris, in which he was deſired to vindicate himſelf againſt Boileau; becauſe ſince the publication of his ninth ſatire, no body bought his poems. He was provoked with that inſult, and publiſhed a very violent piece againſt his critic. He made ſome verſes againſt Racine, in the year 1675. You will ſee in the Menagiana (21), a very pretty epigram of Racine againſt him. Note, that he was deſcended from the famous Civilian John Coras, counſellor in the parliament of Toulouſe, one of the Proteſtant martyrs; for he was hanged for his religion at Toulouſe, in his counſellor's habit, in the year 1572 (22).

JONAS (ARNGRIMUS) an Iſelander, made himſelf eſteemed in the XVIth and XVIIth centuries by the works he publiſhed. He was ſtill alive in 1644, being above ninety years of age (a). Four years before, he was married a ſecond time to a young woman. He was a learned and good man, and in great eſteem among all the learned. He had been coadjutor to Gundebrand de Torloc, biſhop of Hole in Iſeland (b). This Gundebrand was an Iſelander, a man of great learning and probity (c). He had been a diſciple of Tycho Brahe, and was a good Aſtrologer. After his death Arngrimus refuſed the biſhopric of Hole, which the king of Denmark offered him (d): he begged the king to excuſe his accepting of it, both to avoid being envied, and to proſecute his ſtudies with greater tranquillity. Moſt of the books he publiſhed [A], are hiſtories, and deſcriptions of Iſeland, or apologies for his nation. Bleſkenius had ſaid ſeveral things to their diſadvantage, both with repect to witchcraft [B], and laſciviouſneſs [C]. Arngrimus confuted him.

He

[A] The books that be publiſhed.] I ſhall mention all thoſe that I find in the catalogues of Albert Bartholinus, Idea veri Magiſtratus, Copenhagen, 1589, in 8vo. Brevis Commentarius de Iſlandia, at the ſame place, 1593, in 8vo. Anatome Bleſkeniana, at Hole, in Iſelanders, 1612, in 8*vo*, and at Hamburgh, 1618, in 4*to*. Epiſtola pro patria defenſoria, at the ſame place, 1618. Ἀποτριϐη Calumniæ, at the ſame place, 1622, in 4*to*. Chrymogæa (1), ſeu rerum Iſlandicarum libri tres, at the ſame place 1630, in 4*to*. Vita Gudbrandi Thorlacii, at the ſame place, 1630, in 4*to*. Specimen Iſlandiæ Hiſtoricum, & magna ex parte Chrographicum, at Amſterdam, 1643, in 4*to* (2).

A learned man, who has publiſhed the treatiſe of Albert Bartholinus, with hiſtorical and critical additions, informs me, that the Anatome Bleſkenia, is a confutation of a book printed at Leyden, in the year 1607, and intituled, Iſlandia, ſeu deſcriptio populorum & memorabilium hujus Inſulæ; that the Crymogæa was written in the year 1603, and printed at Hamburgh, in 1609, with a map of Denmark, and without it in 1610; that the Specimen Iſlandiæ Hiſtoricum, contains an apology for the author's opinion againſt the reaſons of John Iſaacius Pontanus. Our Arngrimus Jonas maintained that Iſeland did not begin to be inhabited till towards the year 874, and ſo cannot be the antient Thule (3). Pontanus thought it a little ſtrange, that Arngrimus Jonas ſhould write an apology for an opinion, that was leſs glorious to Iſeland, than the contrary one; nevertheleſs, he ſpoke of this learned Iſelander with all ſorts of civility, and marks of eſteem. See the letter which he wrote to Stephanus, the firſt of July, 1638 (4). Mr Mollerus (5) gives us the titles of ſome of our Jonas's works, which had been omitted by Albert Bartholinus, ſome of which have been publiſhed, and others not.

[B] Bleſkenius had ſaid ſeveral things to the diſadvantage of Iſland, with reſpect to their witchcraft . . .] Belſkenius ſays, that the Iſelanders ſell the wind, and that he has experienced it (6). Arngrimus laughs at this; for he ſays, ‘that the ſeamen of Iſeland know over-night, by the diſpoſition of the air, what wind and weather there will be the next day; and that when they conjecture there will be ſuch a wind, as a ſtranger waits for to go off, they go to him, and engage to ſell him this wind: which they do in this manner. They aſk the ſtranger for his handkerchief, in which they pretend to mutter ſome words, and immediately tie the handkerchief with a knot (7), as if it were for fear the words pronounced ſhould fly away. After this they give him the handkerchief thus tied, and adviſe him to keep it carefully, as he receives it, aſſuring him that he ſhall have a good wind during his voyage. Now it ſometimes happens, that this wind blows the next day; but moſt frequently it changes after the ſtranger is gone, and is out at ſea . . . . If it happens but once in a hundred times, that the wind carries a ſtranger to the end of his voyage, that ſingle chance authoriſes the error, notwithſtanding a hundred contrary experiments, and the error is ſpread by him, who confidently ſays, becauſe he believes it, that he bought the wind in Iſeland, and that this wind has carried him ſafe home.’ The ſame Bleſkenius relates (8), ‘that there are ſome magicians in Iſeland, who have the power to ſtop ſhips in full ſail in the open ſea: he ſays alſo, that they who are thus ſtopped, make uſe of ſome ſtinking fumigations for a countercharm (9), which he deſcribes; with which, ſays he, they that are ſtopped, drive away the devils that ſtop them, and the ſhips being uncharmed, reſume their courſe.’

[C] . . . . . . and laſciviouſneſs.] ‘Bleſkenius ſays, that the Germans, who trade into Iſeland, ſet up tents near the harbours where they land, and there expoſe their merchandizes, which are cloaks, ſhoes, looking-glaſſes, knives, and abundance of baubles, which they exchange for commodities of the Iſelanders. The young women, which are very fair in this iſland, but ill clad, come and offer themſelves to the Germans who have no wives, for bread or biſcuit, or any thing elſe of ſmall value. The fathers themſelves preſent their daughters to the ſtrangers; and if they are got with child, it is a great honour to them. This makes them more reſpected and courted by the Iſelanders than the others, and ſeveral ſtrive who ſhall have them. When the Iſelanders have bought, that is, bartered for wine or beer with the foreign Merchants, they invite their relations and friends, and neighbours, to drink both; and they never leave off till they have drank it all. They ſing, as they are tippling, the heroic actions of their captains . . . . It is reckoned an incivility among them, to go from the table, when they drink, to make water. The young women, which, as I have ſaid, are not ugly in this country, ſlip under the treſtles, and hand the chamber-pot to the drinkers. Arngrimus Jonas ſays this is a falſe and abuſive banter, and is very angry with Bleſkenius for ſcandalizing the maids of Iſeland. The good man cannot bear to ſee his countrymen contemptuouſly treated, and repreſented as barbarians (10).’ If it was ever lawful for an apologiſt to fall into a paſſion, that of Arngrimus cannot be blamed; for it is not probable that the goſpel, which has been for ſo many ages planted in that iſland, could leave a people in ſo great a brutality; nor, in caſe religion had made ſo little progreſs among the Iſelanders, that the king of Denmark would ſuffer them to inſult the laws of public decorum with impunity. The cuſtom of their feaſtings does not ſeem to be fairly related; matters are amplified to make the reader laugh. Was ſuch a piece of ſervice, or ſo extravagant a lazineſs ever heard of? thoſe people not only will not riſe from table to make water, but will not ſo much as move their hands. For this the ſtory leads us to; elſe why is it ſaid the young

---

(21) Page 300, of the firſt Dutch edition. It is alſo to be found in the ſecond Factum, or Caſe, of Furetiere, pag. 13, of the Dutch edition, as being aſcribed to Mr de la Fontaine.

(22) See d'Aubigné, Hiſt. Univerſ. Tom. II, livr. i, cap. v, pag. m. 560.

(a) La Peyrere. Relation de l'Iſlande, pag. 55, 56.

(b) Id. ibid. pag. 55.

(c) Id. pag. 5, & 55.

(d) Idem, pag. 55.

(1) It ſhould be Crymogæa.

(2) Taken from Albert Bartholinus's treatiſe, de Script. Danorum, pag. 12.

(3) Taken from Mollerus, Hypomn. ad Barthol. de Script. Danorum, pag. 165, 166.

(4) It is the cxxii^d of thoſe which Mr Matthæus, publiſhed at Leyden in 1695. See page 325, of that collection of Letters, and likewiſe pag. 210.

(5) Moller. ubi ſupra, pag. 166.

(6) La Peyrere, Relation de l'Iſlande, pag. 28.

(7) See a ſtory related by Charles Ogier, pag. 433, of his Iter Polonicum.

(8) La Peyrere, ubi ſupra, pag. 31.

(9) See the Nouvelles de la Rep. des Lettres, for February 1685, pag. 135.

(10) La Peyrere, ubi ſupra, pag. 23, 24.

He died in the year 1649 (e). He had been paſtor of the church of Melſtad, and prefect of the neighbouring churches in the dioceſe of Hole (f).

(e) See Mollerus, Hypomn. ad Albert Barthol. de Script. Danor. pag. 164.

(f) Id. ibid.

women ſlip under the treſtles. The chamber-pot might eaſily be given to the gueſts without that, if all the buſineſs was to ſave them the trouble of riſing. If what Bleſkenius tells us were true, jealouſy would not be an uſeleſs thing in the world (11).

(11) See the New Letters againſt Maimbourg's Hiſt. of Calviniſ. pag. 542, & ſeq.

AN objection drawn from the impudence of ſome nations.

If it were lawful to lye in favour of truth, we muſt deny all that is related of the impudence of ſome nations: for libertines draw a great advantage from there being, they ſay, certain nations, which annex no infamy to the proſtitution of women. This is true of the Iſelanders, according to the narrative of Bleſkenius; nay, they go much farther; for they look upon the big belly of a girl, who proſtitutes herſelf to ſtrangers, as honourable, and fathers look upon themſelves as very happy, when foreigners accept of the offer they make of their daughters maiden-heads. Where then, would they aſk, is that natural impreſſion, which enables all men to diſtinguiſh between right and wrong? there are even Chriſtian nations, which not only diſregard chaſtity in practice, but have even loſt the theory of it: whence it follows, that, in this reſpect, they are not conſcious of what is naturally right. Does not this ſhew, that the ideas of virtue depend upon education and cuſtom, and not upon a natural impreſſion? and how will you cure theſe people, whoſe conſcience is dead? for if it be poſſible, that, with the notions of right and wrong, the conſcience may unhappily be lulled aſleep, muſt not this neceſſarily happen where theſe notions are extinct? it is not neceſſary to reply to this objection, becauſe Arngrimus Jonas denies the fact. To him we muſt refer all thoſe, who would take advantage of his adverſary's narrative. And if they alledge matters of facts, they ſhall then be anſwered.

JORNANDES, originally a Goth, was biſhop of Ravenna about the middle of the VIth century . . . . His hiſtory of the Goths tranſlated into French, was printed at Paris in the year 1703, and dedicated to the king of Sweden (a).

(a) See the Memoirs of Trevoux, January 1704, art. vi, of the French edition.

JOUBERTUS (LAURENCE) counſellor and phyſician in ordinary to the king, and to the king of Navarre, firſt regent doctor, chancellor, and judge of the univerſity of Montpellier, was born at Valence in Dauphiné, the ſixth of December 1529 (a). He was a diſciple of Silvius at Paris, and of Argenterius beyond the Alps (b); and he made himſelf famous by the lectures he read at Montpellier, as profeſſor, and much more by the books he publiſhed. The world had ſuch a notion of his capacity, that Henry III. being extreamly deſirous to have children, ordered him to come to Paris, ſo much he hoped, that the ſkill of this phyſician would remove all the obſtacles, that rendered his marriage unfruitful (c). His hopes were diſapointed. Joubertus died at Lombez [A] the twenty-ninth of October 1582. He publiſhed a great number of books [B] in Latin and French. That which he intituled Popular Errors, raiſed a great cry againſt him, becauſe he ſpoke too freely upon ſeveral nice matters [C]. One thing in particular was thought

(a) La Croix du Maine, pag. 285.

(b) Sammarthan. Elog. pag. m. 75.

(c) Eum in aula vidimus à Rege Henrico III, evocatum, cum pius ille Princeps prolis in publicam utilitatem ſuſcipiendæ cupidus, maximam voti ſui ſpem in ejus induſtria nequidquam collocaſſet Id. ib. pag. 76.

[A] Joubertus died at Lombez] This we learn from la Croix du Maine. He adds, that Lombez is ſeven leagues from Toulouſe, and becauſe it is not on the ſide of Languedoc, but on the ſide of Guienne, it is plain Sammarthanus is miſtaken (1), when he ſays, that Joubertus died as he returned from Toulouſe to Montpellier. The town of Lombez is at a great diſtance from that road. Moreri is ſtill more to blame than Sammarthanus, as thus: He ſays, as he had read it in la Croix du Maine, that this Phyſician died at Lombez, and he adds to it what he had read in Sammarthanus, that Joubertus died as he returned from Toulouſe to Montpellier. The joining of theſe two things proves him guilty of a Geographical ignorance, which cannot be charged upon Sammarthanus, who ſaid nothing of Lombez. A man runs the hazard of committing many errors, when he mixes the extracts of different writers, without correcting their inconſiſtencies. I do not mention the Chronological blunder that is found in Moreri; it is plainly either an error of the preſs, or a want of attention. You will find in Moreri, that Joubertus was born in 1629; that he made himſelf famous in the XVIth century; that he died in 1682, and that du Verdier Vau-Privas, and la Croix du Maine, ſpeak of him in ſome works (2) they publiſhed in the year 1584, which have never been reprinted.

FAULTS of Moreri.

[B] He publiſhed a great number of books.] His Latin treatiſes make two volumes in Folio, in the Frankfort editions of 1582, 1599, and 1645. One of the moſt conſiderable, is a collection of paradoxes, againſt which ſeveral Phyſicians (3) have written. He did not fail to reply to them. I obſerve, that his treatiſe of the Pancreas was written in French, though when he publiſhed it, he put it in the title, that John Paul Zangmaiſtre, a gentleman, born at Ausburg, who was Laurence Joubertus's ſcholar, had tranſlated it into French, from the ſaid Joubertus's Latin (4).

[C] He ſpoke too freely upon ſeveral nice matters.] Perhaps the queſtions about virginity, and generation, were never handled in French in ſo plain terms. He ſo much enlivened that ſubject, that he produced three atteſtations made by ſworn matrons, who had been ordered by the judges to ſee whether ſome maids that complained of having been raviſhed, complained wrongfully. The firſt of thoſe atteſtations was made in Bern; the ſecond at Paris, and the third at Carcaſſonne. The firſt declares the complaining damſel to be a virgin; the other two, that ſhe had been deflowered. Jobertus curiouſly compares together the terms the matrons made uſe of. A book was printed in Holland, in 1686, intituled, Tableau de l'Amour conſideré dans l'état du Marriage. —— The Picture of Love conſidered in the State of Mariage (5). The author calls himſelf Salocini, a Venetian Phyſician; but it is known that his name is Nicolas Venette, and that he is a Phyſician of Rochelle (6). He produces the like atteſtations, and Furetiere took from him what he ſaid under the word Pucelage [Maidenhead]. To return to Joubertus, he was was taxed with inventing theſe atteſtations: 'He well confutes this, in an epiſtle to his 'friends, naming him that ſupplied him with thoſe 'of Paris and Bern. As for that of Carcaſſone, I know 'that he had it from one that was principal ſecretary 'to Mareſchal Dampville, who often recited it for diverveſion. Mr Joubert has much ado to underſtand 'the terms theſe midwives uſe, in order to apply them 'to the differnt parts of the member which diſtinguiſhes the ſex. For he does not find there ſo many 'parts as the matrons do. In the public anatomies we 'ſhew ſixteen or ſeventeen of them; which I ſhall 'name as they occur to me, &c. (7).' La Croix du Maine obſerves, 'that ſome ſay, that Joubertus ſpoke 'too freely, and alledged ſome paſſages too obſcene in 'ſome of his works, particularly in his learned books 'of popular errors; but if he has uſed, ſays he, ſome 'terms too ticklish for nice ears, he was forced 'to do it, if he meant to be underſtood, and make 'his books profitable to his reader.' Scævola Sammarthanus is in the right to ſay, that this did the author an injury (8). Joubertus himſelf was aware of it; for he laid that work aſide, and as to what was already publiſhed, he endeavoured to anſwer ſome complaints. He was blamed for dedicating his book 'to 'the queen of Navarre, a moſt virtuous, generous (9) 'princeſs, a true mirrour and pattern of honour, ſince 'he was to treat at the beginning of his book of obſcene

(1) In Elog. pag. m. 76.

(2) Intituled, Bibliotheque Françoiſe.

(3) Thomas Jourdain, Franç. Valleriola, Bruno Seidelius.

(4) See La Croix du Maine, pag. 255.

(5) See the Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres, Oct. 1686, pag. 1221. It has been tranſlated into Dutch. See the Boekzaal for the month of Auguſt, 1695.

(6) The Journal des Sçavans, May 13, 1686, pag. m. 188, makes mention of him.

(7) B. Cabrol, Apolegetical Epiſtle, prefixed to the ſecond part of Lawrence Joubert's Vulgar Errors.

(8) Futurus tamen cautior, ſi contentus iis, quæ in uſum eruditorum ſermone Latino componebat, à ſcriptionibus Gallicis abſtinere maluiſſet. Naturam enim pro conceſſa Medicis facultate liberius evolvens, temere ſe in plebis imperitæ cenſuram atque riſum objecit. Sammarth. ubi ſupra, pag. 76.

(9) She was not a novice in thoſe matters, if d'Aubigné's ſatires may be credited.

thought ſtrange, that he dedicated this book to the queen of Navarre, the wiſe of Henry IV. But all this buſtle was ſo far from hindring the ſale of the book, that it very much contributed to make it ſell the better [D].

This work was to contain ſix parts [E], each of them divided into five books; but he publiſhed only the firſt, and part of the ſecond. I will mention a particular, which ſhews that Joubertus was modeſt [F], and that he very well knew the bounds of human knowledge.

I have ſaid, after la Croix du Maine, that he was born the ſixth of December 1529; but I muſt add, that we read round his print, that he was in his fortieth year in 1570, which proves, that he was born 1530. Rondelet, whoſe favourite diſciple he was, and whom he ſucceeded, in the year 1567, as Regius Profeſſor of Phyſic at Montpellier, truſted his manuſcripts with him on his death-bead, and deſired him to reviſe, correct, and publiſh them (d). Joubertus carried this place of Regius Profeſſor, after having maintained a diſpute for four days on ſeveral theſes, which have been printed with ſome others of his tracts at Lyons in 1571. There are among theſe tracts ſome remarks which clear up ſome paſſages of his paradoxes [G]. He innovated in the French orthography [H].

‘ ſcene matters, writing of conception, generation, big bellies, and child-bearing (10).’ He anſwered that complaint in the ſecond edition; for beſides the excuſes which he and Lewis Bertravan alledged, ‘ he changed the dedication, and preſented the whole proceſs to Mr de Pibrac, chancellor of the ſaid lady, to pick out ſuch things as her majeſty might know, and judge of without any ſcruple; the ſaid Mr de Pibrac reſerving the reſt to himſelf, as being more ſuitable to his condition (11).’ There was another complaint made againſt him. ‘ All this, ſaid ſome (12), would have been better in Latin than in French; ſuch diſcourſes not ſounding ſo ill in a dead, as in a vulgar tongue: beſides women and maids who are moſt aſhamed of it, would have known nothing of it.’ Cabrol anſwers what follows (13), ‘ the Sieur Joubert has ſufficiently anſwered this in his epiſtle to his friends, wherein he ſhews, that the chaſteſt women in the world, may read it, and will learn nothing but virtuous things from it, and their conjugal duty; and their husbands too. As for maids, they cannot underſtand what is ſaid in it concerning the works of the fleſh, if they be maids in body and ſoul, as one may ſay. But to ſatisfy every body he has ſince left out whatever might give offence to the moſt ſcrupulous conſciences; as knowing, we are not only to abſtain from evil, but alſo from the appearance of it.’ All theſe reaſons are not good; and ſome of them pitiful.

[D] The buſtle they made about this book . . . . contributed to make it ſell the better.] I ſhall cite Joubertus's apologiſt. ‘ The treatiſe of Vulgar Errors, ſays he, (14), has been printed in four ſeveral places in half a year, namely, at Bourdeaux, Paris, Lyons, and Avignon; and the leaſt impreſſion in every place was 1600 copies. This book has had ſo great a reputation, that being at firſt but ten or twelve pence price, it was afterwards ſold for a crown, and even for four livres: juſt as in times of ſcarcity (a ſort of famine) the price of corn riſes every day. Nay, the Bookſellers and Printers are importuned for the reſt of the work; and the author is daily deſired to publiſh the reſt of it; at leaſt five books at a time (if he will not do it all at once) according to the diviſion he made of it, beſides what he promiſes. But he is ſo diſguſted, and full of reſentment, upon the aforeſaid cenſures, being a man of great ſpirit, and extreamly jealous of his honour, that he has often thought, as I know very well, to burn all that he has done of it. What a loſs it would be!’

[E] This work was to contain ſix parts.] When he publiſhed the firſt, he added a table, containing the diviſion of the whole work, and the titles of the chapters in every book. But becauſe it was not he, who put the ſecond part to the preſs, it does not agree with the plan he had publiſhed. It is not divided into five books; and the twenty five chapters it contains, do not correſpond with thoſe of the plan, either as to the number or the ſubject; you will ſee the reaſon of it in theſe words of Cabrol. ‘ He could not as yet be prevailed upon to condeſcend to the publiſhing of the other parts; which he keeps ſo cloſe, that there is no ſeeing or reading of them. Now, ſeeing his reſolution (not to ſay obſtinacy) I went about to print ſome chapters, which I formerly had of him, having done me the favour to explain to me ſome propoſitions, upon which I deſired his explanation and advice. They are not many, but moſt of the chapters are very long, and contain ſeveral heads, ſo that ſhould we divide them into particulars, they would ſcarce be leſs than thirty. Mr Joubert made the firſt draught of them, long before he publiſhed the firſt part of his Vulgar Errors: they are certain ſubjects, which have ſince been diſpoſed by their author in the diviſion of the whole work, both general and particular, to ſerve, one for the ſeventh book, another for the eleventh, ſeventeenth, twentieth, twenty third, twenty fifth, twenty ſixth, and ſo on to the thirtieth. I have not troubled myſelf much about their order, ſince we can have nothing elſe at preſent from the author, as he had promiſed (15).’ The ſame Cabrol ſays (16), that while he cauſed this to be printed, as it were by ſtealth, he was ſurprized at the Printer's by Mr Joubert, who took my enterprize, adds he, very heinouſly. ‘ Neverthele ſs, when he underſtood, that I deſigned to preſent you with it, he . . . . permitted . . . . . the Bookſeller to go on, giving him beſides two fine diſcourſes tranſlated from his Latin paradoxes, by Iſaac Joubert, his eldeſt ſon.’ Note, that Gaſper Bachot, Counſellor and Phyſician to the king, publiſhed, in 1626, a book which he had written long before, to finiſh Lawrence Joubertus's deſign as to the third part of his Vulgar Errors (17). He kept to the chapters of the books, according to the order he found them in, in the table added to the firſt part; but he modelled them his own way, without ſwearing in verba Magiſtri (18). This book of Gaſper Bachot, is intituled Erreurs Populaires touchant la Medicine, & regime de Santé. This author is not to be found in Lindenius Renovatus.

[F] I will mention a particular which ſhews, that Joubertus was a modeſt man.] Gaſpar Bachot, whom I mentioned in the foregoing remark, was made doctor of Phyſic in 1592 (19). He gloried to have maintained his theſis againſt all opponents, and he looked upon his Doctorſhip as the trophy of his victory. But as ſoon as I read your anſwer (he writes this to Mr de Lorme, Phyſician in ordinary to Lewis XIII, and firſt Phyſician to the queen-mother (20), in which you acquainted me, that the late Mr Joubert, your colleague and friend, uſed to ſay of himſelf ter Doctor, nunquam futurus doctus; who being learned, and having obtained that laurel in three different univerſities, whilſt he was admired by every body, could not ſatisfy himſelf. I began from that time to have ſuch a diſtruſt of myſelf, that I thought all my former labour uſeleſs, without hoping to grow learned, ſince ſo great a perſon, like another Socrates, confeſſed his inſufficiency, or the fear of his not being able to arrive to the end of his wiſhes. Note, that he ſays, that Mr Joubert had learned his profeſſion in Montbriſon (21), and in the adjacent country, and lived there when his Decades were dedicated to Papon, a renowned Civilian, the glory of that town (22).

[G] There are . . . . . ſome remarks, which clear up ſome paſſages of his paradoxes.] He had maintained in his ſecond paradox, that it is poſſible a man may live a long time without eating and drinking. This propoſition gave offence, as inſinuating, that Moſes, Elias, and JESUS CHRIST, faſted forty days without any miracle. He anſwered properly to this objection; for his anſwer was approved by John de la Place, miniſter of Montpellier. This miniſter's approbation did not appear in the French tranſlation of this piece of Joubertus; but we find it in the Latin edition of his

---

(d) See the epiſtle dedicatory of Joubert's Queſtion. Medic., page 104, of the third part of his Opuſcula, and a letter of Poſthius, ibid pag. 154.

(10) Cabrol, ubi ſupra.

(11) Id. ibid.

(12) Id. ibid.

(13) Id. ibid.

(14) Id. ibid.

(15) Cabrol, ubi ſupra

(16) In the epiſtle dedicatory to Mr de Villeroy.

(17) At Lyons, for Bartholomew Vincent, in 8vo.

(18) See Bachot's preface.

(19) See his letter to Mr de Lorme, prefixed to the book concerning Vulgar Errors.

(20) Ibid.

(21) A town of the country called Forez.

(22) That is, of Montbriſon.

his Opuſcula, publiſhed at Lyons, in 1570 (23). This confirms what is ſaid in another place (24), that Joubertus was a Proteſtant.

It muſt be obſerved, that in explaining what gave offence, he had regard only to good ſouls, who, thro' a delicacy of conſcience, and too little acquaintance with Philoſophy, were eaſily alarmed. But as to thoſe, who, through malice, diſcovered poiſon in his works, he left them to the hardneſs of their hearts. ‘ Hujus enarrationis, ſays he (25), vel ſolo argumento vel demonſtrationibus commoveri poſſe hominum duo genera, facile præſentio. Unum eſt naturalis Philoſophiæ & Medicinæ imperitum, ſimplicitatis & pietatis nomine venerandum: qualis plebecula & quicunque in æſtimandis rerum cauſis ſtudium non adhibent. Alterum διαϐολικὸν, quod etiam quæ bene dicta eſſe novit, impudentiſſimis calumniis inſectatur. Hoc, quia explicationem non expectat, & quæcunque impura ſua mente excipiuntur depravat, ſuoque veneno inficit, me nihil moratur. Alteri verò benignè & candidè ſatisfaciendum puto.’ He had been very ſenſibly affected with the accuſations of theſe perſons, ſince he wiſhes, that GOD would give him the patience and ſerenity, which are neceſſary, when one is expoſed to the rage of their ſlanders. His words diſcover a heart full of reſentment, and dart thunder at his cenſurers. Thus he concludes. ‘ Hæc διαϐόλȣς κακοδαίμονας ab iſtius enarrationis prophanatione avertant, quibus eſt peculiare etiam ſacram paginam corrumpere, & in alienum peſſimumque ſenſum detorquere, impudentiſſime mentiri, & maledicere, animorum concordiam diſſolvere, inimicitias colere, invidiam crepare, & nunquam non quibus nocere queant modos excogitare, piiſque omnibus eſſe infeſtiſſimos. DEUS miſericors parcat hominibus quicunque ab ejuſmodi furiis agitati, earumque veneno afflati & infecti, ſimilem naturam induunt & referunt: quoſque ab iſtis nequiſſime tractari patitur, patientia (quæ omnia vincit) & manſuetudine bene muniat. Amen (26). —— Let this ſtop theſe ſlanderers from prophaning that narrative, whoſe buſineſs it is to corrupt the ſacred page, and pervert it to another, and that the worſt ſenſe, to lie moſt impudently, and calumniate, to break friendſhips, foment enmities, invent all methods to do miſchief, and to purſue with hatred all good men. May GOD of his mercy ſpare ſuch men as, acted by the ſame madneſs, and infected by their poiſon, imitate their nature: and may he fortify with patience (which ſurmounts all difficulties) and with mildneſs, thoſe whom he ſuffers to be miſuſed by them. Amen.’

[H] He innovated in the French orthography.] For he wrote jantil, accion, parfet, æmer, inſtead of gentil, action, parfait, aimer. He likewiſe made a difference between the v conſonant and the u vowel, and would have the conſonant (27) written differently from the other (28).

JOVIAN, emperor of Rome, came to this dignity by the choice of the army in the year 363, after the death of Julian the apoſtate. He was more conſiderable for the merit of count Varronian, his father, than for his own (a); for he was as yet very young, and ſerved ſtill in the companies of the life-guards [A]. Moſt things relating to him, being in Moreri's Dictionary, I ſhall only mention two particulars which are not there. The firſt is, that Jovian concluded a peace ſo ſhameful and diſadvantageous to the Roman empire, that he expoſed himſelf to the murmurs and banters of the public [B]. The ſecond

[A] He ſerved ſtill in the companies of the life-guards.] In ſaying this, I have chiefly in view theſe words of Eutropius: ‘ Poſt hunc (Julianum) Jovianus, qui tunc DOMESTICUS MILITABAT, ad obtinendum imperium conſenſu exercitus electus eſt, commendatione patris quàm ſua militibus notior (1). —— After this (Julian) Jovian then in the troops of the houſhold, was elected to the empire by the conſent of the army, procured rather by what the ſoldiers knew of his father than himſelf.’ But it muſt be obſerved that the expreſſions of this author, are not preciſe enough, aud that they ought to be rectified by thoſe of another hiſtorian, which more expreſsly ſhew the degree to which Jovian was arrived. ‘ Jovianus eligitur Imperator Domeſticorum ordinis primus paternis meritis mediocriter commendabilis (2). —— Jovian is elected emperor out of the houſhould troops, a perſon moderately eſteemed on account of his father' merit.’ As military employments have not at preſent the ſame order, or the ſame diſpoſition, as in that, age, it would be difficult to find a word that ſignifies exactly what is meant by domeſticorum ordinis primus, or primicerius domeſticorum (3); but we may very well preſume that thoſe words do not ſignify, that Jovian was the chief, or captain, of the guards called domeſtici, for the true name of their captain was Comes Domeſticorum (4). It is ſaid in Moreri's Dictionary, that Jovian was captain of the Pretorian guards, when he refuſed to abjure Chriſtianity under Julian the apoſtate. This is taken from Socrates the hiſtorian, who making uſe of the word χιλίαρχος (5), does not authorize Moreri's phraſe. Obſerve that Theodoret affirms (6) that Jovian had no employment in the army when he was made emperor. Ammianus Marcellinus, who ſays the contrary, is more to be credited, for he was upon the ſpot.

[B] Jovian concluded a peace ſo ſhameful and diſadvantageous . . . . that he expoſed himſelf . . . . to the murmurs and banters of the public.] He gave up to the Perſians five provinces, with ſome places that were a ſtrong rampart to the Roman empire. Amongſt others, the important town of Niſibis, and that of Singara (7); and with difficulty he obtained liberty for the inhabitants to retire into the Roman territories (8). He obliged himſelf not to give any aſſiſtance to the king of Armenia, who had conſtantly been a good and faithful friend of the emperor's. This was, ſay the hiſtorians, a ſort of impiety, and the ruin of this faithful friend, and the loſs of Armenia. ‘ Quibus exitiale aliud acceſſit & impium, ne poſt hæc ita compoſita, Arſaci poſcenti contra Perſas ferretur auxilium, amico nobis ſemper & fido . . . Unde poſtea contigit, ut vivus caperetur idem Arſaces, & Armeniæ maximum latus Medis conterminans, & Artaxata inter diſſenſiones & turbamenta raperent Parthi (9). —— To which was added a condition equally fatal and impious, to wit, that after this peace no aſſiſtance ſhould be given to Arſaces againſt the Perſians, though he was our old and faithful ally . . . . Hence it fell out that Arſaces was afterwards taken alive, and a great part of Armenia bordering on Media, together with Artaxata, in the midſt of theſe diſſenſions and diſturbances, were ſeized upon by the Parthians.’ Nothing can be more moving than the deſcription of the condition the inhabitants of Niſibis found themſelves in, when they ſaw they were forced to remove to another place (10). Their intreaties to Jovian not to force them to leave their country, were enough to break ones heart; and yet he had no regard to them, alledging the engagement of his word, and the fear of perjury: but it was believed he did not aſſign the true cauſe of his fear. ‘ Et hæc quidem ſuppliciter ordo & populus precabatur; ſed verbis loquebantur incaſſum, Imperatore, ut fingebat alia metuens, perjurii piacula declinante (11).’ It was thought he only kept his word, becauſe he feared that if he ſtaid in that country, and ſhould have any new quarrels with the Perſians, he ſhould have a competitor for the empire. They were perhaps in the right to ſay this; but at the bottom the Roman hiſtorians are much to blame for complaining of his punctual execution of the treaty of peace. Here is a paſſage of Eutropius, who cenſures him for it, and makes his great fault to conſiſt in that; for otherwiſe he owns that Jovian was obliged by a ſort of neceſſity, to conſent to thoſe ignominious conditions, which were never before impoſed on the Roman people. ‘ Jam turbatis rebus, exercitu, quoque inopia laborante uno à Perſis atque altero prælio victus (Jovianus) pacem cum Sapore neceſſariam quidem, ſed ignobilem fecit, mulctatus finibus, ac nonnulla imperii Romani parte tradita: quod ante eum annis mille centum & duobus de-viginti fere, ex quo Romanum imperium conditum erat, nunquam accidit. Quinetiam legiones noſtræ ita & apud Caudium per Pontium Teleſinum, ita & in Hiſpania apud Numantiam, & in Numidia ſub jugum miſſæ ſunt, ut

‘ nihil

---

(23) At Page 139, Part II.

(24) In remark [A] of the article VIRETUS.

(25) Jouberti, Opuſcul. Parte II, pag. 136.

(26) Jouberti Opuſcula, pag. 156, 157.

(27) Compare the News from the Republic of Letters, July 1704, art. viii.

(28) Taken from Sorel, at page 114, of the Perfection of Man.

(a) Suidas, in Ἰοβιανῷ. See alſo Eutropius's words in the remark [A].

(1) Eutropius, lib x, pag. m. 123.

(2) Amm. Marcellin. lib. xxv, cap. v, pag. m. 430.

(3) Hieron. in Chron. uſes theſe words.

(4) Vide Valeſium, in Amm. Marcell. lib. xiv, cap. x.

(5) Socrat. Hiſt. lib. iii, cap. xxii.

(6) Theod. Hiſt. lib. iv, cap. i.

(7) Vide Valeſium in Amm. Marcellin. lib. xxv, cap. ix, pag. 439.

(8) Amm. Marcell. ibid. cap. vii.

(9) Id. ibid. pag. 434.

(10) See Marcell. ibid. cap ix.

(11) Id. ibid. See alſo the Alexandrian Chronicle.

ſecond is, that he did not approve the uſing of violence for the extirpation of ſects

‘ nihil tamen finium traderetur. Ea pacis conditio non ‘ penitus reprehendenda foret, ſi fœderis neceſſitatem, ‘ cum integrum fuit, mutare voluiſſet: ſicut à Romanis omnibus his bellis, quæ commemoravi, factum ‘ eſt. Nam & Samnitibus, & Numantinis, & Numidis confeſtim bella illata ſunt: neque pax rata fuit ‘ (12). ——— All things being in confuſion, the army ‘ in want of proviſions, and himſelf twice defeated by ‘ the Perſians, he at laſt made a peace with Sapor, ‘ neceſſary indeed, but ignoble, the frontiers being ſtraitened, and a part of the Roman empire lopped off, ‘ which in the ſpace of 1118 years, that is, from the foundation thereof, to his time, had never happened, for although our legions paſſed under the yoke by the command of Pontius Teleſinus, and in Spain at Numantia, ‘ and again in Numidia, yet was never any part of the ‘ Roman territory given up. However, even this condition of peace would not have been altogether blameable, if when he had it in his power he had remedied ‘ it, as the Romans did on each of the occaſions before ‘ mentioned. For againſt the Samnites, Numantians, and ‘ Numidians, the war was ſtill carried on, and no ignominious treaty ever ratified.’ You ſee that he is cenſured for not having imitated the antient Romans, who without any delay attacked the nations, which had obliged them to accept of a ſhameful capitulation, but had never made them loſe an inch of ground. And ſince he was cenſured, though he reigned but ſeven or eight months, for not repairing the diſgrace and loſs this peace brought along with it, it is plain they would have had him break theſe articles a few days after they were concluded, and as ſoon as his army was ſupplied with proviſions, and in a place of ſafety: but were not theſe politics manifeſtly unjuſt? Suppoſe that after a very prejudicial peace which neceſſity has extorted, it may be lawful to ſeek an occaſion of relief; muſt one not let ſome time paſs and wait for pretences and conjectures which time never fails to ſupply? You ſee that even according to the corrupt maxims of politics, Jovian would have been guilty of a horrible treachery, if he had done what the hiſtorians blame him for having omitted. The three examples alledged by Eutropius are not like this. The ſenate and the people might lawfully break the agreement of their generals; but Jovian who concluded the peace, knew no ſuperior, he was ſole maſter. Note, that what went moſt to the heart of the true Romans, was the yielding of a country which did belong to the empire; for they pretended, that the like had never been ſeen before; and it was ſo little conſiſtent with their maxims to ſuffer their ſtates to leſſen, that they allowed the honour of a triumph only to thoſe who extended their frontiers: it was refuſed to ſome generals who had done great actions, but without any other fruit, than recovering what had been loſt before. Read the deſcription of this Roman grandeur in theſe words of Marcellinus. ‘ Illud tamen ad medullas uſque bonorum pervenit: ‘ quòd dum extimeſcit æmulum poteſtatis, dumque in ‘ animo per Gallias & Illyricum verſat, quoſdam ſæpe ‘ ſublimiora cœptaſſe, famam adventus ſui prævenire ‘ feſtinans, indignum imperio facinus amictu perjurii ‘ fugiendi commiſit, Niſibi prodita: quæ jam inde à ‘ Mithridatici regni temporibus, ne Oriens à Perſis occuparetur, viribus reſtitit maximis. Nunquam enim ‘ ab Urbis ortu inveniri poteſt annalibus replicatis, ut arbitror, terrarum pars ulla noſtrarum ab Imperatore ‘ vel Conſule hoſti conceſſa: ſed ne ob recepta quidem quæ direpta ſunt, verùm ob amplificata regna ‘ triumphalis gloria fuiſſe delata. Unde P. Scipioni ob ‘ recuperatas Hiſpanias, Fulvio Capuâ poſt diuturna ‘ certamina ſuperatâ, & Opimio poſt diverſos exitus ‘ præliorum, Fregellanis tunc internecivis hoſtibus ad ‘ deditionem compulſis, triumphi ſunt denegati. Id ‘ etiam memoriæ nos veteres docent, in extremis caſibus icta cum dedecore fœdera, poſtquàm partes verbis juravere conceptis, repetitione bellorum illico diſſoluta: ut temporibus priſcis apud Furcas Caudinas ‘ ſub jugum legionibus miſſis in Samnio, & per Albinum in Numidia ſceleſtè pace cogitata, & auctore turpiter pactionis feſtinatæ Mancino dedito Numantinis ‘ (13). ——— That act pierced all good men to the very ‘ heart, that while he dreaded a rival in power, he ‘ paſſing through the Gauls and Illyricum, meditating ‘ what greater things others had done, endeavouring ‘ to prevent by his coming the fame of his approach, he, ‘ under colour of avoiding perjury, did what was unworthy of the empire, in delivering up Niſibis, which, ‘ from the time of Mithridates's reign, that the Perſians might never enjoy the eaſtern parts, had been obſtinately defended. Nor is it to be found in the Annals from the very building of Rome (as I apprehend) ‘ that any part of our dominions hath been yielded to ‘ the enemy, by either general or conſul; nay, triumphal honours were reſtrained, and not allowed for the ‘ recovering provinces, but for adding to the territories ‘ of the commonwealth. On this account P. Scipio for ‘ regaining Spain, Fulvius after the reduction of Capua, ‘ which ſuſtained a long ſiege, and Opimius after ſeven ‘ battles, compelling the Fregellani, our invetgrate enemies, to ſurrender, were all of them denied triumphs. ‘ It has alſo been tranſmitted to us from our anceſtors, ‘ that in caſes where ignoble terms were ſubmitted to, ‘ after the parties had confirmed the covenant with ‘ oaths, they were however thought to be diſſolved by ‘ an immediate carrying on of the war, as in old time ‘ after the legions at Samnium, were compelled to paſs ‘ under the Fork, and Albinus in Numidia made a moſt ‘ ſcandalous peace, and Mancinus, author of an ignominious treaty with the Numantines, was delivered up to ‘ that people.’ Obſerve that the remark [D] muſt be conſidered as a conſequence of this; for I there examine whether Eutropius and Ammianus Marcellinus had reaſon to affirm what they ſay.

How people are commonly affected, with reſpect to war and treaties of peace.

If we reflect never ſo little upon the temper of nations, and eſpecially on the condition that Chriſtians and Heathens were then in, we ſhall eaſily believe that the emperor Jovian became odious and contemptible, and the ſubject of many ſatires. The people fear and hate war; they love and deſire peace, and with good reaſon; for they ſuffer the greateſt inconveniencies of the war; nevertheleſs they are afflicted at a treaty of peace, that diſgraces the nation, and deprives it of a frontier, that was a ſafe barrier to it, and made it formidable to it's neighbours. Victories and conqueſts rejoice the meaneſt peaſants, and make them more patiently bear the burden of the war. Taxes and impoſts are moſt eaſily forgotten when the war is attended with good ſucceſs, and with an advantageous peace. Every one has a ſhare in the glory of the nation; but the thought that the enemies will grow haughty, contemptuous, and inſulting upon their terminating the war by a peace wholly to their mind, overwhelms them with grief and indignation. Muſt ſo many charges and expences, ſay they, go for nothing? &c. See above (14) the murmurs of the French againſt the peace of Cateau. Never were people in a better capacity to ſhew the like indignation than under the empire of Jovian. There was great emulation betwixt the Chriſtians and the Heathens. The latter had juſt loſt an emperor whom they loved, and from whom they expected mighty things; they flattered themſelves with the hopes, that his expedition againſt the Perſians would be advantageous and glorious, and they ſaw that death having deprived him of theſe fine triumphs, he was ſucceeded by a Chriſtian prince, under whom things were reduced to a miſerable condition. To murmur againſt ſuch a prince, to cenſure and ſatirize him, was to gratify many paſſions at once; it was heightening Julian's glory, and making the Chriſtians aſhamed; it was ſacrificing to the idol of political vanity, and to their zeal for religion. They failed not to act according to theſe ſeveral principles: they made verſes and parodies to abuſe Jovian (15). The libellers of Antioch diſtinguiſhed themſelves; they diſperſed their libels againſt him in the ſtreets, and poſted up others; they turned him into ridicule, by applying to him ſome places of the Iliads, and amongſt others that of the third book (16), where Paris is ſo roughly treated by his brother Hector; and that of the ſecond book (17), where Ulyſſes threatens Therſites to ſtrip him naked, and ignominouſly to drive him away.

Εἰ μὴ ἐγώ σε λαϐὼν, ἀπὸ μὲν φίλα εἵματα
  δύσω
Χλαῖναντ', ἠδὲ χιτῶνα, τά τ' αἰδῶ ἀμφικαλύπτει
Αὐτὸν δὲ κλαίοντα θοὰς ἐπὶ Πέρσας ἀφήσω.

Niſi

---

(12) Eutropius, ubi ſupra.

(13) Amm. Marcellin. lib. xxv, cap. ix, pag. 439, 440.

(14) In the remarks [C], [G], and [H] of the article HENRY II. See also the remark [P], of the article HENRY IV.

(15) Suidas, in Ἰοβιανῷ.

(16) Ver. 39.

(17) Ver. 261.

ſects [C]. Some authors ſay, that before him the Romans never gave up any part of the empire by a treaty of peace [D]. Others maintain, that they who ſpeak thus are miſtaken. I will examine this in a remark, and will alſo produce what the fathers of the church have

Niſi ego te captum, & caris veſtibus exuam,
Lænaque & tunica & veſtibus quæ pudenda circumtegunt,
Ipſum vero te plorantem celeriter ad Perſas remittam (18).

Thee will I ſeize, and of thy robes diſpoil,
Thy gown, thy tunic, even the needſul veſt
Which modeſty requires, and naked then
I'll laſh thee howling to the Perſians back.

An old woman, who ſaw him well made and handſome, and heard that he had no genius and no ſenſe (19), cried out, his folly is as great as his ſtature (20). Suidas, who tells us all theſe things, had ſaid before, that this emperor knew nothing; that he had no education, and that he loſt by his lazy negligence what nature had given him. Ἀμελέτητος δὲ ὢν, καὶ ἄγευστος παιδεύσεως, καὶ ἣν εἶχε φύσιν διὰ ῥαθυμίαν ἠμαύρου καὶ ἠφάνιζεν. Sed incultus & doctrinæ prorſus expers; quam ne guſtarat quidem. Quinetiam quod habebat ingenium, id per ignaviam obſcurabat, & delebat (21). Eutropius and Ammianus Marcellinus ſpeak not after this manner. Vir alias neque iners neque imprudens (22). ſays one. We ſhall ſee the words of the other at the beginning of the remark [E].

[C] He did not approve the uſing of violence for the extripation of ſects.] The Philoſopher Themiſtius gives him an encomium which does not agree with the acccounts we find in eccleſiaſtical hiſtory. He praiſes him for permitting all men to ſerve GOD in their way, and fixing by that means the inconſtancy of thoſe flatterers, who had changed their religion, juſt as the imperial purple had changed hands whom he compares to the Euripus (23). Θαυμάζει τὸν βασιλέα, ὡς τὸ ἐφεῖναι θρησκεύειν ὡς ἕκαστοι βούλονται, νικήσαντα τῶν κολάκων τοὺς τρόπους· οὓς καὶ διασύρων πάνυ γελοίως ἔφη, ἐλέγχεσθαι αὐτοὺς ἀλουργίδα, οὐ Θεὸν θεραπεύοντας· μηδὲν τε διαφέρειν αὐτοὺς Εὐρίπου, νῦν μὲν ἐπὶ τάδε· νῦν δὲ εἰς τοὐναντίον τὰ ῥεύματα μεταβάλλοντος. Imperatorem magnis effert laudibus, ob id quod conceſſa cuique libera facultate colendi numinis prout vellet, adulatorum mores compreſſerit. Quos quidem facete perſtringens, ait experimento cognitum eſſe, illos non Deum ſed purpuram colere: planeque ſimiles eſſe Euripo, qui modo in hanc, modo in illam partem fertur (24). Themiſtius ſpoke in this manner in his oration upon Jovian's conſulſhip. Which ſignifies, that the emperor did not forbid the Heathens to worſhip their Gods in their old way; and yet we learn from Socrates the hiſtorian (25), that all the temples of the Heathens were ſhut up, and that theſe idolaters concealed themſelves, ſome in one place, and ſome in another; that the Philoſophers left off their habit, and that the ſacrifices, which had been ſo frequent in Julian's time, ceaſed. It muſt be ſaid then, that Themiſtius uſed an hyperbole, that was only grounded upon Jovian's moderation to Heretics, and which perhaps was a crafty inſinuation to tolerate all religions in the ſame manner. That which is certain, is, that this prince ſeeing himſelf courted by all the Chriſtian ſects, every one deſiring to gain him, declared for the orthodox party, as to the conſubſtantiality of the word (26), but he did not give way to the requeſt of expelling from their churches ſuch as were of another opinion (27), and he anſwered that he hated diſputes, and that he loved and eſteemed the lovers of peace and concord. He deſigned by his gentleneſs and mildneſs to extinguiſh all the ſchiſms of the church; for which reaſon he gave out, that he would perſecute no body, and that he would love and honour eſpecially ſuch, as expreſſed the greateſt zeal for the re-eſtabliſhment of peace. Ὁ μέντοι βασιλεὺς πρόθεσιν εἶχε, κολακείᾳ καὶ πειθοῖ τῶν διεστώτων τὴν φιλονεικίαν ἐκκόψαι, φήσας μηδενὶ ὀχληρὸς τῶν ὁπωσοῦν πιστευόντων ἔσεσθαι· ἀγαπήσειν δὲ καὶ ὑπερτιμήσειν τοὺς ἀρχὴν τῇ ἑνώσει τῆς ἐκκλησίας παρέξοντας. Cæterum Imperator id ſibi propoſuerat, ut diſſidentium jurgia blanditiis & leni verborum perſuaſione extingueret, ajebatque ſe nemini omnino qualiſcunque fidei eſſet moleſtiam exhibiturum: eos tamen præ cæteris amaturum atque in pretio habiturum, qui reparandæ in Eccleſia pacis auctores ac duces ſe præberent (28). I muſt obſerve that he made a ſevere law againſt thoſe who ſhould endeavour to marry the Nuns, or behave themſelves immodeſtly to them; for he ordered them to be puniſhed with death (29). He was induced to this ſeverity that he might ſuppreſs the audaciouſneſs that was uſed in Julian's reign, in marrying the Nuns, and employing ſometimes force, and ſometimes perſuaſions to corrupt them (30).

[D] Some authors ſay that before him the Romans never gave up any part of the empire by a treaty of peace.] The paſſages of Eutropius and Ammianus Marcellinus before alledged (31), are a manifeſt proof that this was the common diſcourſe. Caſaubon (32) pretends that they who ſpoke thus, ſaid a thing that was not true: he grounds himſelf upon the emperor Hadrian's abandoning three provinces (33), and Diocleſian's ſtreightening the bounds of the empire. 'Diocletianus .... Auguſti preceptum, Hadrianique 'exemplum ſecutus, imperii, fines à meridie ſupra Ægyptum arctavit, auctor Procopius in Perſicis. Idem Imperator reliquit & Daciam à Trajano conſtitutam, ſublato exercitu & provincialibus; deſperans 'eam poſſe retineri, Vopiſcus ait. —— Diocleſian ... 'following the direction of Auguſtus, and the example of Adrian, ſettled Egypt as the ſouth boundary 'of his empire, as Procopius informs us in his Perſian hiſtory. The ſame emperor, as Vopiſcus ſays, abandoned Dacia, tho' ſettled by Trajan, removing the 'army and the provincial officers, becauſe he deſpaired of keeping it.' But Valeſius (34) ſhews a great difference betwixt what theſe emperors and Jovian did. The latter gave up ſome provinces by a treaty of peace, and as it were by way of ranſom; the others voluntarily abandoned a country, the keeping of which was too chargeable. This was to follow the maxims of prudence, and not like Jovian to ſubmit to the laws of the conqueror. And therefore there was no reaſon for cenſuring Marcellinus's words, as Caſaubon, Lindenbrogius (35) and Coqueus (36) have done; and it is certain that Jovian introduced a novelty. It is generally agreed that it was a ſcandalous thing (37): the Chriſtians and Heathens did not diſpute on that point; but only differed with relation to this emperor's juſtification. The Chriſtians endeavoured to clear him, and the Heathens to condemn him. We have ſeen above (38), that a Heathen hiſtorian cenſures him, not for conſenting to the the treaty of peace, but for obſerving the conditions of it. This is an unjuſt, and abominable cenſure. If neceſſity obliged him to make a peace, as this author and all others acknowledge, he ought to be excuſed; for neceſſity has no law.

Neceſſitas, cujus curſus tranſverſi impetum
Voluerunt multi effugere, pauci potuerunt (39).

With rapid tide neceſſity rolls on,
And tho' all fly, yet few it's rage can ſhun.

And when once he is juſtified upon this point, the reſt goes off of itſelf. The exact obſervation of a treaty of peace ſolemnly ſworn, deſerves not to be condemned. Ammianus Marcellinus is a more dangerous cenſurer than Eutropius; he was an eye-witneſs, and relates things in ſuch a manner, as to give to underſtand (40) that Jovian unneceſſarily engaged himſelf in that neceſſity, and that the confuſion the Perſians had reduced him to, was not ſo great, but that it had been better to have tried the fortune of the war, than to accept thoſe ignominious conditions. He accuſes him of downright cowardice, and of lending an ear to the flatterers who diſcouraged him. 'Et cùm pugnari decies 'expediret, ne horum quidquam dederetur: adulatorum globus inſtabat timido Principi, Procopii metuendum ſubſerens nomen, eumque adfirmans, niſi 'rediret, cognito Juliani interitu, cum intacto milite 'quem regebat, novas res nullo renitente facilè moliturum. Hac pernicioſa verborum ille aſſiduitate nimia ſuccenſus, ſine cunctatione tradidit omnia quæ

---

(18) Id. ibid.

(19) Id. ibid.

(20) Ὅσον μῆκος, καὶ βάθος ἡ μωρία. Quanta longitudo & profunditas eſt hujus corporis, tanta etiam eſt ejus ſtultitia. Id. ib.

(21) Id. ibid.

(22) Eutrop. lib. x, ſub fin.

(23) See the Penſées deverſes ſur les Cometes, pag. 244.

(24) Socrates, Hiſt Eccleſ. lib. iii, cap. xxv, pag. m 205.

(25) Id. ibid. cap. xxiv.

(26) Id. ibid. & cap. xxv.

(27) Id. ibid. cap. xxv.

(28) Id. ibid. pag. 204, 205.

(29) Sozomen. Hiſtor. Eccleſ. lib. vi, cap. iii.

(30) Id. ibid.

(31) In the remark [B].

(32) Caſaubon. Not. ad Spartian. vit. Adriani, cap. v, pag. m. 47.

(33) See, above, remark [G], of the article HADRIAN (PUBLIUS ÆLIUS.)

(34) Valeſ. in Amm. Marcell. lib. xxv, cap. ix, pag. m. 439, 440.

(35) Lindenbr. in Ammian. Marcell. ibid.

(36) Leonardus Coqueus in Auguſt. de Civit. Dei, lib. iv, cap. xxix.

(37) Poſt ... pudendæ pacis icta fœdera. Amm. Marcell. lib. xxvii, cap. xii. See alſo Agathias, lib. iv. Socrates, lib. iii, cap. xxii. Zonaras, &c.

(38) In the remark [B], citat. (12).

(39) Laberius, apud Macrobium Saturn. lib ii, cap. vii. See alſo the words of Horace, above, citation (11) of the article of the third duke of GUISE.

(40) Amm. Marcell. lib. xxv, cap. vii, pag. 433.

have ſaid concerning that peace of Jovian (b). I add, that he was a very tall man, zealous for orthodoxy, but very much addicted to wine and women [E]. Thoſe are rather to be believed, who ſay he wanted neither activity nor prudence and knowledge, than ‘ petebantur (41). —— And when it was more eligible to have ſought ten battles than to have made ſuch conceſſions, a crowd of flatterers deluded the timorous prince, whiſpering that the very name of Procopius was to be feared, and warmly affirming that he knowing of the death of Julian, unleſs the emperor returned with his whole army, might eaſily, and without reſiſtance change the face of affairs: overcome with the pernicious aſſiduity of theſe counſellors, he, without conſideration, gave up every thing that was demanded.’ Agathias (42) charges him plainly with the ſame weakneſs. The Chriſtians, to excuſe Jovian, carefully obſerved, that Julian the Apoſtate was the principal cauſe of all this misfortune, ſince his raſhneſs was ſo great, as to burn all the veſſels that ſhould have ſerved to tranſport the proviſions; for hence proceeded that horrible ſcarcity, which obliged Jovian to a ſhameful capitulation (43). ‘ Cujus vanis deditus oraculis erat (Julianus), quando fretus ſecuritate victoriæ naves quibus victus neceſſarius portabatur, incendit. Deinde fervidè inſtans immodicis auſibus & mox merito temeritatis occiſus, in locis hoſtilibus egenum reliquit exercitum, ut aliter inde non poſſet evadi, niſi contra illud auſpicium Dei Termini, de quo ſuperiore libro diximus, Romani imperii termini moverentur. Ceſſit enim Terminus deus neceſſitati, qui non ceſſerat Jovi (44). —— To which vain oracles he (i. e. Julian) was addicted, when, as if ſecure of victory, he burnt the ſhips with all their proviſions on board. Afterwards advancing with immoderate boldneſs, and having by his timerity merited that death which he received, he left his army in want of all things in countries poſſeſſed by the enemy, from whence it was impoſſible for them to eſcape; if, contrary to the command of the god Terminus mentioned in the former book, the limits of the Roman empire had not been changed. Thus the god Terminus yielded to neceſſity, who had not yielded to Jove.’ You ſee in theſe words of St Auguſtin all the fault laid upon Julian, and moreover a jeſt upon the Heathen religion, in that the immobility of the god Terminus had proved falſe upon that occaſion (45). The Pagans might have ſaid, that it was no wonder that this deity had not acted in favour of Jovian, as being a rebel againſt the gods of Rome; but that ſubterſuge might eaſily have been refuted: for it would ſtill be true, that it was a fallacious promiſe, which the Romans pretended the god Terminus had made, that the boundaries of the empire ſhould never be leſſened. Now this is what St Auſtin deſigned to prove againſt the Heathens.

Note, by the by, how prudent the conduct of the antient Romans was: they deſigned to make conqueſts; and there is nothing more neceſſary for ſuch a deſign, than not to reſtore by a peace, what was gained by the war: for in vain you take towns and provinces, you will never be the greater for it, if you are obliged to reſtore them by the articles of peace. The Romans to ſucceed in the project of forming a vaſt empire, ſpurred their generals by motives of glory, and ſcruples of religion, to gain new countries, and not to loſe the conqueſts they had once made. They never granted a triumph to ſuch as did no more than recover what the enemy had taken (46), and they gave out, that it was violating the religion of the god Terminus, and his ſacred auſpices (47) to yield up the frontiers of the empire. The Turks propoſing to make vaſt conqueſts, and to lay the foundation of a great empire, have more particularly brought in religion into that deſign; for they ſaid that it did not permit them to reſtore a a town wherein there was a moſque, to it's firſt poſſeſſors. For which reaſon they made great haſte to build a moſque in their new conqueſts. This was to engage themſelves to keep them in making peace, and to oblige the governours of a town to defend themſelves by a principle of conſcience, with extraordinary obſtinacy (48). But they have lately experienced the uſeleſſneſs of this nice policy. The treaty of Carlowitz, concluded in the year 1698, has expoſed them to the ſame raillery that St Auguſtin made uſe of againſt the Roman god Terminus, who gave way to neceſſity under Jovian the emperor. The Sultan has been obliged to yield up a great number of places with moſques in them, to the Chriſtian princes. In vain it was repreſented to him that this was offending againſt the maxims of his religion; there was a neceſſity for doing it, and of two evils, the leaſt was to be choſen.

[E] He was a very tall man, zealous for orthodoxy, but very much addicted to wine and women.] See him here drawn by a Pagan hiſtorian (49). ‘ Incedebat motu corporis gravi, vultu lætiſſimo, oculis cæſiis, vaſta proceritate & ardua, adeo ut diu nullum indumentum regium ad menſuram ejus aptum inveniretur. Et æmulari malebat Conſtantium, agens ſeria quædam aliquoties poſt meridiem: jocarique palam cum proximis adſuetus. Chriſtianæ legis idem ſtudioſus, & nonnunquam honorificus, mediocriter eruditus, magiſque benivolus, & perpenſiùs, ut apparebat ex paucis quos promoverat, judices electurus: edax tamen, & vino Venerique indulgens: quæ vitia imperiali verecundia forſitan correxiſſet. —— He walked with becoming gravity, his countenance was very pleaſant, his eyes grey, his ſtature large, inſomuch that it was ſome time before a royal robe could be found fit for him to wear. He ſeemed to imitate Conſtantius in talking of ſerious things, in the afternoon, diſcourſing however ſometimes very pleaſantly, even in public to thoſe about him; ſtrongly attached to the Chriſtian religion, in many things worthy of honour, moderately learned, but very benevolent, and choſe the judges with great care, as appeared by the few he promoted; a great eater however, and ſomewhat addicted both to wine and women, which vices, notwithſtanding, he might have corrected, and put on a modeſty worthy of his dignity.’ Zonarus, who was a Chriſtian and a monk, took from Ammianus Marcellinus the greateſt part of this character, ſpeaking of that emperor. Ὁ μὲν Ἰοβιανὸς, ſays he, εὐσεβὴς ἦν περὶ δόγμα καὶ ἀγαθοθελής. οἴνου δ' ἥττητο καὶ ἀφροδισίων. καὶ τὴν τοῦ σώματος ἀναδρομὴν εὐμήκης, καὶ γραμμάτων οὐκ ἄπειρος. Jovianus quidem religioſus fuit erga Chriſtianam fidem, & benevolus. Vino tamen, Venerique indulgens. Procerus ſtatura, nec litterarum expers. —— Jovian was indeed ſtrongly addicted to the ſupport of the Chriſtian faith, and of a benevolent diſpoſition. Prone both to wine, and women. Of a large ſtature, and not ignorant of letters. Here then you ſee an emperor very religious as to his opinions, but a great drunkard, and a whoremonger. He gave two ſtrong proofs of his zeal for the goſpel, before he aſcended the throne; for in the firſt place, he ſhewed himſelf very ready to renounce his poſt, rather than his religion (50), when Julian commanded the officers of his troops to embrace Paganiſm, or to reſign their employments. In the ſecond place he would not accept of the empire, till having declared that he was a Chriſtian, and that he would not command Heathens, the ſoldiers had declared that they were Chriſtians (51). He had then the reſolution of renouncing for the love of God, not only a ſmall employment, but alſo the greateſt dignity that was then in the world. He was capable of preferring his religion before the Roman empire; but his conſcience, which was ſo nice in this reſpect, could not move him to leave off drinking and women. He could quit for his religion all other things but thoſe two. What an odd thing is this! what a combination of good and evil in the ſame man! There are in all ages many who leave their country for their religion, their eſtates, their employments, and their friends and relations, who yet cannot bring themſelves to renounce Venus and Bacchus. Never believe that Jovian's orthodoxy was imperfect; but he perſuaded that he very well knew, that drunkenneſs and lewdneſs are forbidden by God, and that the ſame religion which condemned the Heathen idolatry, condemned drunkenneſs and the diſorderly love of women. Note, that he was as great an eater as he was a drinker; and it has even been ſaid, that he died of eating too much. Multi exanimatum opinantur nimia cruditate: inter cœnandum enim epulis indulſerat (52). Other reaſons of his death were alledged (53), viz. the vapour of a chamber over-heated, poiſon (54), &c. But this which follows was alledged by the Chriſtians themſelves: Ἐτελεύτησεν, ἢ ἀφειδέστερον, ὥς τινες λέγουσι, δειπνήσας, ἢ ὑπὸ τῆς ὀδμῆς τοῦ οἰκήματος. Obiit

(b) See the remark [D].

(41) Id. ibid. pag. 434.

(42) Agathias, lib. iv.

(43) See the ſecond Oration of Gregory Nazianzen againſt Julian the Apoſtate. See alſo Socrates, lib. iii cap. xxii, pag. 196.

(44) Auguſt de Civitat. Dei, lib. v, cap. xxi, pag. m. 554. See alſo lib. iv, cap. xxix.

(45) See Dionyſius Halicarnaſſeus, lib. iii, cap. xcii.

(46) See the remark [B], citat. (13).

(47) See St Auguſtin, de Civit. Dei, lib. iv, cap. xxix.

(48) Ricaut, Preſent State of the Ottoman Empire, lib. ii, cap. iii, pag. m. 320.

(49) Amm. Marcell. lib. xxv, ſub fin. pag. m. 443.

(50) Socrat. lib. iii, cap. xxii.

(51) Id. ibid.

(52) Eutropius, ubi ſupra. See alſo Ammian. Marcellin. ubi ſupra, pag. 443.

(53) Alii odore cubiculi, quod ex recenti tectorio calcis, grave quieſcentibus erat: quidam nimietate prunarum, quas gravi frigore adoleri multas juſſerat. Id. Eutrop. ibid. See alſo Ammian. Marcellin. ibid.

(54) See Valeſ. in Amm. Marcellin. ibid.

than ſuch as make him effeminate, very ignorant, and ſtupid (c); for he ſhewed his vigilance in preventing the tumults and competitions, which he feared the news of his election might raiſe in the weſtern provinces of the empire (d). The meaſures he took for it were well concerted, though he could not hinder the true news of the ill condition of the eaſt from coming before the falſe news he ordered to be ſpread every where, to conceal the advantages obtained by the Perſians [F]. His father, who had left the ſervice in order to live quietly in his houſe (e), had not time to riſe to the dignity which was deſigned for him; he died before Jovian had executed his reſolution of making him his colleague in the conſulſhip (f). This dignity was conferred on a child (g), viz. Varronianus the ſon of Jovian and of Charis the daughter of Lucilianus (h). Jovian's reign was very ſhort; for it laſted but eight months.

(c) See the remark [B], towards the end.

(d) See Ammianus Marcellin lib. xxv, cap. viii.

(e) Ammian. Marcellin. lib. xxv, cap. v.

(f) See Valeſius, in Marcell. lib. xxv, cap. ult.

(g) Ammian. Marcellin. ibid. cap. x.

(h) Id. ibid. cap. viii, pag. m. 436.

Obiit ſive quod intemperantius, ut quidam ajunt, cœnaverat, ſeu præ odore cubiculi (55). Have you obſerved Marcellinus's conjecture? He ſays, that Jovian would perhaps have corrected, by the conſideration of his imperial dignity, his intemperance and lewdneſs. This is a judicious thought, tho' conſidering things in general, and according to experience, the ſovereign power does not ſeem to be a good ſchool of ſobriety and continence for ſuch as naturally love ſenſual pleaſures: on the contrary, it ſeems much more proper to increaſe the diſeaſe than to cure it, the means of ſatisfying ones pleaſures, being greater and more numerous. But if it be true, that exceſs in eating was the cauſe of the death of Jovian, and if what we read in Suidas be not fabulous, Marcellinus's conjecture is very doubtful. Suidas (56) relates, that Jovian, at the inſtigation of his wife, cauſed a very fine temple to be burnt, which Hadrian had conſecrated to Trajan, and the library which the emperor Julian had ſet up in it. He adds that Jovian's concubines ſet fire to it, and laughed at it. This action is very much like the debauchery of Alexander (57) and Thais the courtezan.

[F] He could not hinder the true news . . . . . from coming before the falſe news he ordered to be ſpread every where, to conceal the advantages obtained by the Perſians] It is one of the moſt neceſſary artifices of policy to deceive the people with falſe relations, when there is no good news to tell them (58). It is a difficult thing, I confeſs, to ſtop the courſe of bad news, when it is but too true; but one muſt do what can be done, and Jovian did not forget that ſtratagem. 'Juſſum eſt autem ad implenda hæc perrectu'ris, extollere ſeriem geſtorum in melius, & rumores 'quaquà irent verbis diffundere, concinentibus pro'cinctum Parthicum exitu proſpero terminatum . . . . '(59). Hos tabellarios ſama prægrediens, index triſti'orum caſuum velociſſima, per Provincias volitabat & 'gentes; maximéque omnium Niſibenos acerbo dolo're perculſit, cùm urbem Sapori deditam comperiſ'ſent (60). ——— It was but fit that thou who were 'concerned to bring theſe things about, ſhould endeavour 'to give a better turn to the ſtory of theſe tranſactions, 'and by diſperſing artful rumors through the pro'vinces, encourage the people to believe that affairs 'with the Parthians had been terminated with ſuc'ceſs . . . . But fame, the quickeſt meſſenger of ill 'news, ſoon got the ſtart of theſe carriers, and flew 'with them throughout the whole empire: the Niſi'benians were of all others ſtruck with the ſharpeſt 'grief, when they underſtood that their city was to 'be delivered up to Sapor.' Theſe words of Marcellinus are remarkable, fama index triſtiorum caſuum velociſſima; They inſinuate that fame never flies ſo ſwift, as when it has unlucky news to bring; and therefore it deſerves with greater reaſon to be characterized as it has been.

Fama, malum quo non aliud velocius ullum:
Mobilitate viget, vireſque acquirit eundo (61).

Fame, the great ill, from ſmall beginnings grows.
Swift from the firſt; and every moment brings
New vigour to her flights, new pinions to her wings.

DRYDEN.

(55) Sozomen. Hiſt. Eccleſ. lib vi, cap. vi.

(56) Suidas, ubi ſupra.

(57) When he ſet fire to the city of Perſepolis. See Quintus Curtius, lib. v, cap. vii.

(58) See the remark [B], of the Diſſertation concerning Libels at the end of this Dictionary.

(59) Ammian. Marcellin. ubi ſupra, cap. viii, pag. 436.

(60) Id. ibid. pag. 437.

(61) Virgil. Æneid. lib. iv, ver. 174.

JOVIUS (PAUL) was born at Como in Italy, in 1483, got a great reputation by his writings, and the biſhopric of Nocera (a); but he was looked upon as a mercenary writer; ſo that no great credit is given to his hiſtories [A]. It is ſaid, that he was not

(a) Pope Clement VII gave it him.

[A] No great credit is given to his hiſtories.] James Gohorri made no ſcruple to ſay, that the adventures of Amadis de Gaul, may appear as true as the hiſtories of Paul Jovius. 'Illud certe ad ſempiternam memo'riam teſtatum reliquit Gorræus Pariſienſis, qui quas 'finxit (1) Amadiſi fabulas non minus veras ac proba'biles quam Jovii ſcripta fore confidit (2). —— Go'borri, a Pariſian, has left it as a thing certain to 'poſterity, that the fables framed by him concerning 'Amadis, had in them as much truth and probability, 'as was contained in Jovius's hiſtorical writings.' Thuanus has not made uſe of that hyperbole, but he ſays enough to let us know the eſteem that writer was in. 'Cum alioqui homo gratioſus ſe paſſim obnoxium 'prodat, eoque nomine ipſi in pleriſque rebus fides 'derogetur, quod ad gratiam & in odium ſcripſiſſe, '& venalem calamum habuiſſe fere omnibus perſua'ſum ſit (3). —— When a man, otherwiſe in good eſteem, 'lays himſelf open in many particulars, and falſifies 'almoſt every fact he relates, it is no wonder if moſt 'people are perſuaded that he wrote out of paſſion and 'prejudice, and with a venal pen.' To which you may add the following paſſage of Voſſius, who ſays that Paul Jovius had in ſome manner ſet up a bank: he promiſed an antient genealogy, and an immortal glory, to all the ſcoundrels that paid him well for his pains, and he traduced all others who would not pay him for his lies. Quam fluxæ etiam fidei patrum ævo fuit Paullus Jovius? quem conſtat in aula Henrici ſecundi quibuſque terræ filiis bene de ſe merentibus generis claritatem ac perpetuum nomen pollicitum: contraque maledice eos traduxiſſe qui venali hiſtorico morem non gererent (4). We ſhall ſee in the following remark, from whence this is taken. He had offered his pen to Don John III, king of Portugal; and becauſe his offers were not accepted, he paſſed over in ſilence a victory of the Portugueſe. Had he had a good ſalary for writing the hiſtory of Portugal, he would have forged imaginary victories, ſo far would he have been from ſuppreſſing the true one. He has been therefore juſtly cried down. The hiſtorian of Emanuel's life ſays thus. 'Victoria fuit præclara: quam tamen Pauſſus Jovius cum 'de Sultani claſſe hac in Indiam contra Luſitanos de'lata narraret, ſilentio ſuppreſſit, iratus videlicet, quod 'cum Luſitanæ hiſtoriæ ſcribendæ munus Joanni, hujus 'nominis tertio, Luſitaniæ regi venale proponeret, rex 'optimus non illum muneribus Indicis ad res Luſita'norum virtute geſtas monimentis illuſtrandas invita'vit (5). ——— This was a very famous victory, which 'however Paulus Jovius, writing of the great fleet of 'the Sultan's, ſent into India againſt the Portugueſe, 'paſſes over in ſilence, being angry that when he had 'made an offer to John III, king of Portugal, of 'hiring out his pen to celebrate the glory of his peo'ple, that great prince neglected, by Indian preſents, 'to retain him for that purpoſe.' He has had the fate of all liars; he is hardly believed when he ſpeaks truth. The worſt of all is, that his lies have been more profitable to him, than the love of truth has been to ſincere hiſtorians. This complaint of Bodin is very well grounded. 'Non quod multa non ſint verè & elegan'ter ab eo ſcripta: ſed hunc mendacii fructum tulit, 'ut etiam cùm vera ſcribit, ſuſpectus habeatur. Hoc 'tamen acerbius eſt ac indignius, quòd cum hiſtoriam 'venalem proſtituiſſet, uberiores tulit mendacii fructus, 'quàm quis alius vera ſcribendo (6). ——— Not but 'that there are many things truly and elegantly deſcribed 'in his writings, but then he reaps this fruit from his 'lying

(1) Bodin does not expreſs himſelf well: Gohorri was only the tranſlator of Amadis.

(2) Bodinus, in Methodo Hiſtor. cap. iv, pag. m. 71.

(3) Thuan. lib. xi, ſub fin. pag. m. 235.

(4) Voſſius de Arte Hiſtor. cap. ix, pag. 48.

(5) Oſorius de Rebus Emmanuëlis, lib. vi, fol. m. 179.

(6) Bodin, ubi ſupra, pag. 73.

not much aſhamed to own it [B], and that he ingenuouſly confeſſed that he praiſed or blamed people according as his favour was cultivated or neglected. No Man did ever aſk for preſents with leſs reſerve than he [C]. You will find in Moreri what Thuanus relates concerning this author's ſpite againſt Anne de Montmorenci. Brantome ſpeaks of it more at large [D]. It is ſaid, that Paul Jovius complained of having loſt ſome books of his hiſtory in the ſacking of Rome, only becauſe he did not find it his intereſt to publiſh them. He was not accounted a man of good morals [E], and was charged with being lying, that he is ſuſpected even when he tells truth. Yet what is ſtill more bitter and unworthy, though he proſtituted his pen in writing hiſtory, yet he got more by telling lies, than another man would have done by relating the bare truth' This man was not in a capacity to write a good hiſtory, for when he could ſay the truth, he had no mind to it, and when he had a mind to it, he could not; he had no good memoirs, except for the tranſactions in Italy. This is what Bodin ſays, becauſe Paul Jovius had not travelled, nor been preſent at the events, but had attended the court of the Popes for thirty ſeven years. ‘ Cum rumoribus fidem habuerit, nec conſilia principum nec conciones, nec epiſtolas, nec res geſtas, nec ulla publica monumenta viderit: ſic tamen ſcribit quaſi rebus interfuiſſet, nec ullum dubitationi locum relinquit. Quæ igitur veriſſime ſcribere potuit, noluit; puta res in Italia geſtas: quæ voluit, non potuit; ſcilicet externa (7).— As he gave credit to flying ſtories, and had no acquaintance either with the councils of princes, ſpeeches, epiſtles, public tranſactions, or records, he yet writes as if he had perfectly known all things, and leaves no room for doubt. What he could have written truly, he would not, I mean the affairs of Italy: what he would, he could not; that is, things done abroad.' This to me ſeems no impediment to his collecting good memoirs about other countries. Beſides, Paul Jovius boaſts of the ſieges and battles he has ſeen, &c. (8). See, in the remark [F], another paſſage of Bodin, and the judgment of Juſtus Lipſius upon our author, whom he taxes with an extream partiality (§ α).

[(§ α) James Gohorry has tranſlated into French the tenth, eleventh, and twelfth books of Amadis, if his work may be called a tranſlation *, for he has added ſo many things to the original, that he may be as much accounted the author of theſe books, as the tranſlator. To this the words of Bodin allude. REM. CRIT.]

[B] They ſay he was not much aſhamed to own it.] Bodin affirms, that Paul Jovius being asked, why he told ſo many lies, and ſuppreſſed true events? anſwered, that he did it in favour of his friends; that he knew well enough, that the preſent age would give no credit to his hiſtories, but that poſterity would not doubt of what he ſaid. Cum autem rogaretur cur ſimularet falſa, vera diſſimularet, amicorum gratia id à ſe factum reſpondit; ac tametſi ſuperſtites intelligeret ſuis ſcriptis fidem derogaturos, attamen intelligebat infinitæ poſteritati credibilia fore quæ ſibi ſuiſque popularibus laudem eſſent allatura (9). Some will have it that he made anſwer: ‘ A hundred years hence there will remain no proof to convict me of falſhood: and therefore what ſhall be read in my hiſtory, will be neceſſarily looked upon as true. Anzi mi vien detto, che eſſendo biaſimato il Giovio della infedeltà della ſua hiſtoria, egli la confeſſò, ſoggiungendo però, che ſi riconfortava, ſapendo, che dopò lo ſpatio di cento anni, non vi ſarà più alcuna memoria in contrario; onde veranno i poſteri neceſſariamente à dare indubitata fede à ſuoi ſcritti (10).' Some ſay (11) he bragged that he had a pen of gold, and another of iron, one for the princes who were bountiful to him, and the other againſt thoſe princes from whom he received nothing. It is ſaid alſo, that he confeſſed, that the reaſon why he ſuppreſſed the three books, where he ſpoke of Antony de Leva, was becauſe that famous general made him no preſent, and that he reſolved an ungrateful man ſhould have no place in his work. Quis neſcit quanta fuerit virtus Antonii Levæ Hiſpani ducis, ut ſolus dici, aut cum paucis Imperator appellari noſtri temporis poſſit: tamen nequiſſimus hiſtoricus (12), ſeu potius fabulator, quod pecunias non dediſſet, maluit totam corrumpere hiſtoriam, treſque libros qui illi debebantur intermittere, ne (ut ajebat) ingratum inſereret hiſtoriæ (13). It is ſaid, that at the court of Henry II he promiſed an illuſtrious genealogy to any one that would pay him for it, and threatned to ſlander all thoſe that ſhould croſs him in his deſign of getting money. Paulus Jovius, me puero, in aula Henrici ſecundi obſcuriſſimo cuique claritatem generis mercede pollicebatur, maledicentia ulturus qui ejus nundinationi adverſaretur (14). For my part, I can ſcarce believe, that he confeſſed the things I have been relating. I find he boldly declares, that he printed his book in the life-time of the perſons concerned, becauſe he does not fear to be convicted of any falſhood, which he could not avoid, if he was not a faithful hiſtorian (15).

[C] No man did ever ask for preſents with leſs reſerve than he.] ‘ His begging trade (16) puts me in mind of that of Paul Jovius, who craved ſtill more openly and more meanly than he. I have read ſome letters of his, which are admirable in that kind. In ſome of which he proteſts, that if the cardinal de Lorrain did not pay him his penſion, he will ſay that he is no longer of the race of Godfrey, who gave the archbiſhopric of Tyre to a pedant. In others, he begs two horſes of the Marquis of Peſcara, and deſires him for that effect to ſtrike the ground more ſtoutly than Neptune did. In others, he deſires a lady to ſend ſome ſweet-meats from Naples, becauſe he begins to be weary of eating new laid eggs, &c. (17).'

[D] Thuanus relates the ſpite of Paul Jovius againſt Anne de Montmorenci. Brantome ſpeaks of it more at large.] Though Brantome's paſſage be ſomewhat long, I will give it intire. ‘ I have heard a great man ſay, that he had ſeen in the firſt Latin impreſſion of Paul Jovius (I know not how true it is) a little touch, wherein it is ſaid, that at the very ſame time the Grand Seignior, Sultan Soliman, put to death his great favourite Ibrahim Baſha; the king of France put out of his favour his great favourite, the conſtable de Montmorenci: but why, ſays he, did not he put him to death; as the other did Ibrahim, or Hibraun Baſha? It was not, ſaid he, but that he had as well deſerved it: (and hereupon he ſpecified ſome impertinences, that are not worth mentioning, and which are falſe) but becauſe this great king was good and merciful, and the other was a cruel tyrant. I do not know whether that Latin edition, has this; but this gentleman affirmed it to me. This is not in the French verſion, and no credit is to be given to it; for the ſaid Paul Jovius ſpoke it, if he did ſpeak it, as a paſſionate man, and diſſatisfied with the Conſtable, who, when he was recalled by king Henry, and went about to regulate the king's houſhold, as it was his office, found among the penſioners of the late king, a conſtant penſion of five hundred crowns, given to the ſaid Paul Jovius, which he immediately ſtruck out, giving the king to underſtand, that it was money ill employed, he being more in the Emperor's intereſt than in the French, and a great liar. The ſaid Paul underſtanding that his penſion was cut off, fell a babbling againſt the Conſtable, and railing bitterly againſt him. This it is to have to do with a virulent tongue and pen, which, when provoked, ſpare nothing. Some ſay that the Conſtable, in the time of his diſgrace, had read this, which this ſpark had written rather to pleaſe the king, than for any reaſon, as generally ſuch writers are flatterers, and time-ſervers for their belly's ſake; and that therefore, when the Conſtable was recalled, he paid him off, and had done worſe, if he could have done it; for it is a great trouble for a valiant and noble man, like him, to be thus abuſed, and expoſed by a writer, without any reaſon (81).' Some ſay, that Jovius's ſpite proceeded only from his not obtaining ſome things which he impudently asked of the Conſtable. Quod quidem expertus eſt Annas Mommorantius Comes Stabuli Franciæ traductus à venali hiſtorico, non aliam ob rem quam quod neſcio quid impudenter petens, repulſam tuliſſet (19). I ſhall obſerve by the bye, that Francis I. had no reaſon to repent the penſion he gave Paul Jovius; for he appeared in the writings of his penſioner more like a conqueror than a conquered prince. It is ſaid, that Charles V made that complaint (20).

[E] He was not accounted a man of good morals.] Cardan taxes him with leudneſs. ‘ Hic noſter hiſtoricus, being very remiſs in reciting his breviary. His ſtyle was bright, but not hiſtorical or correct enough [F]. His inſincerity is not the only fault he is cenſured for in his hiſtories (b), which of all his works is that he has taken moſt pains in [G]. It cannot be denied

---

(7) Id ibid.

(8) See the epiſtle dedicatory of his hiſtory.

* See the epiſtle dedicatory of his tranſlation of the thirteenth book.

(9) Bodin, ubi ſupra, pag. 73.

(10) Stefano Guazzo della Civil Converſatione, lib. ii, pag. m. 242.

(11) Teiſſier, Addit. to the Elog. Tom. I, pag. 67.

(12) Paul. Jovius.

(13) Cardanus in Apolog. Neronis.

(14) Joſeph Scaliger, Epiſt. de Vetuſt. Gentis Scaligeræ, pag. 3. Voſſius, without doubt, took from thence what he ſays above, citation (4).

(15) Abſoluto tandem opere id in publicum edere non dubitem, magno hercle incorruptæ veritatis argumento: quandoquidem plerique eorum, qui hæc bello paceque geſſerunt, adhuc vivant, ac idcirco gravi exiſtimationis meæ cum periculo mentientem refellere poſſint. Jovius, Præfat. Hiſtoriæ ad Coſmum Medicen.

(16) That is of a man, whom Balzac calls John James. He means the ſame perſon, who made Mr Peireſc's Funeral Oration at Rome.

(17) Balzac's ninth letter to Chapelain, book iii, pag. m. 114.

(18) Brantome, Elog. de François I, in the firſt Tome of his Memoirs, pag. 228.

(19) Joſeph Scaliger, ubi ſupra.

(20) Cum aliquando Cæſar noſter legeret victoriam quam de Gallis habuerat, dixit profecto non meam, ſed Gallorum Regis victoriam hic ſcripſit, indicans, ex pecuniis acceptis à Rege quanta mendacia inſeruiſſet Hiſtoriæ. Cardanus. in Apologia Neronis.

‘cus, ſays he (21), admirandus profecto magis aliis (22) qui tametſi ſenex, parum abſuit, quin pepererit *. Sed & id deteſtabilius, quod cum eſſet etiam Antiſtes, gaudebat numerari (23) procos adoleſcentulos. —— Our hiſtorian was certainly to be admired more than the others, who, though he was old, wanted little of bringing forth. And what is yet more deteſtable, when he was even riſen to the rank of a prelate, he delighted in being reckoned among briſk ſuitors.’ Cardan's marginal note has ſomething very ſtrange in it, which is, that Paul Jovius was * an Hermaphrodite. Imperialis (24) owns that this author was accuſed of leading a licentious life, and of being very negligent in his prayers, and in repeating his Breviary.

[F] His ſtile was bright, but not hiſtorical or correct enough.] Scaliger ſpeaks thus of it. Paulus Jovius ‘mendaciſſimus & Guicciardino inferior, nimis affectato & luxuriante ſtylo, potius quam caſtigato utens (25). —— Paulus Jovius, a flagrant liar, and inferior to Guicciardine, uſing an affected and luxuriant rather than a pure ſtile.’ Roland Mareſius ſpeaks of it with the utmoſt contempt, and even ſays it is full of barbariſms. ‘Quantum ſentio, ſays he (26), non bonus eſt hiſtoriæ ſcriptor (Paulus Jovius) nec judicio ſatis valet: qui ſi vernaculè ſcripſiſſet, nullo in numero haberetur. Latinus enim ſermo quaſi fucus quidam labes illius multas contegit: qui prima ſpecie elegans videtur, nam belle ſonat, & quibuſdam imponit, mihi non item. Vix enim Latinus eſt, certè minime purus, totuſque idiotiſmis ſcatet; nihil fere proprie effert, ſed plerumque ϖεριφραστικῶς loquitur, nec pene ulla vox eſt ſine epitheto. —— For my part, I take him to be no good writer of hiſtory, and of a very indifferent judgment, who, if he had wrote in his own language, would not have been at all regarded, for the Latin tongue, like a kind of varniſh, covers a great many of his faults, in as much as at firſt ſight it ſeems elegant, becauſe it ſounds well, which impoſes upon many, but not upon me. For after all it is ſcarce Latin, far from being pure, every where abounding with idiotiſms; hardly any thing properly expreſſed, too much circumlocution every where, and ſcarce a word without an epithet tacked to it.’ They are two very competent judges, and therefore it is ſomewhat ſtrange that Lipſius ſhould ſpeak ſo much in praiſe of Jovius's ſtile. Muſt we not conclude from it, that the taſte of the beſt critics is not uniform upon a ſubject, about which there ought to be no different opinions? Thoſe who know the rules of eloquence, and of the art of hiſtory, ought to agree, either in praiſing or condemning the ſtile of a writer. But let us ſee what character Lipſius gives of Paul Jovius (27). ‘Paulus Jovius multorum judicia magis acerba quam libera experitur. Acriter valde in virum eunt. Ego de eo ſic cenſeo, ſtilo bonum gravemque eſſe & plane ad hiſtoriam: judicio ac fide ambiguum. Ubi affectus non diſtrahunt, rectum, ubi illi adſunt, obnoxium. Ad gratiam ſcilicet ſe dat & auram. Laudationum nec cauſſam ſæpe habet, nec modum. Genti ſuæ, Vaſtio, Medicæis nimis ex profeſſo addictus. His quidem ita ut Laurentium Medicen parricidii reum velut apud judices agat. Orationibus quoque aut frigidus interdum, aut ineptus. Laudandus tamen legenduſque ob multiplicem & variam rerum ſeriem, quas redegit compoſite & dilucide in unum hiſtoriæ corpus (28). —— Paul Jovius has met rather with ſevere than free cenſures from many. They are generally too angry with the man. My judgment of him is this, his ſtile is good, ſolemn, and fit for hiſtory: his judgment and his credit doubtful. Where his paſſions do not draw him aſide, he writes truth, where they intermix, he is not to be defended, for he gave himſelf up to acquire favour and applauſe. His panegyrics have very often, neither juſtice, nor meaſure. To his own nation, and to Gaſton de Medicis, too much, and too profeſſedly addicted. This appears clearly from his defending Laurence de Medicis, though a parricide, as if before the judges. His orations are frequently cold, or little to the purpoſe. However, he is to be commended and read for the ſake of that multiplicity of matters which he has reduced into a regular ſeries, and digeſted neatly, and clearly into a hiſtory.’ Lipſius's obſervation concerning the cold and impertinent harangues that Paul Jovius has inſerted in his hiſtory, puts me in mind of Bodin, who laughs at him for making ſoldiers ſpeak like ſcholars declaiming in the ſchools: ‘Præſertim in concionibus, epiſtolis, fœderibus, decretis quæ Jovius pro arbitratu fingit, in quo tamen decorum ita confudit, ut imperiti milites ipſius Alciati ſui laudatoris judicio, declamatores ſcholaſtici eſſe videantur (29). —— In ſpeeches, epiſtles, leagues, decrees eſpecially, which Jovius feigns at pleaſure, he ſhows ſo little regard to decorum, that even ignorant ſoldiers, in the opinion of Alciatus, his panegyriſt, declaim like ſcholars.’ I am perſuaded that my readers will be pleaſed to ſee here Alciatus's own words, which Bodin goes upon. ‘Id à te præcipue deſiderabam, ut ad illud quod Græci ϖρέπον vocant, non abſurdè reſponderes. Sicuti in ea oratione animadvertebam, quæ à Marconio gregario milite, ad legiones jam planè conſternatas & ad ſeditionem ſpectantes habebantur, quum Solymano Pannoniæ finibus excedente, Carolus Cæſar Vienna profectus in Italiam rediret. In ea ſiquidem concione omnes artis nervos numeroſque ita expreſſiſti, ut ille Marconius nequaquam ab aratro Volaterrani agri ad ſigna vocatus, ſed ex ſchola Ciceronis & Hermogenis ad ſuggeſtum raptus eſſe videatur, quum paſſim exactæ eloquentiæ ſchemata interniteant, quæ peroranti turbam parêre coëgerint (30). —— This eſpecially I would put you in mind of that you offend not againſt what the Greeks call Decorum, as I obſerved to you in regard to that ſpeech which you have put into the mouth of Marconius, a common ſoldier, and addreſſed to his fellows when the legions were about to mutiny on Sultan Solyman's paſſing the boundaries of Pannonia, when the emperor Charles leaving Vienna returned to Italy. For in that harangue all the art, ſtrength, and harmony of Rhetoric, are ſo expreſſed, that this Marconius, inſtead of ſeeming to have been taken from the plow at Volaterra, appears rather to have been forced from the ſchool of Cicero and Hermogenes to mount the pulpit: all the beauties of an exact eloquence glittering in his diſcourſe, and as it were compelling the people to fall in with the ſentiments of ſo excellent a ſpeaker.’

Note, that theſe words of Lipſius, Laurentium Medicen parricidii reum velut apud judices agat, have been thus tranſlated by Mr Teiſſier (31), He vindicates Laurence de Medicis from the crime of parricide, as if he was pleading for him before his judges. Paul Jovius doth juſt the contrary; he pleads as the advocate of this Lawrence's accuſer would do (32). Doubtleſs Mr Teiſſier thought, that the great Lawrence de Medicis is here meant, who was the patron of the learned in the XVth century; but this concerns another Lawrence, who aſſaſſinated Alexander de Medicis in the year 1537.

[G] His hiſtory is of all his works that which he has taken moſt pains in.] It is the firſt work he compoſed, and the laſt he publiſhed. He formed the deſign of it in the year 1515, and continued the execution of it all his life. He took for his ſubject all that happened in his own time all over the world, beginning at the year 1494, which was that in which the French conquered Naples under Charles VIII. This hiſtory contains forty five books, and reaches to the year 1544. But there is a conſiderable chaſm from the nineteenth book to the twenty fourth, incluſively (33). Thoſe ſix books, which reached from the death of Leo X, to the ſacking of Rome in 1527, contain but a ſhort ſummary of the events. He loſt in the ſacking of Rome, what he had compoſed upon that part of his hiſtory (34), and he would neither do it again, nor finiſh what was wanting. He was diverted from it chiefly for two reaſons: one was, that he would have incurred the terrible anger of ſome people; the other was, that he would not exerciſe his pen upon a ſubject that was ignominious to Italy. ‘Peritos medicos imitatus, carcinomata deſperatæ curationis, quæ ſi attrectes, & acri medicamine laceſſas, in immenſum furere, & peſtifera edacique ſerpigine mortem afferre ſolent, naturæ relinquenda, neque his ullo pacto manum admovendam judicavi. Quamobrem exiſtimationi ſalutique meæ conſulens, diræ tempeſtatis materiam, tanquam abominabilis impiique operis, mini-

---

(b) See the remark [F].

(21) Id. ibid.

(22) That is, more admirable than the hiſtorians whom Cardan had before named, and taxed with ſeveral vices.

* Quippe Hermaphroditus.

(23) Theſe words are thus printed in my edition: I think the word inter has been left out.

(24) In Muſæo Hiſtorico, pag. 7.

(25) Scaligerana prima, p. m. 95.

(26) Rolandus Mareſius, Epiſt. xli, lib. i, pag. m. 184.

(27) Lipſius Not. ad 1. lib. Politic. cap ix, pag. m. 218.

(28) La Popeliniere Hiſt. des Hiſtoires, livr. vii, pag 403, without mentioning Lipſius, has only tranſlated this, giving his judgment about Paul Jovius: Nay, he did not underſtand theſe words laudationum nec cauſſam ſæpe habet, nec modum: for he renders them thus, he obſerves neither the cauſes nor the means in his praiſes.

(29) Bodin. ubi ſupra, pag. 72.

(30) Alciatus, Epiſt. ad Paulum Jovium in limine Hiſtoriarum Jovii.

(31) Additions to the Elogies out of Thuanus, Tom. I, pag. 65.

(32) See book xxxviii of Paul Jovius's Hiſtory.

(33) Note, that there is alſo a chaſm from the fourth book to the tenth, incluſive. See his advertiſement at the end of the fourth book.

(34) Fatali illa ſub Clemente VII, urbis æternæ clade nonnulli libri in ſchedis tantum deſcripti illi deperiere, haud ſine ſuo dolore maximo. Baſilius Johannes Heroldus, Epiſt. Dedicatoria Ope. Jovii.

nied that this author was a man of parts, and that we find in his books many curious things. He died the eleventh of December 1552 (c) at Florence; whither he had retired very much diſcontented with the court of Rome, becauſe he could not obtain the biſhopric of Como [H]. He had a brother called BENEDICTUS JOVIUS, who ‘me attingendam arbitratus ſum, quando hæc adverſæ fortunæ accepta vulnera, inſaniæque noſtræ detrimenta, non modo non prodenda poſteris, ſed pro virili occultanda eſſe videantur: Ea ſiquidem, quæ Italicum nomen dedecorent, neque memoria recoli ſine dolore, neque ſine uberrimis lachrymis ſcribi, nec ſine flagitio pudoreque poſteris enarrari queunt (35). —— I have learned to imitate thoſe skillful Phyſicians, who ſay of Cancers deſperate, and beyond the reach of cure, that if you handle them, and apply ſharp medicines, they will grow exceſſively painful, and ſpreading with a peſtiferous corroſion are wont to bring on death; and conſequently ought to be left to nature, and by no means to be meddled with. Wherefore conſidering my character and my health, I am determined to paſs over that unhappy ſubject, which (as an abominable and impious work whereby others received wounds from our madneſs) ought inſtead of being tranſmitted to future times to be ſtudiouſly concealed: ſuch things as would reflect diſhonour on the Italian name, I cannot bring back to my memory without pain, or write without ſhedding a flood of tears, nor without a mixture of wickedneſs and ſhame can be delivered to poſterity.’ We have ſeen above (36), that this chaſm has been much reflected upon to his diſhonour. It is a remarkable thing, that though he had alledged theſe two reaſons as a very good apology, yet in the following page he promiſed to publiſh in a little time, that part which was wanting to his hiſtory. ‘Quod ſi mihi quanquam pedibus capto, atque adeo graviter ſeneſcenti. Deus magnus fatalis horæ ſpatium extendat, perpetua procul dubio lucubratione enitar, ut totum id quod in clade urbis ereptum, vel à me poſtea contumaci quadam indignatione prætermiſſum fuit, non diu à bonis mortalibus deſideretur (37). —— But if notwithſtanding my lameneſs and the heavy load of encreaſing old age, the almighty GOD ſhall be pleaſed to put off my laſt hour, I ſhall without doubt employ my pen continually, that whatever I loſt in the ſacking of Rome, or has been ſince then, with a kind of obſtinate indignation by me concealed, ſhall no longer be deſired in vain by good men.’ Beſides, he tells us, that he has filled up that chaſm, with the particular lives he has publiſhed. The preface from whence I have taken theſe particulars, was written at Piſa the firſt of May, 1552. It is the Epiſtle Dedicatory of the ſecond volume of his hiſtory. The author died in December following, and had not the ſatisfaction of ſeeing the third and laſt volume out of the preſs. He cauſed his work to be printed at Florence. For the reſt, he who ſays that it was the firſt work that Paul Jovius compoſed, is wretchedly confounded in his calculations. He ſays, that the author began to write it in the year 1515, when he was about thirty years of age, and that he died being near ſeventy five years old, and that during the thirty ſeven years, that he ſpent upon it, his fortune was very much unſettled. ‘Cum enim anno à nato CHRISTO qui numerabatur MDXV, ætatis autem ſuæ circa trigeſimum, ea quæ poſt annum MCDXCIV, per totum orbem terrarum geſta eſſent, atque ſe vivo gererentur, animo complexus fuiſſet, illud Hiſtoriæ opus, omnium ſuorum primùm exorſus fuit, licet omnium poſtremum illud ediderit, eique quinque fermè annis ſeptuagenario major immortuus eſt. Triginta itaque illis ac ſeptem annis quibus hiſtoriam concinnavit, varia & ipſe fortuna (uti fieri ſolet) jactatus JOVIUS (38). —— For as in the year 1515, from the birth of CHRIST, and in the thirtieth of his own age, he reſolved in his own mind to write the hiſtory of things which happened throughout the whole world, from the year 1494, or were tranſacted in his life-time. He made this work the firſt he ever entered on, though he publiſhed it the laſt, and died ſoon after almoſt ſeventy five. Thirty ſeven years therefore which he ſpent in writing this hiſtory, brought (as is uſual) many turns and changes in the affairs even of JOVIUS himſelf.’ We may reckon here three faults. I. A man that is employed in a thing from his thirtieth to his ſeventy fourth year, labours at it forty four, and not thirty ſeven years. II. Paul Jovius dying in the year 1552, lived not above ſeventy four years, if it be true that in 1515, he was not above thirty: he would have lived but ſixty ſeven years, or thereabouts. III. Paul Jovius's epitaph (39) gives him ſixty nine years, ſeven months, and twenty two days; it is not therefore true that he lived near ſeventy five years, and it is ſpeaking inaccurately to ſay, that he was about thirty years of age in 1515.

I ſhall occaſionally obſerve, that the book De Piſcibus Romanis, is the firſt that Jovius publiſhed (40). He dedicated it to Cardinal Lewis de Bourbon. The Epiſtle Dedicatory is dated from the Vatican, the twenty ninth of March 1524. He then propoſed to himſelf, a thing which he did not execute, which was ſpeedily to put to the preſs the firſt decad of his hiſtory. Exibit in publicum propediem hujuſmodi laborioſiſſimi operis prima decas, non ſine aliqua ſpe immortalitatis (41).

Alcyonius commends it in a book which was printed in the year 1522; but this ought not to ſerve for a proof of it's being printed; he might mention it, as having read it in manuſcript. Theſe are his words. ‘Quam etiam ſcribendi laudem, feliciſſime conſecutus eſt Paulus Jovius tuus, in ea decade, qua res omnes complexus eſt, quæ toto terrrarum orbe geſtæ ſunt, poſtquam Carolus VIII. Rex Galliæ cum Maximis Copiis tranſgreſſus Alpeis tranquillum Italiæ Statum perturbavit, & prima funeſtiſſimorum in Italia Bellorum jecit ſemina. Hiſtoria enim hujus Clariſſimi Scriptoris, omnes Elegantiæ flores, omnia Eloquentiæ lumina habet, & mira Orationis Claritate ſplendeſcit (uſque eo omnia ornate narrantur) & regiones aut pugnæ admirabiliter deſcribuntur, & conciones hortationeſque prudenter & graviſſime interponuntur. Denique illius auctor, varietate, evagationibus, amplificationibus, digreſſionibus non minus præſtantis Hiſtorici quam eximii Oratoris laude, ab omnibus decorari debet (42), —— Which art of writing your Paul Jovius has moſt happily reached in that Decade, wherein he comprehends the hiſtory of whatever happened throughout the world, after Charles VIII, king of France, paſſing the Alps with a great army, firſt diſturbed the peace of Italy, and ſcattered the ſeeds of thoſe unhappy wars which ſo long rent that country. For the hiſtory of this moſt excellent writer abounds with all the flowers of elegance, all the luſtre of eloquence, and ſhines with wonderful clearneſs of expreſſion (every thing being ſo exquiſitely related) countries and battles ſo admirably deſcribed, ſpeeches and harangues ſo prudently, and with ſuch propriety, inſerted. In a word, this author for his Variety, his Epiſodes, Amplifications and Degreſſions, deſerves from every one to be no leſs commended as an Orator, than admired as an Hiſtorian.’

[H] He could not obtain the biſhopric of Como.] This appears from a letter which Andrew Alciatus wrote to him (43). It is dated from Pavia, the ſeventh of October 1549, and is an anſwer to a letter, which Paul Jovius had wrote to him to acquaint him with his diſcontent, and deſign of leaving Rome, and betaking himſelf to Florence. ‘Scribis te gravi injuria permotum, Urbe (quod nunquam fieri poſſe putaram) propediem exceſſurum, ne diutius acceptæ contumeliæ deformis teſtis in ea aula ſpecteris, in qua per multos annos (uti mihi videtur) cum aureæ mediocritatis bonis planè beatus, tum ſtudiorum tuorum Authoritate clarus hactenus fuiſti. Mirum profectò videri poteſt, quòd tibi doctrinæ aç ætatis honore majora promerito, in petitione Pontificatus patriæ tuæ Paulus Pontifex quendam prætulerit. At quem hominem? qui Comi neque natus, neque unquam viſus ſit, & qui (ſicut à multis audio) ex arcanis cubiculi ſordibus in lucem repente ſit productus. —— You write to me, that, moved by a heavy injury done you, you have thoughts of leaving Rome (a thing I thought would never have come to paſs) that you may not remain an uneaſy witneſs of the wrong done you in that court where (as I apprehend) you have for many years enjoyed the bleſſings of a golden mediocrity, as well as a juſt reſpect flowing from the importance of your ſtudies. I am therefore, I confeſs, ſurprized that to a perſon, who, like you, has both learning and years to ‘plead

(c) Reuſner, in Diario Hiſtor. pag. 185.

(35) Jovius, Præfat. Tom. II, Hiſtoriarum.

(36) In remark [B].

(37) Jovius, ubi ſupra, ſub fin.

(38) Baſil. Joh. Heroldus, ubi ſupra.

(39) Apud Paulum Freherum, Theatr. pag. 1454, & apud Pope Blount, Cenſ. Author. pag. 449, where, inſtead of twenty two days, there is twelve days. Thuanus ſays twenty two.

(40) Herold, ubi ſupra, who tells us in what order the ſeveral books of that author were publiſhed.

(41) Jovius, Epiſt. Dedic. libri de Piſcibus.

(42) Petrus Alcyonius in Medice Legato poſteriore, pag. 103, Edit. Genev. 1624.

(43) It is prefixed to Paul Jovius's Hiſtory.

who wrote ſome books [I]. There was one PAUL JOVIUS, who in the council of Trent, gave his opinion in a curious manner upon the queſtion concerning Reſidence [K].

I muſt not forget that our Paul Jovius has been blamed for giving too much credit to aſtrological predictions, and ſuch like ſuperſtitions [L]. His elogies of illuſtrious men have ' plead in his favour, Pope Paul ſhould prefer another ' to be biſhop in your country. And who is he that he ' has thus preferred? One neither born nor known at ' Como, but one (as I have been told by many) who from ' the dirty privacies of a bed-chamber, has been brought ' on a ſudden to make a figure in the world.' This is well enough; this is ſpeaking freely enough of the holy father, he is not much better uſed in what follows: ' Quis in hoc Pontificem ἀμουσότερον non ' judicet: non enim hoſtis bonarum literarum & ' plane ferreus eſſe non poteſt qui te graviſſimarum ' rerum ſcriptorem intempeſtive contempſerit . . . . ' Dices te indigne deceptum ab inveterati aſtus ſene ' principe, qui blandis promiſſis vota tua honeſte concepta inique fefellerit. —— Who will not look on this ' Pope as a foe to the Muſes, for can he be other than ' an enemy to literature, and a perſon of a ſtubborn ' diſpoſition, who could ſo unſeaſonably contemn a perſon ' like you, who have written on the moſt important affairs. . . . . You will ſay you have been unworthily ' deceived by the thorough-paced cunning of an old ' prince, who with fair promiſes beguiled thoſe wiſhes ' you had honeſtly conceived.' I am afraid Thuanus is guilty here of a miſtake; he pretends that it was Clement VII who refuſed Paul Jovius the biſhopric of Como, and that his refuſal drew upon him ſome reflexions in the books of that hiſtorian. ' Cum ad Novocomenſem Epiſcopatum omnibus votis anhelaret, ' ſuæque erga Mediceam familiam, in cujus laudes ' proſuſus fuerat, obſervantiæ deberi id meritorum fiducia putaret, tamen ab eo obtinere non potuit: ' quod in cauſa fuiſſe plerique credunt, cur Clementem in Hiſtoriis avaritiæ & tenacitatis inſimulet (44). ' —— As he earneſtly deſired to be promoted to the ' biſhopric of Como, and confidently believed it due to ' his merit for the praiſes which he had ſo profuſely beſtowed on the houſe of Medicis, but for all that miſcarried in his ſuit, ſome have imagined that on this ' account he taxes Pope Clement in his hiſtory with covetouſneſs and want of generoſity.'

[I] He had a brother called BENEDICTUS JOVIUS, who wrote ſome books.] He was Paul's elder brother, and proved a kind of a father to him; it was he that educated him, and inſtructed him, and encouraged him to be an author; for having ſhewn him two of his works, viz. the hiſtory of Como, and a treatiſe of the actions and manners of the Swiſſes, he excited in him the deſire of writing a General Hiſtory. He led a very quiet and retired life, in the place of his birth, which he never left but to go to Milan to hear the lectures of a Greek profeſſor. He had learned that language of himſelf: but he deſired to learn to pronounce it, which was the occaſion of his only journey. He lived ſeventy three years in perfect health and vigour of body and mind. He deſigned a century of letters full of learning for the public; and his ſons were to have the care of publiſhing them, with ſome other compoſures which he left them, ſome tranſlations from the Greek, and ſome pieces of poetry (45). Their uncle expected this from their diligence (46), but I think there was nothing of this author printed beſides ſome Latin poems.

We are not to believe that PAUL JOVIUS, Junior, whereof many Latin verſes are to be ſeen in the elogies which our Paul Jovius compoſed, was Benedict Jovius's ſon. He was nephew to JULIUS JOVIUS, who was made coadjutor to his uncle (47) in the biſhopric of Nocera, the twenty firſt of Auguſt, 1551, and was biſhop of that place after him. Paulus Jovius junior, a good Poet, was made coadjutor to his uncle, Julius Jovius, in the ſame biſhopric, the twenty ninth of November, 1560, and was his ſucceſſor there. He kept that ſee twenty five years, and died in the year 1585 (48). I have ſaid elſewhere (49), that Paul Jovius was no Poet.

[K] One PAUL JOVIUS gave his opinion in a curious manner upon the queſtion concerning reſidence.] One of my friends, who heard me ſay all that I remembered of our Paul Jovius, repreſented to me, that I had forgot the moſt curious circumſtance. He was, ſaid he, one of the fathers of the council of Trent; and having no ſkill in Divinity, for he had been a Phyſician before he was made a biſhop, and never interrupted his ſtudy of human learning, I believe he did not diſtinguiſh himſelf in that aſſembly, when he was to give his opinion upon any point of doctrine. He had a great intereſt, not to ſuffer that the reſidence of biſhops ſhould be declared to be of divine right. This aſſertion ſo warmly maintained by ſome of the deputies, did not pleaſe him. He oppoſed it with reaſons taken from experience; he ſhewed, that the dioceſes, in which reſidence was obſerved, were no leſs diſorderly than others (50)); and he inſtanced upon the city of Rome. This friend ſhewed me immediately the 470th page of Father Paul, where I find what follows. ' If the abſence of the prelates was ' the true cauſe of abuſes, we ſhould ſee leſs corruption in the churches, where the biſhops have reſided ' in our time. For this hundred years the Popes have ' continually kept at Rome, and taken great care to ' have the people inſtructed; and yet after all, we do ' not ſee that city better governed. The capital cities ' of kingdoms, where the biſhops have always reſided, ' are more corrupted than ſome wretched places that ' have not ſeen their biſhops for a hundred years. ' And none of the antient prelates, that are preſent ' here, and have always reſided (for there are ſome ' ſuch) can ſhew us, that his dioceſe is better ordered, than thoſe of his neighbours, who never reſided. They who ſay that thoſe churches are ſheep ' without a ſhepherd, ought to conſider that curates ' have the charge of ſouls as well as biſhops; and yet ' theſe are only ſpoken of, as if there could be no true ' Chriſtians, but where there are biſhops. Some people in the mountains, who never ſaw one in their ' lives, might ſerve for a pattern to epiſcopal cities. ' We ought to praiſe and imitate the zeal and conduct ' of the fathers of this council under Paul, who have ' decreed ſome penalties againſt the prelates, to oblige ' them to reſidence, and have begun to remove the ' impediments, which kept them from their churches. ' Rather than flatter ourſelves with a vain hope, that ' reſidence will produce the reformation of the church, ' we ought to fear, that as we deſign at preſent to ' enforce reſidence, the incoveniencies (51) which ' will ariſe from it, may oblige our ſucceſſors to apply to them the remedy of abſence (52).' I eaſily undeceived my friend, by telling him, that the writer of the hiſtory of that council ſpeaks of one Paul Jovius, biſhop of Nocera, in the year 1562 (53), ten years after the death of Paul Jovius, who is the ſubject of this article.

[L] He has been blamed for giving too much credit to Aſtrological predictions, and ſuch like ſuperſtitions.] Martin del Rio having mentioned ſome things, which ſeem to prove, that Chiromancy and Aſtrology can reveal futurities, adds: ' Unus iſta omnia narrat Jovius *, ' nec uſquequaque indubitatæ fidei hiſtoricus, nec ſatis ' à ſuperſtitioſis & gentilium ne dicam opinionibus, ſaltem locutionibus, alienus (54). —— Jovius only has ' told us all theſe things, an hiſtorian not deſerving ' always of credit, nor far enough removed from the ' belief of the ſuperſtitions and opinions of the Gentiles ' at leaſt in his expreſſions.' He had before blamed him for having ſome reſpect for a remark of Amniomancy. This is the name they give to the art of divining by the inſpection of the membrane Amnios, wherewith a child is wrapped up in it's mother's womb. ' Sed & Jovius ne quid ſuperſtitionis omitterit, nimis ' hujuſmodi vanitatibus pro Epiſcopo deditus, in Ferdinandi Davali nativitate (lib. 1. Piſcarii) hujuſmodi ' pelle involutum ex utero prodiiſſe conſideravit (55). ' —— But Jovius alſo that he might not omit any ſuperſtition, being, for a biſhop, too much addicted to ' ſuch vanities, informs us (ſpeaking of the birth of Ferdinand Davali) that he came from the womb, wrapped ' in ſuch a membrane as this.' This membrane commonly breaks when the child is born, but ſometimes it is

(44) Thuan. lib. xi, pag. 235.

(45) Sed hæc & Græcæ traductionis non ignobilia opera cum lepidis poëmatibus eruditorum liberorum diligentia publicabit. P. Jovius, Elog. cap. cvi.

(46) Taken from Paul Jovius, cap. cvi, of his Elogies of Learned Men.

(47) That is, to our Paul Jovius.

(48) Taken from Ughelli, Ital. Sacra, Tom. VII, pag. 746.

(49) In the article of HADRIAN VI, remark [D].

(50) Compare with this what Brantome ſays in a paſſage which I have quoted in the remark [N] of the article FRANCIS I, to which you may add theſe words of Mezerai's Chronological Abridgment, pag. 434, of the ſixth volume. They were ordered by a decree of parliament to go and diſcharge their duty in their biſhopricks; otherwiſe they ſhould be compelled to it by a ſeizure of their goods and equipage. But moſt of them lived ſuch diſorderly lives, that perhaps their abſcence was leſs ſcanda- than their reſidence would have been.

(51) He pretends that if reſidence was declared to be of divine right, the biſhops would forſake their obedience to the Popes, and the prieſts their obedience to the biſhops.

(52) Fra-Paolo, Hiſt. du Concile de Trente, lib. vi, pag. 470, ad ann. 1562, of Amelot's tranſlation. See pag. 99, of the Italian edition in 4to.

(53) It is Paulus Jovius junior: I ſpoke of him above, towards the end of the remark [I].

* In Elogiis.

(54) Mart. del Rio, Diſquiſ. Magic. lib iv, cap. iii, Quæſt. v, pag. 278.

(55) Idem. ibid. cap. ii, Quæſt. [illegible], Sect. I, pag. 237.

have been thought too ſharp and too biting (d), but ſometimes they are too flattering. See the cenſure that a learned critic (e) paſſed upon him in his dialogue De bene inſtituendis Græcæ Linguæ Studiis. George Sabinus complains, that Jovius in his hiſtories is injurious to the Proteſtants of Germany, and particularly to Sigiſmund II, elector of Brandenburg. Conſult the letter that George Sabinus wrote to John Sleidan the firſt of September 1556 (f).

It is neceſſary to enlarge a little upon what I have ſaid of the firſt work that he publiſhed [M].

is preſerved whole, and this is taken for a ſign of good fortune: whence comes this proverb, il eſt né coiffé; (56) (he was wrapped up in his mother's ſmock). Paul Jovius curiouſly obſerved this circumſtance in the nativity of the marquis of Peſcara; and we have juſt now ſeen how he was cenſured for it by Martin del Rio. I add another proof of his fondneſs for Aſtrology. Having ſaid that there happened revolutions of religion all the world over towards the beginning of the XVIth century, he aſcribes it to the influence of the ſtars. I will tell this ſtory in the words of Florimond de Remond, becauſe they will acquaint us with a little trick of a tranſlator. ‘ Almoſt at the ſame time, ſays Jovius, that Iſmael poſſeſſed the empire of the Perſians, and changed the religion, mixing it with a new Mahometan ſuperſtition, there aroſe in Germany under the conduct of Luther that monſtrous Hereſy, which deſigned to deſtroy the Catholic religion, and all that antiquity had received, as the people had done in Perſia, bigotted with their new follies and ſuperſtitions. Whereupon, ſays he, I freely acknowledge that it came to paſs by a ſecret power of heaven, and a malignant influence of the ſtars, that at the ſame time, all the religions in the univerſe began to change; ſince not only the Mahometans, but alſo the Chriſtians, nay the idolatrous nations that are remoteſt from us, both in the Eaſt-Indies, and in the new world lately diſcovered in the Weſt, fell into new religions and opinions. This is what the Latin Jovius ſays. But in the French tranſlation the inſincerity of the tranſlator is remarkable; who paſſes over in ſilence all that Jovius ſays of this change of religions, and of that monſtrous Lutheran Hereſy that ſprung up in Saxony: this went to the heart of him. With what faithfulneſs do they handle the holy and ſacred books, who can thus lame, without any ſhame, the hiſtorians that are but juſt come into the world, only to ſuppreſs one word which touches Luther the father of all the Hereſies that diſturb Chriſtendom (57).’ Florimond de Remond cites the thirteenth book of Paul Jovius's hiſtory, where I find in fol. 239 verſo of the Straſburg edition 1556, that which follows: ‘ Nec multo poſt exarſit in Germania authore Luthero dira hæreſis, quæ populis, ut in Perſide acciderat, ad inſaniam verſis, Chriſtiani dogmatis placita, & veteres ſacrorum ritus vehementiſſimè conturbavit. Ita ut facilè crediderim ab occulta cœli poteſtate, malignoque ſyderum concurſu proveniſſe, ut religiones toto terrarum orbe enatis factionibus, uno tempore ſcinderentur, quand onon Mahometani modo Chriſtianique, ſed & remotiſſimæ gentes idololatræ, aut ſydera aut portenta pro Diis venerantes, cum in India quæ ad Orientem vergit, tum in Novo orbe ad Occiduam plagam reperto, novas ſacrorum opiniones induerint.’ I know no other French tranſlator of Paul Jovius's general hiſtory beſides Denys Sauvage. Was he a Proteſtant? And would he be guilty of the fraud which Florimond de Remond objected to the Reformed?

[M] It is neceſſary to enlarge a little upon what I have ſaid of the firſt work that he publiſhed.] I have ſaid (58), I. that it was the treatiſe de Piſcibus Romanis; II. that he dated the epiſtle dedicatory of it the twenty ſixth of March 1524; in the third place, that he then propoſed to put immediately to the preſs the firſt decade of his hiſtory. With regard to the firſt of theſe facts, I have quoted Heroldus, who has expreſsly ſaid, illud (ſcriptum) quod OMNIUM PRIMUM edidit de Piſcibus Romanis. — That piece which he publiſhed THE FIRST OF ALL HIS WORKS concerning the Roman fiſhes. The ſecond fact ſtood in no need of proof; every one may ſee it at the bottom of the epiſtle dedicatory; and I have proved the third by a paſſage of Paul Jovius. I have raiſed an objection to myſelf taken from Alcyonius affirming, in a work printed in the year 1522, that he had ſeen this hiſtorian's firſt decade. I have anſwered it as well as I could; but here is a new difficulty. Calcagnini informs us in a letter written from Rome under the Pontificate of Leo X (59), that Paul Jovius's firſt decade was publiſhed. ‘ Paulus Jovius . . . tam luculenter, tam docte, tam eleganter ſcribit noſtri temporis hiſtoriam, cujus decem libros JAM EDIDIT ut pudeat me de homine tam diſerto tam indiſerte ſcribere (60) —— Paul Jovius writes the hiſtory of our time ſo clearly, ſo learnedly, and ſo elegantly, ten books of which HE HAS ALREADY PUBLISHED, that I am aſhamed to write with ſo little eloquence concerning ſo eloquent a writer.’ If Calcagnini has good reaſon to ſay, that this firſt decade was printed, Paul Jovius would be guilty of the error charged upon me. It would be in vain to alledge that the date of the epiſtle dedicatory of the treatiſe de Piſcibus Romanis has been altered by the Printers; for it is certain, however it be, that this epiſtle was written under Clement VII, who was created Pope in the month of November 1523.

IPRES or YPRES, an epiſcopal town in the earldom of Flanders, has its name from a river that runs through it. It was at firſt only a caſtle. The Normans having deſtroyed it, count Baudouin the ſecond of the name, ordered it to be repaired in the year 880. Count Arnol fortified it in 901, and count Baudouin III. enlarged it many years after. New additions were made to it from time to time; ſo that in the year 1473, the town of Ipres included within its wall 1173 meaſures, each whereof was fourteen geometrical feet. It was beſieged by the inhabitants of Ghent, and by the Engliſh, in the year 1373, for the ſpace of nine weeks. Its ſtone walls were built in the year 1388, by the conſent of Philip the bold (a). The manufactures and dying of wool were in good perfection there at the end of the XIIth century, as appears by the teſtimonies of Guilelmus Britto (b). The French took it in the year 1648, and loſt it the year following. They retook it in 1658, and reſtored it to the Spaniards by the Pyrenean treaty. They retook it once more in the year 1678, and the Spaniards gave it up to them by the treaty of peace concluded at Nimegen the ſame year. The diſputes of Janſeniſm have rendered the name of the town of Ipres famous; Janſenius being ſcarce ever mentioned without obſerving that he was biſhop of that town. The relation betwixt that town and the controverſes of the Janſeniſts with the Jeſuits, is by this means known to all the world; and hence doubtleſs came that witty fancy of forging a pretended letter of the (d) Balzac, Diſſertat. à Dom André de Saint Denis, at the end of his Socrate Chrétien, pag. m. 174.

---

(e) Henry Stephens Vide Crenium Animadv. Parte V, pag. 163.

(f) It is the laſt of thoſe that have been printed with George Sabinus's Poems, pag. 419, & ſeq. Edit. Lipſ. 1606. See alſo Crenii, Animadverſ. Part. VI, pag. 209.

(56) See Mr Drelincourt's treatiſe, of which an extract is given in the Nouvelles de la Republ. des Lettres, for July 1685, art. xi, pag. 815.

(57) Florimond de Remond, Hiſtoire de l'Hereſie, livr i, cap. iv, pag. m. 24.

(58) See the remark [G], towards the end.

(59) He died in the year 1521.

(60) Calcagninus, Epiſt. ad Jacob. Zieglerum, in Collectione Colomeſiana Clarorum Virorum Epiſtol. pag. 234.

(a) Taken from Valerius Andr in Topographia Belgica, pag 43, 44.

(b) Ipra colorandis gens prudentiſſima lanis. Will. Britto Philippid. lib. ii.

king to Mr Arnauld [A], dated from the camp before Ipres in 1678. Several copies of this letter were handed about; and I remember that ſeveral perſons, who were thought to have a very good judgment, found it ingenious: It was aſcribed to Mr Roſe ſecretary of the cabinet. I do not believe it has been printed, and therefore I am willing to publiſh it.

[A] A pretended letter of the king . . . to Mr Arnauld.] Here it is according to the copy I took of it, at the time it went about as a piece intirely new.

A letter of the king to Mr Arnauld on the ſiege of Ipres.

'Monſieur Arnauld. We are going to begin a ſiege, 'in which you might do us much ſervice with your 'intereſt. I have five propoſitions to make to the gen'tlemen of Ipres. The firſt is, that I am come into 'Flanders to do good to every body. The ſecond 'that the command I give them to ſurrender the town 'is not impoſſible. The third, that it is in their 'power to merit or not merit my favour. The fourth, 'that I have forces with me more than is ſufficient to 'make them obey my orders; and the fifth, that tho' 'they be never ſo much neceſſitated to ſurrender them'ſelves, they will do it with an entire liberty. The 'Queſtion is therefore to make them ſign theſe five 'five propoſitions, which include all the treaty of grace, 'that I deſign to ſhow them. I do not think, that 'they can elude my orders by the diſtinction de Jure, 'and de Facto (between right and fact). For as to the 'right, I have been ſo long uſed to take towns, that 'time alone might ſerve me for a preſcription in the 'Low-Countries, were I deſtitute of ſo many other 'indiſputable rights. They can therefore only inſiſt 'upon the fact, and I will convince them of this by 'thirty cannons, to which I defy them to anſwer ef'fectually; for they will pierce through all difficul'ties. By this you may judge, that I ſhall not be ſo 'long in making them ſign my five propoſitions, as 'you have been in ſigning thoſe of the Pope. Where'fore I order you to ſummon the ban and arriereban 'of the Janſeniſts, and to leave Paris immedi'ately to come at the head of them, in order 'to ſing Te Deum, upon the tomb of Janſenius, as a 'thankſgiving to God, for the happy ſucceſs of my 'five propoſitions. You may for a bon-fire bring a 'hundred copies of the Miroir de la Pieté Chrétienne, '(Mirror of the Chriſtian piety) to caſt theſe good Fle'mings into a holy deſpair of ever belonging again to 'Spain. Afterwards you ſhall go into England to manage 'there the lower houſe, which is very averſe to a peace. 'To conclude, I like your politics, and more ſtill 'your money, with which you uſe ſo advantageouſly 'to perſuade people to what you have a mind to. 'Hereby I am ſure we ſhall have a peace with En'gland and Spain, before you have it with the Je'ſuits. At the camp before Ipres the ſeventeenth of 'March 1678.

IRNERIUS (a), a German civilian, lived in the XIIth century. He is ſaid to be the firſt, that renewed the profeſſion of the Roman law, interrupted ever ſince the invaſion of the Barbarians. He had a great intereſt in Italy with the princeſs Mathilda, and having perſuaded the emperor Lotharius to order the Code and Digeſts to be read in the ſchools, he was the firſt that exerciſed that profeſſion in Italy. His method was to reconcile the anſwers of the Civilians and the laws, that ſeemed contrary to one another. He died about the year 1190 [A], and was buried at Bologna, where he had been profeſſor (b). The thing is carried farther; for it is ſaid that Lotharius abrogated all other laws, and ordered that Juſtinian's law ſhould reſume it's ancient authority at the bar [B]. The famous Calixtus, profeſſor of Divinity at Helmſtadt, maintains (c), that this is falſe, and has been followed in that by the learned Conringius his colleague (d). But Bertold Nihuſius wrote for the contrary opinion (e), and rudely handled Dr Calixtus. It is certain that the later has not tradition on his ſide; and that it makes Irnerius the [A] He died about the year 1190.] I can hardly believe that he lived till that time; for in the firſt place Lotharius II lived but till 1138 at moſt: which plainly ſhews that Forſterus has been unexact; for he ſays that the reſtoration of the Roman law happened about the year 1150 (1). Why then ſhould we think that he has been more exact in his calculation about Irnerius's death? In the ſecond place this is ſaid to have been done in the year 1133 (2). Now who can believe that a thing of that importance could be executed by the counſels of a young man? It is a hundred times more probable, that Irnerius was ſucceſsful in his counſels by reaſon of the great authority he had acquired by his learning and wiſdom; and therefore he muſt have been at leaſt forty years of age. From whence it follows, that if he had lived till the year 1190, he would have lived near 100 years, and in that caſe Forſterus would be inexcuſable for not taking notice of ſo uncommon an age. To which I add, that a chancellor of the emperor is always ſomewhat elderly. Forſterus would be hard put to it, if one ſhould maintain, that Mathilda, with whom he ſays Irnerius had ſuch an intereſt, was that counteſs, who was ſo liberal to the Popes, and who died in the year 1115, or that queen of Italy who died in the year 1101 (3), and who was the wiſe of Conrad, the ſon of the emperor Henry IV, and the daughter of Roger king of Sicily.

During the diſpute that aroſe betwixt Dr Calixtus, and Bertold Nihuſius, to know whether our Irnerius renewed the ſtudy of the law, by the authority of the counteſs Mathilda, or by that of the emperor Lotharius II, the univerſity of Bologna was conſulted, and anſwered in favour of Nihuſius. We find in their anſwer, that it is a conſtant tradition that Irnerius began to teach the law at Bologna in the year 1128. This tradition is ſupported by the following ſentence on Irnerius's picture, which amongſt many others, is to be ſeen in the college of Bologna: Irnerius omnium primus leges commentatus eſt anno MCXXVIII. Nicolas Alidoſio in the preface of his boon intituled, Li Dottori Bologneſi di legge Canonica è Civile, affirms, that this doctor teaching Philoſophy at Bologna, received orders from the emperor Lotharius II to teach the Law, and that he began to do it about the year 1128. However there is ſome ground to believe, that he did it of his own accord, ſome years together, and that he was not authorized by the emperor's order till the year 1137 (4). It is certain he died before the year 1150, and not in 1190, for it is known (5) that James de Porta Ravegnana was Irnerius's ſucceſſor in his profeſſorſhip of the Civil-Law and that he taught it publickly at Bologna in the year 1150. See the author whom I quote (6).

[B] It is ſaid that Lotharius ordered that Juſtinian's law ſhould reſume it's antient authority at the bar.] Here is what Mr Heiſs ſays of it in his hiſtory of the empire under the year 1133. 'This ſolemnity being 'over, the emperor returned into Germany, where 'by the advice of one Werner Urſperg, othrewiſe 'Irnerius (7), who was very well ſkilled in the Civil'Law, he ordered that juſtice ſhould be done in the 'empire according to the Digeſts or Code, which had 'been out of uſe for five or ſix hundred years: ſo 'that this law was introduced into Italy and Germany, 'and afterwards into France and Spain, where the 'people before made uſe of their own particular laws 'and cuſtoms (8). Calviſius, without mentioning our Werner, ſays, under the year 1137, that Lotharius found in Apulia the Roman laws, that he gave them

---

(a) He is alſo called Wernerus, or Guarnerius.

(b) Ex Forſtero, Hiſt. Juris Civil. Roman. lib. iii, cap. vi.

(c) In libello de Morali Theolog.

(d) Conſult the preface to his Origo Juris Germanici, printed in 1643.

(e) See the book which he intituled, Irnerius, publiſhed in 1642.

(1) Incidit hæc revocatio & reſtitutio Juris Civilis in annum Chriſti 1150. Forſterus, Hiſt. Juris Civil. lib. iii, cap. vi.

(2) See the following remark.

(3) Mathias, Theatr. Hiſt. pag. m. 902.

(4) See Nihuſius, in Irnerio, pag. 13.

(5) Otto Murena, in Chronologia Laudenſi apud Baronium, ad ann. 1158.

(6) Nihuſius, in Irnerio, where he has inſerted the whole anſwer of the univerſity of Bologna.

(7) The Dutch edition ſays Irnervis.

(8) Antea homines Jure incerto utebantur, Jure nempe Romanorum corrupto, Jure item Longobardico & lege Salica. Chriſt. Mathiæ Theat. Hiſtor. pag. 921.

firſt reſtorer of the Roman law [C]. It is ſaid moreover, that it was he who moved the emperor Lotharius, whoſe chancellor he was, to introduce into the univerſities the creation of doctors, and that he drew up the form of it; from whence it came, that at that very time, Bulgarus, Hugolinus, Martinus, Pileus, and ſome others, who began to interpret the Roman laws, were ſolemnly promoted to their doctors degree. It was at Bologna that theſe fine ceremonies began; from thence they were received by the other univerſities, and proceeded from the faculty of Law, to that of Divinity. It is pretended, that the univerſity of Paris having adopted this cuſtom, made uſe of it the firſt time in behalf of Peter Lombard, who was made doctor of Divinity (f).

to the Piſans, and ordered they ſhould be explained, and put into practice in the tribunals of the empire. He adds, that this book was afterwards carried into the library of Florence. Another hiſtorian (9) ſays, this happened when that emperor marched againſt Roger king of Sicily, about the year 1135, and obſerves that the manuſcript of the Roman laws found in Apulia, wanting to be explained, Irnerius was commiſſioned for that pupoſe.

[C] Tradition makes him the firſt reſtorer of the Roman law.] This is what an author before cited ſays of him (10). ‘Irnerius primus legibus gloſſas ‘appoſuit, & ſuo exemplo cæteris illuminandi juris ‘exemplum dedit: unde LUCERNA JURIS dictus fuit ‘& inſtaurator legum Romanarum cognominatus. ‘——— Irnerius was the firſt who wrote any gloſſes ‘on the laws, and by his example led others to ‘comment upon them, whence he was called the lamp ‘of the law, and was ſirnamed the reſtorer of the ‘Roman conſtitutions.’ A great number of writers ſay the ſame thing.

ISAACITES (a).

ISAACITES (a). Under this name is mentioned the Rabbi Salomon Jarchi, in the Bibliotheca Rabbinica of father Bartolocci. I may therefore put under this name what is wanting in the article JARCHI. I ſhall therefore obſerve that the ſirname Raſci, which was given him, was compoſed of the initial letters of his names (b), as we learn from father Bartolocci (c). He adds, that this Rabbi was born at Lunir, a town in the province of Aquitain [A]; but that ſome make him a native of Troies in France, and place his birth in the year 1105. Iſaacites began his travels when he was thirty years of age. He ſaw Italy, afterwards Greece, Jeruſalem, and all Paleſtine, and then he went into Egypt, where he ſaw the Rabbi Maimonides. He proceeded into Perſia, Tartary, Muſcovy, and other northern countries, and at laſt came into Germany, from whence he came into his own country. He ſpent ſix years in theſe travels. He was married, and had three daughters, who were married to very learned Rabbies, who wrote many books. Some of his commentaries upon the Scripture have been tranſlated into Latin by the Chriſtians [B]. It is ſaid, that he was well ſkilled in Phyſic and Aſtrology, and in ſeveral languages, and that he died at Troies, being ſeventy five years old. His body was carried to Bohemia, and buried at Prague in the year 1180 (d).

[A] Bartolocci ſays that he was born at Lunir, a town in the province of Aquitain.] Bartolocci adds, that is a town in which there were Jews, as St Gregory witneſſes in the twenty firſt epiſtle of the third book (1). All this is full of faults; for in the firſt place he ſhould have ſaid Lunel, and not Lunir. II. Lunel is not in the province of Aquitain. III. Pope Gregory does not ſpeak of Lunel, or Lunir, but of Luna, an epiſcopal ſee in Italy. See above (2) the cenſure of an error of Hoornbeek. Here is another blunder. Ibidem (that is in the Catena Cabalæ) Rabbi Joſeph Iachijà Auctor dicit quod natus ſit anno ab Orbe condito . . . . 4865. Chr. 1105. in Urbe Trevis, ſeu Trecis (§ α) in Gallia in provincia Narbonenſi, vel in Linguadoca (3). Which is to pretend, that the town of Troies is in Languedoc, than which nothing can be more ridiculous. Note, that according to ſome rabbies, our Iſaacites died 1105 (4); but we have ſeen, that according to ſome other authors, this was the year of his birth. Chronological exactneſs was never the talent of the Jewiſh writers; and it is a ſtrange thing they have ſo ill fixed the time of their moſt famous doctors. Benjamin Tudelenſis (5), who died in the year 1173, highly praiſes the Jews of Lunel, and names ſome of their learned men, and among others Rabbi Solomon. Some ſay, (6), that he means Solomon Jarchi; and if you object, that this Solomon died in the year 1105, they will anſwer, that Benjamin Tudelenſis does not pretend that all the doctors he mentions, ſpeaking of what he ſaw at Lunel, were alive. I do not like this ſolution. It ſeems plain to me, that he ſpeaks of a Solomon that was then alive: We muſt therefore ſuppoſe either that it is a miſtake to place the death of Solomon Jarchi in the year 1105, or that the Solomon mentioned by Benjamin Tudelenſis, is not our Iſaacites. I could eaſily believe, that Conſtantin l'Empereur is miſtaken, when he ſays, that Benjamin meant Solomon Jarchi. If he had ſpoke of a doctor ſo famous as this was, he would have given him great encomiums, and he gives none to his Solomon. If you would have an inſtance of the bad Chronology of the Jewiſh authors, you need only conſider, that the ſame book (7), which makes Rabbi Solomon Iſaacites to be born in the the year 1105, affirms that Maimonides was born in Spain, in the year 1135, and that theſe two Rabbies had an interview in Egypt, though Solomon did not go thither till he was about thirty two years old (8). Note, that ſome (9) maintain, that Rabbi Solomon Iſaacites has not the ſirname of Jarchi in the Jewiſh books, and that it would be a difficult thing to find the time, the ſubject, and occaſion of that falſe ſirname, and that the Jews laugh at the Chriſtian authors for uſing it.

[(§ α) Trecæ, in the Latin of Bartolocci does not ſignify the town of Troyes in Champagne, but Treys in Provence. It is true the firſt is called Trecæ in Gregorius Turonenſis, but Thuanus who names the other Trecæ, calls Tricoſſes, the inhabitants of the latter. REM. CRIT.]

[B] Some of his commentaries have been tranſlatea into Latin by the Chriſtians.] His commentary upon Joel, and the Canticles, has been put into Latin by Genebrard. He publiſhed at Paris, in 1563, the verſion of the commentary upon Joel, and in 1570, that of the commentary upon the Canticles. Arnaldus Pontacus is the author of the Latin tranſlation of the commentaries upon Obadiah, Jonah, and Zephaniah (10). Henry Aquinus publiſhed the commentaries upon Eſther, with notes, at Paris, in the year 1522 (11).

YSE (ALEXANDER D') Miniſter of Grenoble, and afterwards profeſſor of Divinity at Die in Dauphiné, (a) was a natural ſon in a family——— of which at preſent is (b) James d'Yſe de Saleon, Counſellor in the Parliament of Grenoble. This miniſter wrote a diſcourſe for the re-union of the two religions, in which he does not differ much from the principles

(f) Mathias, Theatr. Hiſtoric. in Vita Lotharii II.

(9) Chriſt. Mathias, ibid. pag. 920, who quotes Chythæus, in Chron. pag. 309.

(10) Mathias, ubi ſupra.

(a) Conſtantin l'Empereur, Not in Itinerar. Benjam. Tutel. pag. 149, ſays, that Solomon Jarchi was called Iſacides, because he was the ſon of Rabbi Iſaac.

(b) R. Solomon Iſaacites.

(c) Bartol. Bibl. Rabbinica, Part. IV, pag. 378.

(d) Taken from Bartolocci, ibid. pag. 378, & ſeq.

(1) Bartol. Bibl. Rabbin. Part. IV, pag. 378.

(2) Remark [A], of the article JARCHI.

(3) Bartolocci, ubi ſupra.

(4) See, above, citation (1), of the article JARCHI.

(5) Benjamin. Tutel. Itiner. pag. m. 6.

(6) Conſt. l'Empereur, Notis in Itinerar. Benjam. Tutel. pag. 149.

(7) Catena Cabalæ. See Bartolocci, ubi ſupra.

(8) See Bartoloc. ibid.

(9) Andreas Acoluthus in Tractatu de Aquis amaris maledictionem inferentibus, pag. 3.

(10) Printed at Paris in the year 1656, in 4to.

(11) Taken from Bartolocci, ubi ſupra, pag. 380, 381.

(a) Allard, Biblioth. de Dauphiné, pag. 223, 224.

(b) Mr Allard publiſhed this in 1680.

ples of the Romiſh church (c). I ſhall give ſome extracts of it [A]. He would have been depoſed for that work, if the circumſtances of the times had not obliged the ſynod of that province to obſerve ſome temper [B]. The Proteſtants were ſatisfied with the declaration that Mr d'Yſe made before he died (d). The law-ſuit that was entered againſt him, on account of the money which had been raiſed for the Vaudois, was not attended with the troubleſome and diſgraceful conſequences, that a Catholic writer has publiſhed [C]. I learned

[A] I ſhall give ſome extracts of it.] This work is intituled, Propoſitions & moyens pour parvenir à la reünion des deux Religions en France. —— Propoſals and methods for re-uniting the two religions in France. The impreſſion was finiſhed the laſt of Auguſt, 1677. It contains ſix hundred and eight pages in 4to, and is divided into two parts. The author enlarges in the firſt, upon five conſiderations, which tend to incline the parties to mutual abatements, and the ſecond gives a long catalogue of the articles which they might agree in.

He cites (1) a Lutheran (2), who maintained that the Calviniſts fight with a ſhadow, when they confute a local preſence of JESUS CHRIST, and a natural manducation in the Lord's-ſupper. He cites another (3), who denies the ſame preſence and manducation, and maintains, that the body of JESUS CHRIST enters into the mouth, but not into the ſtomach. This Lutheran (4) confeſſes, that the Calviniſts receive the ſaving fruit of the ſacrament, provided they be morally in an invincible ignorance of their errors, but not if they continue in them againſt their conſcience, and with obſtinacy. Mr d'Yſe makes ſeveral reflexions upon the pacifical method of Father Maimbourg, and upon this objection, viz. that it follows from the doctrine of the Calviniſts, that all the Chriſtians, who have not followed Peter Valdo, John Hus, &c. are damned. His anſwers are almoſt the ſame with thoſe of Mr Jurieu (5), both with reſpect to the expedients of ſalvation, afforded to many perſons who inwardly renounced their errors, and with reſpect to the conſequence that is drawn in favour of thoſe, who, inwardly rejecting the falſe doctrines of Popery, remain ſtill in it's communion. To which purpoſe he ſpeaks of the permiſſion granted to Naaman, and of a national ſynod held at Paris, in the year 1559, which forbids to follow one's maſter into the Popiſh churches, tho' one does not bend the knee, and yet declares, that thoſe may be tolerated, who, like Naaman, and the duke of Saxony, publickly expreſs, 'that they will not pollute and defile themſelves with the idolatries, which are committed in the temples they frequent (6).' He ſays, that according to the Reformed, the univerſal church cannot err ſo far as to overthrow the articles of faith that are abſolutely neceſſary to ſalvation, and that if the thing be well conſidered, it will be found, that the Roman Catholics, whatever noiſe they make about it, aſcribe a leſſer infallibility to the church, than the Proteſtants; for, ſays he, cardinal Richelieu, book 2, chap. 2. inſinuates, that the univerſal church may err in fundamental points. He imputes to ſome Proteſtant divines an error which he calls a fundamental one, which is not to receive St John's Revelation, as a canonical book, and he confeſſes, that the primitive church did not receive it as canonical. It is true, he pretends, that that church erred out of ignorance, and not knowing the truth, but not out of obſtinacy, and denying it. The church, according to that cardinal, has been ignorant of ſome truths, which ſhe came to know in time, and defined afterwards as points of faith. The author adds, that in the references of the ſecond ſeſſion of the council of Trent, we find this queſtion, 'Whether general councils lawfully aſſembled, may err in the deciſion of points of faith.' The anſwer was, It is a doubtful thing. Touching again upon this in the 441ſt page, he ſays, that ſeveral doctors are there cited for the affirmative, and others for the negative. He had ſaid before (7), that the councils of Lateran, in 1180, and 1215, and ſome others, have been held pro Eccleſiæ reformanda in fide & moribus. He obſerves (8), that the Monks promiſing, according to the Roman pontifical, to obſerve a perpetual continence, as far as human frailty will permit, it is a proof that their vow is conditional; ſo that when the frailty of their nature will not permit them to preſerve their continence, they may marry without breaking their vow. He boaſts (9) of alledging nothing that is condeſcending on the part of the Catholics, but what is grounded on the doctrine of Thomas Aquinas, and other grave doctors, and that the condeſcenſion he uſes on the part of the Reformed, is grounded on what has been confeſſed by Calvin, and ſome other famous writers. From whence he infers, that private perſons in both communions, who would not ſubmit to the like condeſcenſions, would be unreaſonable. He produces hereupon the praiſes that ſome Popes, and ſome illuſtrious ſocieties have beſtowed upon Thomas Aquinas's doctrine; and as for the particular doctors, who have praiſed him, he refers us to a book, intituled, The Diſputation of the Univerſity of Complutum on Dialectics. He mentions alſo the approbations given to cardinal Richelieu's and the biſhop of Condom's books, and proves, that Calvin, Thomas Aquinas, &c. have made the conceſſions he ſpeaks of. He ſhews, that Calvin, Rivetus, and Bucanus, held the probability of the doctrine of a guardian angel; and as for what concerns the poſſibility of celibacy, he cites the national ſynod of Rochelle, 1571, which adviſes the wives of eccleſiaſtics relapſed into Popery, to have no commerce with them. That of Vitrai, 1588, does not approve that a man whoſe wife is become leprous, ſhould marry another. They adviſe him to pray to GOD, and to contain himſelf during his wife's life.

Though this book was printed with the conſent of ſome conſiderable perſons, the Monks obtained, that the copies of it ſhould be carried to the rolls of the Chatelet. They had ſeen ſome of them at a Binder's, and they made a great buſtle about it. It is at leaſt a piece of news, which was written to me in the year 1678, by a curious perſon, who was well informed of what concerns the Republic of Letters.

I make no doubt, that the fragments I have inſerted in this place, will be acceptable to the readers, becauſe it is a book but little known, and almoſt impoſſible to be met with.

[B] The circumſtances of the times obliged the ſynod of that province to obſerve ſome temper.] D'Yſe, 'who had been a miniſter at Grenoble, and who was actually profeſſor of Divinity at Die, wrote a treatiſe upon this ſubject, and imagined he had found the means of a perfect reconciliation. However his project had not the good luck to pleaſe the ſynod of his province, which forbid him to publiſh or communicate it. But D'Yſe prepoſſeſſed with the flatteries of Preſident de la Berchere, who filled him with hopes of great rewards, and mighty things, would not believe the ſynod. He took a journey to Paris, with ſeveral recommendations from the Preſident to the chief members of the council. The miniſters of the place having had notice of his deſign, endeavoured to have a ſight of his book, in order to diſcourage him from publiſhing it. They could obtain nothing. D'Yſe would not communicate it to them, but ſhewed it to the biſhop of Condom. That piece could not pleaſe the Catholics, becauſe the author made them too condeſcending; and under other expreſſions, kept moſt of the articles of the reformed doctrine: ſo that he returned without any approbation and recompence; having offended his brethren without gaining the good-will of their enemies. Nay, he was like to be involved in ſome criminal affairs, to pay him for his good intentions; but the Preſident, his protector, ſcreened him. As for the ſynod, they durſt not meddle with him upon that account, at a time when it was believed the court would be diſpleaſed with it. Without depoſing him therefore, a treaty was made with him, by which he was ſuffered to enjoy his Profeſſor's ſalary, but by way of diſcharge, he was deprived of the functions. He died ſome time after, and repaired the fault he had committed on that occaſion, by a declaration of his ſentiments, which was very edifying (10).'

[C] The law-ſuit . . . . . . was not attended with the troubleſome and diſgraceful conſequences, which a Catholic writer has publiſhed.] Mr Bernard (11) affirmed, that when the duke of Savoy made war with his ſubjects of the vallies of Piedmont, the Reformed had raiſed a ſum of ſix or ſeven hundred thouſand livres, which

(c) Allard, ubi ſupra, pag 224.

(d) See end of the remark [B].

(1) Propoſit. & Moiens, pag. 185.

(2) Alb. Grawerus, cap. iii, Polemicæ Sacræ.

(3) Tobias Wagner, doctor of Divinity at Tubingen, Inquiſit. Theol. in Acta Henotica.

(4) See page 526, of the Propoſitions & Moiens.

(5) In his Syſtem. de l'Egliſe.

(6) Propoſit. & Moiens, p. 331.

(7) Page 209.

(8) Ibid. pag. 366.

(9) Ibid. pag. 379.

(10) Hiſt. de l'Edit. de Nantes, Tom. III, Part. II, livr. xv, pag. 350, ad ann. 1677.

(11) Bernard, Explication de l'Edit de Nantes, apud Hiſt. de l'Edit de Nantes, ubi ſupra, Tom. III, livr. xi, pag. 60, ad ann. 1666.

I learned from a letter which I received in 1678, that Mr Cregut had publiſhed an Apology, in which he painted this miniſter in very black colours [D].

I add which D'Yſe had received, and diſtributed; that he did not well diſcharge that adminiſtration; that he was proſecuted in the chamber of Grenoble to bring him to an account; that the conſiſtory, in order to put an end to the noiſe that was made about it, were forced to depoſe him; that they made him Principal of the college of Die, and named four miniſters to reviſe his accounts. There is nothing true in all this, except this one article, that D'Yſe had received the money deſigned for the relief of the inhabitants of the vallies, and that they took this opportunity to bring him into trouble, out of reſentment and revenge. You will find the ſequel of this affair in the Hiſtory of the Edict of Nantes. I ſhall only mention three or four particulars out it. D'Yſe delivered his accounts towards the end of the year 1656. Preſident Periſſol proſecuted him in the year 1665. This proſecution was carried on by degrees to the court made up of Proteſtant and Catholic judges. D'Yſe had his cauſe pleaded in the court, and gained his point. The Preſident enraged at this affront, proſecuted the cauſe ſtill more violently, and his menaces, which neither the intreaties of his colleagues, nor the remonſtrances of the conſiſtory, nor the ſollicitations of the whole church, could put a ſtop to, obliged the conſiſtory not to depoſe D'Yſe, but to ſend him to Die in quality of profeſſor of Divinity. He had already performed the duties of that place, whilſt Cregut was forced, by the perſecution of the biſhop, to leave his profeſſorſhip. In the mean time the cauſe was removed into the court of Caſtres; and the Preſident incited as much as poſſible the inhabitants of the vallies to carry on the action againſt him. The conſiſtory made him give a new account, to put an end to that ſcandal; and they found but one article, amounting ſcarce to a denier per livre of the whole ſum, which he could not well account for. But his honeſty appeared, &c. (12). The words which I ſuppreſs inform us, that he was only guilty of a little negligence; which was well for him, and he ought to be accounted a happy man for having failed only in that; for the handling of ſuch public gatherings is ſo dangerous an occaſion of ſinning, that a wiſe man ought never to engage in it, before he has made a frequent trial of his ſtrength. The cuſtody of this money is perhaps more difficult than that of a beautiful woman. The compariſon betwixt money and pitch, which is ſo common even among countrymen, is a very good one; one can hardly handle that fatal metal, any more than pitch, without ſoiling one's fingers. There was a terrible out-cry (13) againſt the ill management of the immenſe ſums (14), which were raiſed for the Vaudois; and I believe that, in all ſuch caſes, there has been, and there will be, occaſion to cry out; O how rare a thing it is to find a man who is not made of iron with reſpect to that loadſtone.

Abſtinens ducentis ad ſe cuncta pecuniæ (15).

From gold abſtaining; gold, that draws,
And ſubjects all things to it's laws.

We muſt ſeek for him with Diogenes's lanthorn, and if we deſign a crown for him, we may keep it long enough before we can find a man that deſerves it.

Regnum & diadema tutum
Deferens uni, propriamque laurum;
Quiſque is ingentes oculo irretorto
Spectat acervos (16).

Decreeing for that man alone
The crown, the laurel, and the throne,
Who can with unaverted eye
Sees heaps of ſhining metal lye.

[D] Mr Cregut had publiſhed an apology in which he painted this miniſter in very black colours.] It fell into my hands but a few days ago: the title of it is: Apologia neceſſaria non minus quàm æquiſſima Antonii Creguti, contra accuſationem impræviſam, in expectatam & iniquam Friderici Spanhemii Profeſſoris Leydenſis. It was printed at Amſterdam, in the year 1678, and contains forty eight pages, in 8vo. Mr Cregut (17) ſhews, that after the death of Stephen Blanc, who had been profeſſor of Divinity at Die, the academical ſenate charged Mr D'Yſe, the miniſter of the place, to fill the vacancy of the deceaſed till the next ſynod. Mr D'Yſe did ſo. The ſynod of the year following convened at Die, choſe Antony Cregut (18), profeſſor of Divinity. This choice was conditional and became definitive at the end of the year, by the judgment of the ſynod of Pragelas. Mr D'Yſe, who did the more earneſtly deſire that place, becauſe he had diſcharged the duties of it for ſome time, thwarted, as much as poſſible, the election of another; but not ſucceeding, he grew extreamly jealous of Mr Cregut, and ſought all imaginable means to prejudice him, though he always pretended to be his friend. He contributed, by his intrigues, to put a ſtop at Geneva, to the impreſſion of a Latin book of Mr Cregut (19), under pretence that the doctrine of it was falſe, and very dangerous. The author of it deſired, that the examination of his book ſhould be made only by the profeſſors of Geneva, that the whole matter might be tranſacted with leſs noiſe, and more judgment and expedition; but his requeſt was rejected, and his work was examined in the aſſembly of all the miniſters. He expected no good from it, and remembred the complaint of the emperor Hadrian: The multitude of Phyſicians has deſtroyed me. Turba medicorum me perdidit. They condemned two or three of his doctrines: this condemnation was communicated by his adverſary to the miniſters of the Greſivaudan (20) aſſembled in a body, and from that time, prejudices grew ſo violent againſt the author, that he was threatened with depoſition the next ſynod, which was to be held at Die. Mr D'Yſe not doubting that the quality of moderator of that ſynod, would powerfully enable him to execute his reſolutions, deſired to obtain it, and actually did. The firſt accuſation, concerned the aſſertions about Grace, which Mr Cregut had publiſhed. He offered his reaſons, and thought he had nothing to fear, when he ſaw the end of that firſt proceeding; but he was miſtaken; for ſome days after Mr D'Yſe having declared to the ſynod, that the miniſters of Geneva had cenſured ſome articles of the Revelator Arcanorum of Mr Cregut, put ſome queſtions to the author about the doctrine of the imputation of Adam's ſin. Mr Cregut was going to explain that matter; but he was preſently interrupted, upon pretence, that there was ſome other affairs which could not be put off. He waited for another opportunity to explain himſelf in the following ſeſſions, in caſe that diſpute ſhould be ſet on foot again; but he waited in vain. Mr D'Yſe plaid his part ſo maliciouſly, that he got his adverſary condemned, without giving him an opportunity to plead his cauſe. There was a famous diſputation in the Philoſophy-ſchool. The Jeſuits of that town, and ſeveral other perſons of the Romiſh clergy, were preſent at it, and it was very neceſſary that Mr Cregut, as rector of the univerſity, ſhould be there. Mr d'Yſe took that opportunity, drew up an act of condemnation, and got it approved at the end of the ſynod. Part of the miniſters were already gone, and the reſt were very deſirous to ſtay no longer. If the abſence of ſome members is favourable to thoſe who have an ill deſign the diſpoſition of the reſt who deſire to go home, is ſo too; for being in haſte to finiſh what remains, every thing is carried on in a hurry. Thus you ſee how innocence was oppreſſed, as Mr Cregut pretends. ‘Illo tempore (21) me abſente, inaudito, juſſo deputatis ſilentio, ſub finem Synodi, dum omnia tumultuario fiunt, Paſtoribus tunc vel abſentibus, vel abiturientibus Dizius ipſe bellum illum articulum non mihi, ſed ſibi ludibrium propinans, fabricavit, aſſumpto in tanto facinore ſuo Achate Rainaudo, digno patellæ operculo (22).’ He adds, that they ordered a great number of copies of that act to be made, to cummunicate them to all the Proteſtant world. ‘Verum illis non ſufficiebat calumnioſus articulus intra privatos parietes fabricatus ab inimicis, haud potuit ſatiari invidia malitioſa, niſi per totum Orbem Reformatum exemplaria illius articuli mitterentur, tam in Galliam quàm exteras nationes, Helvetiam, Ger-

‘maniam,

---

(12) Hiſt. de l'Edit. de Nantes, ubi ſupra, pag. 61.

(13) See Mr Leti, Critique ſur les Loteries, Part. II, pag. 108, & ſeq.

(14) The author of the Hiſtory of the Edict of Nantes, denies that the money raiſed in France, amounted to ſix or ſeven hundred thouſand livres, as Bernard will have it. It was at moſt, ſays he, but the third part of all the ſeveral ſums, and all the ſums did not amount to five hundred thirty thouſand livres. Mr Leti, ibid. pag. 110, ſays they amounted to three millions, and thoſe of France to ſeven hundred fifty thouſand livres.

(15) Horat. Od. ix, lib. iv.

(16) Idem, Od. ii, lib. ii.

(17) Cregutus, Apol. Neceſſar. pag. 11, & ſeq.

(18) He was miniſter at Montelimart.

(19) Intitled, Revelator arcanorum.

(20) A country near Grenoble, and one of the Colloques of the ſynodal province of Dauphiné for the Proteſtants.

(21) That is, whilſt he was preſent at the public diſputation, as rector of the univerſity.

(22) Cregut, ubi ſupra, pag. 26.

I add, that the churches of the vallies of Piedmont ſent him into England in Cromwell's time, to remove ſome difficulties concerning the collections of money made for the Vaudois; and that he was preſent in the national ſynod of Loudun, as deputy of the province of Dauphiné (e).

(e) Taken from Hiſtoire des Egliſes Vaudoiſes, publiſhed by John Leger, at Leyden, in 1569, pag. 205, of the ſecond part.

‘ maniam, Hollandiam, &c. Pædagogis ſuis jugiter occupatis ut plura Apographa deſcriberent (23).’ In fine, he ſays, that his book having been ſold, without any alteration made in it, ruined the trophies of his enemy, and convicted him of having extracted ſomething out of it, that manifeſted his envy and raſhneſs. ‘ Paulo poſt libro meo edito abſque vel apiculi immutatione, abortivus ac furtivus ille Dizii articulus cecidit coram meo Revelatore, ſicut Dagon coram arca fœderis. Et ne plura exempla proſeram, unum Rev. Antiſtitis Eccleſiæ Bernenſis D. Homelii erit mihi pro cunctis, dum eſſem Bernæ in illius Muſæo protulit è ſua Bibliotheca meum Revelatorem Arcan. & Dizii pravè & ſtolidè articulatum articulum arthritide laborantem, & dixit ſe contuliſſe cum locis Revelatoris, quem tunc præ manibus habebat, unde facta etiam inter nos collatione non poterat ſatis mirari ſtuporem, virus & invidiam compilatoris (24). — Soon after my book had been publiſhed without the alteration even of an accent, the abortive and ſtolen work of D'Yſe fell before my Revelator, like Dagon before the ark of the covenant. And, not to multiply examples, I will be ſatisfied with that alone of Homelius, Antiſtes of Bern; who, when I was at Bern in his Muſæum, brought out of his library my Revelator Arcanorum, and D'Yſe's ſilly lame performance, and ſaid he had compared it with the paſſages of the Revelator, which he had then in his hand; upon which compariſon between us, he could not ſufficiently wonder at the ſtupidity, malice, and envy of the compiler.’ He ſays (25), that having explained in ſome letters, the ſenſe of his propoſitions, and offered new explications, if thoſe already publiſhed were not ſufficient, the divines of Geneva, permitted the impreſſion of the Revelator Arcanorum, and took off the prohibition of ſelling the Theſes maintained at Die. He is contented to mention in general; the great trial above mentioned (26); but he ſays that Mr d'Yſe being ſhamefully expelled from the church of Grenoble, was admitted again into that of Die. Ex Eccleſia Gratianopolitana turpiſſime ejecti . . . . . Ut Dizius fuerat potius intruſus quam vocatus, ita detruſus fuit. Non inquiro de crimine quod objiciebatur, eſſet piaculare. Deus novit. Acta ſunt publice in Parliamento litigata, quæ ad has uſque Oras pervenerunt . . . . . Ictu Maris a Naufragio ſervatus, Galli noſtri vulgo dicunt, d'un coup de vent ou de tempeſte, priſtinas ſedes recuperavit, in Portum Dienſem appellens ubi antea Miniſter fuerat, ibi cum ſuo Rainaudo, juvat meminiſſe laborum præteritorum (27).

I do not vouch for the truth of theſe particulars alledging them only as a proof of my text, viz. that Mr Cregut has painted Mr d'Yſe in very black colours.

(23) Id. ibid.

(24) Id. ibid. pag. 27.

(25) Id. ibid. pag. 30.

(26) In the remark [C].

(27) Cregut, Apol. Neceſſar. pag. 30, 31.

ISLEBIANS. Thus they are called, who embraced the opinions of a Saxon divine, named John Agricola, a native of Eiſleben, and a diſciple and countryman of Martin Luther. I have ſpoke very largely of this JOHN AGRICOLA (a). He taught for ſome time a very falſe doctrine concerning the uſe of the Moſaical law. He miſtook St Paul's diſpute againſt the Jews, and the oppoſition which this great apoſtle of Grace ſo often made betwixt the œcononomy of works, and the œconomy of faith. Luther did ſo vigorouſly oppoſe the errors of Agricola, that he forced him to recant. Every one may know, why the name of Antinomians was given to the followers of this man. Their opinions have not been faithfully repreſented by their adverſaries; and there's no doubt but that Prateolus has much exaggerated what he ſays of them [A]. But this is nothing, if compared with Garaſſe's ſcurrility in his account of the pretended hereſies of the Iſlebians [B].

(a) See his article, at the letter [A], pag. 140.

[A] Prateolus has much exaggerated what he ſays of them.] He did not go to the fountain head, but only copied Staphylus,. Hoſius, and Lindanus. What he copies from Staphylus, may be reduced to this (1), that according to John Agricola, the law of God is altogether uſeleſs, that it is neither neceſſary before nor after our juſtification, and that men under the goſpel are not obliged to good works. What he takes from Lindanus, is much harſher: viz. that according to John Agricola, men may be righteous againſt their conſciences; and that an adulterer, an uſurer, a fornicator, or any ſuch great ſinner, ſhall be ſaved, provided he believe. Antinomi à Johanne Iſlebio Lutheri cive ac diſcipulo exorti. Hi dogma ſequuntur legibus divinis contrarium (ait Querela Lutheri) legem operum rejicientes, finguntque homines contra conſcientiam juſtos eſſe. Aiunt enim, teſte Luthero lib. de Conciliis; ſi es Adulter, Scortator, Uſurarius, Avarus, aut aliis pollutus peccatis, ſi tantum credis, ſalvas es. Hactenus Lindanus (2). I cannot believe this is a faithful acccount of Agricola's opinions.

[B] Garaſſe's ſcurrility in his account of the pretended hereſies of the Iſlebians.] It is an uſeful thing to let the reader ſee how bold ſome men are in their ſlanders; and therefore the length of this paſſage will not hinder me from inſerting it here. ‘ The Iſlebians, or Antinomians, otherwiſe called Nomomachi, foraſmuch as they oppoſe the law of Moſes, ſaying, in their articles of faith, that it is the torment of our ſouls, are the diſciples of a certain labourer, called Joannes Iſlebius, who, coming from the tail of the plough, Triduo ſe Theologum profeſſus eſt, as Melanchthon ſpeaks, writing againſt him. The principal reveries of theſe upſtarts are to be found in the book de Libertate Chriſtiana, written by Dr Paul Crellius, who was one of the chief ſupporters of that curſed ſect. I will only produce three of the moſt remarkable, taken word for word from their articles of faith. The firſt imports, that the goſpel, and the Old Teſtament, unleſs they are preached viva voce, ſunt veteres calcei in angulo derelicti, are like old ſhoes thrown by in a corner, when they can be no longer worn. But when the goſpel is preached, then it becomes like the ſhoes mentioned in the Canticles, Quam pulchri ſunt greſſus tui in calceamentis tuis, filia principis; — (How beautiful are thy feet with ſhoes, O princes daughter!) and in the CVIIth pſalm: In Idumæam extendam calceamentum meum. That is according to Beza's expoſition:

Contre Edom peuple glorieux
Je jetteray mes ſoluliers vieux.

. . . . my ſhoe
On Edom will I caſt.

‘ So that in their way of ſpeaking, preachers are Coblers, the holy Scriptures are old ſhoes; the pulpit, the ſhop wherein they are kept, and Lent and Advent the old ſhoes-fair.

‘ The ſecond propoſition of the Antinomians is ſtill more horrible; and I am very ſorry my words cannot expreſs the weight of my thoughts: It is expreſſed in theſe terms by Dr Crellius: Qui quærit ſalutem in veteri lege quærit PEDICULUM IN SCABIE. He that ſeeks his ſalvation in the law of Moſes, and the Old Teſtament, ſeeks a LOUSE in a SCAB, that is to ſay that the Salvation of our ſouls is like LICE and GOD is like a SCAB. I want words to expreſs my aſtoniſhment . . . . (3).

‘ The third maxim of the Nomomachi is quoted by Dr Crellius, in theſe words, Moſes ad corvos abeat cum lege ſua, nam ſi non reſipuit, eſt dam-

(1) Prateolus, in Elencho Hæreticorum, voce Antinomi, pag. m. 41. He ſays Staphylus took this from Agricola's notes upon the Goſpel of St John, and from Luther's Antinomian diſputes.

(2) Prateolus, ibid.

(3) Garaſſe, Curious Doctrine, book v, ſect. xvi, pag. 557.

‘ natus ad omnes Diabolos. —— Let Moſes be hanged with his law, for if he did not repent he is damned to the pit of hell. I appeal from the ſentence of the Antinomians, as being Moſes's advocate, and I find the Antinomian madneſs far exceeding that of the Manichees; for when they rejected Moſes, they pretended to have more honourable pretences, as St Auſtin relates in the fifteenth book againſt Fauſtus. Being asked why they rejected the Old Teſtament and the law of Moſes, they anſwered, with ſpecious words, and well adjuſted phraſes, that they therein practiſed the command of Jeſus Chriſt, who forbad his Apoſtles to put new wine into old veſſels: and that their church was like a young damſel, who receives no letters or Billets doux from her old lovers, that endeavour to corrupt her by promiſes: that is to ſay, their church neither receives nor acknowledges the old Teſtament, which is an old decayed wine, an old piece of tattered cloth, an old caſt-off-lover. And then they added as in triumph and inſulting our church: Vos quidem pergite agere ut cœpiſtis, rudem pannum veteri veſtimento committite, novum vinum veternoſis utribus credite, duobus maritis nulli placituri ſervite, Chriſtianam fidem Hippocentaurum facite, nec equum perfectum nec hominem: Nobis ſoli Chriſto ſervire permittite. Who, hearing this delicious impudence, theſe bewitching words, would not ſay, here are pious and holy ſouls; but it appears at the bottom, that the Manichees were meer ſcoundrels. It is true that as great ſcoundrels as they were, they had not ſo many lice, as the Antinomians (4).

ITALICA,

ITALICA, a town in Spain, was ſo called when Scipio Africanus gave it the form of a city (a). It grew very conſiderable, and was the birth-place of Trajan and Hadrian (b). It enjoyed a long time (c) the privileges of thoſe towns which were called Municipia, and afterwards it deſired to be in the ſame condition with thoſe which they called colonies. Hadrian wondered it ſhould deſire this change (d); for he looked upon the privileges of a municipium, as preferable to thoſe of a colony. Nothing remains of Italica but the ruins of it (e). Some authors place it near Seville in a place which at preſent is called Sivilla la Veja (f). I have ſaid in another place (g), that it did not appear to me, that it could be proved there ever was ſuch a town in Italy as Italica. I do not retract what I ſaid, though I know a very ſpecious objection may be made againſt it [A].

[A] I know that a very ſpecious objection may be made againſt it.] It is grounded upon a paſſage in Strabo, where we find that ſome people of Italy riſing and conſederating to make war againſt the Romans, made Corfinium their place of arms, and named it Italica. Μετονομασθεῖσαν Ἰταλικὴν, Italicæ nomen indiderunt (1). Note, that Corfinium was the capital town of the Peligni, and that this war was that which was called Bellum Sociale or Marſicum, or Italicum, and which began in the year of Rome 662 (2). It is very probable, that in theſe words of Diodorus Siculus, τὴν κοινὴν πόλιν Ἰταλίαν ὀνομάσαντες (3), it ought to be read Ἰταλικήν (4), and not Ἰταλίαν. Thus you ſee two good authors who witneſs, that the town of Corfinium was called Italica, when theſe people confederated againſt Rome. Velleius Paterculus might be alledged as a third witneſs, caput imperii ſui Corfinium legerant, ſays he (5), quod appellarent Italicum. There are ſome critics (6), who read quod appellarunt Italicam. Others (7) keep to Italicum. It matters not with me; the anſwer I have to make, does not want the more favourabler eading; for this is what I have to ſay. The name of Italica, which the allies gave the town of Corfinium, laſted no longer than the war: they gave it a new name, when they choſe it their common metropolis. They eſtabliſhed in it (8) a policy like that of Rome, whereby they ſhewed not only their emulation for the capital city of the Roman people, but alſo their reſolution to make themſelves independant. Since then the new name of Italica was a conſequence and a monument of their conſpiracy, it is not likely that the Romans would ſuffer it to remain. Corfinium reſumed it's former name, when the war was finiſhed in the year of Rome 664, and we do not find that it was called otherwiſe than Corfinium, ſince that time. Whence the error of thoſe appears, who pretend that the poet Silius Italicus was a native of Corfinium, and for that reaſon ſirnamed Italicus.

JUBA.

JUBA. Hiſtory makes mention of two princes of this name, whereof one was the father of the other. Moreri has ſpoken of them; but he has committed ſome faults [A], which

[A] Mr Moreri . . . . has committed ſome faults.] I. He ſays that Juba, the father, was king of Mauritania: This is falſe. In this Juba's time, the Mauritania Cæſarienſis belonged to Bocchus, and the Tingitana to Bogud. Some time after, that is, in the year 716, Bocchus poſſeſſed himſelf of the Tingitana. After his death his kingdom was reduced into a province in the year 721, as Numidia had been under Julius Cæſar (1). II. He ſays, that Juba, the ſon, was reſtored by Auguſtus to the kingdom of his father, that is to ſay, to Numidia. He ſhould have ſaid with Dion (2), that Auguſtus gave him ſome parts of Getulia, and the two Mauritania's; and that the beſt part of Numidia remained ſtill a Roman province. It is true that Strabo affirms (3) that Auguſtus reſtored Juba to the kingdom of his father, and that moreover he granted him Mauritania; but this Geographer limits the Roman province and the kingdom of Juba in ſuch a manner as ſhews (4) that Numidia belonged to the Romans. III. Moreri makes Pliny ſay, that Juba, the ſon, found an herb, which his Phyſician Euphorbus called by his name Euphorbia. This is not what Pliny ſays; his words are (5): Invenit & patrum noſtrorum ætate rex Juba, quam appellavit Euphorbiam Medici ſui nomine. The meaning of which is, that Juba found an herb, which from the name of his Phyſician, he called Euphorbia. It would be ſomewhat ſtrange that a Phyſician to the king ſhould have been ſo bad a courtier, as to give his own name to an herb, which the king his maſter had found. Yet this is what Pliny affirmed, if we believe Moreri. It would be much leſs ſtrange, that a king, who diſcovers an herb ſhould chuſe rather to give it the name of his Phyſician than his own. Which is what Juba did, if we depend on the teſtimony of Pliny whom I have cited; but there is reaſon to believe, that Pliny has not been ſo exact here as he ought to have been. What he ſays in another book is more credible, namely that Euphorbia was ſo called from the name of it's diſcoverer, who was the Phyſician of king Juba. He adds a thing, which well deſerved that Moreri ſhould take notice of it: which is, that Juba wrote a particular treatiſe upon this herb, in which he extolled the ſingular virtues of it. ‘Juba Ptolemæi pater, qui prius utrique Mauritaniæ imperavit, ſtudiorum claritate memorabilior etiam, quam regno, ſimilia prodidit de Atlante: præterque gigni ibi herbam Euphorbiam nomine ab inventore medico ſuo appellatam. Cujus lacteum ſuccum miris laudibus celebrat in claritate viſus, contraque ſerpentes, & venena omnia, privatim dicato volumine (6). —— Juba, father of Ptolemy, who before reigned over both Mauritania's, more famous as a learned man than as a king, gave the ſame account of Atlas: and beſides, that there grew there the herb Euphorbia, ſo called from his Phyſician, who diſcovered it. The milky juice of which herb he wonderfully extols as an antidote againſt the venom of ſerpents, and all kinds of poiſon.’ IV. I might obſerve as one fault Moreri's falſe quotations (7).

[B] I ſhall

---

(4) Id. ibid. pag. 559.

(a) Appian. in Ibericis, pag. m. 464.

(b) Id. ibid.

(c) Aulus Gellius, lib. xvi, cap. xiii.

(d) Id. ibid.

(e) See Ludovicus Nonnius in Hiſpania, cap. xvii, pag. m. 64.

(f) Id. ibid. pag. 65.

(g) See remark [A], of the article HADRIAN (PUBLIUS ÆLIUS).

(1) Strabo, lib. v, pag. m 167.

(2) See Sigonius, in Faſtis, ad ann. 662.

(3) In Excerptis lib. xxxvii, apud Photium.

(4) See Caſaubon. in Strab. lib. v, pag. m. 94.

(5) Vell. Paterc. lib. ii, cap. xvi.

(6) Gerard. Voſſius, Not. in Patercul. ibid.

(7) Sigonius, de ant. Jure Italiæ, lib. iii, cap. i, fol. m. 100. Boëcler. Paterc. ibid.

(8) See Sigonius, ubi ſupra.

(1) You will find all this proved in Father Noris's Cenotaphia Piſana, pag. 235.

(2) Lib. liii, ad ann. 729.

(3) Lib. xvii, pag. 570.

(4) See Father Noris, ubi ſupra.

(5) Plin. lib. xxv, cap. vii, pag. m. 400.

(6) Plin. lib. v, cap. i, ſub fin. pag. m. 527.

(7) He quotes Dion, in the forty firſt book, & ſeq. But he ſhould have quoted the forty third. He quotes Pliny, lib. xxv, cap. i, he ſhould have quoted the ſeventh chapter. He quotes the eighth book of Athenæus, which mentions only a Greek epigram of Juba: He ſhould have quoted the third and fourth books. He ſhould have quoted the ſeventeenth book of Strabo, and the ſecond book of Voſſius.

which it is not improper to take notice of. I ſhall rectify but a few faults of other authors [B].

[B] I ſhall rectify but a few faults of other authors.] It ſeems Joſephus ſays that Juba, the ſon, had to wife Glaphyra, the widow of one of the ſons of Herod. See this woman's article (8) where we confute this. Father Salian thought that Juba died in the 759th year of Rome. Father Noris (9) has invincibly confuted him by this obſervation; Strabo wrote his thirteenth book a little after the year 771. Now in his ſeventeenth book he ſpeaks of Juba, as of a prince lately dead; Juba therefore did not die before the year 772, or thereabout. The ſame Strabo ſays elſewhere (10) that Juba lived in the reign of Tiberius. Now Tiberius began his reign but in the year 767. It ſeems that one may infer from a paſſage of Tacitus, that Juba was yet alive in the year 776 (11). Noldius is miſtaken in ſuppoſing, that Dion ſays that Auguſtus gave Egypt to Juba, beſides the kingdom of his father (12). There is nothing in Dion's words, that obliges us to refer the word ταύτην to Egypt, and it is certain it muſt be referred to the word Cleopatra. Dion's tranſlator has miſerably blundered. Ἥ τε Κλεοπάτρα Ἰόβα τῷ τοῦ Ἰόβου παιδὶ συνῴκησε. τούτῳ γὰρ ὁ Καῖσαρ τραφέντι τε ἐν τῇ Ἰταλίᾳ, καὶ συστρατευσαμένῳ οἱ ταύτην τε καὶ τὴν βασιλείαν τὴν πατρῴαν ἔδωκε. Cleopatra autem Jubæ Jubæ filio in matrimonium tradita eſt. Hunc Jubam Cæſar in Italia educatum, ac ſuam militiam ſecutum, hoc regno (read ea, Cleopatra ſcilicet) & paterno etiam donavit (13). Noldius citing the paſſage, in which Dion ſays (14) that Juba, inſtead of his father's kingdom, received of Auguſtus ſome parts of Getulia, and the dominions of Bocchus and Bogud, obſerves that Pliny has juſtly ſubſtituted in the room of thoſe dominions, both the Mauritanias. Pro quibus rectè Plinius Hiſt. Nat. V. c. I. utramque Mauritaniam ſubſtituit, hoc eſt Cæſarienſem & Tingitanam. Which is clearly to inſinuate this falſity, viz. that theſe two Mauritania's and the dominions mentioned by Dion, were not the ſame thing.

(8) In the remark [B].

(9) Ubi ſupra, pag. 238.

(10) Lib. vi, circa fin.

(11) See the article GLAPHYRA, grand-daughter, &c.

(12) Noldius de Vita & Geſtis Herodum, pag. 176.

(13) Dio, lib. li, pag. 520. Leunclavius takes notice of this fault of Xylander in his edition of Dion Caſſius.

(14) Id. lib. liv, pag. 580, ad ann. 729.

JUDEX (MATTHEW) one of the principal writers of the Centuries of Magdeburg, was born at Tippolſwald (a) in Miſnia the twenty ſecond (b) of September 1528. He ſhewed a great inclination for learning, upon which his father permitted him to go and ſtudy at Dreſden. He ſtaid not there long, but choſe rather to ſtudy in the college of Wittemberg, and afterwards in that of Magdeburg: He was in a wretched condition, when he came to this laſt town, being over-run with the itch, and without money. The way he took to live, was to beg alms by ſinging from door to door; but after he was known to be a hopeful young man, he was preferred to a tutor's place in the houſe of an advocate, who ſent him with his ſon to Wittemberg in the year 1546. He there took his maſter of arts degree, in October 1549. After which he returned to Magdeburg, and there taught the ſecond claſs ſome years; and afterwards he was miniſter of the church of St Ulric till the year 1559. He quitted not that employment till he went to be profeſſor of Divinity, in the univerſity of Jena. He continued in that profeſſorſhip only eighteen months; for that place was taken from him by order of John Frederic duke of Saxony, in the beginning of October 1561. He ſtayed ſtill half a year at Jena; and then ſpending almoſt as much time at Magdeburg, he retired to Wiſmar. He died the fifteenth of May 1564 [A] at Roſtoc, whither he went a few days before to aſſiſt at the promotion of ſcholars. He was a man of good morals, laborious, zealous, learned, and he wrote ſeveral books [B]. He had many perſecutions and vexations to go

(a) It is a place two German leagues diſtant from Dreſden.

(b) Andreas Schoppius, ubi infra, citat. (c), ſays that it was on St Matthew's day: and therefore he ſhould have ſaid the twenty firſt, and not the twenty ſecond.

[A] He died the fifteenth of May 1564.] I ſhould not make a remark upon this, if it were not to ſay, that authors are very careleſs with reſpect to the dates of the death of perſons, and other computations. I find in Paul Freherus's Theatrum (1) that our Judex died the eleventh of June 1564. This date is alledged upon the credit of the Nomenclator Profeſſorum Ienenſium, written by Hadrian Beyer. Mr Sagittarius (2) citing the ſame Nomenclator, places Judex's death on the ſame day as Paul Freherus: but I ſee in Micrælius (3) this death placed in the year 1587, which was the ſeventy ninth year of the deceaſed. There is in the margin, Freber, p. 202. It is hard to conceive, how ſuch an unfaithful quotation could creep into that place; and note, that Judex would not have lived ſeventy nine years, though he had lived till 1587, for he was born in 1528. It is affirmed in his life (4), that his death was the more regretted, becauſe he had not lived above thirty ſeven years. This calculation is not right; for ſince his birth was placed on the twenty ſecond of December 1528, and his death on the fifteenth of May 1564, it ſhould have been ſaid that he was not yet thirty ſix years old.

[B] He was a man of good morals . . . . and wrote ſeveral books.] He was of ſuch ſobriety, as not to eat ſo much in a week, as others, but of a moderate ſtomach, eat in two days; and his beſt friends could never obtain of him to drink more than to ſatisfy his thirſt (5). He was ſo averſe to pomp and luxury, that on his wedding-day he would not conſent, that his wife ſhould dreſs herſelf finely, and obliged her to content herſelf with very ordinary cloaths (6). His chaſtity was ſo great, that, before he married, ſome people thought that he was of a frigid or inſenſible conſtitution; and he confeſſed privately to his intimate friends, that he believed the cauſe of his ill ſtate of health, or at leaſt, that what increaſed his infirmities, was his ſtaying too long before he married. ‘Ante legitimum conjugium adeò pudicè vixit, ut à ‘nonnullis frigidus ſit judicatus, ac ipſe intimis ſit confeſſus, ſe judicare originem aut certè non leve ſuæ ‘adverſæ valetudinis incrementum inde exiſtere, quòd ‘non priùs duxiſſet uxorem (7).’ Yet he was married at twenty ſix years of age (8), when he was called to be miniſter of the church of St Ulric at Magdeburg. He married a maid of fifteen or ſixteen years of age, who was not rich. Some of his friends were angry, that he had married a wife who had neither years nor money enough; but he anſwered them, that he had always begged of GOD a wife, unexperienced in evil things, tractable, free from pride, &c. ‘Ægriùs tu‘lere amicorum quidam, quòd juvenculam & minùs ‘dotatam ſibi jungeret virginem, ſed iis reſpondit, ſe ‘ab adoleſcentia aſſiduè petiſſe à Deo, ut puellam bonis ‘prognatam, honeſtè educatam, virtutibus & pietate ‘ornatam, malarum rerum ætate adhuc imperitam, & ‘morigeram potiùs, quam natalibus elatam, delicatâ ‘& blandâ educatione ac converſatione malâ depravatam, ac dotibus & ornamentis fortunæ protervam, ‘ſibi dare dignaretur, ac ſe voti ſui compotem factum ‘in Dei providentia adquieſcere (9). —— Some of ‘his friends took it amiſs, that he had married a young ‘girl without a fortune; but he anſwered them, that ‘he had made it his conſtant prayer to GOD from his ‘childhood, that he would beſtow on him a young woman, born of virtuous parents, virtuouſly educated, ‘good and pious, unacquainted with the vices and follies ‘of life, and of a complying temper, rather than one ‘who is proud of her family, ſpoiled through polite education and company, and inſolently vain of her qualifications and fortune; and that, being poſſeſſed of his ‘wiſh, he acquieſced in the providence of GOD.’ He lived piouſly and comfortably with his wife a little above ten years, and had ſix children by her (10). She married the ſecond time Andrew Schoppius (11).

I ſhall

(1) Page 202.

(2) Sagittar. Introd. in Hiſt. Eccleſ. pag. 247.

(3) Micræl. Hiſtor. Eccleſ. pag. 770. Edit. 1699.

(4) Andr Schoppius, Orat. de Vita Matth. Judicis apud Crenium Anim. Phil. & Hiſt. Part. VI, pag. 71.

(5) Schoppius, ibid. pag. 58.

(6) Id. ibid. pag. 58, 59.

(7) Id. ibid pag. 57, 58.

(8) Id. pag. 58.

(9) Id. ibid.

(10) Id. ibid.

(11) Id. ibid. pag. 50.

go through during the courſe of his miniſtry (c) [C].

(c) Taken from Andrew Schoppius, in Oratione de Vita Matthæi Judicis. It is to be found at the end of the ſecond part, enarrationis Epiſtolarum Dominicalium Matthæi Judicis, Iſlebiæ 1578, in 8vo. Mr Crenius has inſerted that Oration in the ſixth part of his Animadverſiones Philol. & Hiſtor. pag. 49, & ſeq.

I ſhall now ſpeak of the books he wrote. He tranſlated into Latin the German book of Luther concerning the literal ſenſe of theſe words, This is my Body. He dedicated that work to the ſenate of Ratisbon, and confuted in the Epiſtle Dedicatory the fifteen main arguments of the Zuinglians. The title of a book he publiſhed in the year 1559 runs thus: quod arguere peccata ſeu concionari pœnitentiam ſit proprium Legis & non Evangelii proprie dicti, Rationes & Argumenta. His treatiſe de Typographiæ inventione, & de prælorum legitima inſpectione, was printed in the year 1566. His Enarrationes Epiſtolarum Dominicalium came out in the year 1578. He publiſhed ſix books of his own compoſing in High-Dutch. He and Wigandus jointly publiſhed ſome pieces, as (12) Reſponſio ad Confeſſionem Majoris de Juſtificatione & bonis operibus. Reſponſio ad ſcurriles & blaſphemos fœtidi Rambocchii Rythmos Witebergæ impreſſos. De Adiaphoricis corruptelis in magno libro Actorum Interimiſticorum, ſub conficto titulo Profeſſorum Wittebergenſium edito, repertis, Admonitiones. Corpus Doctrinæ ex Novo Teſtamento, De Victorini Strigelii declaratione ſeu potiùs occultatione. Andrew Schoppius adds this: Item cum Illyrico, Muſæo, & Wigando miſit Epiſtolam ad quoſdam pios fratres de cauſſa Victorini. Et cum iiſdem ſe purgavit de fictis rationibus demiſſionis Jenenſis, quas charta ἀνώνυμος referebat (13). He afterwards gives the titles of ſome German books, and of ſome Latin pieces that have not been printed. He obſerves (14) that Judex was well ſkilled in Muſic, and had ſome knowledge of the Mathematics. He was not ignorant of Aſtrology, and calculated ſome nativities. ‘ Judicia nativitatum ſibi, liberis ſuis & Embdenis (15) nonnullis ‘ compoſuit, atque figuras cœli, quas vocant, aliis rebus accommodatas erexit.’ He had ſtudied ſome time the Civil-law at Wittemberg: he could make Latin and Greek verſes, and he had a deſign to write an Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory of his own time (16). Every body knows that he had a hand in the two firſt centuries (17) of Magdeburg, and that it was a very great labour. He died very young, and had a bad ſtate of health for fifteen years together (18), and therefore it cannot be doubted that he was very ſtudious and laborious.

I ſhall occaſionally relate a thing, which may ſerve as a ſupplement to what we have ſeen above (19) concerning the hiſtory of theſe centuries. The three laſt were never publiſhed, though the centuriators had proceeded very far in them, and the Margrave of Brandenburg, duke of Pruſſia, had given orders to Andrew Stangewald to put the laſt hand to them, that they might be printed. Andreas Stangewaldus . . . . ſibi ab inclyto Marchione Brandenburgenſi, Duce Boruſſiæ tùm temporis negotium datum eſſe confirmabat, ut reliquas tres centurias Eccleſiaſticæ Hiſtoriæ Magdeburgenſ. ab autoribus affectas jam penèque perfectas, perpoliret, atque ad editionem accuratè præpararet. Mr Crenius (20) has publiſhed the letter, out of which I have taken this paſſage. It was found in a poſthumous work of Conrad Schluſſelburg printed at Roſtoc in the year 1624. He wonders how Mr Sagittarius forgot this particular; and he mentions another which he read in a work of the civilian Francis Baudouin (21): namely, that a French tranſlation of the centuries of Magdeburg was made at Geneva, with the ſame inſincerity, that appeared in the French tranſlation of Luther's commentary upon St Paul's epiſtle to the Galatians (22).

(12) In 1558.

(13) Taken from Andrew Schoppius, pag. 63, & ſeq.

(14) Id. ibid. pag. 56.

(15) He was tutor to the children of Levinus Embdenus a civilian of Magdeburg.

(16) Andr. Schoppius, pag. 56.

(17) Note, that he had a hand in the German tranſlation of the three firſt firſt centuries.

(18) Annis quindecim valetudine afflictiſſima. Andr. Schoppius, pag. 56.

(19) Remark [H], of the article ILLYRICUS.

(20) Crenius, Animadv Part. VI, pag. 72.

(21) Viz. His anſwer to Beza under the name of Michael Fabricius.

(22) Crenius, ubi ſuora, in Addendis, pag. penult.

[C] He had many perſecutions and vexations to go through.] He was one of thoſe that drew up the diſcipline of the church of Magdeburg, which was printed in the year 1554. He ſhewed himſelf very exact in procuring the obſervation of it, and refuſed the ſacrament to ſome impenitent perſons. Hereupon he was threatened to be beaten and trampled under foot (23). He was very much abuſed in the ſatires, that were made at Wittemberg againſt the centuriators. Scurriles Neminiſtæ & Acolaſti Witebergenſes in famoſa illius laboris reprehenſione & acerba invectiva D. Judicem vocabant Judam & pullum filium aſinæ ſubjugalis (24). He ſtrongly oppoſed the Synergiſts, whilſt he was profeſſor of Divinity at Jena. It was a powerful party, and they paſquined him, in an inſolent and ſlanderous manner. They made uſe of ſtones too; for there was a gang of rogues, who all the night long committed riots about his houſe, and threw ſtones at his windows. He was deprived of his employment, after having exerciſed it in the midſt of many troubles eighteen months. The pretence alledged for it was the publication of a German book, De fuga Papatus, Of the Flight of Popery (25); but one of the true cauſes was his oppoſition to the party, which was favoured at court (26). This party was that of Strigelius, a profeſſor, one of the heads of the Synergiſts, or ſticklers for human liberty. They did not fail to give out many reaſons or pretences for the depoſing of Matthew Judex, which were all confuted. He was accuſed, amongſt other things, of having diſperſed ſeveral copies of Balthaſar Winter's life, and he was required to diſcover the author of that ſatire, and to recover all the copies, and deliver them to the court. He anſwered that this work was no libel; that it was only the true narrative of the life and death of a faithful ſervant of God, that it was neceſſary to oppoſe the calumnies which the enemies of that pious man had ſpread, and to communicate it to the widow, and ſome others to comfort them. He did not think himſelf obliged to name the author; but he offered to anſwer to that affair before impartial judges, made up of laymen, and eccleſiaſtics. His adverſaries did not care for ſuch a tribunal (27). Leaving Jena he retired to Magdeburg with his friend Wigandus, and did not long enjoy the permiſſion the ſenate granted him to ſtay there. Some miniſters were arreſted, others were expelled by night from the town. He did not approve that conduct of the magiſtrates, and adviſed theſe afflicted miniſters to patience. He expoſed himſelf by this means to many ſlanders, and a burgher received orders not to let him his houſe. His father-in-law had a ſhare in the outrages, becauſe he had lodged him in his houſe. At laſt the ſenate commanded Matthew Judex to depart immediately from Magdeburg. His wife melting in tears, intreated the firſt burgo-maſter to permit her to ſtay at her fathers with her five children, till the rigour of the winter ſhould be over. She repreſented to them that her eldeſt ſon was but eight years old, and that the youngeſt was but three months, and beſides was ſick. All her intreaties and remonſtrances proved ineffectual; depart they muſt, and retire to Wiſmar thro' the ſnow (28). The Roman Catholics have been well pleaſed with the ill treatment of the centuriators of Magdeburg. I will only alledge the reflexion of a Jeſuit. As for the four firſt authors of the centuries, ſays he (29), their fortune was very different from that of Baronius; for ſoon after they had publiſhed their work, they were baniſhed by the Lutherans themſelves, who could not ſuffer among them ſuch wicked men.

(23) Ipſi verbera & conculcationem fœdiſſimam minati ſunt quod eos ad Baptiſmum & uſum Cœnæ non admiſerat. Andr. Schioppius, ubi ſupra, p. 62.

(24) Id. ibid. pag. 67.

(25) Id. ibid. pag. 63.

(26) The court of the duke of Weimar.

(27) Andr. Schoppius, ubi ſupra, pag. 68.

(28) Id. ibid. pag. 69.

(29) Maimbourg, Hiſt. du Lutheran. Tom. II, pag. 179. Dutch Edit.

JUDITH, A Jewiſh woman, delivered her country invaded by Holofernes. You will find this hiſtory in Moreri, with ſome obſervations upon the perplexity, in which it involves the commentators. Of all the books that the Proteſtants have rejected as apocryphal, there is none that better deſerves that blot than this; for the beſt thing that can be ſaid of it is, that it is a pious romance [A]. It is not many years ſince, a learned Benedictin

[A] It is a pious romance.] Dom. Bernard de Montfaucon (1) obſerves that the Proteſtants, to extricate themſelves out of all difficulties, have ſaid that this book is but a fiction or parable, and that ſome of them have affirmed it to be a tragedy. I think the Proteſtants do not trouble their heads with removing theſe difficulties; for it is their intereſt they ſhould ſubſiſt and multiply in the moſt perplexing manner. By this they

(1) In the preface to the Verité de l'Hiſtoire de Judith, Paris 1690, in 12*mo.* The ſecond edition came out in 1692.

Benedictin wrote a book to ſolve the difficulties that are made againſt this hiſtory [B]. If he has not removed them, he has at leaſt ſupplied us with ſome uſeful illuſtrations. I remember to have ſeen a diſſertation (a), wherein, amongſt other arguments, this is inforced, that a book cannot be ſaid to be canonical, when it authorizes aſſaſſination. This puts me in mind of a thing concerning the aſſaſſin of William I. Prince of Orange [C]. Somebody has obſerved, that is a very ſignificant commendation of Judith to ſay that ſhe was never ill ſpoken of [D].

they ſhew they have reaſon to reject this book, and that the church of Rome take for a canonical book what is not ſo. I believe then that the author in ſaying this, did not attend to the ſyſtem of the Proteſtants; he thought they were no leſs concerned than the Catholics to maintain in that work the glory of the holy Spirit. When it cannot be maintained by reconciling a thing with hiſtorical truths, it is uſual to have recourſe to allegories, parables, the myſtical ſenſe, &c. And this the Proteſtants would do if they believed, this hiſtory to be divinely inſpired; but becauſe they do not believe it, it does not concern them to ſay that it is a parable.

[B] A learned Benedictin wrote a book to ſolve the difficulties that are made againſt that hiſtory.] You will ſee his name, and the title of his book in the foregoing remark. The method he has taken to preſerve to the hiſtory of Judith the rank that is given it in the church of Rome is more inſtructive and edifying, than that which is made uſe of by the Romiſh controverſiſts. The latter generally are contented to retort the objections. They endeavour to ſhew, that the difficulties raiſed by the Proteſtants againſt the apocryphal books, may be alledged againſt the canonical. But Dom Bernard de Montfaucon touches very ſlightly upon this, and makes it his buſineſs to give a direct anſwer. His whole recrimination is contained in theſe words: Are there not many ſtories in the ſacred text, in which we find theſe and even greater difficulties, and yet for all that, no body goes about to deny the truth of them in the literal ſenſe? Is not the hiſtory of Eſther full of confuſion and difficulties, which it is hardly poſſible to get clear of? Did ever any one ſhew clearly and certainly, who is the Abaſuerus mentioned in that book, and in what time that hiſtory ought to be placed? Is it not as difficult to fix the time of the hiſtory of Ruth, and of the ruin of the tribe of Benjamin? And yet no body dares ſay, that they are parabolical or ænigmatical hiſtories (2). I do not know whether he had ſeen Dr Raynold's objections, who, of all the Proteſtant writers, has handled the controverſy of the apocryphal books with the greateſt force.

[C] This puts me in mind of a thing concerning the aſſaſſin of William I, prince of Orange.] I mean that villain Balthazar Gerard, who killed him; for there were other aſſaſſins, who did only wound him. 'Tho' he was a ſtaunch Catholic, he craftily behaved like a Proteſtant. He went to ſermons and evening prayers, he had always Marot's pſalms in his hands, or ſome other Proteſtant book. He read alſo du Bartas's Poetical Week; and it was found that the place moſt worn out, was the ſtory of Judith murdering Holofernes (3).' There is no doubt but this woman's example may perſuade a great many people that it is a holy action, by means of a thouſand lies to get one's ſelf admitted to a prince who oppreſſes liberty and religion, in order to ſtab him as ſoon as an opportunity offers. In a word, this hiſtory being once taken for a canonical one, encourages aſſaſſins to make any attempt upon the life of kings, whom they hate, and furniſhes orators with a crown of glory, to put upon the head of the Clement's and Ravaillac's. Obſerve this paſſage of Maimbourg. 'The Leaguers publiſhed alſo in their books printed at Paris and Lyons, that an angel had declared to James Clement, that the crown of Martyrdom was prepared for him, when he ſhould have delivered France from Henry de Valois; and that having acquainted a learned Monk with his viſion, that Monk approved of it, aſſuring him that in ſtriking this blow, he would be no leſs acceptable to GOD, than Judith was in killing Holofernes. And becauſe his Prior, named Father Edme Bourgoing, was accuſed of being, of all the preachers of the League, the moſt paſſionate panegyriſt of that abominable parricide, directing his diſcourſe to him in the pulpit, and calling him the bleſſed child of his patriarch, and the holy martyr of JESUS CHRIST, and comparing him to Judith; it was not doubted but it was he, with whom this young man, who was under his tuition, had adviſed; and that he had afterwards confirmed him in his execrable deſign (4).'

[D] She was never ill ſpoken of.] The thought I ſpeak of, is to be found in an extract of a panegyric (5). The Abbot de la Chambre making the funeral oration of the late French queen (6), took for his text theſe words of the book of Judith, 'She made herſelf famous, famoſiſſima, in all things, and there was none that gave her an ill word; for ſhe feared GOD greatly. It is perhaps the fineſt commendation that ever was given to a woman: for though notwithſtanding the prodigious detraction that has prevailed ſo long in the world, there are ſome women, that remain untouched by that implacable and inſatiable monſter; yet this good fortune rarely happens to thoſe who have otherwiſe a ſhining reputation, and who are, as the text ſays, famoſiſſimæ: ſo that we may boldly challenge all the Greeks and Romans to ſhew us a paſſage in their books, that in ſo few words gives us ſo great an idea, as that which the book of Judith gives us in the words before-mentioned. The addreſs that Homer made uſe of, to give his reader a great notion of the beauty of Helena (7), is certainly inferior to the plainneſs and ſimplicity of this Jewiſh author; and that which is moſt excellent in his way of praiſing, is, that he has included in his elogy the true cauſe and ſource of the virtue he has deſcribed: ſhe had, ſays he, a great reputation in all things, and was ſecure from every evil tongue, becauſe ſhe was ſenſibly touched with the fear of the LORD. It is upon this happy expreſſion of Judith's panegyriſt, that the Abbot de la Chambre built his funeral oration of the queen.'

Auſonius places it among the ſentences of one of the ſeven wiſe men of Greece, that a chaſte woman frights away calumny:

Quæ dos matronæ pulcherrima? vita pudica.
Quæ caſta eſt? de qua mentiri fama veretur (8).

He ſuppoſes that Bias had two queſtions to anſwer. The firſt was, What is the nobleſt portion of a woman? he anſwered, a chaſte life. The ſecond was, What woman is chaſte? he anſwered, ſhe whom fame dares not ſlander. Theſe rules are ſevere, will ſome ſay; for they condemn all women that have been expoſed to obloquy; and yet it is certain that there are moſt virtuous women, who have not been able to avoid them. It muſt be owned, that this maxim of Bias cannot ſerve as a general rule without exception; but generally it is a ſign of a very wiſe conduct, both as to the inſide and the outſide, to enjoy the reputation of a chaſte woman without any oppoſition or contradiction whatſoever. 'Magnus eſt pudicitiæ fructus pudicam credi; & adverſus omnes illecebras atque omnia delinimenta muliebris ingenii eſt veluti ſolum ac firmamentum in nullam incidiſſe fabulam (9). —— It is of great advantage to chaſtity, to be thought chaſte; and never to have been ſlandered by report, is the bulwark of a female mind againſt all temptations and alurements.' This is what the orator Porcius Latro ſaid, pleading for a huſband, who accuſed his wife of adultery, becauſe a rich foreign Merchant had made her his heir, and gave as the reaſon of it, his not being able to debauch her. The Advocate drew from thence one of his arguments: he maintained, that a woman became juſtly ſuſpected, when once her honour was attempted; for if ſhe was very chaſte, her refuſal might be read in her face, and her outward behaviour would baffle the hopes of a gallant, and diſcourage him from diſcovering his paſſion. She would refuſe him at leaſt with ſo much ſeverity, that he would

---

(a) Intituled, Ficta Juditha, &c. at Verona, in the year 1614, and written by Mirabilis de Bonacaſa, wherein the author ſhews, 1, that the book of Judith is apocryphal; 2. That Judith's action was wicked; and that Roſſæus Mariana, and other enemies of monarchy have no reaſon to take advantage of it. The true name of this Mirabilis de Bonacaſa, was Eberhard de Weihe; he was chancellor to prince Julius duke of Brunſwic. See Placcius, de Pſeudonym. pag. 166.

(2) Pag 283.

(3) Hiſt d'Alexandre Farneſe, Duc de Parme, livr, iii, pag. 205. Printed in 1692.

(4) Maimbourg, Hiſt. de la Ligue, pag. 358.

(5) In the Nouvelles de la Rep. des Lettres, Decemb. 1684, art. viii, pag. 1041.

(6) I write this the twentieth of Auguſt, 1695.

(7) See, above, remark [A], of the article HELENA, citat. (7).

(8) Auſon. in Sept. Sapientum Sententiis ſeptenis verſibus explicatis, pag. m. 228.

(9) Seneca, Controv. vii, lib. ii, pag. m. 187.

never be ſo bold as to make a ſecond attempt. If ſhe is not afraid to be thought capable of the fault, ſhe will not fear to commit it. ‘ Matrona quæ ſe adverſus ſollicitantes aviam volet, prodeat in tantum ornata, ne immunda ſit: habeat comites ejus ætatis, qui impudicos, ſi nihil aliud, verecundia annorum removeant: ferat jacentes in terram oculos: adverſus officioſum ſalutatorem inhumana potius quam inverecunda ſit; etiam in neceſſariam reſalutandi vicem multo rubore confuſa longe ante impudicitiam neget ore, quam verbo: in hac ſervandæ integritatis custodia, nulla libido irrumpet. Prodite mihi fronte in omne lenocinium compoſita, paulo obſcœnius quam poſita veſte nudæ, exquiſito in omnes facetias ſermone, tantum non ultro blandientes, ut quiſquis vicerit, non metuat accedere. Deinde miramini, ſi cum tot argumentis pudicitiam proſcripſerit, cultu, inceſſu, facie, aliquis repertus eſt qui incurreret, & reti adulteræ ſe non ſubduceret. Internuntium, puto ſollicitantis ſe, arripi & denudari juſſit, & flagella & verbera, & omne genus cruciatus popoſcit in plagas deterrimi mancipii: vix imbecillitas muliebris manus continuit. Nemo ſic negantem iterum rogat . . . . . . (10). Quæpoteſt non timere opinionem adulteri, poteſt non timere adulterium (11). —— A matron who would be inacceſſible to ſuitors, ſhould dreſs only ſo far as not to be dirty: ſhe ſhould chuſe for her companions perſons of ſuch an age, that reſpect to their years, if nothing elſe can, may deter the immodeſt: ſhe ſhould keep her eyes generally fixed on the ground: if an officious fellow offers to ſalute her, ſhe ſhould be uncomplaiſant rather than immodeſt; and, if ſhe be obliged to return the ſalute, it ſhould be with much bluſhing and reluctance: modeſty, thus guarded, is not expoſed to the attacks of luſt. Shew me the women, who diſplay all their charms, who behave more obſcenely than if they were to appear naked, full of gaiety and wit, and only not careſſing their admirers, in ſhort, inviting all comers: then wonder, if, when dreſs, behaviour, and countenance, conſpire to baniſh modeſty, ſome one be found to entangle himſelf in the adulterous net. She ordered the go-between, endeavouring to perſuade her, I ſuppoſe, to be ſeized and ſtripped, and demanded rods, and all kinds of torture, for the puniſhment of that villainous ſlave; ſcarce did a woman's weakneſs reſtrain her hands. A woman, who denies in this manner, is never asked again. . . . . She, who can bring herſelf not to fear the opinion of the adulterer, can get over the fear of the adultery.’ Theſe maxims are too rigid and too ſtrained (12), and we ſhall be frequently very unjuſt, if we ſhould direct our judgments by them. But the advantage, happineſs, and glory, of our Judith, raiſe her virtue and good conduct to the higheſt degree. I ſhall occaſionally obſerve, that the morality of ſome Heathens was ſo auſtere, that they would not have a woman to give matter either for praiſe or reproach: that is, they would have her true merit to conſiſt in this, that ſhe ſhould not be talked of, and that no body ſhould ſpeak well or ill of her. Plutarch diſlikes this maxim, as we ſee in the beginning of one of his books: ‘ (13) I am not of Thucydides's opinion . . . . . concerning the virtue of women; becauſe he reckons her the moſt virtuous and the beſt, who is the leaſt ſpoken of, whether well or ill, imagining that the name of a woman of honour ought to be as much confined as her body, and never go abroad. I think Gorgias was more reaſonable, who would have the fame, and not the face of a woman to be publickly known. And, in my opinion, the law or cuſtom of the Romans was very good, which ordered, that women, as well as men, after their death, ſhould be publickly honoured at their funerals with the praiſes they deſerved.’ St Gregory Nazianzen was of Thucydides's opinion. Fear the praiſes of men, ſaid he, ſpeaking to a woman; this fear is the ornament of your ſex.

Ἄλλησιν τὰ περισσά, σὺ δ' ἅζεο χείλεσιν ἀνδρῶν,
Καὶ κληιζομένη, τῦτο γυναιξὶ κλέος.

Linque aliis vana: ac labiis vereare virorum
Commendari etiam, hoc fœmineum decus eſt (14).

Be others vain: ſhun thou the praiſe of men;
It is the ſex's nobleſt ornament.

To which may be added theſe words of Syneſius (15). Μίαν ἀρετὴν Ὄσιρις ᾤετο γυναικὸς εἶναι, τὸ μήτε τὸ σῶμα αὐτῆς, μήτε τὔνομα διαβῆναι τὴν αὔλιον. Unam virtutem Oſiris muliebrem eſſe cenſebat, ut neque corpus, neque nomen mulieris è veſtibulo exiret. —— Oſiris thought it a woman's chief virtue to keep both her perſon and her name within doors. What Syneſius aſcribes to Oſiris, is at the bottom the ſame thing that Plutarch aſcribes to Thucydides. Some have given it out as the opinion of Pericles. See theſe words of John della Caſa. ‘ Cujus quidem mulieris (Victoriæ Farneſiæ) modeſtia ac pudor ingenuus illud profecto præſtitiſſet, quod Periclem ajunt dixiſſe, primam in muliere laudem eſſe, ut ne de virtute quidem illius ulla ad viros fame emanet: ſed nulla ratione occultari tanta primariæ fœminæ virtus poteſt, quin ad viros quoque emergat, ac ſuo ipſa ſplendore ſe prodat (16). —— The modeſty of which lady (Victoria Farneſe) was as great as that which Pericles ſpoke of, when he ſaid, a woman's chief praiſe ought to be, that the men have never heard of her virtue: but the ſo great virtue of a lady of quality can never be ſo concealed, but it will be known to the men, and diſcover itſelf by it's own luſtre.’ But though an hundred perſons, as illuſtrious as theſe three (17), had vouched this maxim, we ſhould not be obliged to approve of it. This would be condemning women to a more rigid life than that of the Carthuſians; it would be impoſing on them the incloſure and ſilence of thoſe Monks, and forbidding them to receive any viſit in their cells. Now this is more than is impoſed upon the Carthuſians.

I conclude with this obſervation. The reputation of Judith, that reputation, I ſay, clean and free from ſuſpicion, and ſecure againſt evil fame, is an admirable proof of virtue and prudence. But it muſt not be from thence concluded, that every woman who has not that good fortune, and is ill ſpoken of, is guilty of imprudence at leaſt. It may be true that a woman has a regular conduct, and yet becauſe ſhe has for ſome good reaſons put off her waiting-woman, her chamber-maid, &c. ſcandalous ſtories ſhall be quickly forged. The diſgraced creature being malicious and revengeful, will apply to her miſtreſs's enemies, and give them myſterious inſinuations, as the ſpirit of ſlander ſhall ſuggeſt. Theſe lies ſhall be heightened, whiſpered about, flouriſhed and enlarged on; nay they ſhall be printed; and thus a perſon really innocent, ſhall not have the reputation of being ſo; ſo true it is, as I have ſaid in another place (18), that the appearance is ſometimes more difficult to obtain, than the reality. This depends upon our ſelves, the other depends on many cauſes that are not in our power. The Poet Plautus repreſents this thought very naturally in a ſcene, wherein he introduces two old men, Callicles and Megaronides talking thus:

ME. Quia omnes bonos, bonaſque accurare addecet,
Suſpicionem, & culpam, ut ab ſe ſegregent.
CA. Non poteſt utrumque fieri. ME. Quapropter? CA. Rogas?
Ne admittam culpam, ego meo ſum promus pectori:
Suſpicio eſt in pectore alieno ſita.
Nam nunc ego ſi te ſurripuiſſe ſuſpicer,
Jovi coronam de capite, è Capitolio,
Quod in culmine aſtat ſummo: ſi id non feceris,
Atque id tamen mihi lubeat ſuſpicarier:
Quî tu id prohibere me potes ne ſuſpicer (19)?
. . . .
CA. Exſpecto, ſi quid dicas. ME. Primum dum omnium,
Malè dictitatur tibi volgo in ſermonibus:
Turpilucricupidum te vocant cives tui.
Tum autem ſunt alii, qui te volturium vocant:
Hoſteſn' an cives comedis, parvi pendere,
Hæc cùm audio in te dicier, excrucior miſer.
CA. Eſt, atque non eſt, mihi in manu; Megaronides.
Qui dicant, non eſt: meritò ut ne dicant; id eſt (20).

ME. Becauſe it behoves all good men and women to remove from themſelves all ſuſpicion, and guilt.
CA. They cannot do both.
ME. Why?
CA. Do ye ask? it is in my own power not to entertain guilt: the ſuſpicion of it lies in another's breaſt.

---

(10) Seneca, ibid. pag. 186.

(11) Id. ibid. pag. 187.

(12) See, above, remark [O], of the article BLONDEL (DAVID).

(13) Plutarch. de Mulier. Virtut. pag. 242.

(14) Gregor. Nazianz. περὶ καλλωπιζομένων γυναίκων.

(15) Syneſius, Orat. I, de Providentia.

(16) Joh. Caſa, in Vita Petri Bembi, pag. 143.

(17) Oſiris, Thucydides, Pericles.

(18) Above, at the end of remark [H], of the article AMPHIARAUS.

(19) Plautus, in Trinummo, Act. I, Sc. II, ver. 41, pag. m. 732.

(20) Id. ibid. ver. 61, pag. 733.

breaſt. For, ſuppoſe now, I ſhould ſuſpect you of having ſtolen a crown, from Jupiter's head, out of the capitol; though you are innocent, if I have a mind to ſuſpect you, how will you hinder it? . . . . I wait your anſwer.

ME. In the firſt place, you are ill ſpoken of by the people: your fellow-citizens call you a ſordid, covetous, fellow; others think you rapacious. Whether you plunder friends or foes, ſignifies little: when I hear theſe things ſaid of you, it grieves me exceedingly.

CA. It is, and it is not, in my power, Megaronides: what they ſay, is not in my power; but that they ſay it without foundation, is in my power.

This concluſion is excellent: it does not depend upon me, anſwered Megaronides, to prevent being ill ſpoken of; it is only in my power, that it be not done deſervedly. Note, that there are an hundred accidents that may give birth to the ſame conſequences, as the malice of a ſervant turned out.

JULIA, wife of Septimius Severus, emperor of Rome, and daughter of Baſſianus, prieſt of the Sun [A], was born in Syria. The Aſtrologers had foretold that ſhe ſhould marry a king [B]; for which reaſon Severus, before he came to the empire, courted, and married her. He paid great deference to Aſtrology; and therefore believed that ſuch a marriage would be his ſecurity for aſcending, ſome time or other, to the throne. She was a woman of great parts, and capable of great things (a). Some ſay, that her huſband gave her a great ſhare in the government [C], though he was not very fond of her. She cultivated Philoſophy [D], and ſpent much time in hearing the diſcourſes of [A] She was daughter of Baſſianus prieſt of the Sun.] This may be inferred from theſe words of Aurelius Victor (1). 'Caracalla Severi filius . . . . Baſſianus 'ex avi materni nomine dictus . . . . Hujus (Heliogabali) matris Semeæ avus Buſſianus nomine, fuerat ſolis ſacerdos, quem Phœnices unde erat, Heliogabalum nominabant (2). ——— Caracalla, the 'ſon of Severus . . . . called Baſſianus after his grandfather by the mother's ſide . . . . Baſſianus, grandfather of Semea, mother of Heliogabalus, was prieſt 'of the Sun, whom the Phœnicians, whence he ſprung, 'named Heliogabalus.' Semea (3) was the daughter of Mæſa: now Mæſa was ſiſter to Julia (4); therefore Baſſianus, the prieſt of the Sun, muſt be Julia's father. We cannot poſitively affirm whether Emeſa or Apamea was Julia's native country: for, according to ſome authors (5), her ſiſter Mæſa was of Emeſa: but according to others (6), ſhe was of Apamea. Lampridius (7) calls Julia nobilem Orientis mulierem; — A noble woman of the eaſt; but Dion (8) makes her a Plebeian, ἐκ δεμοτικοῦ γένους, è genere plebio.

[B] The Aſtrologers had foretold that ſhe ſhould marry a king.] Let us ſet down the words of Spartianus, that the readers may know what enquiries Severus chiefly made, when he reſolved to marry again he did not inform himſelf about the merit of the perſon, but the promiſes of her nativity. 'Quum amiſſa uxore aliam 'vellet ducere, genituras ſponſarum requirebat, ipſe 'quoque matheſeos peritiſſimus: & quum audiſſet eſſe in Syria quandam quæ id genituræ haberet ut regi jungeretur, eandem uxorem petiit, Juliam ſcilicet, & accepit interventu amicorum: ex qua ſtatim 'pater factus eſt (9). ——Being deſirous, after the 'death of his wife, to marry another, and being himſelf a skillful Mathematician, he enquired into the 'nativities of thoſe he would have married; and hearing, that there was in Syria a woman, who was 'fated to marry a king, he ſought her in marriage: 'her name was Julia; whom his friends procured for 'him, and who ſoon made him a father.'

[C] Some ſay that her husband gave her a great ſhare in the government.] 'She had in charge his 'memorials, letters, and petitions, of whatever conſequence they were, ſays Dion in the life of Caracalla. Which ſhews her great capacity: for ſhe gave 'her advice upon all important affairs: and yet he 'neither loved her much, nor ſhe him, as we ſee in 'Dion and Herodian, tho' ſhe commonly received 'this honour from him, to be named in his letters with 'praiſe and commendation, and even when he wrote 'to the ſenate, inſerting her name with his own and 'that of his armies, according to the ſtile of that 'time. And indeed ſhe kept her rank very well, 'paying no more deference, nor ſaluting with more 'reſpect the greateſt perſons of the empire than Severus or Caracalla did. However Caracalla coming 'to the empire, leſſened her authority, no ways 'yielding to her counſels, eſpecially when the fancy 'took him to put any perſon to death. But as to Severus, her husbannd, he was very much ſwayed by 'her advice and good ſenſe (10).' This is what Triſtan ſays: but it is certain that he is miſtaken, taking the father for the ſon. For what he relates, has no reſpect to Julia under the reign of her husband, but ought only to be underſtood of her, in the reign of Caracalla. There is no difficulty in the thing, if we conſider the words of Xiphilin (11). Οὐδὲ ἐπείθετο οὔτε περὶ τούτων οὔτε περὶ τῶν ἄλλων τῇ μητρὶ πολλὰ καὶ χρηστὰ παραινούσῃ. καίτοι καὶ τὴν τῶν βιβλίων τῶν τε ἐπιστολῶν ἑκατέρων, πλὴν τῶν πάνυ ἀναγκαίων, διοίκησιν αὐτῃ ἐπιτρέψας. καὶ τὸ ὄνομα αὐτῆς ἐν ταῖς πρὸς τὴν βουλὴν ἐπιστολαῖς ὁμοίως τῷ τε ἰδίῳ καὶ τῷ τῶν στρατευματῶν, ὅτι σώζηται, μετ᾽ ἐπαίνων πολλῶν ἐγγράφων. Τί γὰρ δεῖ λέγειν, ὅτι καὶ ἠσπάζετο δημοσίᾳ πάντας τοὺς πρώτους, καθάπερ καὶ ἐκεῖνος. Qua in re cæteriſque omnibus minimè obtemperabat matri juſta & utilia monenti, licet ei curam libellorum atque epiſtolarum utriuſque generis, præter admodum neceſſarias (12), commiſſet ejuſque nomen pariter cum ſuo & exercitus nomine poneret cum maximis laudibus in epiſtolis quas mittebat ad ſenatum, dum omnes valere ſcriberet: nec opus eſt referre ab hac omnes primarios viros ſalutari non ſecus quam ab illo conſueviſſe. ——— In which thing, and in all others, he paid no regard to the prudent advice of his mother, tho' he entruſted her with the petitions and letters of both ſorts, except thoſe of the greateſt importance, and joined her name, giving her great praiſes, to his own, and the army's, in the letters he wrote to the ſenate, informing them that all were well: nor need I relate, that ſhe received the compliments of the great men, in the ſame manner as himſelf. I obſerve that it was at her requeſt that her husband undertook the war againſt Peſcennius Niger, and Clodius Albinus (13).

[D] She cultivated Philoſophy.] Immediately after the words juſt read, Xiphilin affirms that Julia philoſophized notwithſtanding ſo much buſineſs. Ἀλλ᾽ ἡ μὲν καὶ μετὰ τούτων ἔτι μᾶλλον ἐφιλοσόφει. Sed ea nihilo minus philoſophabatur. He had ſaid in another place (14), that being perſecuted by Plautianus, who had a prodigious intereſt, ſhe began to cultivate Philoſophy, and to ſpend whole days with the Sophiſts: Καὶ ἡ μὲν αὐτή τε φιλοσιφεῖν διὰ ταῦτ᾽ ἤρξατο, καὶ σοφισταῖς συνημέρευσεν; Quæ dum ob eam cauſam philoſopharetur, & tempus cum Sophiſtis tranſigeret. Philoſtratus called her a Philoſopher: Ἀντωνῖνος, ſays he (15) ſpeaking of Caracalla, ἦν ὁ τῆς φιλοσόφου παῖς Ἰουλίας. Antoninus vero filius erat Juliæ Philoſophæ. Thus it ought to be read, according to the lucky conjecture of the learned Salmaſius (16). He has corrected another paſſage of Phlloſtratus, wherein we learn that the Sophiſt Philiſcus obtained a profeſſorſhip at Athens, by Julia's intereſt. It was ſhe that ordered Philoſtratus to write the life of Apollonius. Philoſtratus ſays ſo himſelf (17), and obſerves at the ſame time that this lady was a great lover of Rhetoric. Tzetzes mentions the ſociety of learned men that were about Julia. See the margin (18).

Mr Le Moyne has made two remarks, which deſerve to be mentioned. I. He wonders, that Scaliger, who made ſuch bold conjectures, durſt venture none concerning Antoninus, Julia's ſon, ſpoken of by Philoſtratus. II. He has confirmed by the words of Tzetzes Salmaſius's correction, which yet he ſeems never (a) See the remark [I], at the end.

(1) Aurel. Victor, in Epitome, pag. m. 211.

(2) Id. ibid. pag. 212.

(3) Or rather Soæmis, according to Herodian, lib. v, cap. iii.

(4) Herodian. ibid.

(5) Herodian. ibid. Julius Capitolinus, in Macrino, cap. ix, pag. m. 759.

(6) Dio, lib. lxxviii, pag. 902.

(7) Lampridius, in Alexandro Severo, cap. v, pag. 890.

(8) Dio, lib. lxxviii, pag. 899. Edit. 1606.

(9) Spartian. in Septim. Severo, cap iii, pag. m. 594, Tom. I. See alſo Lampridius, ubi ſupra.

(10) Triſtan, Comment. Hiſt. Tom. II, pag. 110.

(11) Xiphilin. in Epitome Dionis, in Caracalla, pag. m. 353.

(12) Triſtan ſhould not therefore ſay that ſhe was intruſted with the petitions though they were never ſo important. He ſhould have made this exception, as Mr de Tillemont does, Hiſt. des Empereurs, Tom. III. pag. m. 189, unleſs it was about a very important thing.

(13) Capitolinus, in Clodio Albino, cap. iii, pag. 689.

(14) In Sept. Severo, pag. 330.

(15) Philoſtratus, in Vitis Sophiſtarum, in Philiſco.

(16) Salmaſ. ad Spartian. in Vita Severi, cap. xviii, pag. m. 625.

(17) Philoſtrat. in Vita Apollin. lib. i, cap. iii.

(18) Εἷς τοῦ χοροῦ Ῥητόρων τε καὶ Γραμματευόντων τῇ Ἰουλίᾳ τῇ κραταιᾷ τελούσῃ Βασιλίδι. Unus illorum Rhetorum & Grammaticorum, qui Juliæ Imperatrici frequentes adeſſe ſolebant. Tzetzes, Chil. VI, Hiſt. XLV.

of the wits that made their court to her. It is pity it cannot be ſaid, for the honour and advantage of learning, that her virtue equalled her capacity; for the hiſtorians witneſs that her adulteries were a blot upon her huſband Severus [E]. Some authors ſay, that after the death of Severus ſhe contracted an inceſtuous marriage, by marrying Caracalla, her huſband's ſon [F]: but it is a miſtake [G]. She was no leſs the true mother of never to have heard of. This is what he ſays as to Scaliger: Sic Philoſtratus in vitis Sophiſtarum, in Philiſco, ‘Ἀντωνεῖνος δὲ ἦν ὁ τȣ̃ φιλοσόφȣ παῖς Ἰȣλίας. Antoninus erat Filius Philoſophi Juliæ. Ad quæ verba hærens & attonitus Scaliger, Antonino Philoſopho alius filius quam Commodus, alia uxor præter Fauſtinam? Niſi legamus ὁ τȣ̃ Σεβήρȣ παῖς καὶ Ἰȣλίας. Hoc etiam tenuit ancipitem Tzetzem, nec mihi minorum movit admirationem. Quæ nos proponimus Chronologis eruditis, & Antiquitatis inveſtigatoribus, ut quærant, & nos doceant, quæ ingenue nos neſcire profitemur. Sed mirum hic retuſum Scaligeri acumen, & moratam iſtam felicem audaciam, quæ loca, hoc multo difficiliora, tam ſtrenue & alacriter ſuperaverat (19). As for the paſſage of Tzetzes, he makes uſe of it to ſhew that Philoſtratus did not ſay τȣ̃ φιλοσόφȣ; for if Tzetzes had read this in Philoſtratus, he would not have ſaid this author does not ſhew who the empreſs Julia was married to. Σύζυγος δ' αὐτὴ ȣ̓ φησὶ τινος ἦν βασίλεως. Non dicit vero cujus Imperatoris illa fuerit conjux (20). He might eaſily have underſtood that this Julia's huſband was either Marcus Aurelius, ſirnamed the Philoſopher, or Septimius Severus who was very much given to Philoſophical ſtudies, in imitation of Marcus Aurelius (21). Philoſophiæ, declamandi, cunctis poſtremo liberalium deditus ſtudiis (22). Philoſophiæ ac dicendi ſtudiis ſatis deditus; doctrinæ quoque nimis avidus (23). For the reſt, Mr le Moyne commonly gives to our Julia the ſirname Severa, according to ſome inſcriptions (24).

[E] Her adulteries were a blot upon her huſband.] Severus had acquired a great reputation both by his military and political actions; but he blaſted it by indulging his wife's debaucheries. Nay, it was ſaid, that he was not ignorant, that ſhe was engaged in a conſpiracy that was formed againſt him. Huic tanto domi foriſque uxoris probra ſummam gloriæ dempſere: quam adeo famoſe amplexus eſt, ut cognita libidine ac ream conjurationis retentarit (25). This is what Aurelius Victor affirms: and Spartianus ſays no leſs (26). Triſtan (27) does not think it probable, that ſhe ever conſpired againſt her husband: his reaſon is, that ſhe had too much ſenſe, not to know, that ſuch an attempt muſt muſt have been fatal, both to her ſelf and her two ſons. But it may be anſwered: I. that we frequently act againſt our true intereſts, when we have a mind to ſatiſfy a violent paſſion; as ſuppoſe the deſire of revenging an affront offered to Julia by her husband, or the deſire of delivering herſelf from an intolerable oppreſſion. II. That Julia might have ſo managed things, that the murderers of Severus would have given the empire to her ſon. This is not without precedent. Be it how it will, it cannot be denied, but ſhe found herſelf oppreſſed. Severus had ſo extravagant a kindneſs for Plautianus, that his intereſt was viſibly greater than his maſter's (28). Now Plautianus inveighed violently againſt Julia: he ceaſed not to blacken her to Severus; he cauſed informations to be made againſt her, and ſought for witneſſes to prove her guilty. He ſought for them, I ſay, by putting many women of quality to the rack. Ὥστε καί τὴν Ἰȣλίαν τὴν Αὐγȣ́σαν πρὸς τὸν Σεβῆρον ἀεὶ διέβαλλεν, ἐξετάσεις τε κατ' αὐτῆς, καὶ βασάνȣς κατ' εὐγενῶν γυναικῶν ποιȣ́μενος (29). Ut etiam apud eum Juliam Auguſtam ſemper calumniatus ſit, & in eam ac de matronis nobilibus tormentis quæſiverit (30). The hiſtorian who informs me of this, does not ſay that the empreſs ſought her deliverance by any conſpiracy againſt her husband; but only that this was the reaſon of her ſtudying Philoſophy. She cannot but be praiſed for taking that method of conſolation. The miſery of it is, that whilſt the favourite too inſolently abuſed his power, ſhe afforded him perhaps too many reaſons to accuſe her of adultery. I ſhall ſet down the anſwer that was made to her in Great Britain. She had followed her husband thither (31), and obſerving that the women of that iſland communicated their favours to ſeveral men without any ſhame, ſhe very ſharply bantered Argentocoxus's wife, who thus anſwered her: We better ſatisfy the cravings of nature than your Roman ladies; for we publickly beſtow our favours on the worthieſt men, whereas you ſecretly commit adultery with the baſeſt fellows. Μάλα ἀσείως Ἀργεντοκόξȣ τινὸς γυνὴ Καληδονίȣ πρὸς τὴν Ἰȣλίαν τὴν Αὐγȣ́σαν ἀποσκώπτȣσάν τι πρὸς αὐτὴν μετὰ τὰς σπονδὰς ἐπὶ τῇ ἀνέδην σφῶν πρὸς τȣ̀ς ἄῤῥενας συνȣσία, εἰπεῖν λέγεται, ὅτι πολλῷ ἄμεινον ἡμεῖς τὰ τῆς φύσεως ἀναγκαῖα ἀποπληρȣ̃μεν ὑμῶν τῶν Ῥωμαϊκῶν· ἡμεῖς γὰρ φανερῶς τοῖς ἀρίσοις ὁμιλȣ̃μεν, ὑμεῖς δὲ λάθρα ὑπὸ τῶν κακίσων μοιχεύεσθε. Urbane imprimis Argentocoxi Caledonii uxor, Juliæ Auguſtæ quæ ipſam mordebat, initis fœderibus, quòd ipſæ impudenter cum maribus verſarentur, dixiſſe fertur, Nos (inquit) multo melius explemus ea quæ naturæ poſtulat neceſſitas, quàm vos Romanæ. Nam apertè cum optimis viris habemus conſuetudinem: vos autem occultè peſſimi homines conſtuprant (32). If any one ask to what purpoſe the hiſtorian makes mention of this anſwer, I ſay it was on occaſion of a law the emperor had made againſt adultery; the execution whereof he was forced to neglect, becauſe the multitude of the accuſed (33) made the courts unwilling to meddle any longer with theſe trials. It muſt be confeſſed that this barbarous woman archly anſwered the empreſs's railleries: But let us have a care not to believe that the impudence of theſe Iſlanders was leſs blameable than the ſecret adulteries of Rome. They who commit an ill action in ſecret, retain the ideas of virtue, and pay ſome homage to them. But they who ſin without ſhame, have no regard to juſtice, either in the theory or practice (34).

Brantome mentions a circumſtance which I have not read in the antient hiſtorians. It contains the reaſon why Severus ſo patiently bore with his wife's leudneſs. Theſe are his words (35). ‘The emperor Severus was not much concerned for the honour of his wife, who was a public whore, and did not care to reform her, ſaying that her name was Julia, and that therefore ſhe ought to be excuſed, for as much as all the women that bore that name from all antiquity, uſed to be great whores, and to make their husbands cuckolds; as I know many ladies, bearing certain Chriſtian names (36), which I will not mention out of reſpect to our holy religion, who are commonly more ſubject to be whores than other women of other names, and few have been ſeen that were free from it.’

[F] Some hiſtorians ſay . . . . . that ſhe married Caracalla.] This error is not a ſtory of a late invention, but is found in Spartianus, and Aurelius Victor. See how Brantome relates it. ‘We further read of Julia, the ſtep-mother of the emperor Caracalla, that being one day, as it were, by careleſſneſs, half naked, and Caracalla ſeeing her, ſaid only theſe words; how gladly I would, if I might. She ſuddenly anſwered, you may if you pleaſe; do not you know that you are emperor, and that you are to give laws, and not receive them? Upon this fine ſaying, he married her, and lay with her (37). She muſt needs have been a great whore, ſince ſhe loved and married him, who ſome time before had killed her own ſon in her arms. She was doubtleſs a great whore, and had very mean thoughts, but it is a great matter to be an empreſs, and for ſuch an honour all is forgotten. This Julia was very much beloved by her husband, though ſhe was far advanced in years; but ſhe had loſt nothing of her beauty; for ſhe was very handſome, and very courteous, as it appears from her words, which highly encreaſed her grandeur (38).’ That the reader may ſee whether this ſtory has been flouriſhed, I will ſet down the words of the Latin authors who have mentioned this paſſage. Intereſt ſcire, ſays Spartianus (39), quemadmodum novercam ſuam Juliam uxorem duxiſſe dicatur. Quæ quum eſſet pulcherrima, & quaſi per negligentiam ſe maxima corporis parte nudaſſet, dixiſſetque Antoninus, Vellem, ſi liceret: reſpondiſſe fertur, Si libet, licet. An neſcis te imperatorem eſſe, & leges dare, non accipere? Quo audito, (19) Stephanus le Moyne, in Prolegomenis Variorum Sacrorum, fol. * 25.

(20) Tzetzes, ubi ſupra.

(21) Amore Marci quem fuiſſe vel fratrem ſuum dicebat, & cujus Philoſophiam literarumque inſtitutionem ſemper imitatus eſt. Spartian. in Geta, cap. ii.

(22) Aurelius Victor, in Cæſar.

(23) Spartian. in Severo, cap. xviii, pag. 625, 626.

(24) See Triſtan, Comment. Hiſt. Tom. II, pag. 121.

(25) Aurel. Victor, in Cæſaribus. Triſtan, pag. 110, has not well tranſlated this paſſage, he thought it ſignified that the debaucheries of Julia very much tarniſhed the glory of Severus at home and abroad.

(26) Domi tamen minus cautus, qui uxorem Juliam famoſam adulteriis tenuit, etiam conjurationis conſciam. Spartian. in Severo, pag. 626, 627.

(27) Comment. Hiſt. Tom. II, pag. 100.

(28) Xiphilin. in Severo, pag. m. 329, 330.

(29) Id. ibid. pag. 330.

(30) Caſeneuve, in his Remarks on the Letters of Philoſtratus, pag. 19, gives this in French from Suidas; but he commits a very great error.

(31) In the year 208.

(32) Xiphilin, in Severo, pag. 343.

(33) Three thouſand people had been indicted for adultery.

(34) See the article JONAS (ARNGRIMUS), remark [B].

(35) Brantome, Dames Galantes, Tom. I, pag 33.

(36) Theſe two verſes of Rutilius Numatianus, may be applied to this ſubject.

Nominibus certos credam decurrere mores,
Moribus an potius nomina certa dari?

(37) Brantome, Dames Galantes, Tom. II, pag. 205.

(38) Id. ibid. pag 206.

(39) Spartian. in Caracalla, cap. x, pag. m. 730.

of Caracalla, than of Geta. She had the misfortune not to be able to keep peace betwixt her two ſons (b). Her induſtry, as great as it was, proved deficient in that reſpect. Geta was killed by Caracalla, in the arms of his mother Julia, who was wounded, and durſt audito, furor inconditus ad effectum criminis roboratus eſt: nuptiaſque eas celebravit quas ſi ſciret ſe leges dare, vere ſolus probibere debuiſſet Matrem enim (non alio dicenda erat nomine) duxit uxorem, ad parricidium junxit inceſtum: ſiquidem eam matrimonio ſociavit cujus filium nuper occiderat. Aurelius Victor repreſents more clearly the artifice ſhe made uſe of. She was not ſo unpolitic, as to undreſs herſelf openly before Caracalla; ſuch an impudence might have diſguſted the young man; ſhe ordered it ſo, that it might paſs for a ſurprize; ſhe pretended not to know that Caracalla could ſee her in that poſture; ſhe pretended to be ignorant of his being where ſhe was undreſt. Pari fortuna, & eodem matrimonio, quo pater; namque Juliam novercam .... forma captus, conjugem affectavit: cum illa factioſior, aſpectui adoleſcentis, præſentiæ quaſi ignara, ſemet dediſſet, intecto corpore, aſſerentique, Vellem ſi liceret, uti: petulantius multo (quippe quæ pudorem velamento exuerat) reſpondiſſet; Libet? plane licet (40). I do not know where Vigenere found what he ſays, as to the circumſtance of the place. The empreſs Julia, ſays he (41), was doubtleſs Severus's wife; for Antoninus Caracalla married her afterward, though ſhe was his ſtep-mother; and this inceſt came from his ſeeing her one day naked in the hot bath, through a private window, where he ſhewed himſelf; and ſhe asking him what he thought of it, he anſwered, I like you ſo well, that I ſhould be glad to have you, if it could be done lawfully. Are you, replied ſhe immediately, ſo ignorant as not to know, that every thing is lawful to you, who are the lord of the whole earth? And hereupon they proceeded to their tranſgreſſion.

[G] ... but it is a miſtake.] It has been ſo clearly made out, that Moreri is inexcuſable, for having told this ſtory as a certainty. If he had read Triſtan's Commentaries, he would have ſeen ſufficient proofs of it's falſity; though it muſt be granted, that all the arguments of this author are not demonſtrative.

His firſt proof (42) is taken from the ſilence of the Greek authors, who have exactly deſcribed Caracalla's actions, without the leaſt flattery. Dion Caſſius lived at that time, and had great employments: he could not then be ignorant, whether Caracalla had or had not married Julia; and if he had known of ſuch a marriage, he would certainly have ſpoke of it, the better to defame this emperor, whom he does not appear to have deſired to ſpare in any thing. Since then he does not mention it, it is a certain argument of the falſity of this marriage. Herodian's ſilence confirms the ſame thing; Herodian I ſay, who relates many particular and diſgraceful things, and who lived much nearer that time, than they who vouch this pretended marriage.

The ſecond proof is drawn from our Julia's age. Triſtan ſuppoſes (43), that at the time when they ſay her beauty made Caracalla deſire to marry her, ſhe was at leaſt forty five years old; for ſhe muſt have been ſeventeen or fifteen (44) when ſhe married Severus: and as ſhe had Caracalla the firſt year of her marriage, and Caracalla was twenty ſeven years old when it is ſuppoſed he ſaw her naked, it follows, that ſhe was forty four or forty five years old. This author is in the right to ſuppoſe, that Julia was not the ſtep mother, but the true mother of Caracalla; no good objection can be made againſt this. Thoſe that might be made to leſſen the age of Julia, and againſt the conſequences that Triſtan draws from her being forty five years old, would be more conſiderable. Nothing hinders, will ſome ſay, but that Julia might be but fifteen years old, when ſhe married Severus, and it is probable that Caracalla married her the year after his killing Geta (45). Now Caracalla reigned ſix years after the death of his brother (46), and lived but twenty nine years in all (47); he might therefore marry Julia, when he was but twenty four years old, which being added to the ſixteen of his mother, when he was born, make but forty. Triſtan (48) will have forty four or forty five years ‘not to be an age, in which there could be ſo ‘much luſtre, vigour, and beauty, as to move him ‘ſo powerfully to love her, that he was obliged to ‘marry her, in order to ſatisfy his paſſion.’ One might inſtance ſome women, who at ſuch an age, and even older, have made princes paſſionately in love with them; but he might anſwer, that thoſe women made not their conqueſts all at once, by appearing naked. The charms of converſation, the artifices of love, and a thouſand pretty ways were their ſtrongeſt arms to conquer; and then I know not what addreſs of body and mind, enabled them to keep their conqueſts. The bare ſhewing of a body, that has undergone the influences of above forty years, is not a good expedient: it is not appearing with the beſt ſide; and therefore there is no probability, that ſo cunning a woman as Julia ſhould have taken this method to gain the love of Caracalla, or that if ſhe did, ſhe found her account in it. I go no farther: I believe this may be replied to; the reaſons that may be alledged upon ſuch a ſubject, being not of ſuch a nature as to leave no room for doubting.

Let us ſee the third proof. Dion (49) obſerves, that when Julia ‘knew of the death of her ſon, ſhe ſtruck ‘her breaſt (50) to cauſe her own death, by reviving ‘and irritating a cancer, which ſhe had for a long ‘time, and that it contributed very much to her ‘death afterwards; which ſhews how ridiculous they ‘are, who have forged this ſtory, that Julia ſhewed ‘herſelf naked to Caracalla, and that her nakedneſs ‘made him deſperately in love with her. For is it ‘likely, that this woman would have ſhewn herſelf ‘naked, being thus ulcerated, and that Caracalla, a ‘young prince, monarch of the world, who had the ‘choice of all that was fine and beautiful in ſo vaſt ‘an empire, could have been caught by this object, ‘as they repreſent it?’ There being nothing too difficult for a Sophiſt, ſome caviller might be found, who would tell Triſtan, that Julia did not ſhew her whole body (51). Spartianus ſays, that ſhe only ſhewed the better half of it. We may then ſuppoſe, that the part ſhe concealed was her breaſt, and ſo her cancer did not appear. Mr Chevreau could not make this objection; for he ſays that Julia appeared before Caracalla, in a careleſs manner, and with a naked breaſt (52). It would be to no purpoſe to examine, whether it is probable that a woman, who would ſhew herſelf naked, except ſome part, would make choice of her breaſt before all others to hide it. This, I ſay, would be to no purpoſe, ſince by ſuppoſing the cancer, there were particular reaſons that neceſſarily obliged Julia not to ſhew her breaſt. I therefore proceed to a third obſervation, which enervates the third proof of Triſtan: I ſay, that the cancer came upon her after her marriage with Caracalla. If it came a year after the marriage, ſhe might have had it four years when Caracalla was killed, and ſo Dion might ſay, that ſhe had it for a long time (53).

The fourth proof of Triſtan is this: Dion, who perfectly knew Caracalla, obſerves, that he had been extremely enervated for a long time, and very unfit for that ſort of exerciſe; having brought himſelf to that paſs by his debaucheries, ὕστερον γὰρ ἐξησθένησαν (54) αὐτῷ πᾶσα ἡ περὶ τὰ ἀφροδίσια ἰσχύς; for, ſays he, the natural vigour, neceſſary for the ſervice of the ladies, was extinct in him the laſt years of his life (55). It is not true that Dion obſerves, that Caracalla was enervated in that reſpect for a long time, and ſo the fourth proof lies open to the ſame inconvenience as the foregoing; for it may be anſwered, that this emperor exhauſted his ſtrength by his debaucheries, after his marrying Julia. Perhaps the reader will not be diſpleaſed to know, to what purpoſe Dion makes this remark. He had been ſaying, that Caracalla put four veſtals to death, and that he enjoyed one of them as much as his ſtrength would permit. The hiſtorian ſays afterwards what Triſtan has quoted, and adds, that this veſtal cried out, when ſhe was led to the place of execution, The Emperor himſelf knows very well, that I have preſerved my virginity. Τέσσαρας δὲ τῶν ἀεὶ παρθένων ἀπέκτεινεν, ὧν μίαν βίᾳ, ὅσα γε καὶ ἠδύνατο, ἠσχύνκει· ὕστερον γὰρ ἐξησθένησεν αὐτῷ πᾶσα ἡ περὶ τὰ ἀφροδίσια ἰσχύς. ἀφ' ὗπερ καὶ ἑτερόν τινα τρόπον αἰσχρουργεῖν ἐλέγετο. ἡ δὲ δὴ χόρη αὐτη περὶ ἧς λέγω, Κλωδία Λαί-

(b) Herodian. lib. iv, cap. iii.

(40) Aurel. Victor, in Cæſaribus, pag. m. 144. See alſo Eutropius, lib. viii. and Oroſius, lib vii, cap xviii, who mention that inceſt.

(41) Vigenere, preface to Philoſtratus's pictures.

(42) Triſtan. Comment. Hiſt. Tom II, pag. 113, & ſeq.

(43) Ibid. pag. 114.

(44) It is likely an error of the preſs for 18.

(45) He cauſed his wife, daughter of Plautianus, to be put to death, after he had got himſelf rid of Geta. Herodian, lib. iv, cap. vi.

(46) Herodian lib. iv, cap xiii, in fin.

(47) Triſtan. ubi ſupra, pag. 119. 148.

(48) Ibid. pag. 114.

(49) Id. ibid.

(50) See the remark [I].

(51) Se maxima coporis parte nudaſſet. Spartian. ubi ſupra.

(52) Chevreau, Hiſtoire du Monde, Tom. II, pag. 3[illegible]6. Dutch Edit. 1687.

(53) Ἐκ πάνυ πολλοῦ χρόνου. Jam multo tempore. Dio, in Macrino, pag. 362.

(54) It ſhould be ἐξησθένησεν.

(55) Triſtan, ubi ſupra, pag. 114.

durſt not afterwards expreſs the leaſt grief (c). If I miſtake not, the beſt expedient Caracalla made uſe of to comfort his mother, was to give her a good ſhare in the government [H]. This was a wonderful charm for this lady; and if ſhe had a mind to kill herſelf, when ſhe heard that Caracalla had been aſſaſſinated, it was not ſo much out of grief for her ſon's death, as becauſe ſhe feared to ſee herſelf ſoon reduced to the condition of a private perſon (d). And therefore ſhe thought no more of death, when ſhe obſerved that Macrinus, who ſucceeded Caracalla, uſed her well. But as ſoon as ſhe underſtood that he reſolved to reſent the injurious words ſhe had uttered againſt him, when ſhe heard of the aſſaſſination of Caracalla, ſhe ſtarved herſelf to death [I]. The title of Domna, which is given her, was the ſirname of a family [K]. There are ſome difficulties about the time of her marriage with Severus [L]. There are ſome inſcriptions (e), in τα ὠνομάζετο· ἥ τις καὶ μέγα βοῶσα, Ὄιδεν αὐτὸς Ἀντωνῖνος ὅτι παρθένος εἰμὶ, ζῶσα κατωρύγη. Veſtales occidit quatuor, ex quibus unam quantum in ipſo fuit, vitiavit: nam eum ad extremum vis in rebus Venereis defecerat, qua ex re dicebatur flagitia obſcœna alterius generis facere. Huic virgini Clodia Læta nomen fuit, eaque viva ſepulta eſt: quum tamen exclamaret ſcire ipſum Antoninum ſe virginem eſſe (56).

I proceed to the fifth proof. It is certain, that if Julia had been his wife, when ſhe died, her body would not have been depoſited firſt in the monument of the two brothers, Lucius and Caius Cæſar's, and afterwards in that of the Antoninus's with the bones of Geta, but with him (57). This proof is very bad, and ſhews, that Triſtan did not know that Caracalla and Geta were in the ſame tomb. Geta was laid in the ſepulchre of Severus (58), that is to ſay, in that of the Antoninus's (59), and Caracalla was laid there too. Corpus ejus Antoninorum ſepulchro illatum eſt, ut ea ſedes reliquias ejus acciperet quæ nomen addiderat (60). His body was ſent to Rome, by the very order of his murderer (61). Others ſay, that Macrinus had it burnt, and put the aſhes in an urn, which he ſent to Julia (62).

The ſixth proof is very good; it is grounded on Julia's being the mother, and not the mother-in-law of Caracalla. This is plain from the teſtimony of Dion, a man of figure in the empire, and who had ſeen Severus, Julia, Caracalla, Geta, &c. a hundred times. Herodian ſays the ſame thing; and what can be more convincing upon this ſubject, than theſe words of Oppian? τὸν μεγάλη μεγάλῳ φυτήσατο Δόμνα Σεβήρῳ. Since Oppian, in a book which he dedicated to Caracalla, affirms, that Julia brought forth Caracalla, can there be the leaſt doubt of it? Can a cotemporary writer be miſtaken in ſuch a thing? And durſt he tell a lie in the face of all the court, about a thing which no body was ignorant of? Can any one be ignorant in a prince's court, whether his wife is the mother, or the ſtep-mother of his ſons? I ſay nothing of the inſcriptions, in which Julia is called Caracalla's mother (63). Now all thoſe who ſpeak of the pretended marriage of Julia and Caracalla, ſuppoſe that ſhe was his ſtep-mother, and therefore are not to be credited, as building upon a falſity. Nay, they fall into a contradiction. Does not Spartianus ſay ſomewhere, that Geta was a greater favourite of his mother than Caracalla? Fratri ſemper inviſus, matri amabilior quam frater (64). Would a man who ſhould make this remark, and yet believe Julia to be Geta's mother, and Caracalla's ſtep-mother, have common ſenſe? This is not the only argument, that Spartianus affords againſt himſelf (65). Aurelius Victor (66) affirms, that Caracalla died, being near thirty years of age: which cannot be true, if this emperor was not Julia's ſon. See the remark [L]. The ſame hiſtorian obſerves. that Caracalla having ſecretly lain with Semea, his couſin, had a ſon by her, who was the emperor Heliogabalus (67). If Caracalla was Semea's couſin, he was Julia's ſon. I muſt obſerve by the way, that Mammea, Semea's ſiſter, and Alexander Severus's mother, is called by Ulpian Caracalla's couſin (68). Thus we find here a cotemporary writer, who ſays, that Julia was Caracalla's mother.

[H] Her ſon . . . . . gave her a good ſhare in the government.] See what has been quoted out of Dion, in the remark [C]; and add to it what the ſame hiſtorian tells us, when he relates the tragical end of Caracalla. He ſays, that during Caracalla's expedition againſt the Parthians, Julia remained at Antioch, and received all the diſpatches, and communicated only to the emperor, ſuch as were material. Thus all the affairs of the ſtate went through her hands, and it was ſhe who judged, whether ſuch or ſuch letters written to the emperor, deſerved to be ſent to him or not. This is a proof of the truſt that Caracalla repoſed in her, and of the notion he had of her capacity. Ἐκεκέλευστο αὐτῇ πάντα τὰ ἀφικνούμενα διαλέγειν, ἵνα μὴ μάτην αὐτῷ ὄχλος γραμμάτων ἐν τῇ πολεμίᾳ ὄντι πέμπεται. Cui mandatum erat, cuncta quæ mitterentur, diſcernere, ne ad Antoninum occupatum in terra hoſtili fruſtra multitudo literarum mitteretur (69).

[I] As ſoon as ſhe underſtood that Macrinus reſolved to reſent the injurious words ſhe had uttered againſt him, . . . ſhe ſtarved herſelf to death.] Macrinus ſent her Caracalla's aſhes (70), and wrote a very obliging letter to her (71): he deſired ſhe might keep all her retinue, and have her guards, as before; which made her think no more of killing herſelf. Ἐπειθ' ὡς οὔτε τι τῆς βασιλικῆς θεραπείας καὶ τῆς τῶν δορυφόρων περὶ αὐτῇ φρουρᾶς ἠλλοιώθη, καὶ ἐκεῖνος χρηστά τινα αὐτῇ ἐπέστειλε, θαρσήσασα, τὴν τοῦ θανάτου ἐπιθυμίαν κατέθετο. Sed poſtquam ille non modo nihil de regio famulatu ejus, aut de ſtipatoribus quos ſecum habebat cuſtodiæ cauſa immutavit, verùm etiam multa ad eam percommode ſcripſit, cœpit bona ſpe injecta deſiderium mortis deponere (72). But when he underſtood, that ſhe had furiouſly inveighed againſt him, and formed factions, to make herſelf ſovereign in that country, like Semiramis and Nitocris; he ordered her immediately to depart from Antioch, and permitted her to retire whither ſhe pleaſed. Then Julia would live no longer; ſhe feared more than death the condition of a woman without authority. Some (73) doubt whether her death was voluntary; but Dion does not ſpeak of it doubtfully. He affirms (74), that ſhe ſtarved herſelf to death, which ſhe the eaſier effected, as having inflamed her cancer, by ſtriking her breaſt. Triſtan believes, that ſhe ſtruck her breaſt to haſten her death, by irritating her cancer; but I do very much queſtion whether this is the hiſtorian's meaning. I believe that Dion meant no more than this, viz. that this lady ſtriking her breaſt, whilſt ſhe was lamenting the death of her ſon, irritated the cancer (75). The general cuſtom of women, upon the news of a loſs like this, was not only to make lamentations, but alſo to beat their breaſts. Julia did as the reſt, but probably it was not with ſuch blows, as to deſign directly to die of them. Since ſhe is compared to Semiramis, ſhe muſt have been looked upon as a moſt ambitious and cunning woman. This laſt quality ſhe did not want, if we believe Dion Caſſius (76).

[K] The title of Domna . . . . . was the name of a family.] Triſtan (77) proves it very learnedly, and cenſures Ritterſhuſius (78), who thought that in this verſe of Oppian, Τὸν μεγάλη μεγάλῳ φυτήσατο Δόμνα Σεβήρῳ, the word Δόμνα is an epithet borrowed from the Latin Domina, and that the Poet making it Greek, inſerted it with the licence of the eliſion of the Iota. He criticiſes another fault of the ſame Ritterſhuſius, which is his believing that Oppian ſpeaks of Martia, Severus's firſt wife. See Menage (79), who cenſures Gentilis (80), who was guilty of Ritterſhuſius's firſt fault. See alſo Mr Spanheim (81), who finds the ſame fault in the notes upon Nicephorus Briennius.

[L] There are ſome difficulties about the time of her marriage with Severus.] Dion (82) affirms that Fauſtina, wife of Marcus Aurelius, prepared the nuptial chamber for Severus and Julia, in the temple of Venus, which was in the palace. Now Fauſtina died in the eaſt, about the end of the year 175 (83). Therefore Severus's and Julia's marriage was not later than that

(c) Xiphilin. in Caracalla, pag. 345, 346.

(d) Id in Macrino, pag, 362.

(e) They are to be found in the ſecond volume of Triſtan's Commentaires Hiſtoriques, pag. 117, 118.

(56) Xiphilin. in Caracalla, pag. 352.

(57) Triſtan. ubi ſupra, pag. 115. He quotes no body. This is to be found in the fragments of Dion, pag. 899, of the edition of 1606.

(58) Funus Getæ accuratius fuiſſe dicitur quam ejus qui à fratre videretur occiſas. Illatuſque eſt majorum ſepulcro, hoc eſt Severi. Spartian. in Geta, cap. vii, pag. m. 744.

(59) Urnulam auream . . . . Severi reliquias continentem eamdemque Antoninorum ſepulcro illatam. Id. in Severo, cap. ult. pag. 640.

(60) Id. in Caracalla, cap x, pag. 730.

(61) Capitolin. in Macrino, cap v, pag. 753.

(62) Herodian. lib. iv, cap. 13.

(63) See Salmaſius, in Spartian. cap. xx, pag. 633, and Mr Spanheim, de Præſt. Numiſmat pag. 628.

(64) Spartian. in Geta, cap. v, pag. m. 740.

(65) See the remark [L].

(66) Aurel. Victor, in Epit. pag. 212.

(67) Heliogabalus dictus Caracallæ ex Semea CONSOBRINA occulte ſtuprata filius. Id. ibid.

(68) Ulpian. lege ultima de Senat. apud Triſtan, pag. 117.

(69) Xiphilin. in Caracalla, pag. 357.

(70) Herodian lib. iv, cap. xiii.

(71) Xiphil in Macrino, pag. 362.

(72) Id. ibid.

(73) Herodian. ubi ſupra.

(74) Xiphilin. in Macrino, pag. 362.

(75) See the Fragments, pag. 899, of Dion's edition, 1606.

(76) Πρὸς δὲ τούτοις εἶχε καὶ τὸ πανοῦργον τῆς μητρὸς, καὶ τῶν Σύρων ὅθεν ἐκείνη ἦν. Inerat ei fraus & malitia matris, Syriorumque ex quibus illa orta fuerat. Xiphilin. in Caracalla, pag. 349.

(77) Triſtan. Comment. Hiſt. Tom. II, pag. 119, 120.

(78) Not in Oppiani Cynegetica.

(79) Amœnit. juris, cap. xxv, pag m 139.

(80) Lib. ii, Parergorum juris, cap. xxii.

(81) Spanhem de Præſtant Numiſmat. pag. 126.

(82) Xiphilin. in Severo, pag. 310.

(83) Tillemont, Hiſt. des Emper. Tom. III, pag. 389.

in which ſhe is called the mother of the camps, the mother of the country, and the mother of the Senate.

that year. Julia was quickly a mother; it is not known whether Caracalla was the eldeſt of her children, but that might well be. According to Spartianus, who makes him live forty three years, Caracalla was killed in the year 217, according to which reckoning he muſt have been born in the year 174. If you object to this author, that Caracalla's and Julia's marriage muſt be placed about the year 212, ſince it happened after the beginning of Caracalla's reign, which laſted but ſix years; and if you conclude from thence, that this marriage is a meer fiction, ſince Julia was then above fifty years old; he will anſwer you, that Julia was not the mother of Caracalla, and he will maintain, that ſhe was not married to Severus, till long after the year 174. And yet Dion affords us a ſtrong proof that Julia muſt have been at leaſt fifty years old, when it is pretended that her nakedneſs did ſo charm Caracalla. From what he ſays, we ought to ſuppoſe, that ſhe was married before the death of Fauſtina, and conſequently, that ſhe was at leaſt twelve or thirteen years of age, in the year 175. I am going to ſhew, that it is impoſſible, that Caracalla ſhould have been born the firſt year of Julia's marriage, if it be true, that this marriage happened before Fauſtina's death.

Spartianus ſays, 'that Caracalla was but five years 'old, when his father was governor of Illyricum, (which 'we cannot ſuppoſe before the year 190) and that he 'received the Toga virilis when he was deſigned con'ſul (that is at the end of the year 201, and ſo he was 'not then at moſt but in the beginning of his fifteenth 'year). He every where acknowledges, that Caracal'la was very young, when Severus came to the em'pire. He repreſents him as a child of two or three 'years of age at moſt at the birth of Geta, which was 'the twenty ſeventh of May, 189 (84).' All this is inconſiſtent with the forty three years he gives this emperor, when he was killed in 217. He therefore contradicts himſelf. Dion affirms, that Geta lived but twenty two years and nine months (85), and that Caracalla lived but twenty nine years (86). Now Caracalla lived but ſix years after the death of Geta (87), and he was killed in the year 217. Geta therefore muſt have been born in the year 189, and Caracalla in 188. Therefore there muſt have been many years from Julia's marriage to Caracalla's birth, if Fauſtina prepared the nuptial bed, as Dion relates it; and yet, according to Spartianus, Julia's marriage was quickly fruitful, and gave a ſecond ſon to Severus, a few years after the birth of the firſt. 'Ex qua (Julia) ſtatim pater factus 'eſt. A Gallis ob ſeveritatem & honorificentiam & 'abſtinentiam, tantum quantum nemo dilectus eſt. 'Deinde Pannonias proconſulari imperio rexit. Poſt 'hoc Siciliam proconſularem ſorte meruit, ſuſcepitque 'Romæ alterum filium (88). —— Which Julia ſoon 'made him a father. He was exceedingly beloved by 'the Gauls, on account of his ſeverity, honourableneſs, 'and abſtinence. After that he was Proconſul of the 'Pannonia's: next he was Proconſul of Sicily, and had 'another ſon at Rome.' There is a great deal of confuſion in all this. I know not whether a conjecture, which I advance at a venture, will be approved. Dion does not ſeem to me to ſay, that Fauſtina actually prepared the nuptial chamber, but that Severus dreamed ſhe had prepared it. This hiſtorian relates ſeven preſages of Severus's exaltation; and after having mentioned the ſix firſt, he adds, that they appeared to him in his ſleep (89); and afterward he ſpeaks of the ſeventh as of a fortuitous action, done when he was awake. In relating the ſix firſt, he does not always obſerve upon each in particular, that it was a dream; but he does it three or four times. This might have deceived the interpreters; for he does not obſerve it as to this action of Fauſtina, which is one of the ſix preſages: he relates it as a reality, I mean without cautioning that it was a dream. Now ſince he does the ſame with reſpect to ſome of the other preſages, which were manifeſtly a dream, and ſince, before he relates the preſage, which conſiſted in a real action, he gives notice, that all the preceeding preſages appeared in his ſleep; I think it may be concluded, that he makes the preparation of the nuptial bed in the temple of Venus, by Fauſtina, to be only the viſion of a man who ſleeps. I do not know whether ever the nuptial chamber of any perſon was prepared for him in a temple. It is eaſier therefore to come to Dion's aſſiſtance, than to bring off the other hiſtorian: nevertheleſs, ſome contradictions are objected to the latter, without much ground. This I am going to examine. obſerving firſt of all, that Mr de Tillemont ought not to have preferred this paſſage of Dion, to the hypotheſis that Spartianus leads us to (90). This hypotheſis is to ſay, that Severus married Julia, whilſt he commanded in Gallia Lugdunenſis, in the year 186. Some hiſtorians tell us (91), that Caracalla was born at Lyons.

An Examination of ſome contradictions objected to Spartianus.

Triſtan (92) alledges, as a proof of Spartianus's contradictions, theſe words of Caracalla's life. 'Hic ta'men omnium duriſſimus, & ut uno complectar verbo, 'parricida, inceſtorum reus, patris, matris & fratris 'inimicus (93). —— He was the moſt cruel of men; 'in a word, he was guilty of parricide and inceſt, and 'hated his father, mother, and brother.' But I do not think that he can hereby be convicted of contradiction, and of forgetting his hypotheſis; he might maintain, that he takes the word mater, according to the notion which he explains two pages before, 'Matrem enim (non alio dicenda erat nomine) duxit 'uxorem. —— He married his mother; for ſhe could 'be called by no other name.' And we ſee he does not forget the inceſt, in the words related by Triſtan (94). 'The ſame Spartianus mentions the rea'ſon, which Caracalla ſaid he had to kill his bro'ther, namely, that he deſpiſed their mother, and did 'not pay her the reſpect that was due to her. Which 'makes it manifeſt, that Spartianus, or he that he took 'it from, acknowledged her to be their common mo'ther. For he would have had no reaſon to be ſo 'enraged with this irreverence of his brother towards 'Julia, if ſhe had not been his mother, and the pretence 'had been as ridiculous, as it appeared barbarous, 'notwithſtanding all the other reaſons he invented to 'palliate his violence and his crime. This objection is not good: for in the firſt place, theſe words matri eum irreverentem fuiſſe (95), ſignify only, that Geta did not reſpect his mother; and they ought not to be tranſlated as if being ſpoken by Caracalla, they meant, Geta does not reſpect our mother. It is thus however, that Triſtan has underſtood them, which is his fault. In the ſecond place, it is a very ſpecious pretext to extenuate a murder, to ſay, that the perſon killed uſed his mother ill. An uſurper, who ſhould dethrone a prince, inſolent to his mother, would not fail to charge him with this crime, though he were no relation to the family dethroned. Cromwell and his party would have exhauſted all the common-places of rhetoric, if they could have reproached Charles I with ſuch an irreverence. Much more would this pretence be alledged, if a man was the ſon-in-law of a lady, ill treated by her own ſon. Such a man would ſay, that he thinks himſelf obliged to defend the rights of his father's widow, againſt all oppoſers whatſoever. In a word, he would alledge a hundred plauſible reaſons, and ſuch as might make an impreſſion; and I do not know what Triſtan meant when he called this a ridiculous pretence.

Here is a ſtronger objection againſt Spartianus. He ſays (96) that Caracalla being in his thirteenth year, was proclaimed by the ſoldiers, an aſſociate to the empire, upon the taking of Cteſiphon. He adds, that Severus returning into Syria, gave the Toga virilis to Caracalla, and named him his colleague in the conſulſhip, which they entered upon immediately. This conſulſhip falls in the year 202, and the taking of Cteſiphon, in the year 198. It is not therefore poſſible, that Caracalla, who was killed in the year 217, ſhould have lived ſo long as this hiſtorian affirms, that is, forty three years.

(84) Id. ibid. pag. 389, 390.

(85) Xiphil. in Caracalla, pag. 345.

(86) Id. ibid. pag. 358.

(87) Herodian. lib. iv, cap. xiii. See alſo Xiphilinus, in Caracalla, pag. 358, who ſays, that Caracalla reigned ſix years, two months, and ſome days. Two days according to the edition of Dion Caſſius, in 1606.

(88) Spartian. in Severo, cap. iv, pag. 594.

(89) Ταῦτα μὲν ἐκ τῶν ὀνειράτων ἔμαθεν. ὕπερ δὲ ἔς τε τὸν βασιλικὸν δίφρον ἔφηβος ὢν ἔτι ἀγνοίᾳ ἐνιδρύνθη. Quæ omnia quum ex ſomniis intellexerit Severus, tum id revera evenit, quod quum adhuc ephebus eſſet, conſedit in ſella principis per imprudentiam. Xiphilin. in Severo, pag. 310.

(90) See Tillemont, Tom. III, pag. 389, & Spartian. in Severo, cap. iii, & iv, pag. 594.

(91) Aurel. Victor, in Cæſaribus, pag. 211.

(92) Triſtan, ubi ſupra, pag. 119.

(93) Spart. in Caracalla, ſub fin. pag. 732.

(94) Triſtan, ubi ſupra.

(95) Spart. in Geta, cap. ii, pag. 709.

(96) In Severo, cap. xvi, pag. 616, 617.

JULIS,

JULIS, a town of the iſle of Cea, in the Ægean Sea. In this town (a) were born the Poet Simonides, the Poet Bacchylides, his nephew, the Sophiſt Prodicus, the Phyſician Eraſiſtratus, and a Philoſopher called Ariſto [A]. Valerius Maximus (b), relates a very ſingular thing, which he was witneſs of, when he paſſed through Julis in the retinue of Sextus Pompeius, who was going into Aſia, to exerciſe his proconſulſhip. I ſpeak of it elſewhere (c). When the four towns of this iſland were reduced to two, Julis was one of the two (d). It was built upon a mountain three miles from the ſea. The native country of ſo many great men, ought not to have been omitted by Moreri; nor left out in the Dictionary of Charles Stephens, by Mr Lloyd, who had done better to rectify this article [B], than to leave it out intirely.

(a) Strabo, lib. x. Suidas, Stephanus.

(b) Lib. ii, cap. vi.

(c) In the article ZIA, remark [C], towards the end.

(d) Strabo, ubi ſupra.

[A] A Philoſopher called Ariſto.] It is thus we ought to ſay, and not with Moreri (1), the Philoſopher Ariſto; for this expreſſion induces one to believe, that either there was but one Philoſopher of that name, or at leaſt, that he who was born at Julis, was incomparably more eminent than all the other Ariſto's, both which things are falſe.

[B] Mr Lloyd . . . . . had done well to rectify this article.] Charles Stephens had done well not to ſay ſo abſolutely, that the iſle of Cea was indifferently called Cia or Cos, and to examine better what he ſays, that there was a law in Julis, which ſentenced all people to death that were above ſixty years of age, and that the end of this law was to prevent the want of proviſions for the reſt. See what we ſhall ſay upon this in the remarks of the article ZIA.

(1) At the word Cée.

JULIUS II, created Pope the night between the thirty firſt of October, and the firſt of November, 1503, was nephew to Sixtus IV, and was called Julian de Ruvere (a). It is ſaid that he had been a water-man [A]. There was ſomething very remarkable in his election [B]; for, properly ſpeaking, it preceded the entrance of the cardinals

(a) The Italians write it ſo.

[A] It is ſaid, that he was a water man.] Eraſmus has inſerted this tradition in his Adages. ‘A remo ad tribunal, ſays he (1), Dici ſolitum ubi quis repente ab infima conditione provehitur ad honeſti muneris adminiſtrationem. Id quod haud ſcio an ulli contigerit fœlicius quàm Julio ſecundo. Nam fama eſt hunc juvenum ad ſtipem ſcalmum remo ſubigere ſolitum, & tamen à remulco non ſolùm ad tribunal, verumetiam ad ſummum illud rerum humanarum culmen evectus eſt. Nec contentus hoc faſtigio, pontificiæ ditionis pomeria multum protulit; longius etiam producturus ſi per mortis inclementiam vitam illi producere licuiſſet. ——— From the oar to the tribunal, is proverbially ſaid, when any one is ſuddenly raiſed from a low condition to an honourable employment. I kn w not whether this happened more luckily to any one, than to Julius II. For it is reported, that, when he was a young man, he uſed to row for hire; and yet he was raiſed from a boat-man, not only to the ſeat of juſtice, but even to the higheſt of human honours. And, not ſatisfied with this elevation, he greatly enlarged the Papal authority, and would have carried it ſtill farther, had he not been prevented by death.’ Father Theophilus Raynaud is miſtaken, in ſaying (2), that Eraſmus makes mention of the ſame thing in the explication of the proverb, à ſcapha in triumphalem quadrigam. It is not he, but Hadrian Junius (3), who explained this adage, and ſays: ‘Efferri poteſt de quovis è fæce hominum ad magnes opes dignitateſque provecto, quemadmodum Julius Ligur poſt ſedentariam operam in ducendo ſcalmo diu navatam, Sixti Pontificis beneficio inſignibus Eccleſiaſticorum honorum ornatus, tandem ad Pontificatum maximum emerſit. ——— It may be ſaid of any Plebian raiſed to great riches and honours, ſuch as Pope Julius, who, after having long been employed in rowing a boat, was, by the favour of Pope Sixtus, raiſed to the honours of the church, and at laſt obtained the Popedom.’ Anaſtaſius Germonius, archbiſhop of Tarentaiſe, has maintained, that all the ſtories concerning the birth of Sixtus IV, and Julius II, are falſe; and that Leonard de Ruvere, father of Sixtus IV, was a very noble knight, and that before the exaltation of this Pope, the family of Ruvere was in a flouriſhing ſtate. ‘Sixtus IV falſo jactatus eſt è plebeiis & piſcatoribus editus cùm patrem haberet Leonardum de Ruvere, Equitem nobliſſimum, ut obſervavit Anaſtaſius Germonius, exponens indultum Hieronymi Cardinalis de Ruvere §. Sixtus num. 28, qui etiam §. Magnis, de gentis Ruvereæ antiquo, (etiam ante Sixtum, ſplendore, agit diffuſiſſimè (4).’

Mr de la Monnoie (5) pretends, that Anaſtaſius Germonius, who only copies Onuphrius, cannot ſtand ‘againſt Philelphus, Baptiſt Fregoſus, Volaterranus, Corio, Eraſmus, Machiavel, Chaſſeneuz, Bandello, du Ferron, Maſſo, and ſo many others cited by Spondanus, in his continuation of Baronius, on the year 1471. n. 10.’ Bandello affirms, that Julius II. boaſted that he had ſteered a little veſſel. ‘Giulio ſecondo Pontefice, anchorche di baſſiſſima gente foſſe diſceſo, e non ſi vergognaſſe ſpeſſe fiate dire che egli da Arbizuola, villa del Savoneſe, haveſſe con una barchetta più volte, quando era garzone, menato de le cipolle à vendere à Genova, fù nondimeno huomo di grandiſſimo ingegno e di molto elevato ſpirto (6). ——— Pope Julius II, though of mean extraction, and made no difficulty frequently to ſay, that from Arbizuola, a village in the Savoneſe, he many times, when a boy, carried onions in a boat to ſell at Genoa; nevertheleſs was a man of great parts, and an exalted genius.’

[B] There was ſomething very remarkable in his election.] He was ſure of his election before the cardinals entred the conclave; ſo that he came into it Pope. He was an exception to the common proverb, that he who enters the conclave Pope, comes out cardinal, Chi entra Papa, eſce Cardinale (7). He had ſecured his faction, by ſo many promiſes, and had in his power ſo many means of enriching ſuch as would ſerve him, that it was not poſſible for him to miſs of the Papal dignity. Beſides the riches which he had already gotten, he had in hands thoſe of others: every one was eager to offer him money, and even their benefices; ſo that he ſaw himſelf in a capacity of promiſing more than was asked. Thus you ſee the iniquitous way by which he roſe to the pontificate. It is not a Proteſtant, but an Italian author that ſays it. ‘Ma molto più ve lo promoſſono le promiſſioni immoderate, & infinite fatte da lui a' Cardinali, a' Principi, a' Baroni, & a ciaſcuno, che gli poteſſe eſſere utile a queſto negotio, di quanto ſeppono dimandare: & hebbe oltra ciò facultà di diſtribuir danari, e molti beneficii, e dignità Eccleſiaſtiche, coſi delle ſue proprie, come di quelle d'altri: perche alla fama della ſua liberalità molti concorrevano ſpontaneamente ad offerirgli, che uſaſſe a propoſito ſuo i danari, il nome, gli ufficii, & i beneficii loro: ne fu conſiderato per alcuno eſſere molto maggiore le ſue promeſſe di quello, che poi Pontefice poteſſe, ò doveſſe oſſervare: perche haveva lungamente havuto nome tale d'huomo libero, & veridico, che Aleſſandro ſeſto, nimico ſuo tanto acerbo, mordendolo nell' altre coſe, confeſſava lui eſſere huomo verace; laqual laude, egli ſapendo, che NIUNO più facilmente inganna gli altri, che chi è ſolito, & ha fama di mai non gl'ingannare; non tenne conto, per conſeguire il Pontefícato, di maculare (8). ——— But that which ſerued moſt in his aduauncement, was the promiſes immoderate and infinite, whiche he made to the cardinals, princes, and barons, and to all others whom he might make profitable to him in that action. Beſides he had the meane to diſtribute money, benefices, and ſpiritual dignities, aſwell ſuch as were his own, as thoſe that were the rightes of others, for that ſuche was the bruite and renowne of his liberalitie,

(1) Eraſm. Adag. Chil. III, Cent. IV, n. 8[illegible], pag. m. 725.

(2) Theophil. Rainaud. Hoplotheca, Sect. II, Serie III, cap I, pag. m. 303.

(3) Hadr Junius, Adag. Cent. VI, n. 43.

(4) Theophil. Rainaud ibid. pag. 304.

(5) In a manuſcript remark, which he has imparted to me.

(6) Bandello, Novel xxxi, of the firſt part, fol. 229, verſo, Mr de la Monnoie has furniſhed me with this paſſage.

(7) Memoires des Intrigues de la Cour de Rome, printed at Paris, 167[illegible], pag. 20.

(8) Guicciardin, lib. v., fol. m. 165, verſo.

Cardinals into the conclave. He had gained the faction of the duke of Valentinois, by making him believe, that he was his father [C], and promiſing to treat him as his ſon. He did afterwards juſt the contrary. No man had ever a more martial ſpirit than he [D]. He was in perſon at the taking of towns, and appeared more fiery than thoſe who commanded his armies [E]. A great number of writers affirm, that he once threw ‘ beralitie, that many made willing offers to him to diſpoſe as he beſt liked of their treaſures, their names, their offices, and benefices. They conſidered not that his promiſes were farre to great then, that beeing Pope, he was eyther hable or ought to obſerue, for that he had of ſo long continuaunce enioyed the name of iuſt and vpright, that Pope Alexander him ſelf his greateſt enemie, ſpeaking ill on him, in al other things could not but confeſſe him to be true of his word: a praiſe which he made no care to defile and ſtaine, ſo thende to become Pope, knowing that no man more eaſily beguileth an other, then he that hath the cuſtome, and name neuer to deceiue any ‡. If he had not made uſe of this Simony, how could he have induced the cardinals to give him their voices. He, who had always diſcovered ſuch a turbulent and terrible temper, and got many enemies (9). Money brings every thing about; it made a Pope before they had met for the election: a thing never known before. ‘ Il Cardinale di San Pietro in Vincola potente d'amici, de riputatione, e di ricchezze, haveva tirati a ſe i voti di tanti Cardinali, che non havendo ardire di opporſegli quegli, che erano di contraria ſentenza, entrando in Conclave gia Papa certo, e ſtabilito; fu con eſſempio incognito prima alla memoria de gli huomini, ſenza che altrimenti ſi chiudeſſe il Conclave, la notte medeſima, che fu la notte dell' ultimo giorno d'Ottobre, aſſunto al Ponteficato (10). ——— The cardinall S. Petri Ad Vincla mighty in frends, reputation, and riches, had drawn to him the voices of ſo many cardinals, that entring the conclaue, he was with an example all new and without ſhutting the conclaue, elected Pope the ſame night †.’

[C] He made the duke of Valentinois believe that he was his father.] I have read this no where but in Varillas. This hiſtorian ſays (11), that the French accuſed Julius II ‘ of having aſcended St Peter's throne by two irregular ways, to wit by Simony (12) and deceit. To prove the Simony they inſtanced the benefices, and legations promiſed in the conclave, and given after the election to the cardinals, who were heads of the factions, and they ſpecified the ſums of money, which the other cardinals had received for the price of their voices. To demonſtrate the deceit, it was remonſtrated to the ſame Pope, that the Spaniſh cardinals being engaged by oath not to give their voices to any other, than him who was propoſed by the duke of Valentinois, the cardinal of St Peter in Bonds, who was ſworn enemy to this duke, ſuborned ſome perſons to perſuade him, that he was his father; that he had kept his mother when ſhe ſeemed only to belong to cardinal Borgia, who was afterwards Alexander VI; that the jealouſy the ſame Borgia conceived againſt him, was the only cauſe of the perſecution he had ſuffered from him for ten years together; but the buſineſs at preſent being to chuſe another Pope, if he would lend him his intereſt, he would treat him as his ſon. The duke of Valentinois gave credit to what was told him in confidence ſo far as to conſent, that the cardinals of his faction ſhould elect the cardinal of St Peter in Bonds, who failed not immediately after to deprive him of all Romagna and Umbria, inſtead of acknowledging him for his ſon.

[D] No man had ever a more martial ſpirit than he.] Here is what John le Maire Hiſtoriographer to Lewis XII ſays of him. ‘ Let us farther obſerve another wonderful difference in the end of this work; I mean the graciouſneſs and affability of the Sultan to the Moſt Chriſtian king, in compariſon of the rigour and obſtinacy of the preſent Pope, who being all over martial and ſour, and always in his armour, as if he would have his terrible and warlike actions ſpoken of, as thoſe of the great Tamerlane, emperor and Sultan of the Tartars, will continually carry on the war, which becomes him as little, as dancing does a hooded Monk. Yet he muſt not expect to make a new world wholly monſtrous, as he is attempting; for hogs will always feed on acorns, oaks will be deprived of their leaves in due time, and wood will be applied to ſuch an uſe as properly belongs to it. But the glorious ſtelliferous crown, and the eagle of Jupiter, which are bright celeſtial luminaries, fixed and unmovable, as Aſtrologers witneſs, will ſhine in the firmament as long as the world laſts (13).’ William Budæus called him a bloody ringleader of gladiators (14), and ſtrongly repreſented the ſcandal that Pope gave, who at ſeventy years of age appeared in a warlike habit, whilſt the people were going in proceſſion to beg peace of God. ‘ Cùm ſacerdos ſeptuagenarius Chriſti, Pacis conditoris & parentis Legatus, Bellonæ ſacris operaretur, cui cum generis humani luculento diſpendio litare contendebat. Idque tum, cùm profanum vulgus ad delubra pacis & concordiæ miſerabili ſpecie ſupplicationes inibat. Enimverò viſendum ſpectaculum, Patrem non modo ſanctiſſimum, ſed etiam ſenio & canitie ſpectabilem, quaſi ad tumultum Gallicum Bellonæ fama ſuos evocatos cientem: non trabea, non auguſtis inſignibus venerandum, non Pontificiis geſtaminibus ſacroſanctum, ſed paludamento & cultu barbarico conſpicuum; ſed furiali, ut ita dicam, confidentia ſuccinctum, fulminibus illis brutis & inanibus lucidum, eminente in truci vultu cultuque ſpirituum atrocitate (15). —— When a miniſter of CHRIST, of ſeventy years of age, embaſſador of the Prince of Peace, was employed in ſacrificing to Bellona, to whom his vows were offered at the expence of the human race. And that, at a time when the populace were lamenting and making prayers in the temples of Peace and Concord. It was indeed a remarkable ſight, to ſee a moſt Holy Father, venerable for his old age and grey hairs, exciting his ſubjects to war, habited, not as a prince or Pope, but armed, and breathing nothing but rage and fury.’ This is but a ſmall part of Budæus's vehement declamations againſt this Pope. You may ſee them at large in Flacius Illyricus, in the twentieth book of his Catalogus teſtium veritatis.

[E] He was in perſon at the taking of towns, and appeared more fiery than thoſe who commanded his armies.] Du Pleſſis Mornai adds nothing to the expreſſions of Guicciardin, when he ſays (16), ‘ being reſolved to attack Ferrara, he was adviſed firſt to take Mirandola, and being tired with the ſlow progreſs of that ſiege, which went not to his mind (a thing not expected, and never known before) the vicar of CHRIST on earth was there in perſon againſt a Chriſtian town, ſays Guicciardin, and tho' old and ſick, was ſo obſtinate and impetuous in a war that he himſelf had raiſed againſt the Chriſtian Princes, that nothing was done ſoon enough, he was always calling to the captains in a fury, having his quarters ſo near the battery, that two men were killed in his kitchen, notwithſtanding the remonſtrances the cardinals made to him of the diſgrace he brought both upon himſelf and his ſee.’ Monſtrelet (17) ſays on that occaſion, ‘ he deſerted St Peter's chair, to take the title of Mars the god of battle, to diſplay his three crowns in the field, and to ſleep in a watch-tower; and God knows what a fine figure theſe mitres, croſſes, and croſiers made, fluttering in the camp; the devil was not ſuch a fool as to be there, for benedictions were too cheap.’ Guicciardin does very well repreſent what concerns the ſiege of Mirandola; for he obſerves, that this Pope had no regard to the horrible cold of the ſeaſon, which retarded the works of the beſiegers. ‘ Parti il ſecondo dì di Gennaio (18) da Bologna accompagnato da tre Cardinali, e giunto nel campo, alloggiò in una caſettà d'un villano, ſottopoſta a' colpi dell' artiglierie de' nimici; perche non era più lontana dalle mura della Mirandola che tiri in due volte una baleſtra commune: quivi affaticandoſi, & eſſercitando non meno il corpo, che la mente, e che l'Imperio, cavalcava quaſi continuamente hora quà, hora là, per il campo, ſollecitando che ſi deſſe perfettione al piantare dell' artiglierie, delle quali inſino

‘ a quel

---

‡ Fenton's Tranſlation of Guicciardin's Hiſtory. Lond. 1579, pag. 314, 315.

(9) Il quale era notiſſimo eſſere di natura molto difficile, e formidabile a ciaſcuno; & il quale inquietiſſimo in ogni tempo, e che haveva conſumato l'eta in continui travagli; haveva per neceſſità offeſo molti, eſſercitato odii, e nimicitie con molti huomini grandi. Id. ibid. - - - Who was knowen to be of a diſpoſition rigorous and terrible, and in whom was no expectation of reſt and tranquilitie, hauing conſumed his youth in continuall trauels, offended many by neceſſitie, and exerciſed hatreds agaynſt many great perſonages. Fenton, ubi ſupra, pag. 314.

(10) Id. ibid. fol. 165.

† Fenton, ubi ſupra.

(11) Anecdotes de Florence, pag. 229, 230.

(12) As to the ſimony, ſee what I have quoted out of Guicciardin, above, in the remark [B].

(13) John le Maire de Belges, prologue to his treatiſe of Schiſms, pag. 2, of the edit. of Lyons, 1549, in folio.

(14) Cum interim ſub ipſo laniſta ſanguinario. Budæus de Aſſe, apud Hotting. Hiſt. Eccleſ. Tom. V, pag. 545.

(15) Id. ibid. apud eundem, Hottinger. ibid. pag. 546.

(16) Du Pleſſis, Myſtere d'Iniquité, pag. 578.

(17) Mr du Pleſſis quotes Monſtrelet in the new additions; but it is a miſtake: for Monſtrelet died before the pontificate of Julius II, and is not the author of thoſe additions.

(18) Of the year 1511.

threw St Peter's keys into the Tyber [F], in order only to uſe St Paul's ſword: but as theſe writers copy one another, without citing any good original author, I would not adviſe any body to vouch for the truth of it. However, it may be ſaid, that if this Pope wanted the qualities of a good biſhop he had at leaſt thoſe of a conquering prince. He had great courage and a political head, by which he formed leagues, and broke them, according to the exigency of his intereſt. He made a moſt formidable one againſt the republic of Venice, and made uſe, among other things, of the thunder of his excommunications;

‘a quel giorno era piantata la minor parte, eſſendo impedite quaſi tutte l'opere militari da' tempi aſpriſſimi, e dalla neve quaſi continua (19). —— He parted from Bolognia, the ſecond of Januarie accompanied with three cardinalls, And being come to the campe, the neceſſitye of the place, compelled him to be lodged in a litle countreye cottage, ſubiect and open to the artilleries of thennemies, for that it was no furthur from the walls of Mirandola, then a common crosbow will ſhoote at twiſe: there he diſpenſed with no trauell of his bodye, nor forbare any care or ſtudie of minde. There he was no leſſe prodigal of his authoritie, then of his preſence, and riding continually thorow, and about the campe, he had almoſt finiſhed the planting of thartillerie, whereof till that daye the leſſer parte could not be imployed for thimpediments, which the vnſeaſonable tyme and ſnowes gaue to all actions of warre *.’ Complaining of his captains, he encouraged his ſoldiers with the hopes of plunder; for he promiſed them not to capitulate with the town, but to ſuffer them to ſack it. ‘Stette alla Concordia pochi giorni riconducendolo all' eſſercito la medeſima impatientia, & ardore; il quale non raffredò punto nel camino la neve groſſiſſima, che tuttavia cadeva del Cielo, nê i freddi così ſmiſurati che a pena i ſoldati potevano tollerargli: & alloggiato in una Chieſetta propinqua alle ſue artiglierie, e più vicina alle mura, che non era l'alloggiamento primo, nè gli ſatisfacendo coſa alcuna di quelle, che ſi erano fatte, e che ſi facevano; con impetuoſiſſime parole ſi lamentava di tutti i Capitani, eccetto che di Marc' Antonio Colonna, il quale di nuovo haveva fatto venire da Modena; nè procedendo con minore impeto per l'eſſercito, hora queſti ſgridando, hora quelli altri confortando, e facendo con le parole, e con i fatti l'officio del Capitano. Prometteva, che i ſoldati procedevano virilmente, che non accetterebbe la Mirandola con alcuno patto; ma laſcierebbe in poteſtà loro il ſaccheggiarla (20). —— The Pope remeined not longe at Concorda, the ſame impatience and violence of mind cauſing him to returne, which firſt procured him to come to the campe; neither was his fury any thing abated by the hurtfull ſnowes that continually fell from heauen, whileſt he was in the fielde, nor his rigor the more reſtrayned by the ſharpe cold, whoſe bitterneſs the ſouldiours could not endure but with great payne: he was lodged in a litle church, neare to his artilleries, but ſomwhat nearer the wals then was his former lodging: and being diſcontented with all thinges, that either were already done, or ſtoode to be done, he complayned with bitter wordes againſt all his capteins, except only Mar. Anth. Colonno, whom he had newly ſent for from Modena: he trauelled with great impacience about the armie, enforcing him to perſuade a diligence in the men in whoſe ſlownes he tooke griefe, he accompliſhed both in wordes and action, the office of a Capteine, promiſing the ſoldiours for the reward of their vallours the ſpoyle of Mirandola, which he ſayd he would not take to compoſicion, but leaue it to their libertie to ranſecke or raunſom to their own profit †.’ Mezerai (21) ſays, that the town being taken by compoſition the nineteenth of March (22), the Pope would be carried into it through the breach.

[F] A great number of writers affirm, that he once threw St Peter's keys into the Tyber.] Hitherto I have found no authority for this, beſides this Latin epigram of one Gilbertus Ducherius Vulto (23), Aquaperſanus.

In Gallum ut fama eſt, bellum geſturus acerbum,
Armatam educit Julius urbe manum:
Accinctus gladio, claves in Tibridis amnem
Projicit, & ſævus, talia verba facit:
Quum Petri nihil efficiant ad prælia claves,
Auxilio Pauli forſitan enſis erit.

Fame ſays, Pope Julius once the ſword did wield,
And, to engage the Frenchman, took the field.
Fierce, into Tyber's ſtream, the keys he threw,
Exclaiming loudly, as his ſword he drew:
Since, in my aid, thy keys, O Peter, fail,
Thy ſword, O Paul, in battle may avail.

It muſt be confeſſed, that this is a very weak foundation; for when a poet has a pretty thought, and finds no proper ſubject, that he may apply it to, he makes no ſcruple to ſupply the want of it, by his amplifications and fictions; and he will diſpenſe with the truth, rather than loſe a witty ſaying. Poëtæ modo aliquid argute vel acute dicere videantur, plerumque verumne ſit an falſum propemodum non curant (24). Be that how it will, this action true or falſe of Julius II, is to be ſound in many authors. One of the lateſt writers, in whom I have read it, relates it thus (25). ‘Percuſſo cum ipſis (Venetis) fœdere exercitum ſuum adverſus Imperatoris confœderatos Ferrarienſem & Ludovicum XII, Regem Francorum, iniquiſſimus & perfidiſſimus bellator eduxit (26) cum ea voce, quæ ipſum non S. Petri, ſed perditiſſimi & ſceleratiſſimi latronis ſucceſſorem eſſe commonſtravit. Cum exercitu enim Roma egreſſus, Petri clavem furibundus in Tiberim jactavit, adeoque, uti ingenioſe Bibliander concluſit, omne, quod à Sancto Petro ſe habere finxit jus, Tiberino flumini reſignavit; additis hiſce verbis: Quia clavis S. Petri amplius nil juvat, (evaginato gladio) valeat gladius S. Pauli. —— Having made an alliance with the Venetians, this moſt unjuſt and perfidious warriour led his army againſt the emperor's allies, the duke of Ferrara, and Lewis XII, king of France, with an expreſſion, which denoted him rather the ſucceſſor of a moſt abandoned and wicked robber, than of St Peter. For, marching out of Rome with his army, he, in a rage, threw St Peter's key into the Tyber, thus reſigning to that river, as Bibliander ingeniouſly concludes, whatever power he pretended to have received from St Peter; adding theſe words; ſince St Peter's key is of no farther uſe (at the ſame time he drew his ſword), let us try St Paul's ſword.’ I muſt not omit, that Hotman relates the ſame thing upon the credit of Arnold du Ferron, a Catholic hiſtorian. ‘Is eſt Julius ſecundus, ſays he (27), de quo & Arnoldus Ferronus, vir imprimis doctus, & Galliæ noſtræ hiſtoricus, & Burdegalenſis quondam Parlamenti Senator, itemque alii complures memoriæ prodiderunt: quòd cùm exercitu comparato Roma in Galliam, infeſto in Regem noſtrum animo, contenderet, ſuaſque armatas copias ipſe loricatus ex urbe per Tiberis pontem educeret, multis hominum audientibus hæc pronuntiavit: Quando nobis claves Petri nihil proſunt, age, gladium Pauli diſtringamus: ſimul claves, quas ſecum attulerat, in Tiberim projecit, gladiumque vagina eduxit. Qua de re notum illud vetus carmen eſt (28). —— This is that Julius II, concerning whom Arnoldus Ferronus, a very learned man, and one of our hiſtorians of France, and formerly a member of the parliament of Bourdeaux, as alſo many others, have related, that, being incenſed againſt our king, and marching with an army from Rome into France, himſelf armed, as he paſſed out of the city by the bridge of the Tyber, he ſaid in the hearing of a great many: Since the keys of St Peter are of no uſe to us, come on, let us draw the ſword of St Paul; at the ſame time he threw the keys, which he had brought with him, into the Tyber, and drew his ſword. The epigram upon this is very well known.’

I could never have believed, that Hotman could have been guilty of the unfairneſs of which I am going to convict him. I have conſulted Arnold du Ferron, and do not find that he recites Ducherius's epigram, as Hotman ſeems to ſay. The verſes he quotes are quite of another nature, and he adds to them the anſwer communications; but when he ſaw that the victory which the king of France, one of the heads of that League, obtained over the Venetians, did too much weaken that republic, he forſook his allies, and re-united himſelf with it. The emperor, and the king of France, equally diſſatisfied with him, endeavoured to bring him to reaſon, by a way always formidable to the Popes; which was, by the calling of a Council (b). But he was not daunted at that, he proceeded ſeverely againſt this Council, and called another himſelf, which had the better of it, to which at laſt the king of France ſubmitted in a low manner [G]. It is true, that Julius II was then dead. The Sacred League which he formed in Italy, received a terrible check by the battle of Ravenna (c); and if they had known how to make uſe of that advantage, they would doubtleſs have humbled this haughty pontiff, whereas they permitted him to recover himſelf from that ſevere blow [H], by the little uſe they made of that victory, to which the powerful diverſions in his behalf contributed very much. He obtained great ſuccours from the Swiſs, and was very liberal of titles, and marks of honour towards the Cantons [I]. He died of a ſickneſs, full of vaſt deſigns [K], the twenty ſecond of February 1513. He

---

(19) Guicciard. lib. ix, fol. 262, verſo.

* Fenton, ubi ſupra, pag. 505, 506.

(20) Guicciard. lib. ix, fol. 263.

† Fenton, ubi ſupra, pag. 506.

(21) Abrégé, Chronolog. Tom. IV, pag. 455, ad ann. 1511.

(22) He ſhould have ſaid the twentieth of January.

(23) Du Pleſſis, pag. 580, quotes only that author, and calls him Gilbertus Ducterius. He was of Aigueperſe, in Auvergne. His Epigrams were printed at Lyons, in 1538.

(24) Papyr. Maſſo, in Vita Leonis X.

(25) Joan. Henricus Heidegg Hiſtoria Papatus, pag. 192, 193.

(26) Du Pleſſis, pag. 580, ſhould not have placed that expedition ſoon after his election to the Papacy.

(27) In Bruto fulmine, pag. m. 110, 111.

(28) It is Ducherius's epigram above mentioned. Hotman gives it at length.

(b) It was convened at Piſa, and then tranſferred to Milan, and at laſt to Lyons.

(c) On Eaſter-day, the eleventh of April, 1512.

anſwer which John Laſcaris made in favour of Julius II. I do not deny that he tells the ſtory of St Peter's keys being thrown into the Tyber; but he queſtions whether it be not a fiction. ‘ Quin vulgatum ‘ eſt, ſays he (29), Jocone Conficto an vero, ‘ quando Romani pictores Petro Claves, Paulo enſem tribuunt, illum in Gallos emiſſurum copias enſe accinctum & clavibus ad Tybrim profectum in ‘ aquas amnemque projeciſſe claves, hæc inferentem, ‘ quandoquidem nihil Petri claves prodeſſent, Pauli ‘ enſem (quem mox eduxerat) auxilio futurum. —— ‘ It is commonly reported, whether jeſtingly or truly, ‘ that whereas the Roman Painters give Peter keys, ‘ and Paul a ſword, this Pope, about to lead an army againſt the French, armed with ſword and keys, ‘ and marching by the Tyber, threw the keys into the ‘ river, with this ſaying, ſince Peter's keys were of ‘ no ſervice, the ſword of Paul (which he preſently ‘ drew) ſhould aſſiſt him.’ Is it conſiſtent with ſincerity to build ſuch a ſtory upon the authority of a great Catholic magiſtrate, and to ſuppreſs the declaration he made, that he knew not but it might be an impoſture? Moſt books are full of the like quotations, and we cannot take the trouble often to verify whether thoſe who cite the authors do it fairly; we cannot, I ſay, often take that trouble, without contracting a miſtruſt, which will oblige us to believe only our own eyes. If ſo famous an author as Francis Hotman gives himſelf ſo much liberty, what will not little authors do, who have nothing to loſe? We muſt then argue juſt contrary to him who cried out:

Quid Domini facient, audent cum talia fures (30)?

What will not maſters dare, when ſervants thus preſume?

[G] The king of France ſubmitted in a low manner.] This confirms what I have ſaid in another place (31), that princes hardly ever ended their quarrels with the Popes, but to their own confuſion. Lewis XII had called an aſſembly of the Gallican church at Tours, in the year 1510, to know whether he could in conſcience make war with Julius II. He was informed by that aſſembly ‘ that his cauſe was juſt, and that ‘ the Pope's was not, and that he might proceed to ‘ the offenſive part in his own defence (32).’ At his requeſt, and the emperor's, and in execution of the decree of the council of Conſtance (33), ſome cardinals had ſummoned a general council at Piſa; he and the emperor had approved by their Letters Patents (34) the calling of this council. He had protected the fathers that compoſed it, and who declared Julius ‘ ſuſ‘ ſpended from the adminiſtration of the pontificate, ‘ and forbad obedience to him (35).’ He had protected them, I ſay, againſt this Pope, who excommunicated and degraded them in his council of Lateran. Neverthleſs, this ſame king ſome time after declared, that he looked upon the aſſembly of Piſa, as a pretended council. His procurators, they are the words of the act (36), ‘ having in their hands ‘ the letters-patents of the Moſt Chriſtian King, ſealed ‘ with his ſeal, and ſigned by him, and diſpatched by ‘ his command, after the reverence and humility re‘ quired in ſuch caſes, have entirely departed from the ‘ pretended council of Piſa, and abſolutely renounced ‘ it, and freely, purely, and entirely adhered to the ‘ moſt holy council of Lateran, as to the only true and ‘ lawful one. And farther, according to their afore‘ ſaid procuration, they have promiſed that from thence‘ forth the Moſt Chriſtian King ſhall not give any fa‘ vour or aſſiſtance, in any manner whatever, to the ‘ ſaid pretended council of Piſa: nay, that all thoſe ‘ who ſhall be found in his city of Lyons, or other ‘ parts of his kingdom, territories, and lordſhips be‘ longing to him, perſiſting in their adherence to the ‘ pretended council of Piſa, ſhall be forced by him to ‘ retire in a month's time; and if any, of whatever ſtate, ‘ degree, dignity, or condition they be, whether ſecu‘ lars or eccleſiaſtics, do obſtinately refuſe to obey, he ‘ will expel them, and repute them ſchiſmatics, and as ‘ ſuch, upon any order of the aforeſaid Holy Father, ‘ purſue them with main force, if there is occaſion. ‘ And farther, the ſaid procurators have promiſed that ‘ the aforeſaid Moſt Chriſtian King ſhall effectually ‘ cauſe ſix prelates, and four doctors, or moſt eminent ‘ graduates among thoſe, that were in the ſaid pre‘ tended council at Piſa, to be deputed to our afore‘ ſaid holy father the Pope, in the name of the ſaid ‘ pretended council of Piſa, and repreſenting the body ‘ of all thoſe who adhered to it, to appear between ‘ this day and the firſt of January, in perſon before ‘ his Holineſs, in order purely and entirely to renounce ‘ and abjure the ſaid council of Piſa, after having ‘ asked and received the remiſſion and abſolution from ‘ his Holineſs, humbly and in a ſuitable form. And ‘ over and above, that they will adhere and incorpo‘ rate themſelves with the ſaid council of Lateran, as ‘ the true and undoubted one, both in their own name ‘ and in the name of their adherents. But if they ſhall ‘ refuſe to do this, the aforeſaid king ſhall give no ſuc‘ cours, aſſiſtance, or favour againſt the authority of ‘ the holy apoſtolical ſee, to any of thoſe that ſhall be ‘ found to favour or have favoured the ſaid pretended ‘ council of Piſa: on the contrary, he ſhall with all ‘ his power cauſe the ſentences, decrees, and cen‘ ſures of our Holy Father to be executed, even with ‘ force of arms, if there be occaſion, without any ‘ fraud or diſſimulation.’ This is what the prelates get who adhere to the intereſt of their prince in his quarrels with Rome: they are made a ſacrifice to the Pope, when their quarrels are ended. It is a wonder to me, that there are ſo many, who prefer their temporal before their ſpiritual prince.

[H] They permitted him to recover himſelf from that ſevere blow.] He recovered ſo well, that the ſame year the French were forced to abandon the Milaneſe. Nothing was ſo prejudicial to Lewis XII, as the ſuperſtition of Anne de Bretagne his wife. She filled her head with ſo many ſcruples, about the war that France made with the Pope, that ſhe retarded all the good deſigns of her husband (37).

[I] He was very liberal of titles . . . . . . to the Cantons.] ‘ Whereas his predeceſſors gave ſeveral privi‘ leges to the mendicant Friars, this Pope gave them ‘ to the Swiſs Cantons, who were the principal execu‘ tors of his lofty enterprizes, to whom he gave the ‘ perpetual title of Defenders of the Eccleſiaſtical Li‘ berty, with many Bulls and Standards, and a Sword, ‘ and a Cap of Gold, and other preſents, to oblige them ‘ to perform all his commands (38).’

[K] He died of ſickneſs full of vaſt deſigns (39).] This is what Guicciardin ſays (40). ‘ In queſti tali ‘ e tanti penſieri (that is of engaging the king of England to make war with France, and of depoſing ‘ Lewis

(29) Arn. Ferronus, in Ludovico XII, fol. m. 52, verſo.

(30) Virgil. Eclog. iii, ver. 16.

(31) In the article GREGORY VII, at the end of remark [R].

(32) Mezerai, Abr. Chronolog. Tom. IV, pag. 453.

(33) Id. ibid. pag. 457.

(34) In July 1511.

(35) Mezerai, ubi ſupra, pag. 462.

(36) It is to be found intire in Coëffeteau's anſwer to the Myſtere d'Iniquité, pag. 1221, & ſeq.

(37) See Mezerai, ubi ſupra, pag. 457, 460.

(38) Du Pleſſis Mornai, ubi ſupra, pag. 580. See alſo Heidegg. ubi ſupra.

(39) Varillas, Hiſt. de Louïs XII, livr. x, pag. m 217, & ſeq. mentions ſeven.

(40) Guicciard. lib. xi, fol. 325.

He was a lover of wine and women [L]; and he is accuſed even of the unnatural ſin [M]: and there is no ſort of crime but he is charged with, in a dialogue it is feigned he had with St Peter at the gate of Paradiſe [N]. The hatred he conceived againſt France

‘Lewis XII, and of giving the kingdom to the firſt that could conquer it) e forſe ancora in altri più occulti e maggiori (perche in un' animo tanto feroce non era incredibile concetto alcuno, quantunque vaſto, e ſmiſurato) l'oppreſſe dopò infermita di molti giorni la morte . . . . Principe d'animo, e di coſtanza ineſtimabile, ma impetuoſo, e di concetti ſmiſurati, per i quali che non precipitaſſe, lo ſoſtenne più la riverenza della Chieſa, la diſcordia de' Principi, e la conditione de' tempi, che la moderatione, e la prudenza: degno certamente di ſomma gloria, ſe fuſſe ſtato Principe ſeculare, ò ſe quella cura, & intentione, che hebbe ad eſaltare con l'arti della guerra, la Chieſa nella grandezza temporale, haveſſe havuta ad eſaltarla con l'arti della pace nelle coſe ſpirituali: e nondimeno ſopra tutti ſuoi anteceſſori, di chiariſſima, & honoratiſſima memoria, maſſimamente appreſſo a coloro, iquali, eſſendo perduti i veri vocaboli delle coſe, e confuſa la diſtintione del peſarle rettamente, giudicano che ſia più ufficio de' Pontefici, aggiugnere con l'armi, e col ſangue de' Chriſtiani, imperio alla Sedia Apoſtolica, che l'affaticarſi con l'eſſempio buono della vita, e col correggere, e medicare i coſtumi traſcorſi per la ſalute de quelle anime, per laquale ſi magnificano che Chriſto gli habbia conſtituiti in terra ſuoi Vicari (41). —— In theſe conceptions no leſſe ſtraunge for their varietie, then great for the importance they drewe, and parhaps in other thoughtes, more ſecret and ſinguler (for in a mind ſo fierce and terrible, all ſortes of imaginations howe great and vayne ſo euer they be, are not incredible) after the continuation of his ſickneſſe for many days, he declined towardes death: . . . . . . he was a prince of incredible conſtancie and courage, but ſo full of furie, and unruled conceptions, that the reuerence that was borne to the churche, the diſcorde of princes, and the condition of times, did more to ſtaye him from his ruine, then eyther his moderation or his diſcreſſion: worthy, no doubt, of great glory, if eyther he had bene a prince ſecular, or if that care and intention which he had to rayſe the chuche into temporall greatneſſe by the meane of warre, had bene employed to exalte it by the mediation of peace, in matters ſpirituall: nevertheleſſe he was lamented aboue all his predeceſſors, and no leſs eſteemed of thoſe, who having eyther loſte the true conſideration of things, or at leaſt ignorant howe to diſtinguiſhe and peaze them rightly, iudged it an office more duely apperteining to Popes, to increaſe the iuriſdiction of the ſea apoſtolike by armes and blood of Chriſtians, then by good example of life and due curing and correction of corrupt maners, to trauell for the ſauing of thoſe ſoules, for whom they glory ſo much that Jeſus Chriſt hath named them his vicars in earth *.’ How judicious is this, and what an admirable cenſure upon thoſe impatient doctors, who believe all to be juſt, provided the temporal grandeur of the church be improved by it! this in particular hits cardinal Palavicini, who ſpeaks ſo faintly of Julius IId's faults, and excuſes them by reaſon of the temporal advantage they brought to St Peter's patrimony. ‘Fu dotato, ſays he (42), di ſpiriti eccelſi, à tal che ſe foſſe ſtato principe di dominio ſol temporale, meriterrebbe d' eſſer contato fra gli Eroi . . . . . Certamente ſenza una tal ferocia non havrebbe ricuperato egli alla Chieſa il piu e'l meglio del ſuo dominio. —— He was endowed with a high ſpirit, inſomuch that if he had been a temporal prince, he would deſerve to be put in the number of the heroes. . . . . Certainly had it not been for that fierceneſs, he had not recovered to the church the beſt part of her patrimony.’

Paul Jovius (43) affirms, that Julius II died having a vaſt deſign upon the kingdom of Naples. Hæc ingenti animo verum ægro corpore cogitantem, diuturnus fluentis alvi morbus intercepit (44). It was ſaid that the title of deliverer of Italy, with which he ſuffered himſelf to be flattered, was but an empty name, whilſt the Spainards were poſſeſſed of Naples: If GOD let me act, anſwered he, ſtriking his ſtick upon the ground, this ſhall not laſt long. Ad quod Pontifex quaſſato ſcipione quo innixus pavimentum infrendendo pertundebat, reſpondit brevi futurum, ut Neapolitani non iratis ſuperis externum jugum excuterent (45).

[L] He was a lover of wine and women.] We are told of an exclamation of the emperor Maximilian: ‘(46) Good GOD! what would become of the world, if thou didſt not take a particular care of it, under the reign of ſuch an emperor as I am, who am but a poor hunter, and under that of ſo wicked and drunken a Pope as Julius II.’ Some hiſtorians obſerve, that this Pope invented a new name to accuſe the French of drinking too much wine, and diſcharging it immediately by urine; and they add, that this was his great vice. ‘Gallos in Univerſum novo nomine augens Romanam ſupellectilem, Micturivinos vocarat, quaſi immodicos vini potores quod mox emittendum eſſet, quo vitio ipſe maxime laborabat (47). —— He gave the French the general appellation of Micturovini [Wine-Piſſers] thus adding a new word to the Roman language, implying that they were immoderate drinkers of wine, which was afterwards to be diſcharged; of which vice he himſelf was very guilty.’ I proceed to his leudneſs. He had a daughter who was married to John Jordan de Urſinis, and he is brought in, ſaying in a dialogue with St Peter (48), that he had had the pox.

Note, that there is a fault in the words of Arnold du Ferron before-cited. He ſuppoſes that the Pope invented the Latin word Micturivinus, to ſignify the drunkenneſs of the French; but it was not in that language that Julius II expreſſed himſelf, but in Italian, and the word was Piſciavini. It is ſaid that one of his officers, a Norman by nation, told him one day, Faith, Holy Father, you are then a true Frenchman, for you are one of the greateſt wine-piſſers on the earth (49).

[M] He is accuſed . . . . . . of the unnatural ſin.] It is certain that Julius II is accuſed of this horrid crime. ‘We read in a book of our divines of Paris, of two young gentlemen abuſed by him, whom queen Anne, the wife of king Lewis XII, had recommended to cardinal de Nantes to conduct them into Italy (50).’ Probably du Pleſſis gives us here a tranſlation of theſe words of Wolfius. ‘Legitur in Commentario Magiſtrorum Pariſienſium (§ α), de Julio ſecundo Papa, quod duobus nobiliſſimi generis, adoleſcentibus, quos Anna Galliarum Regina Nanetenſi Cardinali informandos commiſerat, & aliis multis diaboliaca rabie (proh facinus) ſtuprum intulerit (51).’ This quotation ſeems too indeterminate; he ſhould have told us where, and in what time that book of the Paris doctors was printed. John Crepin, undertaking to relate this adventure, has fallen into an anachroniſm: ‘We read, ſays he (52), in a certain commentary of the doctors of Paris, againſt the Lutherans, that this Julius, inflamed with a diabolical rage, had his will of two young gentlemen of a noble family, whom queen Anne of France had ſent to Robert cardinal de Nantes, to be inſtructed by him.’ The doctors of Paris would have been far from inſerting ſuch a thing in a controverſial piece againſt the Lutherans; if they inſerted it any where, it is in the writings they publiſhed againſt Julius, under Lewis XII.

[(§ α) This citation of Wolfius is falſe. He ſhould have ſaid: In Commentario ſuper Articulos Magiſtrorum Pariſienſium: whence it had appeared that this Commentary being a piece of the new Lutherans, one might expect to find in it ſuch facts, as could not decently be advanced by the Sorbonne. That Commentary, to obſerve it by the by, is quoted by John Bale, in his Life of Clement VII, and it relates to the twenty five articles of the Sorbonne, publiſhed by Peter Gallandius, in 1543, and confuted by Calvin in his Antidote, &c. See Du Boulai, Tom. VI. pag. 384, 385, of his Hiſtory of the Univerſity of Paris. REM. CRIT.].

[N] A dialogue which it is feigned he had with St Peter at the gate of paradiſe.] It is a moſt ſatirical piece. Wolfius has inſerted it in his Lectiones memorabiles (53). Rivetus (54) affirms, that it was printed at Paris with the king's licence, in the year 1612, at the ends of the acts of the council of Piſa. The ſubſtance

---

(41) See a paſſage of Mezerai, in remark [O], citation (60).

* Fenton, ubi ſupra, pag. 632, 633.

(42) Iſtoria del Concilio, lib. i, cap. i, n. 5.

(43) Jovius, in Vita Alfonſi Ferrariæ Ducis, pag. m. 353, 354.

(44) Id. ibid. pag. 354.

(45) Id. ibid.

(46) Deus æterne, niſi vigilares quam male eſſet mundo! quem regimus nos, ego miſer venator, & ebrioſus ille ac ſceleratus Julius. Du Pleſſis, Myſt. d'Iniquité, pag. 580, who quotes Joachim Curæus Freiſtadienſis, in Annalibus, gentis Sileſiæ.

(47) Arnoldus Ferronus, in Ludov. XII, fol. 52, verſo.

(48) I ſpeak of that dialogue in the remark [N].

(49) I have this remark from Mr de la Monnoie.

(50) Du Pleſſis, Myſtere d'Iniquité, pag. 581.

(51) Wolfius Lection. Memor. Tom. II, pag. 21.

(52) In his Etat de l'Egliſe, ad ann. 1513, pag. m. 512.

(53) Pag. 61, of the ſecond volume.

(54) Remarques ſur la Réponſe au Myſtere d'Iniquité, Part. II, pag. 634.

France, where he had found a good ſanctuary under the pontificate of Alexander VI, was ſo exceſſive, that he ordered that all the French which could be met with ſhould be killed [O], and promiſed a recompence to whoſoever ſhould execute his order. We are not to believe, that the wine and hams which he ſent to the king of England, were the true cauſe of the war of the Engliſh againſt France [P]. I do not know whether ſubſtance of it is this. ‘Paulo poſti pſius mortem Vir quidam doctus in lucem emiſit Dialogum, quem inſcripſit, Julius, in quo Pontificem hunc horrendorum criminum inſimulat, nim. quod fuerit homo palam ſceloroſus, temulentus, homicida, ſimoniacus, veneficus, perjurus, rapax, portentoſis libidinum generibus undique conſpurcatus, denique ſcabie, quam vocant Gallicam, totus coopertus (55). —— A little after his death, a certain learned man publiſhed a dialogue, which he intituled Julius, in which he accuſes this Pope of horrid crimes; for inſtance, that he was openly miſchievous, a drunkard, a murderer, guilty of ſimony, a poiſoner, perjured, rapacious, defiled with monſtrous kinds of luſt, and laſtly, covered with what they call the French pox.’ Some ſay that Fauſtus Andrelinus (56) was the author of that ſatirical piece. Some aſcribe it to Eraſmus; Mr Placcius affirms, that ſeveral authors ſay this in the two places he quotes of Melchior Adam (57). I have conſulted thoſe two places, and have found no other teſtimony than that of Leo Juda. Thus Mr Placcius deceives us. Eraſmus was very much troubled, that ſuch a piece ſhould be aſcribed to him: he juſtifies himſelf very ſeriouſly in a letter. ‘Dialogi cujuſdam ſuſpicionem mihi moliuntur impingere. Is ut ex argumento ſatis conſtat, ſcriptus eſt in odium divi Julii Pontificis Maximi ſchiſmatis tempore, ſed à quo incertum, ante quinque annos deguſtavi veriùs quam legi. Poſt reperi in Germania apud quoſdam deſcriptum, ſed variis titulis. Quidam teſtabantur Hiſpani cujuſpiam eſſe, ſed ſuppreſſo nomine, rurſus alii Fauſto Poëtæ tribuebant, alii Hieronymo Balbo. Ego quid de his conjectem non habeo, ſubodoratus ſum quoad licuit, verum nondum perveſtigavi, quod animo meo faceret ſatis. Ineptiit quiſquis ſcripſit, ac majore ſupplicio dignus, quiſquis evulgavit. Ac miror eſſe qui ſolo Styli argumento mihi obtrudere parent, quum nec mea ſit phraſis, niſi prorſus ipſe mihi ſum ignotus, nec mirum ſit futurum, etiam ſi qui in oratione nonnihil referrent Eraſmicum, quum verſer in manibus omnium, & referimus fere, in quorum aſſidua lectione verſamur (58).’

[O] His hatred . . . . . againſt France, ... was ſo exceſſive, that he ordered that all the French which could be met with ſhould be killed.] ‘Julius's rage had no bounds; he had made a decree in the name of the council, to transfer the kingdom of France, and the title of Moſt Chriſtian, to the king England (59). As he was upon the point of publiſhing it, heaven taking pity of him and of Chriſtendom, called him out of the world, the twenty third of February. He died of an hectic fever, cauſed, as he ſaid, by the uneaſineſs he was under, that he could not bring the Venetians to come to an agreement with the emperor; ſo furious were his paſſions, and more ſuitable to the ſultan of the Turks, than to the common father of Chriſtians (60).' As for his order of murdering the French, I have read it only in the 109th, and 110th pages of Francis Hotman's Brutum Fulmen. ‘Si quæ patrum memoria, ſays he, in hoc regno contigerunt recordari volumus, primum hoc reperiemus: Ludovicum XII (at, quem Regem? qui Patris patriæ nomen ſummo bonorum omnium conſenſu adeptus eſt) urbes aliquot Italiæ, bello captas, Papæ Julii ſecundi ditioni adjunxiſſe. Papam intermiſſis aliquot menſibus hanc Regi pro accepto beneficio gratiam retuliſſe, ut non modo eum ſchiſmaticum & hæreticum pronuntiaret, proſcriberet, diris ſuis excommunicationum fulminibus inſectaretur, verum etiam Gallos omnes hoſtilem in modum cruciandos interficiendoſque curaret: præmium etiam percuſſoribus polliceretur peccatorum omnium veniam, & impunitatem, ſi quis vel unicum Gallum quoque modo trucidaret. . . . . . Quo nuntio (61) Julius accepto, tanto dolore atque iracundia exarſit, ut non modo Gallis omnibus aqua & igne interdiceret, verum etiam obvium quemque mactari, trucidarique imperaret: prœmiis etiam, ut dixi ſicarios ac percuſſores invitaret. —— If we would call to mind what happened in this kingdom, in the memory of our fathers, we ſhall find the principal tranſaction to be this: that Lewis XII (but what king? one, who, by general conſent, obtained the name of father of his country) added to the dominion of Pope Julius II, ſome cities of Italy, taken in war: that the Pope, after ſome months, returned the king this favour, for the benefit he had received, that he not only pronounced him a Schiſmatic and Heretic, proſcribed and excommunicated him; but procured all the French to be tortured and ſlain in an hoſtile manner; and even promiſed a reward to thoſe, who ſhould aſſaſſinate but one Frenchman, together with pardon of all their ſins, and indulgencies. . . . . . . When Julius heard this news, he was ſo exaſperated, that he not only proſcribed all the French, but even enjoined thoſe, who ſhould meet them, to aſſaſſinate and make away with them: he alſo encouraged cut-throats and aſſaſſins, as I ſaid, by promiſe of rewards.'

[P] We are not to believe that the wine and hams . . . . were the true cauſe of the war of the Engliſh againſt France.] Spondanus has been ſo unjuſt as to inſinuate this, and to jeſt upon it; and he pretends that Polydore Virgil ſaid nothing of it, to ſave at once the honour of Italy and England. Polydore was an Italian, and lived in England; he was therefore concerned in the glory of both theſe nations. Now he thought it unworthy of Italy to win people by ſuch alurements, and unworthy of England to ſuffer itſelf to be caught by ſuch a bait. Theſe are the words of the Annaliſt. ‘Feſtivum eſt quod refert Guicciardinus, appuliſſe hoc tempore in Angliam Pontificiam longam navem Falerno vino, caſeis, ſuminibuſque onuſtam, quæ nomine Pontificis Regi ac Principibus, Antiſtitibuſque donata, ab omnibus miro applauſu accepta ſunt: & plebem, quam plerumque non minus levia quam gravia movent, ad eam navem videndam ſumma cum voluptate accurriſſe, gloriantem antea nunquam in ea inſula navim ullam cum Pontificiis vexillis conſpectam. Quibus bellam gentem nobis depingit Guicciardinus, & vini acutique guſtûs appetentem, quibus ſciret Pontifex eam facile in partes ſuas trahi poſſe; ſicuti olim Narſes feciſſe dicitur *, ut Longobardos in Italiam alliceret; omnes generis Poma, aliarumque deliciarum irritamenta, quorum Italia ferax eſſet, mittens, ut pauperrima ſua rura deſerentes ad occupandam regionem cunctis refertam divitiis venirent. Eam verò rem adeò inſignem, & Regi, principibuſque, & antiſtitibus, ac populo maxime acceptam gratamque, cùm Polydorus Virgilius ſuæ hiſtoriæ Anglicanæ non inſeruerit; exiſtimamus, eum ut Italum, & in Anglia commorantem, utriuſque nationis gravitati parcere voluiſſe (62). —— It is a merry ſtory, which Guicciardin relates, that a ſhip belonging to the Pope, loaden with Falernian wine, cheeſes, and Weſtphalia-hams, arrived at that time in England; which being made a preſent of, in the Pope's name, to the king, nobles, and prelates, was received by them all with wonderful applauſe; and that the common people, whom trifles affect no leſs than things of moment, flocked to ſee that ſhip with great pleaſure, boaſting that they had never before ſeen in that iſland any ſhip with Papal colours. Guicciardin tells us, that nation was fond of wine and high-ſeaſoned meats, by which the Pope knew he ſhould eaſily draw them to his party; as they ſay Narſes once did, to entice the Lombards into Italy, ſending them all kinds of fruit, and other delicacies, with which Italy abounds, that they might be induced to leave their own native poverty, and take poſſeſſion of a country full of all ſorts of riches. Now whereas Polydore Virgil has not inſerted in his Hiſtory of England this memorable fact, ſo highly acceptable to the king, nobles, prelates, and people, I take the reaſon to be, becauſe, being an Italian, and reſiding in England, he had regard to the gravity of both nations.' Mezerai comes much nearer the truth; for he obſerves, that the Pope ſpurred on Henry VIII, with the ambition of protecting the true church. ‘The Engliſh, ſays he (63), were upon the point of breaking with the king. For the Pope had made them drunk with the vain-glory of defending the holy See, and with the flavour of delicious wines of all ſorts, with which he had ſent them a great ſhip laden, together with hams, ſauſages, and ſpices, to make them reliſh the better.' According to Varillas (64), it was from a motive of religion, whether it is poſſible to find a certain ſpeech, in which he was very ill treated. Varillas, who ſpeaks of it, is liable to cenſure [Q]. The hiſtory of Venice, written by Cardinal Bembo, is ſufficient to ſhew the paſſion, treachery, and prodigious ambition of Julius II, though this hiſtorian be leſs prolix upon it than Guicciardin.

---

(55) Joan. Zuinger, de Feſto Corporis Chriſti, pag. 140.

(56) In the edition of Wolfius there is in the title F. A. F. Poëtæ Regii libellus de obitu Julii ſecundi.

(57) A Deſiderio ERASMO Roterodamo conſcriptus eſſe diverſorum teſtimoniis confirmatur apud Melch. Adam. in Vitis Theolog. Germ. pag m. 95, (it ſhould be 97) & pag. 167 (it ſhould be 197) in Vitis Medicor. Germ Placcius, de Anonymis, n. 259, pag. 72.

(58) Eraſm. Epiſt. i, lib. xii, pag 575, 576

(59) Concitava il Re d'Inghilterra alla guerra: alquale haveva ordinato che per decreto del Concilio Lateranenſe ſe trasferiſſe il nome del Re Chriſtianiſſimo: ſopra laqual coſa era già ſcritta una Bolla, contenendoſi in eſſa medeſimamente la privatione della dignità, e del titolo di Re di Francia, concedendo quel Regno a qualunque lo occupaſſe. Guicciard. lib. xi, fol. 325. - - - - He ſtyrred vp to make warre, the king of Englande, to whom he had transferred by publike decree of the councel of Latran, the name of Chriſtianiſſimo, whereof there was already a Bul written, and in it likewiſe was conteyned the priuation of the dignitie and name of the king of Fraunce giving his kingdom to who coulde occupie it. Fenton, ubi ſupra, pag. 632.

(60) Mezerai, Abr. Chronol. Tom. IV, pag. 464, ad ann. 1513.

(61) That is, that he had been ſuſpended by the council of Piſa, transferred to Milan.

* Paul. Diacon. de Geſt. Longob. lib. i, cap. v.

(62) Spondanus, ad ann. 1512, n. 3, pag. m. 289, where theſe words have been placed as a ſummary, Quibus illiciis Pontifex ſibi Anglos benevolos reddiderit.

(63) Abregé Chronol. Tom. IV, pag. 459, ad ann. 1512.

(64) Varill. Hiſtoire de Louis XII, livr. viii, pag. 81.

This Pope was ſo tired with the plaiſters that his Surgeon put unſucceſsfully upon an ulcer, that he would no longer ſuffer him to dreſs it. The Surgeon, who had promiſed with an oath not to uſe any more that remedy, made uſe of an artifice, and cured it [R]. Bandel tells a ſtory that is pleaſant enough [S]. I have juſt now read in a French writer, that this Pope was ſo malicious as to invent a fable prejudicial to the memory of Gaſton de Foix, duke of Nemours, and which might increaſe the ſuperſtition of the people, to the diſadvantage of France. The ſtory was, that a ſerpent had been religion, that an Engliſh biſhop ſounded an alarm for war the day after the feaſt (65), where the chief members of the parliament were treated with the good wines and excellent cheeſes which the Pope's ſhip had brought to London. This prelate repreſented, that Lewis XII was a perſecutor of the church, and that it 'would be an eternal diſgrace to the Engliſh nation to live in peace with the perſecutors of 'the holy ſee.' Varillas ſhould have a little better explained all the reaſons of this prelate, and not have been contented to give us to underſtand, that ſome political reaſons were added to thoſe religious motives. The Engliſh prelate urged no doubt, that Lewis XII would depoſe the Pope, only to create another in his room, who would permit him to conquer Italy. This certainly was the true ſpring that put Henry VIII in motion; he plainly perceived, that if no oppoſition was made to it, Lewis XII would reap all the glory of depoſing Julius II, the ſcourge of Chriſtendom, and of creating a new Pope devoted to him, and of ſubduing all Italy. Human policy and jealouſy do not ſuffer a prince to conſent to ſuch an aggrandizing of the glory and power of his neighbours; and for this reaſon Lewis XII ſaw the forces of England, Swiſſerland and Spain againſt him.

[Q] Mr Varillas, who mentions a certain ſpeech . . . is liable to cenſure.] He ſays (66), that Pompey Colonna, and Antony Sevelli, underſtanding that the Pope was fallen into 'a ſort of a ſwoon, that laſted 'four hours, and gave occaſion to believe he was 'dead . . . . . called (67) their friends together, run 'through the ſtreets, encouraged the townſmen to a 'ſedition, and led them to the town-hall, where Colonna, the moſt eloquent of the two, pronounced the 'moſt ſatirical ſpeech that is extant, againſt the Popes 'in general, and Julius in particular. He pretended, 'that they had moſt of them abuſed the ſovereign 'authority, ever ſince they had uſurped it; and 'reckoning up the towns that had heretofore been under tyrants, he concluded, that not one of them had 'been ſo ill treated as that of Rome. He entered into the particulars of the conduct of the late Popes, 'and dropt ſome things upon that ſubject, which it is 'not decent to relate.' Mr Varillas adds (68), 'that 'Guicciardin had written this ſpeech from the memoirs of two or three perſons that heard it; but it 'has been taken out of the body of his hiſtory. Nevertheleſs it is to be found printed by itſelf in Italian; and the French tranſlator who recovered it, 'reſtored it to the place it was taken from.' I have occaſion for another paſſage of this author, before I make my criticiſm: let us ſee the beginning of his preface (69). 'When, ſays he, I cauſed the eighth 'book of this hiſtory to be printed, I thought that the 'ſpeech of Pompey Colonna to the principal citizens 'of Rome, to oblige them to ſhake off the Pope's 'yoke, was a very rare piece. Indeed, I had never 'ſeen it, except in the king's library. But I have 'been informed ſince, that it has been reprinted by 'the care of the late Mr Wicquefort, at the beginning 'of the book he publiſhed with the title of Thuanus 'Reſtitutus, and conſequently it is not hard to recover. 'It is true however, that the ſame Mr Wicquefort has 'acquitted himſelf, in that reſpect, but of one part 'of his duty to the public, ſince he has not mentioned the motives that occaſioned this ſpeech, which is 'the moſt inſolent that can be read; and whereas 'Guicciardin has been as negligent to relate them, the 'curious will perhaps not be diſpleaſed, if I ſupply 'the deficiency of theſe two hiſtorians. The firſt motive, &c.'

I can neither affirm nor deny that this ſpeech is in the French king's library; but I can ſay, that Guicciardin has never inſerted it in his hiſtory. He only ſpeaks (70) by the bye of the tumult theſe two perſons endeavoured to raiſe; and he does not ſay, that it was Pompey Colonna who made that ſpeech, as being the moſt eloquent. It is not true, that the French tranſlator has reſtored this ſpeech to the place from whence it was taken. If it was ſo, it would not be a rare piece, the French tranſlation of Guicciardin being a book common enough. It is not true, that it was reprinted by the care of Mr Wicquefort, at the beginning of Thuanus Reſtitutus; but this doubtleſs miſled Varillas. They have left out of the fourth book of Guicciardin a long diſcourſe concerning the manner how the Popes became temporal lords of part of Italy. The Proteſtants have preſerved this diſcourſe, and publiſhed it by itſelf a great many times (71). It is to be found (72) in Latin, Italian, and French, at the end of Thuanus Reſtitutus, printed at Amſterdam, in 1663, and it is in the place where it ought to be in the French tranſlation of Guicciardin, made by Jerom Chomedey, and printed at Geneva in the year 1593, with ſummaries and marginal notes, which breathe a true Proteſtant ſpirit (73). Varillas having heard ſome account of this diſcourſe, and ſomething concerning the ſpeech of thoſe who endeavoured to diſpoſe the Romans to an inſurrection in the year 1511, has confounded the one with the other (§ α).

[(§ α) Though Guicciardin has not inſerted in his hiſtory the ſpeech of Pompey Colonna, he has however given us an abſtract of it, which having been left out in moſt editions, was reprinted by Wicquefort at the end of his Thuanus Reſtitutus. Note, that the ſaid abſtract is alſo wanting in Fenton's Engliſh tranſlation, pag. 540. REM. CRIT.]

[R] His Surgeon . . . . made uſe of an artifice which cured the ulcer.] Naudé brings in this example in a diſſertation, where he enquires whether a patient ought to be deceived. 'Is (celeberrimus Chirurgus Joannes 'de Vigo) dum nodum carnoſum Julii ſecundi contumaciorem in dies fieri, & Pontificem omne genus remediorum conſtanter reſpuere animadverteret, novam quamdam medendi rationem meditatus eſt: pannos ſiquidem veteres fruſtillatim conſcerptos unà cum 'panis ſiliginei mica molliore, & arſenici ſublimati in 'aquis roſarum & plantaginis excepti fomento, ad tertias in vaſe æneo decoxit, expreſſiſque demum illis, '& pulveris modo ulceri admotis, quod nullis deinceps unguentis ſe curaturum jurejurando receperat, 'brevi ſumma cum omnium admiratione Pontificem à 'gravi & moleſto affectu liberavit (74). —— The famous Surgeon Johannes de Vigo, perceiving that 'an ulcer of Julius II became every day more ſtubborn, 'and that the Pope perſiſted in refuſing all manner of 'remedies, hit upon a new method of cure: for he boiled together in a braſs kettle, for three hours, old 'rags cut in pieces, with crums of fine bread, and a fomentation of arſenic ſublimed in roſe-water, and plantain; after which, drying them, and applying them 'by way of powder to the wounds, to which he had 'ſworn he would no longer apply plaiſters, he cured the 'Pope in a very ſhort time of a troubleſome diſeaſe, to 'the wonder of every one.'

[S] Bandel tells a ſtory that is pleaſant enough.] 'The Germans, ſays he (75), having asked the Pope 'leave to eat fleſh upon St Martin's day, when it 'ſhould fall on a fiſh-day; Julius would not flatly deny 'them that favour, but granted it on condition they 'ſhould drink no wine the ſame day.' This was the ſame thing as a refuſal; there being more to be loſt than gotten by ſuch a favour.

[T] He

(65) Henry VIII gave that entertainment.

(66) Varillas, Hiſt. de Louis XII, lib. viii, pag. 8, ad ann. 1511.

(67) Ibid. pag. 10.

(68) Ib pag. 13.

(69) Of the third Tome of the Hiſtory of Lewis XII.

(70) Guicciardin, Livr. x, fol. 280. See alſo Paul Jovius, in Vita Leonis X, pag. m. 108.

(71) See the article GUICCIARDIN, remark [A].

(72) With two other paſſages that had been retrenched, one out of the third book of Guicciardin, and the other out of the tenth book.

(73) Written by la Noue.

(74) Naudæus, in Pentade Quæſt. Iatrophilologicarum, pag. 122. Edit Genev. 1647. He quotes Joan. de Vigo, lib. iii, Chirur Tract. II, cap. v.

(75) Bandel. ubi ſupra. This is a remark of Mr de la Monnoie.

been ſeen to come out of the duke of Nemours's tomb. The author who tells me this, ſpeaks very ill of that Pope [T].

[T] He was ſo malicious as to invent a fable prejudicial to the memory of Gaſton de Foix . . . . . the author who tells me this, ſpeaks very ill of that Pope.] I begin with the ſtory: ‘Non defuere qui prædicarent ſerpentem viſum de Fuxenſis tumulo ſibilum exilire, & hi maximè ſacrificuli; nam ab iiſdem ſæpè aliquid ſpectri novi intelligimus, ſed Phyſici mitiores (76). —— Some there were who gave out, that a ſerpent was ſeen to ſpring out, hiſſing, from the tomb of De Foix, and thoſe chiefly prieſts: for we often hear from them of ſome new prodigy; but naturaliſts are kinder to us.’ Note, by the way, that he ſays the prieſts were the principal promoters of the ſtory; and that it is a common thing with them to ſpread prodigies. I omit his quotation of Ælian and Sozomen (77), and will only take what relates to our Julius II. ‘Tales nugas in vulgus emiſerat malignitas Julii II Pontificis Rom. credulitas rudis dederat incrementum (78). —— The malice of Pope Julius II, ſpread theſe fables among the people, who too credulouſly propagated them.’ He relates afterwards how this Pope deceived cardinal George d'Amboiſe, and made Rome reſound with arms; and how he was delighted with ſatirical verſes againſt France. He forgave a Poet ſeveral crimes, and ordered him a good ſum of money for a diſtich, which we ſhall ſee below. ‘Verſiculis ad Gallorum ignominiam ſpectantibus mirè delectabatur: adeò ut poëtæ ſtateres aureos ducentos numerarit, præter delictorum abolitionem, qui hos vulgaſſet:

Julius evulſit Gallis cythereius alas:
Martius hic priſco Cæſare major erit (79).

—— He was wonderfully delighted with verſes reflecting on the French; inſomuch, that he made a preſent of two hundred pieces of gold, beſides the pardon of his ſins, to the Poet, who had publiſhed the following:

Julius, who pluck'd the Frenchmens wings, ſhall be Greater than Cæſar of antiquity.

Forcatulus, my author in this remark, oppoſes to theſe two verſes a ſharp diſtich that was made againſt this Pope. ‘Eminuit in contrarium non inelegans Diſtichum, dignum, opinor, quod Catulli eſſet, non autoris incogniti:

Fæx Ligurum Romam, ponti fæx concutit armis
Julius, huic Brutum Gallia fortis alit (80).

—— There was handed about a tolerably good diſtich to the contrary, worthy, I think, of Catullus, not of an unknown author:

From France another Brutus ſoon ſhall come,
To ſhake this Julius, who with arms ſhakes Rome.

Some, continues he, obſerved, that the time was come in which another Julius, by profuſion of borrowed money, obtained the pontificate, and ſupplanted his competitors; but that this new Julius had nothing common with the other, as to learning, clemency, or honeſty; nor had nothing common with the Apoſtle St Peter, no, not as to the fiſhing-boat, ſince the Apoſtle employed it for an honeſt livelihood, but Julius in piracy. If you underſtand Latin you will ſoon ſee that I lend nothing to Forcatulus (81). ‘Nonnulli adjiciebant rediiſſe pro certo Julii ſeculum, quo ille nimirùm profuſa largitione Pontificatum indeptus fuerat conflato multo ære alieno, ſuperatiſque, ut Tranquillus ait *, duobus competitoribus ætate & dignitate potioribus . . . Julius demum qui nihil doctrinæ cum illo primo & perpetuo Dictatore commune habuit, nihil fidei & benevolentiæ, nihil cum Apoſtolo Petro ſanctitatis & prudentiæ, nihil morum (niſi forſan quòd Petrus in mari innoxiam piſcationem exercuit, ille aliquandiu, ut ajunt, piraticam) poſt novenne imperium, & ſi quid menſium excurrit, obſtinatum in Galliam animum ad Manes tulit (§γ).’

[(§γ) In the year 1511, Julius II interdicted the whole kingdom of France (except the duchy of Bretagne), and removed the fairs of Lyons to Geneva. This appears by the decree made in the third ſeſſion of the council of Lateran: ‘Anno M. D. XI. die nono Calendras Novembris, & anno ſequenti Idibus Auguſti, Franciæ Regnum, Lugdunum præcipuè, (Britanniæ Ducatu excepto) Eccleſiaſtico Interdicto ſubjecit, Nundinaſque Lugduni ſolitus habere in Genebenſem civitatem tranſtulit, ut refert Pontificium Diploma in tertia Seſſione Synodi Lateranenſis, in qua etiam hæc leguntur: Damnationis alumnos Bernardinum Carvajal, Guillelmum Briſſonet, Renatum de Pria, & Fridericum de S. Severino, Cardinales, eorumque fautores ſacro Concilio approbante damnamus, reprobamus & deteſtamur. Porro Julius Papa, qui antea Julianus, in hæc verba prorupit moriens, Ut Julius Cardinalibus indulgeo Schiſmaticis, ut Julianus juſtitiæ rationem habendam judico: id notatam eſt à Pariſio Craſſ. Cæremoniarum Sacelli Pontificii Magiſtro †. REM. CRIT.]

JULIUS III, created Pope the ſeventh of February 1550, was called John Maria del Monte. He was of low extraction, and a true ſoldier of eccleſiaſtical fortune. He roſe up ſtep by ſtep till he came to be preſident of the council of Trent [A]. He was a very voluptuous man [B], and paſſionately loved a young boy very ugly, and of very

[A] He had roſe up ſtep by ſtep till he became preſident of the council of Trent.] Not to ſpeak of his firſt advancements, I ſhall firſt obſerve, that he aſſiſted in the council of Lateran, and made a ſolemn ſpeech at the concluſion of it. He was archbiſhop of Siponto, auditor of the apoſtolical chamber, and twice governour of Rome. He was given for an hoſtage when Rome was ſacked by the troops of Charles V, and after his promotion to the cardinalſhip, he was frequently legate in the principal provinces of the eccleſiaſtical ſtate and at Bologna (1). ‘He took the name of Julius in memory of Julius II, who had raiſed his family by the promotion of Antony del Monte, his uncle, to the cardinalſhip, and from whom he obtained the archbiſhopric of Siponto. He was born at Rome, in that part of the town called del Parione; but his family was originally of Monte-San-Savino in Tuſcany, from whence he took the name of Monte, inſtead of that of Giocchi, which he bore before (2).’ He obtained of the duke of Tuſcany, the inveſtiture of Monte-San-Savino for his brother: he could not deny himſelf the pleaſure of ſeeing his family lord it in that place. Impotens ſibi temperandi ab eâ voluptate quâ ſuos adſpiceret in illis dominantes inter quos educati fuerant æquales (3).

[B] He was a very very voluptuous man.] Here is what Thuanus ſays of it. ‘Sub id tempus Julius III intemperantia vitæ magis quam ſenio effœtus fato conceſſit, qui Joanne Baptiſta Balduini fratris F. Mortuo, cum non ita a Fabiano juniore Baptiſtæ fratre, ſollicitaretur, totum ſe voluptatibus mancipaverat, parato ad delicias nobili illo receſſu, ſtructura & operibus antiquis admirando, in quo fere reliquam vitam à negotiis vacuus cum amicis ſui ſimilibus, inter ludos, aleam, comœdias, & quæ talia comitari amant, ſacro faſtigio indigna oblectamenta, continuatis nocti diebus tranſegit (4). —— About that time died Julius III, through intemperance of life, not old age; who, after the death of John Baptiſt, nephew to Baldwin, being not ſo ſollicited by Fabian, younger brother of Baptiſt, gave himſelf up wholly to pleaſures, in that noble retirement, ſo famous for it's ſtructure and works of antiquity, in which he paſſed the reſt of his life, free from buſineſs, with friends like himſelf, diverting himſelf day and night with gaming, plays, and ſuch like entertainments, unworthy his ſacred dignity.’

---

(76) Forcatulus, de Gallor. Imperio & Philoſophia, lib. iv, pag. m. 553.

(77) Lib. ix, cap. xvii, concerning two ſerpents found in the ſepulchre of the prophet Zachariah.

(78) Forcat. ubi ſupra, pag 554.

(79) Id. ibid. pag. 556.

(80) Id. ibid.

(81) Id. ibid.

* In Julio, cap. xiii.

† Petr. Frizon, in Gallia Purpurata, pag. 557. Hæc tes Craſſus, in Diariis Pontif.

(1) Taken from Palavicini, Hiſtor. Concil. Trident. lib. xiii, cap. x, n. 8.

(2) Amelot de la Houſſaye, in the margin of his tranſlation of Father Paul, pag. 280, ex Onuphrio.

(3) Palavicini, ubi ſupra.

(4) Thuan. lib. xv, pag. 306.

of very mean birth [C]. When he was made Pope, he gave him his cardinal's cap [D], and made a pleaſant anſwer, when the unworthineſs of the perſon was repreſented to him [E]. His diſcourſes had but little gravity in them, as appears from the

[C] He paſſionately loved a young boy, very ugly, and of very mean birth.] Some ſaid it was his ſon, others denied it, and told how cardinal del Monte having found this lad playing tricks with a monkey in the ſtreets, took him into his ſervice, becauſe there was no body but he that durſt play with that creature. This was the foundation of a kindneſs which afterwards grew a diſorderly paſſion. This lad had nothing in him but what was loathſome, only he had gotten a habit of buffoonry. Thomas Eraſtus relates this; theſe are his own words. ‘Habet puerum quendam, nigram, turpem, arrogantiſſimam beſtiam, ineptam, ignorantem & planè inertem, niſi quod nonnihil eorum quæ ſcurræ, dicteriorum in ore habet. In ſumma, corpore & animo monſtrum. Quis, unde, aut cujus ille puer ſit, tam ſunt variæ hominum ſententiæ & opiniones, ut nemo exploratum habere videatur. Animadverti ego quoſdam, qui filium arbitrabantur; & qui filium negabant, ingenioſè aliorum dicta refutare, atque in plateis repertum eduxiſſe è parvulo, propter ſimiam, cum qua præter illum nemo hominum ludere auderet. Ea re Cardinalem (aut Epiſcopum tum) ita delectatum, ut pro ſuo habuerit. Hunc puerum, miſer, ita amat perditè, ita deperit (dicitur autem alios omnes vincere ἐν τῇ παιδεραστίᾳ) ut nihil poſſit dici vehementius (5). —— He has a boy, a black, filthy, inſolent brute, ſilly, and ignorant, and quite a fool, except that he can play the buffoon a little. Upon the whole, he is a monſter both in body and mind. Who he is, and whence he ſprung, no one knows. Some think him his ſon; and thoſe, who deny it, ingenuouſly come off, by ſaying, he found him in the ſtreets, and brought him up from a child, becauſe of his playing with an ape, which no one elſe dared to do: the cardinal (or biſhop, then) was ſo pleaſed, they ſay, with the ſight, that he took him for his own. He is the fondeſt imaginable of this boy, as indeed he exceeds all others in pederaſty.’ Thuanus ſays a thing which confirms part of this: as firſt, that this boy was called the monkey, even when he had obtained the cardinal's cap. In the ſecond place, that he had his name, becauſe of his employment with the cardinal, his maſter, which was to look after a monkey. Soluti ad omnem licentiam animi homo: they are the words of this great hiſtorian, which give a very ill character of Pope Julius III. ‘Statim adepta dignitate qualis eſſet, omnibus manifeſtum fecit. Nam cum antiquæ conſuetudinis ſit, ut novus Pontifex galerum, cui velit, ſuum largiatur, eum juveni cuidam cui Innocentio nomen, quique, quod in familia ſimiæ curam gereret. Simiæ etiam poſt adeptam dignitatem nomen retinuit, cognomine etiam ſuo atque inſignibus attributis donavit (6). —— Being addicted to every kind of pleaſure, he was no ſooner created Pope, than he diſcovered to every one his diſpoſition. For, it being an ancient cuſtom, that the new Pope gives his hat to whom he pleaſes, he gave it to a certain youth, whoſe name was Innocentius, and who, becauſe he had the care of a monkey in the family, retained the name of Simia, giving him his name and marks of honour.’ See the notes upon the Confeſſion Catholique de Sancy, page 249, of the edition 1699.

[D] . . . . . he gave him his cardinal's cap.] We have juſt ſeen in Thuanus, that cardinal del Monte being Pope, immediately conferred his cap, his name, and (7) his arms upon a young fellow that was called Innocent, and took care of a monkey. Eraſtus, whom I have already cited, gives us a more particular account. This boy was left at Bologna, ſo that Julius III who would not bring him to Rome before he had made him a cardinal, and who wanted a little time to make that promotion reliſhed, was very uneaſy at his abſence, and endeavored to find a remedy for it. He was never gay and pleaſant, but when he heard of his Innocent, and enquired after him of all thoſe who could give an account of him. He ordered him to come near Rome, that he might have an opportunity to go and ſee him; and having ſent for him once ſecretly into the city, he expected him at the windows with all the impatience of a man, to whom his miſtreſs has promiſed a night. He was heard ſay, that the chief reaſon why he rejoiced for being Pope, was becauſe it gave him an opportunity of being a benefactor to Innocent; and that he thought himſelf leſs indebted to the cardinals for making him Pope, than for having conſented to the promotion of Innocent to a cardinal's hat (8). He appointed him his principal miniſter, and interceſſor for all thoſe that would obtain favours of him. ‘Dum Romæ poſt electionem commoraretur, (manſerat autem Innocentius, id ei nomen, Bononiæ) dicitur nunquam lætus fuiſſe, niſi dum aliquid de Innocentio intelligeret. Et audivi ego à gravibus viris, inter tam multos Bononienſes, qui Romam ſint profecti, neminem eſſe repertum, quem ſciret cum Innocentio, aut ſuſpicaretur fuiſſe, qui non interrogatus ab eo eſſet, quid, & quomodo Innocentius ageret. Poſt aliquot menſes propius Romam accedere juſſit, ut ad eum deambulatum aliquando Roma exire poſſet. Non enim potuit adduci, ut pateretur eum ingredi Romam, niſi galero rubeo eſſet ornatum turpe caput. Ab hac re plurimi Cardinales videbantur abhorrere, minimeque paſſuri, ut in Cardinalium numerum cooptaretur, quem ne hominem quidem eſſe cognoviſſent. Accerſivit igitur noctu aliquando in urbem clam, atque ita in feneſtris expectabat, ut ii ſolent, quibus amica, qua nihil habent in vita charius, pollicita eſt noctem. Dicitur dixiſſe; ſe lætari, quod in ampliſſimam illam poteſtatem eſſet collocatus, non tam ſua cauſa, quàm quòd poſſet bene de Innocentio mereri. Et tandem factus Cardinalis dixit, ſe pro beneficio magis Cardinalibus obſtrictum eſſe, quàm quòd ſe Pontificem eſſe voluerint. Præterea, ut qui aliquid à ſe velint, id per Innocentium eſſe impetrandum. Quemobrem Legati Civitatum, Principum & Regum ad puerum concurrunt, illi ſua negotia exponunt, ut is de rebus ſuis graviſſimis etiam ad Papam referat (9).’ Some ſatires were publiſhed at Rome, in which it was ſaid that this favourite, as ugly as he was, was a new Ganymede. The Pope made no myſtery of it; but ſometimes told the cardinals ſome ſtories of this boy's laſcivious tricks. ‘Romæ fama, erat, & libellis quoque perſcriptum fuit, à Jove Ganymedem foveri, licet deformem: ſed nec ipſe Pontifex hoc ad reliquos Cardinales diſſimulare, & per jocum fertur aliquando commemorare, quam ſit laſcivus adoleſcens & importunus (10).’ I ſhall ſpeak again of the adventures of this man in the remark [M].

[E] . . . . and he made a pleaſant anſwer when the unworthineſs of the perſon was repreſented to him.] I will make uſe of John Bodin's words. ‘The prince who exalts a worthleſs creature above men of merit, or that ſets him in the rank of the greateſt perſons, in doing good to one, does injury to all the reſt: As it was repreſented by the conſiſtory of cardinals to Pope Julius del Monte, when he gave his cardinal's cap to the young lad he loved; that it was a great diſhonour to admit him who had neither virtue nor knowledge, nor birth, nor eſtate, nor any other quality to deſerve, as they ſaid, to arrive to ſuch a dignity. But the Pope, who was very facetious, addreſſing himſelf to the other cardinals; what virtue, ſaid he, what nobility, what knowledge, what honour have you found in me, to make me Pope (11)?’ Was not this to make a jeſt of the Sacred College? And might not Cato's exclamation be applied to this Pope, What a comical conſul have we (12). Some report Julius's anſwer was thus: ‘pray what have you found in me, to do me the honour of making me Pope without deſerving it? Let us advance then this young man, and he will deſerve it (13).’ Theſe laſt words are a ſly jeer, and reprove a very common fault. When a man is poſſeſſed of an employment, he finds a thouſand flatterers, who give out, he has very well deſerved it. Montagne ſays ſomewhere ‡, that Antiſthenes once made the Athenians ſenſible of the abuſe committed in the promotions to public poſts; he adviſed them to give order, that their aſſes ſhould be made to plough as well as their horſes. It was anſwered him, that that animal was not made for it: ‘it is all one, replied he, all depends upon your decree; for the moſt ignorant and unqualified, that you employ, as commanders in your wars, fail not immediately to become highly meritorious, becauſe you employ them.’

---

(5) Thomas Luberus (qui Eraſtus poſtea voce Græca appellari amavit) in Epiſtola ad Pellicanum, apud Hottingerum, Hiſt. Eccleſiaſt. Tom. V, pag. 572.

(6) Thuan. lib. vi, pag. 121, col. 1.

(7) See the remark [M], in in the margin, citat. (30).

(8) Compare with this what is ſaid in the remark [M], citat. †.

(9) Eraſtus, apud Hottingerum, ubi ſupra.

(10) Sleidanus, Hiſtor. lib. xxi, fol. m. 609, verſo.

(11) Bodin, de la Republique, lib. v, cap. iv, pag. m. 748.

(12) Adjungit Plutarchus eum (Ciceronem) cum Murænam Conſul defenderet quem accuſaſſet Cato, ſcite excogitaſſe ſententias & præcepta Stoicorum in Catone, unde riſus ingens à corona pervenerit ad ſubſellia, ſubriſiſſe porro ipſum Catonem leviter atque ad conſeſſum dixiſſe, quam ridiculum, judices, habemus Conſulem. Vaſſor de Ludicra Dictione, pag. 329.

(13) John Creſpin, l'Eſtat de l'Egliſe, ad ann. 1550, pag. m. 551, ex Pauló Vergerio.

‡ Book iii, cap. vi.

the reflexion he one day made upon the anſwer of two cardinals [F]. The want of gravity was not his greateſt fault: it is ſaid that his diſcourſe proceeded ſometimes to prophaneneſs and blaſphemy; as when he excuſed his paſſion by inſtancing the anger that God expreſſed againſt Adam for an apple [G]. During the conclave in which he was elected, ſome of his letters were intercepted, which made it conjectured, that this future Pope would be a leud man; for thoſe letters were ſtuffed with the moſt extravagant obſcenities [H]. It is thought his money fruſtrated the election of Cardinal Pole, which had been concluded on, and the publication whereof was only deferred, becauſe they were afraid it would be an ill omen to notify it in the night (a). The medal which he ordered to be ſtruck after the death of Edward king of England, had for it's motto a ſentence of the holy Scripture, the application whereof proved falſe in a little time [I]. This Pope died the twentieth of February 1555, being about ſixty eight years

[F] The reflexion which he one day made upon the anſwer of two cardinals.] They found him in the court of his palace in a very indecent poſture; for by reaſon of the heat he had put off his cloaths, and was walking in his drawers. He obliged them to do the like, and afterwards asked them, what the people would ſay of them, ſhould they go and ſhew themſelves in that figure in the field of Flora, and the ſtreets of Rome? They would take us, anſwered they, for idle rogues, and would throw ſtones at us. Therefore, replied he, it is to our cloaths we are obliged for not being thought idle rogues: how much then are we indebted to our cloaths? ‘Cum aliquando exutis veſtibus, diploide & caligis tantùm indutus, in aula, quòd ferveret tempeſtas, obambularet, venerunt Cardinales duo, collocuturi cum ipſo. Quos ipſe ad exuendas veſtes ſuas, & deambulandum ſecum urgebat, mox autem nudos interrogabat: Quid ſi in Campo Floræ, aut per plateas nudi ſic deambularemus, quid oro populum exiſtimatis de nobis judicaturum? Reſponderunt: Judicarent nos eſſe nebulones, & conjicerent in nos rudera atque lapides. Excepit Pontifex: Ergo quod non habemur pro nebulonibus, id acceptum ferre debemus noſtris veſtibus. Quantum igitur, ô fratres, debemus illis noſtris veſtibus (14)?’

[G] He excuſed his paſſion by inſtancing the anger that GOD expreſſed againſt Adam for an apple.] The thing is thus, related in John Creſpin's book. ‘(15) He loved amongſt other diſhes, to eat hogs fleſh, and peacoks: but as his Phyſician had cautioned him againſt eating hogs fleſh, becauſe it was bad for the gout, with which he was often tormented, and yet he could not abſtain from it; the Phyſician ſecretly adviſed the ſteward to give orders that no hogs fleſh ſhould be ſerved in. As therefore it was omitted for ſome time, and the Pope perceived it, he asked the ſteward, where was his diſh of pork? The ſteward anſwered, the Phyſician had ordered that none ſhould be brought in. Upon which he exclaimed in this manner, bring me my diſh, (al diſpetto di Dio) in ſpight of GOD. . . . Seeing one day a peacock at dinner, which no body touched, keep, ſaid he, this peacock cold for my ſupper, and lay the table in the garden, for I ſhall have ſome company at night. As he was at ſupper, and ſaw hot peacocks brought to table, but not his cold one, which he had ordered to be kept for him, flying into a bitter paſſion, he uttered an execrable blaſphemy againſt God. Upon which one of the cardinals who ſate at table with him, ſaid, your holineſs ought not to be in ſo great a paſſion, for ſo little a thing. Julius replied, if GOD could be ſo very angry for an apple, as to turn our firſt father, Adam, out of paradiſe; why ſhould it not be lawful for me, who am his vicar, to be in a paſſion for a peacock, ſince a peacock is much more than an apple?’ They who will read this ſtory in two languages, may ſatisfy their curioſity by caſting their eyes on what follows (16): Sæpiſſimè nequiſſimus iſte homo blaſphemiis illis uſus fuit quæ impuriſſimis lenonibus aliiſque deſperatæ malitiæ hominibus tunc temporis frequenter in ore fuerunt, ad quas animus totus quantus exhorreſcit, vid. Al diſpetto di Dio, in contemptum (17) Dei, & Potta di Dio, i. e. ad vulvam Dei &c. exemplum hujus rei proponit auctor libri cui titulus, Lectura ſuper Canone de conſecr. diſt. 3. ajens: ‘Intellexi, portatam fuiſſe in Civitatem Paduæ quandam hiſtoriam, impreſſam Latine, Italicè, Germanicè, & Gallicè, in qua narratur, quòd Sanctiſſimus Dominus noſter Papa Julius III proximis diebus valdè fuit iratus cum Epiſcopo Ariminenſe, ejus Magiſtro domus, propter certum pavonem, & quum ſua prælibata Sanctitas bis blaſphemaſſet, primò dicendo, Potta di Dio, deinde Al diſpetto di Dio, quod fecit tanquam Johannes Maria de Monte, & ſic tanquam homo, non tanquam Julius III Papa, & Vicarius Chriſti, de quo ſupra dixi. Et quùm unus Cardinalis illi dixiſſet, quòd non deberet iraſci propter unam tàm parvam rem, id eſt, propter unum pavonem, tunc ſanctiſſimus D. Papa reſpondit; Si Deus fuit totus turbatus, & in magna ira & colera, propter unum pomum, & tanta mala fecit omnibus hominibus; quare non poſſum ego, qui ſum ſuus Vicarius in terris, iraſci cum meo magiſtro domus propter unum pavonem?’

[H] Thoſe letters were ſtuffed with the moſt extravagant obſcenities.] They were written the twenty ſixth of January 1550, to one Annibal Contin by Camillus Oliva a conclaviſt of the cardinal of Mantua, and accompanied with a little poem, in which the author filthily deſcribed his paſſion, and the vehement ardour, that made him wiſh to have his friend again. It is John Sleiden who tells this. ‘Dum in Conclavi res agitur, interceptæ fuerunt literæ, quas ex Cardinalis Mantuani familiaribus, quidam, Camillus Olivus, ad quendam ſuum Annibalem Continum, Januarii die XXVI, ſcripſiſſe ferebatur, & ſimul carmen lingua populari ſcriptum, ubi de ſua locutus affectione, & abſentis deſiderio, tam pudendis utitur verbis, ut ſine flagitio vix ea recitare liceat. Hinc jocus illorum, qui pontificem dicebant aliquem obſcœnum prænunciari, qui proditurus eſſet ex eo Conclavi, quòd ejuſmodi literas daret (18).’ An author above cited does not relate this paſſage without having firſt ſaid, ‘Vir doctus anonymus in Epiſt. ad amicum narrat, ex eo Conclavi, in quo creatus eſt Julius, interceptas fuiſſe literas alicujus ex Conclaviſtis, i. e. ex illis, qui ſolent aſſidere Cardinalibus, Papam electuris, quibus quidem literis non putet ullâ memoriâ unquam ſcriptas fuiſſe ullas obſcœniores, ſceleratioreſque. Nudis enim nefandiſſimiſque verbis illic agi cum cinædo, ſalvo honore, Has, fateri, ad ſe primum in Germaniam fuiſſe miſſas, ſed dare typis excudendas (ut multi voluiſſent) nunquam quidem ſe voluiſſe. Paulo poſt addit, Julium III valdè male audire in hoc obſcœniſſimo genere, (Sodomitici nim. criminis) ita ut neque a Cardinalibus abſtineat (19).’

[I] A medal which he ordered to be ſtruck . . . had for it's motto a ſentence of the holy Scripture, the application whereof proved falſe in a little time.] They expreſſed an extraordinary joy at Rome, for the death of king Edward; becauſe the princeſs Mary, who ſucceeded him, reſtored England to the obedience of the Pope; but the reaſons of that joy ceaſed in a little time. Queen Elizabeth re-eſtabliſhed the Reformation, and rendered that iſland one of the moſt flouriſhing kingdoms in Chriſtendom; ſo that the prediction of the medal was a meer chimera. ‘Eo inſaniæ Julius pervenit, ut in perpetuam rei memoriam excudi curaverit monetam, cujus altera pars ejus imaginem tricorniferam oſtentavit, altera inſcriptionem ejuſmodi habuit: Gens & Regnum, quod non ſervierit tibi, peribit. Sibi ſtolidè vindicans, quod Chriſto Eſaias. Sed diuturnum & ſtabile gaudium neutiquam fuit (20). ——— Julius arrived to ſuch a pitch of madneſs, that he ordered a medal to be ſtruck to perpetuate the memory of the thing, on one ſide of which was a figure with three horns, and on the reverſe this inſcription: The people and kingdom, which will not

---

(a) Poſt longam Cardinalium in conclavi diſceptationem, cùm, teſte in Muſeo Hiſtorico Johanne Imperiali, ὁμοψήφως Papa jam electus eſſet Reginaldus Polus, eamque electionem promulgare nocte appetente inauſpicatum duxiſſent iidem; nocte tranſacta & mutatis rationibus aureis Julius Papa ſubitò emerſit. Heidegg. Hiſtor. Papatus, pag. 233.

(14) Bullinger, in Vita MS. Julii III, apud Heideggerum Hiſt. Papatus, pag. 235.

(15) Ubi ſupra, pag 553.

(16) Joann. Zuingerus, in Tractatu Hiſtor. Theologico de Feſto Corporis Chriſti, pag. 146.

(17) The word contemptus, does not expreſs the force of the Italian word diſpetto: it ſhould have been ſaid invito Deo.

(18) Sleidanus, Hiſt. lib xxi, fol. m 609, verſo. This is alſo to be found in Thuanus, in the Francfort edition, 1625, lib. vi, pag 121.

(19) Joann. Zuingerus, ubi ſupra.

(20) Heidegger. Hiſt. Papatus, pag 238.

years of age (b). He pretended to be ſick [K]; and the better to deceive the world, he reduced himſelf to a courſe of Phyſic, which brought upon him a real diſeaſe, of which he died. It is ſaid, that there was ſo great an intimacy betwixt him and cardinal Creſcentio, that they had miſtreſſes in common; and that they maintained the children they had by them at a common charge [L], for want of knowing who was the true father. Each of them alſo paid his quota for the maintenance of theſe women. Cardinal Pallavicino extenuates as much as he can the faults of this Pope, but he does not confute what Father Paul ſays of them [M] I forgot to obſerve, that the court of (b) Spondanus, ad ann. 1555, n. 43. but Palavicini, Hiſtor. Concil. lib. xiii, cap. x, n. 7, ſays he was ſeventy years old.

'ſerve thee, ſhall periſh: fooliſhly arrogating to himſelf, what Iſaiah ſaid of CHRIST. But the joy laſted not long.'

[K] He pretended to be ſick.] The reaſon of it was, becauſe he diſcovered, that the cardinals would refuſe to conſent to the requeſt, which his brother preſſed him to make to them. His brother paſſionately deſired the poſſeſſion of a town, and importuned the Pope perpetually on that account. That he might therefore have a pretence not to hold a conſiſtory, he pretended to be ſick. And to play this trick more artificially, he eat but little, and choſe ſuch food, as is fit for ſick people. This change of diet, they ſay, brought on him the diſtemper of which he died (21). This puts me in mind of Martial's Cælius:

Diſcurſus varios, vagumque mane,
Et faſtus, & ave potentiorum,
Cum perferre patique jam negaret;
Cœpit fingere Cælius podagram.
Quam dum vult nimis approbare veram,
Et ſanas linit obligatque plantas,
Inceditque gradu laborioſo;
(Quantum cura poteſt, & ars doloris!)
Deſit fingere Cælius podagram (22).

Tir'd with th' attendance, clients pay
At great mens levees every day,
Cælius pretends the gout: but ſee
Th' effect of this hypocriſy!
Whilſt he in flannel wraps his feet,
Or walks on crutches thro' the ſtreet,
He plays the counterfeit no more
But has the gout, he feign'd before.

Some ſay that the change of diet, was indeed the cauſe of his illneſs; but not that he reſolved upon it, in order to deceive the world: they ſay he hoped to deliver himſelf thereby from the intolerable pains of the gout. Others pretend, that an old diſtemper was the cauſe of his death, and acknowledge, that he was a man addicted to his pleaſures, who thought more of enjoying than exerciſing his pontificate. 'Sunt etiam qui dicant, eum veterano interiiſſe: cùm, ut idem etiam auctor narrat, externa quæque parum curans, fruendo potiùs quàm regendo Pontificatui incumberet, totuſque eſſet in extruendâ elegantiſſimâ ad voluptarios ſeceſſus extra portam Flaminiam Villâ Juliâ, cujus inſanire ſtudio videbatur; in quâ conviviis potiùs quàm publicæ procurationi vocabat (23).'

[L] It is ſaid he and Creſcentio . . . . . had miſtreſſes in common, and that they maintained the children they had by them at a common charge.] This I have from Thomas Eraſtus. 'Julius III Pontifex, ſays he (24), & Creſcentius fere omnes meretrices communes habuerunt, propriiſque ſumptibus neuter, ſed communibus aluerunt, atque ut breviter dicam, omnium ſcelerum ſocii extiterunt. Suſceperunt ex quadam muliere, honeſti viri Viterbienſis filiam, quam, quod neuter ſuam eſſe dicere credereque poſſet, ut matrem, ita filiam quoque communibus ſumptibus educandam tradiderunt, nuptuique dederunt Nobiliſſimo hujus urbis adoleſcenti, & inter Principeshujus urbis qui ſunt 40 conſtitutum voluerunt. ——— Pope Julius III, and cardinal Creſcentio, had almoſt all the courtezans in common, and maintained them jointly; in ſhort, were companions in all manner of vices. They had a child by a certain woman, the daughter of a gentleman of Viterbo, which, becauſe neither of them could ſay or think it was his own, as they had the mother in common, ſo they educated the daughter at the joint expence of both, and married her to a noble youth of this city, whom they would have ranked among the princes of this city, who are forty in number.' Here is a great exemption from jealouſy, which is a rare thing in that country.

[M] Cardinal Pallavicino extenuates . . . . . the faults of this Pope, but does not confute what Father Paul ſays of them.] He owns that this Pope loved to divert himſelf, but he adds that he equally loved application to buſineſs (25), he grants that he died being little eſteemed and loved (26); but he pretends, that his too free and familiar way of acting was the cauſe of it, becauſe not getting the public veneration, he made it believed that he was not a good Pope. He adds, that this judgment was unjuſt, and that if the faults of Julius III were more conſpicuous than his good qualities, they were not perhaps of ſo much conſequence as his virtues (27). As to the promotion of the young lad, he is contented to ſay (28), that it diſhonoured the firſt days of his papacy. He acknowledges that the birth of this man was ſo obſcure that it was ſtill unknown: But he pretends the affection cardinal del Monte had for him, was founded upon this, that he looked upon him as the ſon of his judgment. The meaning whereof is this; whilſt the cardinal was legate at Piacenza, he was pleaſed with the pretty carriage of a little boy, who often came near his table. He took this for a ſign of wit, and reſolved to raiſe this young plant at his own charge: and ſeeing the boy improving, he loved him more and more. He applauded himſelf for his happy conjecture; he looked upon him as the ſon of his judgment, a ſort of creature which we ſet a greater value upon than upon a child of our body. 'Oblectatus ex eo herus, ſibique plaudens, quod ſuâ quaſi perſpicacia plantam eximiam, adhuc minutulam, & in luto, diſcreviſſet, majori in puerum benevolentia incaluit, quâ illum proſequebatur veluti ſui judicii prolem, cujus filii pluris quam corporis ſoboles æſtimantur (29).' He would have his brother to adopt him; and when he was Pope, he raiſed him to the dignity of a cardinal, the thirtieth day of May 1550. He had made him ſtay till then in a village a day's journey from Rome. He gave him an income of twelve thouſand crowns: but did not then entruſt him with the adminiſtration of affairs. This new cardinal was ſcarce ſeventeen years of age: he ſhewed himſelf wholly unworthy of this honour, and it was neceſſary under the following pontificate to puniſh him for his debaucheries. This is all that Palavicino obſerves: he has cautiouſly forborn to criticiſe on Father Paul; who has moſt plainly ſhowed that the world looked upon this minion of Julius as his Catamite: prudence would not permit him to revive thoſe ideas. Wherefore he does not accuſe Father Paul of malicious ſlanders, but is contented to ſay, that he is miſtaken as to the time of the adoption (30), and as to the place where this young man firſt began to make himſelf acceptable (31). Let us ſee what Father Paul ſays. '(32) Julius immediately gave a ſpecimen of his future government, by ſpending whole days in walking in his gardens, and contriving the building of pleaſure houſes; and by diſcovering a great inclination to the pleaſures of life, and very little for buſineſs †, eſpecially for ſuch as he found difficult to manage. The embaſſador Mendoza well obſerving this humour, wrote to his maſter, that it would be eaſy to ſucceed in all his negotiations with this Pope, who being only for mirth and pleaſure, would turn any way, if he was put in fear. The opinion that was entertained of him, that he would prefer his private intereſt and affection before the public good, was ſoon confirmed by the promotion he made of a cardinal the thirty firſt of May, to whom he gave his hat, as is cuſtomary with the Popes. When he was but archbiſhop of Siponto, and governor of the town of Bologna, he took into his houſe a young boy, a native of Piacenza, whoſe original is not yet known. He took an affection

(21) Spondan. ad ann. 1555, n. 4, pag. 556, ex Onuphrio Panvinio. Thuanus relates the ſame thing, lib. xv, pag. m. 306.

(22) Mart. Epigr. xxxix, lib. vii.

(23) Spondan. ibid ex Eod.

(24) Apud Hottinger. ubi ſupra, pag. 574.

(25) Pronus ad laxamenta; ſed æque etiam ad negotia. Palavic. Hiſt. Concil Trident. lib. xiii, cap. x, n. 8

(26) Eſtimatione tenui, nec majore benevolentia mortuus eſt. Id. ibid.

(27) Nihilominus ut mea fert opinio, hæc de illo exiſtimatio fuit iniqua: ipſius quippe vitia majora quidem ad ſpeciem erant quam virtutes, ſed non fortaſſe ad pondus. Id. ibid.

(28) Id. lib. xi, cap. vii, n. 4.

(29) Id. ibid.

(30) Palavicino, lib. xi, cap. vii, n. 4, ſays that it appears from the Journal of Maſſarellus, ſecretary to the council, that the young boy was adopted, when he was one of the actors of a paſtoral, the ſecond of March, 154[illegible].

(31) Palavicino, ibid. ſays it was not at Bologna, as Father Paul will have it, but at Piacenza.

(32) Fra-Paolo, lib. iii, ad ann. 1550, pag. 28[illegible], of Amelot's tranſlation.

† Qui occupationibus totus intentus Cardinalis, veluti furtim, voluptates ſequebatur, Pontifex factus, votorum jam omnium compos, abdicata rerum cura, hilaritati & genio ſuo nimium indulſit. Onupr. in Vita.

of France offered this Pope's nephew a princeſs of the blood, and that this alliance was refuſed [N].

‘fection to him as if he had been his own child, and brought him to Trent, where he had like to have loſt him by a great fit of ſickneſs. But ſending him, by the Phyſicians advice, to Verona, for change of air, Innocent, (for that was this minion's name) recovered his health, and ſome time after returned to Trent. The day that he was to come, the legate went out of town as to take a walk, accompanied with a great many prelates, and meeting him, received him with all the exceſſive teſtimonies of joy and affection. Which gave much occaſion of diſcourſe whether it was an accidental meeting, or a thing deſigned to take him in the way. The legate uſed to ſay, that he loved him, as being the author of his fortune †, for as much as the Aſtrologers had predicted great wealth, and high dignities to this boy, which could never happen, but by his exaltation to the popedom. He was ſcarce made Pope, but Innocent was adopted by Baudouin del Monte, his brother, for his ſon: and afterwards having conferred on him many benefices, he made him a cardinal, as I have ſaid: which afforded matter enough for paſquins, and gave the courtiers an itch to ſpeak out the true cauſe of ſo ſurpriſing an action upon ſeveral conjectures drawn from paſſed accidents.’

† Onuphrius relates, that Julius ſaid he had been promoted to the pontificate for the care he had taken of that child. Affirmans ſe ad tanti honoris decus evectum, ob ea beneficia quibus illum puerum affeciſſet.

[N] The court of France offered to this Pope's nephew a princeſs of the blood. But this alliance was refuſed.] The Pope anſwered that marriages between perſons of ſo different a rank could not be happy; and as he acknowledged the royal houſe of France to be the nobleſt in the world, he acknowledged his own to be the meaneſt upon earth. However he did not give the true reaſon of this refuſal; for that which induced him to refuſe ſo glorious an alliance, was, the deſire of marrying his nephew to the great duke's daughter: which was more uſeful to him for the execution of what he was projecting in favour of his family. This we learn from Thuanus. ‘Julius, ſays he (33), ad ſcurrilitatem uſque feſtivus, & alienam ab innata deceſſoribus Pontificibus ambitione mentem præ ſe ferens, cum tamen interea Coſmi, ut proximi & ſuorum rebus utiliſſimi principis adfinitatem ultra modum expeteret, & Camertium principatum Fabiano deſtinaret, ut conditionem tam amplam eluderet, ſic Lanſacum urgentem dimiſit, ut diceret, quam ex nobiliſſima omnium, quæ uſquam fuiſſent, familia rex prognatus eſſet, tam ſe ac ſuos omnium, qui viverent, mortalium ignobiliſſimos agnoſcere; proinde nuptias, quæ inter pares melius coirent, inter inæqualeis adeo perſonas commode contrahi non poſſe. ——— Julius being pleaſant even to buffoonry, and a ſtranger to the ambition of his predeceſſors, as he eagerly courted the alliance of Coſmo, a prince neareſt him, and moſt likely to be of advantage to his family, and deſigned the principality of Camercio for Fabian, diſmiſſed Lanſac, who importuned him, telling him, that as the king was of the moſt noble family that ever was, ſo he acknowledged himſelf and his family to be the moſt ignoble of men; therefore that marriage, which requires an equality of condition, could not conveniently be contracted between perſons ſo unequal.’ Note, that one of the daughters of Coſmo duke of Florence, was betrothed to Fabian del Monte, who was Baudouin's ſon, and not yet marriageable. See Thuanus, book xiii. Palavicino, in the place above cited, obſerves, that Fabian was Baudouin's baſtard.

(33) Thuan lib. xiv, circa init. pag. m. 280, ad ann. 1554.

JUNCTIN (FRANCIS), in Italian, Giuntino, one of the famous Mathematicians and Aſtrologers of the XVIth century, was of Florence, but ſpent a good part of his life in Lyons (a), where he publiſhed ſeveral books [A]. His being doctor in Divinity (b), did not hinder him from being extremely addicted to judicial Aſtrology, and that with great credulity. I do not know in what year he died. He was fifty ſix years old when he publiſhed his commentaries upon Sacroboſco's ſphere, in the year 1577 (c). Deduce from thence the year of his birth. For the reſt, he deſcended ſometimes from the region of heaven, to divert himſelf with human diſcoveries; for he compoſed a diſcourſe upon the Epocha of Petrarch's amours (d). I have elſewhere ſpoken (e) of his horoſcope of Luther. We ſhall ſee, below, the particulars of his life, publiſhed by Poſſevin [B].

(a) See la Croix du Maine, pag. 101.

(b) Id. ibid.

(c) Voſſius, de Scient. Mathem. pag. 194.

(d) See the title of it in the remark [A].

(e) In the remark [B] of the article LUTHER.

[A] He publiſhed ſeveral books at Lyons.] He publiſhed there, in 1570, his Tractatus judicandi revolutiones nativitatum, in 8vo. Three years after he publiſhed his Speculum Aſtrologiæ quod attinet ad judiciariam rationem nativitatum atque annuarum revolutionum, cum nonnullis approbatis Aſtrologorum ſententiis (1). This work was in 4to, but in the edition of 1581, it became a Folio, by reaſon of the commentaries which were added to it, in duos poſteriores Quadripartiti Ptolomæi libros innumeris obſervationibus referta (2), & certiſſimis Aphoriſmis (quatenus ex ſiderum poſitione liceat Chriſtiano more aliquid conjicere) ex probatiſſimorum Aſtrologorum ſcriptis depromptis inſignita. His Latin commentaries upon Sacroboſco's ſphere, came out in 1577 (3). There was printed at Cologne, in 1580, a book, intituled De Divinatione quæ fit per aſtra diverſum ac diſcrepans duorum Catholicorum ſacræ Theologiæ Doctorum judicium, ſcilicet Franciſci Junctini ac Joannis Lenſæi. There are two French tracts of Junctin, viz. A large diſcourſe upon the things wherewith the comet that appeared in November, 1577, threatens many princes, countries, and people of Chriſtendom. At Paris, for Gervais Mallot, 1577 (4), and at Lyons, for Francis Didier, 1578, in 8vo (5), and A Diſcourſe upon the reformation of the year, made by our Holy Father Pope Gregory XIII, with the reaſons of his taking away ten days, and the golden number; at Lyons, 1582, in 8vo. He printed in the ſame city, in 1580, in 8vo, Diſcorſo ſopra il tempo dello inamoramento del Petrarca. Con la ſpoſitione del Sonetto, Gia fiammegiava l'amoroſa ſtella (6).

(1) See the epitome of Geſner's Bibliotheque.

(2) This word refers to commentaria.

(3) Printed at Lyons, apud Jo. Tornæſium. Voſſius mentions only that edition: Du Verdier Vau-Privas mentions only that of 1578, apud Symphorianum Beraud.

(4) La Croix du Maine, pag. 101.

(5) Du Verdier Vau Privas, Bibliotheque Françoiſe, pag. 404.

(6) Id. ibid. pag 404, 405.

[B] We ſhall ſee the particulars of his life, publiſhed by Poſſevin.] I knew him in France, ſays he (7), where he lived in exile; he applied himſelf to the pernicious ſpeculations of Aſtrology. He was a fugitive apoſtate; he had been a Carmelite, and promoted to the prieſthood, and even to be Provincial: he forſook his vows, and his profeſſion, and the Romiſh religion; but by the charitable advice of ſome devout perſons, he was in ſome meaſure brought back into the right way. He publickly abjured his hereſies in the church of the Holy Croſs at Lyons. And he gave reaſon to believe for ſome time, that he deſigned to labour for the advantage of the Catholic church. However, he did not retract the works he had made upon prognoſticating impieties (8); he was one of thoſe who putting their hand to the plough, and looking back, are not fit for the kingdom of heaven. He dealt in bills of exchange, lent money upon intereſt, and by that means got ſixty thouſand crowns, no footſteps whereof were found after his death. He had made a legacy of three thouſand livres to the Junti, to whom he had been corrector of the preſs. That teſtimony of his friendſhip did them no kindneſs. Juntis honeſtiſſimis Typographis (in quorum ædibus ſæpe librorum correctionibus operam Lugduni poſuerat) mille aureos nummos cum moriens legaſſet, ii mihi faſſi ſunt, eos uti reliquos evanuiſſe; nimirum omnia perdita fuiſſe quæ perditus ille anxie hinc inde corraſerat (9).’

(7) Poſſevinus, Biblioth Select. Tom. II, pag. m. 245.

(8) Non vidimus eum libros ſuos de impietate divinatrice retractaſſe. Id. ib.

(9) Id. ibid.

JUNGERMAN (Godfrey) made himſelf known by his learning in the beginning of the XVIIth century. He was born at Leipſic, where his father GASPAR JUNGERMAN [A], was profeſſor of Civil-Law. His mother was the daughter of the famous Joachim Camerarius of Bamberg (a), profeſſor likewiſe at Leipſic. Godfrey Jungerman underſtood the Greek tongue in perfection. The public is indebted to him for the firſt publication of Julius Cæſar's Commentaries in Greek [B]. He had already publiſhed his Latin verſion of Longus's Paſtorals, with notes (b). He printed in 1609 ſome remarks upon the treatiſe de Equuleo [C], which Magius had written in priſon. We have alſo ſome of his letters printed. He died the ſixteenth of Auguſt, 1610 (c), at Hanaw, where he had been a long time corrector of the preſs to Wechel's heirs [D].

(a) Bapenbergenſis. I add this title to diſtinguiſh this Camerarius from his ſon Joachim Camerarius, who is ſirnamed Norimbergenſis.

(b) You will ſee a fault of Moreri, concerning Jungerman, in the article LONGUS, rem. [A].

(c) Diarium Biograph. Henningi Witten.

[A] His father GASPAR JUNGERMAN.] It is probably he who is the author of ſome diſputes upon ſome points of law, which Draudius (1) mentions, and of a poem De Cuſtodia Angelica, mentioned by the ſame Draudius (2), and by Simler (3).

[B] The public is indebted to him for the firſt publication of Julius Cæſar's Commentaries in Greek.] He added to that verſion, aſcribed by ſome to Planudes, and of which the manuſcript that was in Mr Petau's Library, had been communicated to him by Bongars (4); I ſay, he added to it, not only his own remarks upon the Greek tranſlator, but alſo thoſe of ſeveral learned critics upon Julius Cæſar's Commentaries. This edition of Francfort, in the year 1606, in 4to, is very much eſteemed.

[C] He printed ſome remarks upon the treatiſe de Equuleo.] The Journal des Savans (5) ſpoke of theſe remarks with contempt, as if moſt of them ran only upon trifles; for example, to know whether it ought to be ſaid Equuleus, or Eculeus: but this cenſure is too haſty; for tho' this little point of orthography has been ſomewhat largely diſcuſſed by Jungerman, the Journaliſt ſhould not have judged of all the remarks by this, which beſides is not uſeleſs to the ſubject, nor unfit to pleaſe ſeveral perſons.

[D] He was corrector of the preſs to Wechel's heirs.] This we learn from ſome letters he wrote to Goldaſt (6). Wherein we find alſo that he was writing upon Julius Pollux; but this was known before, by the preface to his edition of Herodotus. He enriched that edition, with ſeveral pieces, and amongſt others, with ſeveral fragments of Cteſias. Mr Chevillier might have put him into the catalogue of learned men, who have been correctors of the preſs (7).

(1) Bibliotheca Claſſica, pag. 716.

(2) Ibid. pag. 1507.

(3) Epitome Bibl. Geſneri, pag. 258.

(4) See the French epiſtles written to Scaliger, pag. 368.

(5) Of the ſecond of March 1665, pag. m. 182, Dutch Edit.

(6) See the collection of the Letters to Goldaſt, printed at Francfort, in 1688, and Gudius's Letters, publiſhed at Utrecht, in 1697.

(7) Origine de l'Imprimerie de Paris, pag. 195, 196.

JUNGERMAN (Lewis) born at Leipſic the fourth of July 1572, and brother to the foregoing, was an excellent Botaniſt. He betook himſelf early to the ſtudy of plants, and got ſuch a reputation by it, that he was offered in England the place of the famous Matthias Lobel, who died at London in the year 1616; but he choſe rather to live in Germany. He had already diſtinguiſhed himſelf by contributing very much to the work, intituled, Hortus Eyſtettenſis, which contains the figure and deſcription of all the plants of the biſhop of Eichſtet's garden; and he made a catalogue of all thoſe that grow about Nuremberg, the impreſſion whereof was taken care of by Gaſpar Hofman, in the year 1615. He was made profeſſor of Phyſic at Gieſſen, in the year 1622 [A], after having planted a garden, which did very much contribute to the ſcholars proficiency. He ſpent three years in that profeſſorſhip, and afterwards he had ſuch another with that of Botanics at Altdorf, in the year 1625. He continued in them to his death, which happened the ſeventh of June 1653, and during the twenty eight years of thoſe employments, he took ſuch care of the Phyſic garden, that he made it famous even in foreign countries. He had the more time to ſpend in this buſineſs, becauſe he neither married, nor had any amorous avocation: which has given occaſion to ſay, that he cannot be praiſed for his continence, ſince he had no occaſion for a woman; for continence is a virtue, which, according to Ariſtotle, ought to cauſe a conflict, of which there appeared no ſign in Jungerman's life (a). The panegyriſt of a Monk would have given the matter another face. This profeſſor left his library to the univerſity of Altdorf. I muſt not forget, that he took a wonderful delight in making anagrams [B]. I know not whether he was fond of judicial Aſtrology; but in the Programma, from which I take this article, it is very ſeriouſly obſerved, that (a) In quo (cœlibatu) non eſt neceſſe continentiam prædicari, qua nulla in ipſo opus erat, virtus enim eſt cum lucta, Ariſtotele cenſore, conjuncta, cujus indicium nulla quæ unquam in hoc genere emicaret flamma, præbere animadverſa eſt. Abdias Trew, Matheſ & Phyſ. Prof. & Rector Univerſitatis Altdorfinæ, in Programmate apud Henning. Witten Memor. Medicorum.

[A] He was made profeſſor of Phyſic at Gieſſen, in the year 1622.] The rector of the univerſity of Altdorf has a little perplexed the Chronology, in his Programma. He pretends that Jungerman got ſo great a reputation during his profeſſorſhip at Gieſſen, that he was invited into England to ſucceed the moſt famous Botaniſt Lobel. This is to confound the time; for Lobel died in the year 1616, and Jungerman was not profeſſor at Gieſſen, but from the year 1622, to 1625. What likelihood is there that the Engliſh ſhould have left Lobel's place vacant ſix or ſeven years? doubtleſs they deſigned it for Jungerman a little after it was vacant; he had therefore acquired before his profeſſorſhip at Gieſſen, the reputation that procured him that great mark of eſteem the Engliſh had for him. Paul Freherus, who has given (1) an abſtract of that Programma, has on one hand better ſpecified the dates; but on the other, this ſerves only more clearly to diſcover the error of his calculation. Thus he ranges the dates. 'Doctor Med. ſays he, creatus, & ad Profeſſionem Med. 'publicam promotus eſt A. 1622. Hinc (2) per triennium ea nominis celebritate præfuit, ut in Angliam 'quo celeberrimi Botanici Matthiæ Lobelii ſucceſſor 'fieret invitaretur A. C. 1616. ſed ille Germaniæ conditiones prætulit. Ad deſcriptionem etiam Horti 'Eichſtettenſis tota Germania celebris laudabilem nec 'vulgarem operam contulit. ——— He was created 'doctor and profeſſor of Phyſic in the year 1622. Three 'years afterwards, his great fame procured him an invitation into England, to ſucceed Matthias Lobel, 'the Botaniſt, in the year 1616; but he choſe to continue in Germany. He laboured ſucceſſfully in the 'deſcription of the Garden of Eichſtet, ſo famous all 'over Germany.' This Hortus Eyſtettenſis was printed in the year 1613. Judge if theſe things are placed according to their time. Mr Witten's Diarium Biographicum ſuppoſes that our Jungerman was profeſſor at Leipſic, and afterwards at Altdorf. Make no ſcruple to correct it, by putting Gieſſenſi inſtead of Lipſienſi.

[B] He took a wonderful delight in making anagrams.] He publiſhed a collection of them at Gieſſen, in the year 1624, intituled, Aulæum Academicum, in 4to. We have two other works of his, namely, the catalogue

(1) Theatr. pag. 138.

(2) It ſeems that this word hinc, which anſwers the word cui in the Programma, is an error of the preſs for huic But this error of the Printers has not put the order obſerved by the author in a worſe condition.

that the humours of an Eryſipelas ſtopping on a ſudden, when Mars was retrograde, produced a ſcorbutic gangrene [C] in the extremities of his feet. Godfrey and Lewis Jungerman, had a brother named GASPAR, who was a man of letters. See the notes of Godfrey Jungerman upon the fourth chapter of the treatiſe de Equuleo.

catalogue I have mentioned in the text of this article, and another like it, intituled, Cornucopiæ Floræ Gieſſenſis, &c. Gieſſæ, 1624, in 4to.

[C] It is obſerved . . . . . that the humours of an Eryſipelas produced . . . . . . a ſcorbutic gangrene.] Theſe are the words of the Programma. Cujus (ereſipelatis) fluxus conſueti ſubito ſubſiſtentes, gangrænam ſcorbuticam ante trimeſtre (circa motum Martis in loco Lunæ natalitio oppoſito tardum & retrogradum) in extremitate pedum pepererunt. The Phyſicians of that time were wont to aſcribe much to the influence of the ſtars, in diſcourſing upon diſtempers.

JUNIUS (Hadrian) born at Horn in Holland [A] the firſt of July 1511 [B], was one of the moſt learned men of his age. He was the ſon of a burgo-maſter of great worth [C]; and he ſtudied firſt at Haerlem, afterwards at Louvain and Paris, and at laſt at Bologna in Italy, where he was admitted doctor of Phyſic. Being returned into his country, he went into England in 1543 (a), and was Phyſician to the duke of Norfolk, and afterwards to a great lady. He there wrote ſome books, and amongſt others a Greek and Latin Dictionary, in which he added above 6500 words. He dedicated it to king Edward in 1548; and becauſe he gave him the title of king, they moleſted him for it a long time after at the court of Rome. He was very much afflicted with that perſecution; for we ſee in his letters (b) to Lindanus, biſhop of Ruremond, and to cardinal Granvelle, that he paſſionately deſired that diſgrace might be taken off, with which he had been branded, ſince the cenſors had put his works in the catalogue of prohibited books. He wrote to the Pope about it, by the advice of Arias Montanus; and he prepared an apology, where proteſting that he had been always a good Catholic, he ſhewed that he could not avoid giving Edward the title of king (c). As he was a very good poet, he publiſhed in 1554, an epithalamium upon the marriage of Philip II with queen Mary (d). This perhaps would have been a conſiderable fortune to him, if England had remained quiet. He left it during the troubles [D], and confined himſelf at Horn; but the king of Denmark quickly ſent for him, to make him preceptor to the prince, his ſon (e). Junius not being able to reconcile

(a) See his Apology among his Letters, pag. 392, where he ſays that he went thither, when Charles V was before Landrecy.

(b) Pag. 388, 469.

(c) See his Letter to Vulcanius, pag. 124, where he boaſts of having ſlighted that diſgrace.

(d) Ib. pag. 214.

(e) See the remark [E].

Faults of Moreri, and the Tranſlator of Thuanus.

[A] Junius . . . . . . born at Horn in Holland.] Moreri, in the article of HADRIAN (Junius), ſays, that vulgarly his name was Jonghe, or Du Jon; and afterwards when he ſpeaks of Francis Junius, profeſſor at Leyden, he makes only his vulgar name to be Jonghe. There is nothing exact in this; for in the firſt place he ſhould have ſaid de Jonghe, and that only with reſpect to Hadrian Junius, ſince it is falſe, that in the Dutch tongue his name could be indifferently either De Jonghe or Du Jon. In the ſecond place it is falſe, that the vulgar name of Francis Junius was any other than Du Jon. It is ſaid in Thuanus's tranſlation (1), that Horn, the native place of Hadrian Junius, is a village of Guelderland. It is a great blunder, which I do not find in Thuanus of the Francfort edition, 1625. If the tranſlator found that fault in his edition, he is excuſable; but here is another thing to be cenſured. He ſays, that Junius leaving Haerlem becauſe of the ſiege, went to Armuyden near Middelburg, where having in vain uſed great diligence and pains, to afford ſome remedy to the miſeries of that beſieged town, he was ſo troubled with the change of air, &c. It is plain that that beſieged town neither relates to Middelburg nor Armuyden, but to Haerlem. Now it is very falſe that Junius thought of relieving that beſieged town, when he was at Armuyden; for he went not thither till Haerlem was taken. Thuanus (2) cannot be well excuſed for this miſtake: for though in writing Latin, there is no neceſſity to clear a period according to the ſtrictneſs of French Grammar: yet he would never have expreſſed himſelf as he did, had he thought that Junius did not go into Zeland, till after the taking of Haerlem. It cannot be ſaid that he there ſpeaks of the ſiege of Middelburg, or the ſiege of Armuyden, ſince theſe two places were not beſieged whilſt Junius lived in Zeland. Melchior Adam has tranſcribed Thuanus's fault. They ſhould have known that this Phyſician ſtaid ſome time at Delft, after the taking of Haerlem, before his going into Zeland.

(1) Apud Teiſſier, Addit. aux Eloges, Tom. I, pag. 479.

(2) Ad Armuydam juxta Mildeburgum in Mattiacis ſe contulerat, ubi cum fruſtra conſilio & diligentia ſua concivibus laborantibus opem ferre conatus eſſet, ex cœli mutatione . . . in letalem morbum incidit. Thuan. lib. lxii.

[B] The firſt of July, 1511.] This is what we find in the Life of Junius, prefixed to his epiſtles, vitam hanc orditur Kalendis Julii, anni 1511. Some pages after, we read that he died 'Die 16 Junii anno 1575. 'cum explevisset annum ætatis 63 qui magnus cli'mactericus annus Medicis vocatur. —— He died the 'ſixteenth day of June, in the year 1575, when he had 'completed the ſixty third year of his age, which the 'Phyſicians call the great climacteric.' Which ſhews that Thuanus and Melchior Adam are miſtaken, who make him die in his climacterical year. But becauſe this Life of Junius is not very exact, and the edition of the epiſtles (3) to which it is prefixed, is ſaid to have been printed in the year 1552, though it contains the epitaph of the author who died in 1575, and ſome of his letters dated in 1574, I would not rigorouſly condemn the Chronology of Meurſius, who places the birth of this learned man to the year 1512 (4). That which makes me ſay that his life (5) is not exact, is, that beſides the two dates I have mentioned out of it, I there find his epitaph, which imports, that he lived ſixty three years. If the author of this life thought the epitaph was right, he was in the wrong to place Junius's birth-day on the firſt of July, 1511, and to ſay that on the ſixteenth of June, 1575, he had compleated the ſixty third year of his age. On the other hand, when a man is full ſixty four years old within fifteen days, it is a great negligence to ſay that he is ſixty three years old, or that he has paſſed his ſixty third year. But whether there be little or much negligence in it, it is certain, that Moreri, Freherus, Melchior Adam, Sir Thomas-Pope Blount, and thoſe who place Junius's birth in the year 1513, are all thereby confuted. The edition of his letters is not very correct; and beſides they are not placed according to the time in which they were written, and no care has been taken to diſcover and ſupply the dates where they are wanting, which very often happens. Theſe two defects are but too common in ſuch ſort of collections.

(3) I make uſe of an edition, printed at Dort, apud Vincentium Caimax, in 12mo.

(4) Valerius Andreas, Bibl. Belg. and Bullart, Academ. des Sciences, have followed it.

(5) I cannot tell whether it be that, which Beverwyck promiſes in a Letter to Voſſius, dated the twelfth of June 1626. See the Letters written to Voſſius, n. 78, pag. m. 47.

[C] He was the ſon of a burgomaſter of great worth] The father of our Junius had not only been ſecretary, and afterwards five times burgomaſter of Horn, but alſo twice deputed to the court of Denmark, and once to Sweden, and other places. He was a man of learning, and wrote a Latin book, which was never printed, containing the original and growth of Horn (6.)

(6) Boxhornius, Theatr. Holland, pag. 373.

[D] He left it during the troubles.] For want of a better guide, I have followed the life of Junius, which is perfixed to his letters; though I am not ignorant that exactneſs will not ſuffer us to make this author live in England from the firſt time of his coming thither, till the troubles that happened after the marriage reconcile himſelf [E] either to the climate, or the genius of the inhabitants, retired in ſo abrupt a manner, as not to take his leave of the king. It is probable, this was in 1564 (f). He ſettled at Haerlem [F], where he practiſed Phyſic, and married, and was made principal of the college. The States of Holland commiſſioned him to write the hiſtory of that province, of which he would have acquitted himſelf honourably, and with greater exactneſs than he did, if he could have put the laſt hand to the work, which came out after his death, under the title of Batavia (g). When the Spaniards beſieged the town of Haerlem, he found a way to eſcape out of it, to attend the prince of Orange, who deſired to uſe his medicines. The town being taken in 1573, his library was pillaged, where he had left ſeveral works, which had coſt him a great deal of pains, and by which he hoped to immortalize himſelf. He might ſoon have put them in a condition to be publiſhed; which increaſed his grief. He went into Zeland, where the prince's recommendation procured him a public ſalary, for practiſing Phyſic in Middelburg: but the air of the country was very diſagreeable to him. He there got ſome diſtempers, which, together with his grief for the loſs of his library, occaſioned his death the ſixteenth of June 1575, being ſixty four years old wanting ſome days. His body was carried from Armuyden to Middelburg, where his eldeſt ſon cauſed him to be honourably buried, and compoſed his epitaph [G]. We have ſeveral books of his compoſing [H]. I will ſay ſomething of them in the laſt remark. He was deſigned for a Profeſſor's chair at Leyden [I], where the univerſity was, as marriage of Mary with Philip II, for I ſee ſome of his letters (7) are dated from Haerlem, or Horn, in the year 1552, and at the beginning of 1554, which beſpeak a ſedentary man. Many of thoſe who have written lives, have ſtood very much in need of advice.

[E] Not being able to reconcile himſelf.] This appears from the three hundred and eighty fifth page of his letters, where he thus ſpeaks to Sambucus. 'Liberet mihi Polydori exemplo erumpere in hæc verba, 'adſum profectus Danica è caligine, niſi longinqui ac 'moleſti itineris ceu partus recordationem obliteraſſet 'jucundus amicorum reduci quotidie gratulantium '. . . . . . occurſus. —— I might, after the example 'of Polydore, break out into theſe words: here I am, 'emerged from Daniſh darkneſs; had not the agree'able meeting of my friends, congratulating me daily 'on my return, blotted out the memory of a long and 'troubleſome journey, as of child-birth.' He adds ſeveral reaſons for his refuſing the ſalary, and this was no inconſiderable one (8), which he might have enjoyed at Copenhagen. In another letter (9), he ſays, that he and his wife abhorred that country. In another he deſires an augmentation of his ſalary. I find there, that he was invited to be Phyſican to the king, but not to be tutor to the young prince.

[F] He ſettled at Haerlem.] The author of his life has not well diſtinguiſhed the times. He ſays that he ſettled at Haerlem, and married only after his return from Copenhagen. But I have proved (10) he returned from thence in the year 1564, and we ſee by a letter (11) which he wrote in 1559, that he had fixed himſelf at Haerlem a good while before, and that he was married to a handſome woman who brought him a fortune. The Epiſtle Dedicatory of his treatiſe de Anno, that of his tract de Coma, and that of his Animadverſorum, are dated from that town in 1556.

[G] His eldeſt ſon compoſed his epitaph.] Boxhornius having added an appendix to his Theatrum Hollandiæ, for the omiſſions he thought were to be ſupplied, amongſt other things inſerted this epitaph in great letters, but he let three faults creep into it, velint inſtead of meruit, 67 inſtead of 63, and 15 inſtead of 16, Vixit ann. LXIIIX. obiit die XV. &c.

[H] We have ſeveral books of his compoſing.] His chief works beſides thoſe already mentioned (12), are, Animadverſorum libri ſex. Commentarius de Coma. Adagiorum ab Eraſmo omiſſorum centuriæ octo cum dimidia (13). Appendix ad Epitheta Textoris. Copiæ cornu, ſive Oceanus enarrationum Homericarum ex Euſtathii Commentariis collectus in unum volumen. A Nomenclator. Commentarius de anno & menſibus. Several kinds of Latin verſes. The tranſlation of Eunapius de vitis Sophiſtarum. That of Heſychius Mileſius, that of Plutarch's table-talk (14). That of the queſtions relating to Phyſic, of Caſſius Iatroſophiſta, made and printed at Paris in 1541. (It is I believe the firſt of his works.) I mention not a great number of authors, whom he has illuſtrated with notes, as Nonius Marcellus, Plautus, Seneca, Pliny (15), Virgil, Horace (16). He had been a long time upon Suidas, and deſigned to dedicate it to the prince of Orange's ſon, as he owns to an Engliſh lord (17), whoſe good offices he deſires with that prince, in order to be gratified with a preſent before hand; for he underſtood as well as any body elſe how to make the beſt of an epiſtle dedicatory.

I have ſomething to obſerve concerning three of his works. I. The author of his Life ſays that the Animadverſorum libri ſex were loſt, when Haerlem was taken: I do not well underſtand what he means; for they were publiſhed by the author himſelf, and dedicated to Antony Perenot, biſhop of Arras, in the year 1556. Gruterus has inſerted them in the fourth volume of his Theſaurus Criticus. II. As for the Appendix ad Epitheta Textoris, it may be ſaid that Junius handled that matter with another ſort of learning than Textor, who committed very groſs faults in it. See ſome of them in Junius's letters (18). He looked upon it as a moſt profitable and painful work (19). III. His Nomenclator is in it's kind an excellent book. The choice of words in eight languages is no leſs a proof of Junius's learning, than of his indefatigable patience. It is ſaid (20) that he underſtood eight languages very well, Greek, Latin, Italian, French, Spaniſh, High-Dutch, Engliſh, and Dutch. His travels had done him great ſervice on that account: I find he had been in France, Italy, Germany, and England, but not in Spain, as Valerius Andreas (21), Moreri, and Freherus affirm. Colomiés has publiſhed (22) a little ſtory, which he had from Iſaac Voſſius; it ſhews that Junius neglected nothing to perfect his Nomenclator, and that he condeſcended to drink with Carters to learn the terms of their trade: beſides, I believe it appears from one of his letters (23), that he did not think it a great crime to drink plentifully without being drunk.

When I ſay that this Nomenclator is an excellent book in its kind, I do not pretend to deny, that there are faults in it, and very groſs ones (24); I only mean that the good things that are in it very much exceed what has been commonly publiſhed on that ſubject. Now in works of this nature, where it is impoſſible not to miſtake, perfection does not demand that an author ſhould be free from all faults. Such a book is like man: he is the moſt perfect that has the feweſt faults.

Vitiis nemo ſine naſcitur, optimus ille eſt qui minimis urgetur (5).

[I] He was deſigned for a profeſſor's chair at Leyden.] It is Meurſius who ſays this; Sub mortis tempus, ſays he (26), Academiæ naſcenti inter primos profeſſores deſtinatus, ſed inter ipſa initia morte abreptus inchoare munus non potuit. Freherus (27) who tranſcribes this, without adding what univerſity is meant throws his readers into the dark, or into an illuſion; one would think that he means Middelburg, of which he had been ſpeaking, and that an univerſity had been lately founded there. I ſhall obſerve on this occaſion, (f) See his Letters, pag. 385.

(g) Voſſius, de Scient Mathem. pag. 259. Pontus Heuter. lib. ii, de Vet. Belgio, cap. xxv.

(7) Pag. 339, 345, 348.

(8) It was a ſalary of four hundred rixdollars (German crowns), pag. 409.

(9) Ibid.

(10) See, above, citation (f).

(11) Pag. 179. See concerning his miſtreſs, pag. 109.

(12) In the body of this article.

(13) This book is placed among thoſe of Francis Junius, profeſſor of Divinity at Leyden, in the catalogue of the Bodleian Library.

(14) Huetius, de Claris Interpretibus, ſpeaks of thoſe tranſlations with great contempt.

(15) See his Life prefixed to his Epiſtles, and in Melchior Adam.

(16) See his Letters, pag. 5, 6.

(17) Epiſt. pag. 173. See alſo pag. 116.

(18) Pag. 406.

(19) Ib. pag. 116.

(20) Meurſius, Athen. Batav.

(21) Bibl. Belg. pag. 12.

(22) Opuſc. pag. m. 132.

(23) It is written to a biſhop, pag. 460.

(24) See what Crenius, Animad. Phil & Hiſtor. Part. I, pag. 31, & ſeq. quotes out of Gronovius, &c.

(25) Horat. Sat. III, lib. i, ver. 68.

(26) Athen. Batav. pag. 93.

(27) Theatr. pag. 1270.

as it were, juſt born, when he died. I have not yet had time fully to examine whether he at laſt turned Proteſtant [K].

It appears from one of his letters (b), that he put himſelf into a great paſſion, when he heard that one of his ſcholars had accuſed him of commanding his boarders not to go to church. He proteſts, on the contrary, that he forced them to go upon holidays; for he condemned to conſiderable fines thoſe who neglected to go. Elſewhere (i) he complains of his poverty, and that being loaded with debts, and obliged to equip himſelf, he had no money in his pocket.

occaſion, that nothing cauſes a greater obſcurity in books than the not taking pains to add the neceſſary ſupplements to what is taken out of other authors. A thouſand things are clear in the originals, which are unintelligible, when they are nakedly removed into another place.

[K] I have not had time fully to examine whether he at laſt turned Proteſtant.] That which holds me in ſuſpence is, a letter (28) that he wrote to the biſhop of Haerlem in 1573, to give him an account of the endeavours he had uſed to hinder this prelate's houſe from being plundered. He tells him, that he preſerved this Depoſitum, as well as he could, and that he gave it not up to the plunderers till he was overpowered, being threatened with immediate death, with a piſtol to his breaſt. He adds, that the impunity of theſe wicked attempts obliged him to ask leave to retire out of the town, which he obtained. It is certain he vigorouſly complained to the magiſtrates of the violence that had been done him (29), and that he told them the Spaniards would hardly be guilty of the ſame exceſſes, if they were maſters of the town. That which I do not underſtand, is what he tells this prelate, that to preſerve his houſe, it had been neceſſary to drive away the French, who prophaned every thing with a cruel rage, excludendo barbaram & crudelem Gallorum omnia profanantium rabiem (§ α). I do not take the Index librorum probibitorum & expurgandorum (30), wherein he is called a Calviniſt, and an author damnatæ memoriæ, to be a convincing proof.

[(§ α) Theſe were probably ſome remains of the Proteſtant troops, which being defeated in 1571, had followed Genlis into the Low-Countries *. Theſe were no longer thoſe Proteſtant ſoldiers, who in the firſt civil-war, appeared ſuch enemies to vice and all ſorts of violence. REM. CRIT.]

JUNIUS (a) (FRANCIS) profeſſor of Divinity (b) at Leyden, was born at Bourges the firſt of May 1545. He was of a noble family [A]. His father, who was a man of the Long Robe, found himſelf expoſed to many perſecutions for being ſuſpected of Lutheraniſm [B]. He expoſed his wife to horrid ſlanders, becauſe ſhe proved

[A] He was of a noble family.] WILLIAM du Jon, his grandfather, lord of Boſſardiniere near Iſſoudun, was enobled for the good ſervices he had done in the expedition into Navarre, when endeavours were uſed to reſtore John d'Albret unjuſtly deprived of his kingdom by Ferdinand of Arragon. He had alſo been a ſervant to the king (1). He left three ſons, the laſt whereof, called DENYS, ſtudied the civil-law, and took his degrees at Toulouſe. He performed his ſtudies but ill (2); for as he had a great ſpirit, he was always engaged in the quarrels of the ſcholars. In a word, he was a great dueliſt. He obtained the office of the king's counſellor at Bourges, as a reward of a bold action he had done. We ſhall ſee it in the following remark. He had nine children, of which our Francis Junius was one (3).

[B] His father ..... found himſelf expoſed to many perſecutions for being ſuſpected of Lutheraniſm.] The ſuperior of the Franciſcans of Iſſoudun preached ſo impudently againſt Margaret queen of Navarre, ducheſs of Berry, and ſiſter to Francis I, as to ſay, that becauſe ſhe was a Lutheran, ſhe deſerved to be ſowed up in a ſack, and to be thrown into the ſea. The magiſtrates of the place adviſed him not to be wanting in the reſpect, that was due to that princeſs; but he laughed at their advice, and went on preaching in the ſame ſtrain. Informations were made againſt him, and ſent to the king. The king being reſolved to puniſh him with the ſame puniſhment, to which he had adjudged the princeſs, ordered the monk ſhould be brought to him. The queen of Navarre interceding for him, obtained that the puniſhment ſhould be moderated. The difficulty was to ſeize that Monk, who had the mob on his ſide; ſo that the magiſtrates of Iſſoudun durſt not undertake the execution of his majeſty's orders. Denys du Jon, being returned from the ſchools where he had fought ſo many duels, declared that if his majeſty would give him a commiſſion to take the Monk, he would punctually execute it. This commiſſion being diſpatched for him, he put himſelf at the head of the archers, and in ſpite of the populace, he took the preacher out of the cloyſter, who was ſent to the gallies for two years. Du Jon by this ingratiated himſelf with Francis I, and the ducheſs of Berry; but he incurred the hatred of the people, and of the Franciſcans, and found himſelf expoſed to many calumnies, and threatenings, and involved in proceſſes, which ended at laſt in a cruel maſſacre, committed on his perſon. Hæc prima fuit actio, quæ in gratiam Regis, ſororiſque Reginæ inſinuavit patrem: ſed apud illam inconſultam plebeculam & Franciſcanorum ordinem odia perpetua conciliavit; indigniſſimaſque calumnias, minas, criminationes, perſecutiones, damna, cruentam denique cædem patri apportavit (4). He was accuſed of Lutheraniſm, and his maid was ſuborned to atteſt that he did not obſerve faſting days. Et Franciſcanorum arte, & plebis imprudentia odioque maximo preſſus eſt ſub religionis ſpecie & Lutheraniſmi .... accuſatus, ſubornata ad eam rem ancilla quæ domi ſerviverat. Ea patrem à ſe viſum, quum diebus vetitis carnes ederet, pro teſtimonio dicebat falſo, ut matrem ſæpe audivi confirmantem (5). He betook himſelf to flight, being unwilling to truſt himſelf with ſuch paſſionate people: they ſeized on his eſtate, and the queen of Navarre was obliged to ſupply him wherewithal to ſubſiſt for near a year. At laſt by the king's authority the accuſations were brought to nothing, and then du Jon obtained a place of counſellor, &c. 'Liberatus ab accuſatione pater auctoritate Regis, patrium ſolum repetit, atque immigrat in Biturigum metropolin, ubi cum laude ad exitum uſque vitæ Conſiliarii Regii & pro Tribuno militum honoribus à Rege collatis defunctus eſt: præter alia commoda honoraria, quæ à Regina ſorore illius & Biturigum Duce acceperat (6), —— His father, being diſcharged from the accuſation by the king's authority, returns home, and goes to Bourges in Berry, where, to his death, he honourably diſcharged the offices of king's counſellor and colonel, conferred on him by the king; beſides other honorary benefits, which he received from the queen, his ſiſter, and the duke of Berry.' Hear how he was killed. On Corpus Chriſti day, the Catholics of Iſſoudun, without any regard to the treaty of peace, which had been juſt concluded, committed a thouſand violences againſt the Reformed. The king diſpatched a commiſſion to Denys du Jon to inquire into that inſurrection, and to puniſh the authors of it. Du Jon repaired to Iſſoudun, accompanied only by three archers; he diſperſed the reſt in ſeveral places, before he entered the town, it being neceſſary to uſe prudence in ſo nice an affair. His precautions did him no ſervice; it was conjectured upon what account he came; the people ſeized on the gates, and beſieged the houſe of the commiſſioner. They broke into it, killed du Jon, threw him out at the window, dragged him along the ſtreets, expoſed him to the dogs, and publickly forbad (7) any to bury him (8). The king's council, out of indignation againſt this inſolence, ordered that the walls of Iſſoudun ſhould be demoliſhed, but Cipierre, and ſome other lords, got the decree changed, eſpecially becauſe the murthered commiſſioner had been ſuſpected of Lutheraniſm above twenty four years. The widow of the deceaſed deſiring to proſecute the murderers, got the hatred of a great many

---

(b) Epiſtol pag. 387.

(i) Ib pag. 149. See alſo pag. 254

(28) Pag. 497.

(29) Pag. 381.

(30) Pag. 476. Edit. 1607, in fol.

* Thuan. lib. li.

(a) His true name was Du Jon, and not Jongbe, as Moreri will have it.

(b) And not a Civilian, as Father Jacob ſays in his Bibliotheca Pontif. pag. 460.

(1) In cuſtodia & equili ... Ludovici XII, miniſtravit. Franciſcus Junius, in Vita ſua, Tom. I, Oper. pag. 6, col. 1.

(2) Hinc ab avo ſolennis literarum quas Dionyſio filio mittebat, & falſa inſcriptio, Dionyſio dilecto filio miſſo ad ſtudendum, pro eo quod alii vulgo inſcribunt, ſtudenti. Id. ibid.

(3) Taken from Junius's Life.

(4) Franciſcus Junius, ubi ſupra, col. 2.

(5) Id. ibid.

(6) Id. ibid pag. 7, col. 1.

(7) However a woman buried him in the night. Id. ibid.

(8) Taken from the Life of Franciſcus Junius pag. 14.

proved with child, whilſt it was believed he had fled away [C], and it was not known that he came once ſecretly to ſee her. Our Francis Junius was carefully educated, and became a very learned man, to which his natural modeſty, together with his great ambition [D], did not a little contribute. He began to ſtudy the civil-law under Hugo Donellus at thirteen years of age. Some years after he was ſent to Lyons, in order to join the embaſſador, whom the king of France ſent to Conſtantinople: but not arriving till after the departure of the embaſſador, he ſtaid at Lyons, and applied himſelf to his ſtudies with an incredible induſtry. Bartholomew Aneau [E], who was principal of the college of that town, gave him good advice about the right method of ſtudying. The young gentleman found himſelf expoſed to two very different temptations, to that of love, and that of impiety. He vigorouſly oppoſed the firſt; for he gave a box on the ear to a young woman, who came to careſs him [F]: but he yielded

ny people, and ſpent her eſtate. Hæc cædes conſilium Regis commovit plurimùm: & decretum de labefactendis muris totius oppidi in eo factum propter atrocitatem ſceleris, & periculoſiſſimum exemplum illius. Sed poſtea converſa eſt factionibus tota ratio conſilii: tum propter Sipierrii Gubernatoris & nonnullorum ex nobilitate procerum inveterata odia, tum propter religionis Pontificiæ Zelum, cujus odio indeſinenter flagraviſſe inde ab annis amplius viginti quatuor criminabantur patrem. Itaque cædem illam neceſſe habuit mater in Regis conſilio perſequi ex eo tempore: quo facto, cùm ipſa in ſe multorum concitavit odia, tum omnia fermè commoda quæ ex bellica licentia, furtis, rapinis, graſſationibuſque reſtabant ipſi, in hac perſecutione occupavit (9).

I need not put any body in mind of the ill effects of a religious zeal. Thoſe who are poſſeſſed with it, juſtify a murder, and diſapprove the conduct of a woman, who deſires that thoſe who have murdered her husband ſhould be puniſhed. But I deſire my readers to conſider well one thing. Religion, which is looked upon all over the world as the ſtrongeſt ſupport of the ſupreme authority, and which would be actually ſo, if it was well underſtood and practiſed, is commonly that, which moſt enervates that ſame authority. There was nothing more juſt than the decree of Francis I, againſt the preacher of Iſſoudun; a man who had the impudence to treat the king's ſiſter ſo baſely in the pulpit. And yet not one magiſtrate durſt execute the king's orders againſt this mutineer, and when a gentleman has the courage to execute them, he expoſes himſelf to a thouſand perſecutions, and becomes ſo odious, that his murtherers are openly protected. The queen of Navarre, was the firſt who adviſed this gentleman to leave his country (10), ſince the execution of his prince's orders would expoſe him to the hatred of the bigots. An evident proof that the court did not think itſelf ſtrong enough to protect it's good ſervants perſecuted by churchmen. It is commonly ſaid that the miniſtry of the goſpel eſt ipſis Angelis tremendum. —— Is formidable to the angels; we may add & ipſis quoque Regibus. —— And to kings alſo. Read the hiſtory of the Romiſh church, and you will find that the greateſt princes have had more reaſon to fear the paſſions raiſed by the zealots, than the arms of the infidels: thus that very thing which ought to be the ſupport of the ſtate, is very often the greateſt obſtacle that ſovereigns meet with in the execution of their orders (11).

[C] He expoſed his wife to horrid ſlanders, becauſe ſhe proved with child.] It is an imprudence to venture the being ſo, when the husband is a fugitive; for if he ſhould die before he returned, and before the lying-in, and without owning that he is the father of the child, three things very poſſible, how could a woman juſtify herſelf to the public? but farther, is it nothing to give a handle to ill tongues, as the wife of Du Jon did? it will be ſaid that it is eaſy to talk ſo, when one is diſcourſing of it in cold blood, without conſidering the caſe of amorous people. After ſome months abſence, their love is ſo violent, that no conſideration can reſtrain them; paſſion hurries them along, and they are not able to hearken to any reaſon:

> Fertur equis auriga, neque audit currus habenas (12).
>
> So the fierce courſers ſtarting to the race . . . .
> Nor reins, nor curbs, nor threat'ning cries they fear,
> But force along the trembling charioteer.
>
> DRYDEN.

However it be, our Junius's mother was defamed upon that account, at which ſhe was moſt ſenſibly afflicted (13).

[D] His natural modeſty, together with his great ambition.] Theſe two paſſions do not ſeem to be conſiſtent one with another, and yet ſometimes they join together. Junius is an inſtance of it. He confeſſes, that in his younger years he wiſhed to be honoured and praiſed more than he ought to do, and that he could not ſuffer the praiſes, which were given to others. 'Natura me puerum ad honoris & laudis 'appetentiam plus ſatis accendente. Sic enim mala 'radix illa τῆς φιλοτιμίας in me germinabat, ut 'nec alienam laudem iſta ætate æquo animo ferre 'poſſem miſer, nec in mea exiſtimatione illa con'quieſcere quam mihi conciliabam pertinaciſſima di'ligentia.' On the other hand he acknowledges, that he was ſo timorous, and baſhful, that even when he was near fifty years old, he could not ſpeak to his own wiſe without bluſhing, and that he durſt hardly command his own domeſtics. 'Pudor ſummus qui me 'ad hanc uſque ætatem ſic preſſit, ut ruſticus magis 'ad omnia quam urbanus merito haberi poſſim . . . . 'Quid dicam niſi impudentem ferme pudorem eſſe 'qui me tantopore impeditum diſtinet, ut vix ſine pu'dore uxori res vulgareis enunciem, vix jam domi 'ſervitio imperem.' He pretends to have drawn great advantages from this baſhfulneſs; becauſe diſtruſting himſelf, he applied himſelf much more to improve by what he heard and ſaw (14); and he declares he would not acquaint his readers with his infirmity, if he did not believe, it would be a moſt uſeful leſſon of modeſty to youth. 'Hoc eo libentius prædico de 'infirmitate mea, ut juventus ab exemplo meo præ'ceptum hauriat ταπεινοφροσύνης atque modeſtiæ, ut 'certum fructum peritiæ certo judicio aſſequatur. Id 'enim teſtor, nihil mihi ſecundum benedictionem 'Dei tam commodaviſſe in rebus omnibus, quàm il'lam de me ipſo diffidentiam ex conſcientia infirmi'tatis & pudoris mei, & ſtudioſam aliorum, quibuſ'cunque adſui, obſervantiam.' That modeſty and rare humility which makes a man diſtruſt his own ſtrength, cannot be too much praiſed: but it is certain it is of no uſe to the making of one's fortune in the world; and if a father has a deſign that his children ſhould come to perferments, I would adviſe him rather to inſpire them with vanity and preſumption, than with diffidence of their own merit. Junius is perhaps the only perſon, who with reſpect to worldly advantages, was not the worſe for his modeſty. I do not pretend to affirm that arrogance is always uſeful: it ſometimes ruins young men, and hinders them from riſing; I ſpeak only of this in general, without regarding the exceptions.

[E] Bartholomew Aneau.] I have ſpoken elſewhere (15) of his Commentary upon Alciatus's emblems. He was called in Latin Annulus, or Anulus: he was a native of Bourges, and publiſhed ſeveral books (16). He was wickedly killed in the tumult of religion, where Junius had like to have loſt his life: his wiſe would have had the ſame fate, if the provoſt of Lyons had not ſaved her by impriſoning her (17).

[F] He gave a box on the ear to a young woman who came to careſs him.] This is a thing much more admirable than Theagenes's action (18), as being hiſtorical, whereas that of Theagenes is only a romantic fiction. Junius, intent upon his ſtudies, thought of nothing leſs, than of making love. In the mean time he was teazed for his want of gallantry, and it was repreſented to him, that he would never learn civility, if he did not fall in love. Theſe diſcourſes having no influence upon his conduct, they expoſed him to the careſſes of three or four young women, who

An important reflexion upon the effects of falſe zeal.

---

(9) Id. ibid.

(10) Felicius certe utiliuſque politicos honores geſturo, & Remp. adminiſtraturo, ſi poſt tam forte auſum honeſta & cauta migratione, quam ſæpe fieri Navarrena Regina & nonnulli Proceres cupiverunt, ut alibi Reip. inſerviret pater, ſibi proſpexiſſet. Id. ibid. pag. 6, col. 2.

(11) Compare what has been ſaid in the article ABDAS, remark [B].

(12) Virgil. Geogr. lib. i, ver. 514.

(13) Profugus pater clam ad matrem ſemel redierat, hinc gravida facta mater proſcindebatur à vulgo. tanquam ſi proſtituta fuiſſet pudicitia illius. Utroque hoc incommodo ſanctæ illius fœminæ animus oppugnabatur, objicientibus maligne quam plurimis tum Franciſcani illius reverſionem, tum graviditatem, ut ajebant, impudicam Junius, in Vita ſua, pag. 7, col. 1.

(14) Ex pudore hæc conſequuta ſunt inde à puero quod mihi ſemper ſim diffiſus, quod aliorum factis audiendis, ſermonibus obſervandis & advertendis in uſum meum ſtuduerim. Idem, ibid. col 2.

(15) Above, in the remark [M], of the article ALCIATUS, (ANDREW).

(16) See La Croix du Maine, pag. 32, & Du Verdier Vau-Privas, pag. 110, 111.

(17) See Junius's Life, pag. 10, col. ii.

(18) See the article HELIODORUS, remark [C].

yielded ſo much to the ſophiſtry of a libertine, that he found himſelf a perfect Atheiſt [G], after lending an ear to him for ſome days. He did not remain long in that unhappy condition; a tumult about religion, which obliged him to run away, in order to ſave his life, afforded him an occaſion of reſuming his firſt faith. His father recalled him to Bourges, and diſcovering ſomething of the opinions his ſon was imbued with, he gave him good inſtructions, and without ſeeming to know any thing of the matter, brought him to read the New Teſtament. The firſt words (c) that Junius met with, affected him [H] ſo ſenſibly, that he quickly grew out of conceit with whatever related not to piety. In the beginning of the civil-wars, he went to Geneva, for the ſtudy of the languages. As he carried but little money with him, and had none ſent him, he found himſelf reduced to extreme neceſſity [I]. At laſt he received wherewithal to deliver himſelf from his miſery, and to pay his debts; and hearing the tragical end of his father (d), he reſolved to get his livelihood by teaching youth. He undertook that employment at Geneva, which he diſcharged till he was ſent into the Low-Countries (e) to be miniſter of the Walloon church at Antwerp. He performed that office in the midſt of many dangers; for tho' he oppoſed the indiſcreet zeal of thoſe, who, without any lawful authority, who impudently attacked him. They fell violently upon him, and omitted nothing to triumph over his modeſty. At laſt, he loſt his patience, and gave one of them a box on the ear; this blow cauſed a great noiſe in the houſe. The girl, who had received it, finding by the young man's look, that it was not by way of jeſt, but out of anger that ſhe had been thus uſed, fell a crying and lamenting. She was laughed at, and Junius too; but this made him odious to ſeveral people. Theſe are his own words. ‘Dies & noctes appetebant canes illæ promiſcuè, neſcium quid ſibi vellent, & gravitatis honeſtatiſque illius, quam in domo paterna videram, ſubinde recordantem. Neque id ſeorſim tentabant ſingulæ, verumetiam ternæ aut quaternæ ſimul conſertis manibus in me irruebant immodeſtiſſimè, ut perducto ad ſuam impuritatem animo meo de ſpoliis pudoris mei triumpharent. Tandem verò adeò me puduit illarum impudentiæ, ut quum una multis ſpectantibus me amatoriè eſſet a-dorſa palpo, ego contrà colaphum gravem ei impegerim: quem illa addubitans utram in partem acciperet, defixis oculis attenta reſpexit ad me, aliquantiſper obſervans aliquam mei animi ſignificationem: ut autem rem ſeriam à me eſſe vidit, tum illa vociferationibus & ejulatibus implevit domum, omniumque riſum imprudens in ſeſe, ſtultorum odia in me concitavit (19).’ He was ſo tired with thoſe temptations, that he had a thouſand times the thoughts of returning to his father, without taking leave of the people of the houſe, where his chaſtity ſuffered ſo many attacks; but he feared their reſentment, and the calumnies they might make uſe of, to diſparage him in his family.

[G] He yielded ſo much to the ſophiſtry of a Libertine, that he found himſelf a perfect Atheiſt.] By Bartholomew Aneau's advice, he had read Cicero de Legibus, and made collections out of it. In the mean while he received a viſit from a man, and heard him maintain with ſo many arguments, what Cicero alledges concerning Epicurus's rejecting a providence, that he gave way to that impious doctrine: which he did the more eaſily, becauſe it was the conſtant table-talk, and all the houſe rung with it (20). ‘Memini, quum libros M. Tullii de legibus per illud tempus, auctore & ſuaſore Anulo (de quo ante dixi) expenderem, & notas quaſdam in eos animadverſioneſque colligerem, venire hominem ad me, & illa Epicuri verba quæ libro primo extant (21), nihil curare Deum nec ſui, nec alieni, multis quàm diligentiſſimè confirmare: ad quæ ego non ratione judicioque certe reſpondebam: ſed aſſenſionem paulatim adhibens, ſentiebam venenum ſerpens, quod imbiberam, confirmari in me: & cum auctoritate hominis, tum argutis dictorum ejus præceps eò deferebar, ut meus animus in iſto malo hærens occalleſceret, totuſque fieret ἀναισθητός (22).’

[H] The firſt words that he met with in the New Teſtament affected him.] The thing is ſo edifying, and ſo likely to imprint a due ſenſe of the efficacy of the word of God, that I ought to ſet down the whole paſſage. ‘Hic ergo novum illud teſtamentum divinitus oblatum aperio: aliud agenti exhibet ſe mihi aſpectu primo auguſtiſſimum illud caput Joannis Evangeliſtæ & Apoſtoli, in principio erat Verbum, &c. Lego partem capitis, & ita commoveor legens, ut repente divinitatem argumenti, & ſcripti majeſtatem auctoritatemque ſenſerim longo intervallo omnibus eloquentiæ humanæ fluminibus præeuntem. Horrebat corpus, ſtupebat animus, & totum illum diem ſic afficiebar, ut qui eſſem, ipſe mihi incertus viderer eſſe. Recordatus es mei, Domine Deus mi, pro immenſa miſericordia tua, ovemque perditam in gregem tuum recepiſti. Ex eo tempore, quum in me Deus tam potenter Spiritus ſui virtute irruiſſet, alia frigidiùs & negligentiùs legere & tractare cœpi; de his verò quæ ad pietatem pertinent cogitare ampliùs, & ardentiùs in eis verſari (23). —— Here therefore I open that new Teſtament, the gift of heaven: at firſt ſight, and without deſign, I light upon that moſt auguſt chapter of the Evangeliſt and Apoſtle St John, In the beginning was the word, &c. I read part of the chapter, and am ſo affected as I read, that on a ſudden I perceive the divinity of the ſubject, and the majeſty and authority of the writing, far exceeding all human eloquence. I ſhuddered, I was confounded, and was ſo affected that whole day, that I ſcarce knew myſelf. Thou didſt remember me, O Lord my God, for thy great mercy, and didſt receive a loſt ſheep into thy flock. From that time, when God had given me ſo great a meaſure of his holy ſpirit, I began to read other things with more coldneſs and neglect; and to think more of, and be more converſant with, thoſe things, which belong to piety.

[I] He found himſelf reduced to extream neceſſity.] He gives a long account of it, whereof I will obſerve but theſe two things. Having only, upon the approach of the winter, a linnen doublet and a little cloak, he reſolved to imitate Cleanthes (24), that is, to get ſomething by the labour of his hands. He deſigned to work by the day, and turn pioneer in the ditches of Geneva. But he found a young man of his country, who relieved him. Standing in need of this help longer than he had a mind to, he was afraid of being burthenſome, and in that apprehenſion he brought himſelf to the making but one little meal once a day. This abſtinence laſted four months, and reduced him to ſuch a lean condition, that he was ſcarce able to bear the weight of his ſhirt. He would have died in a little time, if his friends had not prevailed upon him to eat a little more. ‘Ultro ad menſes quatuor jejunium ipſe indixi mihi, & horam prandii in ambulatione, legens & memoriam colens, meditans, orans occupavi: veſpere autem cœna frugali uſus ſum, plurimùm ſorbens bina ova, & mediocrem vini cyathum hauriens. Sed ex diuturna iſta & pervicace inedia paulatim me invaſit tabes, & ita exedit graviter, ut vires omnes exhauſtum corpus deficerent. Quod malum tum demum ſenſi, quum inſtantibus amicis & tabem meam ex vultu recognoſcentibus, ad majorem cibi copiam ſumendam veni, & vivere inſtituti liberalius: nam vel induſii ſolius onere prægravati mihi eſſe humeri videbantur (25). —— I voluntarily enjoyned myſelf a faſt of four months, and ſpent the hour of dinner in walking, reading, and recollecting, meditating and praying: in the evening I ſupped ſparingly, for the moſt part on two eggs, and a moderate glaſs of wine. But this long and obſtinate faſting brought on me by degrees a conſumption, and quite exhauſted my ſtrength: which I then became ſenſible of, when, at the preſſing inſtances of my friends, who perceived my diſtemper by my looks, I betook myſelf to eating more plentifully, and began to live more freely; for my ſhoulders ſeemed loaden with the weight of my ſhirt alone.’

(c) The beginning of St John's Goſpel.

(d) See the remark [B].

(e) In the year 1565.

(19) Junius, ibid. pag 9, col. 2.

(20) Iſta horribili impietate conſtrata erat quotidie menſa, perſonabat domus circumſtrepebant omnia aures meas, adeo ut jamque ad alia omnia obſurdeſcerem. Nam quum omnibus horis aliquid atrociter fieri videmus, aut audimus, inquit Tullius, etiam qui natura mitiſſimi ſumus, aſſiduitate moleſtiarum ſenſum omnem humanitatis ex animis amittimus: quum impie fieri aut dici, pietatis ſenſum. Id. ibid. pag. 10, col. 1.

(21) Here is a ſlip of memory: Junius took the firſt book de Legibus, for the firſt book de Natura Deorum.

(22) Junius, ubi ſupra.

(23) Ibid pag. 11, col. 2.

(24) Certum deliberatumque erat hebdomade proxime ſequutura . . . alternos dies in egerenda terra ad foſſam urbis, & in ſtudiis conſumere, Cleanthis exemplo, ut levarem inopiam meam. Id. ibid.

(25) Ibid. pag. 13, col. 2.

authority, broke the images, and pillaged the temples, he was accounted their inſtigator; which was the reaſon that they often attempted to impriſon him. He had the good fortune always to have timely notice of it, ſo as to avoid being taken. It was found expedient for him to go into the country of Limburg, where he continued his miniſterial functions with good ſucceſs, till the dangers he was expoſed to engaged the magiſtrates to adviſe him to retire into Germany. The curioſity that an old man had, deſerves to be known [K], it is ſo proper to ſhew the knavery of the perſecutors, and the fooliſhneſs of the people. Junius was received at Heidelberg by the elector Frederic III, with a great deal of kindneſs, and went to ſee his mother at Bourges; from whence returning to the Palatinate, he was made miniſter of a little church there (f). Some time after he was ſent by the elector to the army of the prince of Orange, during the unfortunate expedition of the year 1568. He was chaplain to that prince, till the troops had got into Germany; and then he returned to his church in the Palatinate, where he diſcharged his function till the year 1573, after which he was ſent for to Heidelberg by the Elector Palatine, to tranſlate the Old Teſtament (g). He was ſent to Neuſtadt in the year 1578, and at fourteen months end to Otterburg, where he ſtaid eighteen months; after which he returned to Neuſtadt, and read public lectures till prince Caſimir, adminiſtrator of the electorate, ſent for him to Heidelberg, to be profeſſor of Divinity. He returned into France with the duke of Bouillon, and waited on king Henry IV, who ſent him into Germany upon ſome buſineſs. He thought fit to paſs through Holland before he went to give an account of his commiſſion to Henry IV, and being invited to be profeſſor of Divinity at Leyden, he accepted the offer, having firſt obtained the conſent of the embaſſador of France (h). He diſcharged the functions of that employment with great ability, till the year 1602, when he died of the plague. He had an averſion for women; but, as he owns himſelf, he was puniſhed by God for it, in the four marriages he contracted [L]. He left ſome children [M]: he publiſhed many books [N]. Thuanus is very much miſtaken

[K] The curioſity that an old man had, deſerves to be known.] He had been made to believe, that Junius, the Heretical preacher, had cloven feet, and he was not undeceived, till he had viewed him from head to foot. It was in the preſence of a great company, who were met in hopes of hearing a diſpute between Junius and a Franciſcan. The place and hour for the conference were appointed; but the Friar went back, under pretence of having forgot ſomething. I have a hundred times heard ſuch ſort of ſtories, but never ſaw them before ſupported by a printed and authentic teſtimony. Which makes me ſet down Junius's own words. ‘Ridiculum eſt quod dicam, ſed tamen indicium horum ſimplicitatis, & mendaciſſimæ illorum impudentiæ. Quum in campo eſſemus, Franciſcani illius adventum exſpectantes, vir quidam ſenex frequentiam illam maximam quæ tum aderat perrumpens, copiam ſibi fieri videndi mei poſtulavit. Audito ſtrepitu rogabam quid rei eſſet. Cognito hominem eſſe mei videndi cupientem, monui ut daretur homini ad veniendum locus. Tum ille demiſſo vultu inde à pedibus ad verticem uſque obſervans diligentiſſimè conſtitutionem meam, erupit in hæc verba: eho, jamjam video non eſſe id verum, quod mihi de te fuerat enunciatum. Me autem dicente, quid ergo illud eſt? tibi, inquit, pedes fiſſos eſſe (26). —— What I am going to relate, is ridiculous, but is an inſtance of the folly and lying impudence of theſe perſons. When we were in the field, expecting the coming of that Franciſcan, a certain old man, breaking thro' the crowd, demanded to ſee me. Hearing a noiſe, I asked what was the matter: and finding, that one deſired to ſee me, I deſired they would make way for him. Then he, caſting his eyes downward, and ſurveying me from head to foot, broke out into theſe words: now I am convinced, it is not true, what was told me of you. Upon asking him, what that was, he anſwered, he had been told, that I had cloven feet.’

[L] He had an averſion for women, but he was puniſhed by GOD for it, in the four marriages he contracted.] Leſt I ſhould tranſlate his words wrong, I ſhall only ſet them down. ‘In conjugiis varie me duriterque exercuit Dominus. Nam quatuor uxores duxi hactenus: adeò me (qui prius propter canum impiarum ſcelera à fœminis abhorrebam, & functionis meæ ſtudio conjugium refugiebam pervicaciſſimè) caſtigavit Dominus, præpoſterum judicium meum tacitè exprobravit, & perjucunda optimarum fideliſſimarumque conjugum conſuetudine evicit peccatum, indignamque de ſexu fœmineo toto opinionem meam (27).’ He obſerves, that he loſt his firſt wife by the ignorance of a midwife, who ſpoilt her Uterus in delivering her of twins (28). ‘Harum primam injuria obſtetricis è vita ſuſtulit, quum ita corruptus in obſtetricatu fuiſſet illius uterus, ut annos amplius ſeptem indeſinente ſanguinis defluvio afflicta ſit atque exhauſta, incredibili cruciatu ipſius, & labore meo (29).’ The conſequences of this accident proved very unhappy, not only for the wife, but alſo for the husband, namely a continual loſs of blood for above ſeven years together. His ſecond wife died, being with child, the fifth day of a continual fever. The third died of a dropſy. The fourth was alive when he wrote this, about the year 1592. Afterwards ſhe died of the plague.

[M] He left ſome children.] By his ſecond wife, the daughter of John Cornput, ſecretary and burgomaſter of Breda, he had, amongſt other children, a daughter who was married to the learned John Gerard Voſſius, and a ſon named JOHN CASIMIR JUNIUS (30), who ſtudied Divinity, and was deſigned by his father for an Hebrew profeſſor, but that did not ſucceed. He quitted letters for the military profeſſion, at the ſollicitation of his uncle John Cornput (31), who made him lieutenant of his company. He died at Gertrudenberg. He publiſhed in Dutch an apology for the ſpeech of Sir Dudley Carleton, king James's embaſſador. It was in anſwer to James Taurin, an Arminian miniſter at Utrecht, who had confuted (32) that ſpeech. He left a ſon called FRANCIS JUNIUS, born at Embden, the twentieth of September 1624, who was profeſſor of the Civil-Law in the univerſity of Groningen (33). In the following article I ſhall ſpeak of another FRANCIS JUNIUS, a ſon of the Leyden profeſſor, by a third venter.

[N] He publiſhed many books.] His works of Divinity, collected together, make two volumes in folio, and contain, amongſt other things, I. A commentary upon the three firſt chapters of Geneſis, with an anſwer to the twenty two objections of Simplicius (34) againſt this holy book. II. An Analyſis of the Pentateuch, an explication of the prophecies of Ezekiel, Daniel, and Jonah. III. Sacred parallels, and notes upon the Revelation, and the epiſtle of St Jude. IV. Obſervations againſt Bellarmin, and upon the anathema of Gregory XIII againſt Gebhard Truchſes, archbiſhop of Cologne. He alſo publiſhed ſome notes upon Manilius and Cicero's epiſtles, and upon Tertullian, and a work of George Codinus Curopalates. He alſo tranſlated into Latin, Bodin's Demonomania, John du Tillet, Arnauld's plea againſt the Jeſuits, &c. He wrote an anſwer (35) in French, to Peter Charron's

---

(f) Scœnovienſis Eccleſiæ.

(g) Tremellius was his partner in that work.

(h) Taken from his Life, written by himſelf, and publiſhed by Merula, in 1595, and afterwards prefixed to his works. Melchior Adam has given us a large Abridgment of it. Moreri is miſtaken in quoting Merula, in Deſcript. Vitæ Junii.

(26) Ibid. pag. 20, col. 1.

(27) Ibid. pag. 21, col. 2.

(28) They did not live. Ex prima, ſays he, gemelli vix viderunt lucem.

(29) Junius, ibid. pag. 22, col 1.

(30) Godſon to prince John Caſimir, adminiſtrator of the Palatinate.

(31) He was governor of the citadel of Groningen: Meteren ſpeaks of him. Vitæ Profeſſ. Groning. pag. 224.

(32) His book is intituled, Statera Orationis Carletoni, &c.

(33) See the Lives of the Profeſſors of Groningen, pag. 224, 225.

(34) And not Symmachus, as Melchior Adam ſays, in Vita Junii, pag. 201.

(35) It was printed at Leyden, in 4to, in the year 1599.

miſtaken in what he ſays him [O]. Scaliger's memoirs, who hated Junius, very probably prejudiced this famous hiſtorian againſt him [P]. Junius did not deſerve the contempt that Scaliger had for him; the injuſtice of it is viſible. And when we conſider the praiſes that many great authors have given him (i), we find ourſelves more diſpoſed to pity than to indignation, with reſpect to that injuſtice. He was a learned and honeſt man; and otherwiſe ſo far from running things to an extremity, that he believed ſalvation ron's Three Truths. I muſt not forget, that he underſtood the Greek and oriental tongues. He was the firſt that publiſhed George Codinus's book De Officialibus Palatii Conſtantinopolitani, & officiis magnæ Eccleſiæ. He added to it a Latin tranſlation with notes. He publiſhed two editions of this book, one in the year 1588, to which he put his name in Hebrew for he called himſelf Nadabus Agmonius (36). He dedicated it to the magiſtrates of Francfort. He dedicated the ſecond to Marquardus Freherus, who procured him ſome manuſcripts, by means whereof he filled up ſeveral chaſms of the former edition. He was preparing a third, which would have been exempt from ſome of the faults which had eſcaped him in the two firſt, and which were cenſured by the Jeſuit Gretſerus (37). What Voſſius obſerves againſt that critic, is very judicious; he does not deny that Gretſerus's book is a learned work, but he thinks that the good ſervice which Junius had done to the Republic of learning, has not been ſufficiently conſidered. Gretſerus makes it his only buſineſs to cenſure his faults; which is, ſays he, the epidemical diſtemper of the learned. 'Multa in iis ſunt, quibus etiam 'doctiſſimos doceat (Gretſerus). Nec pauca tamen, quæ 'pro Junio poſſim reponere. Sed hic eruditorum 'morbus eſt epidemicus: ut non tam cogitent quan'tum boni aliquis præſtiterit: quale eſt hic, quòd 'primus eum ſcriptorem Junius ſuâ linguâ edide'rit, Latine verterit, etiam illuſtrarit Notis; in qui'bus humani aliquid ſubinde, in tam arduo nego'tio, perpeſſum fuiſſe, nec ipſi negamus. Sed, ut 'dici ſolet, inventis aliquid ſuperaddere, vel, quando 'omnes ſumus homines, etiam errores obſervare, non 'eſt uſque adeò difficile (38). —— There are many 'things in them, in which Gretſer may inſtruct the 'moſt learned; and not a few, which I can replace 'for Junius. But this is the epidemical diſeaſe of 'learned men: they do not enough conſider, what good 'any one has done; ſuch as Junius's publiſhing that 'author in his own language, tranſlating him into La'tin, and even commenting on him; in which labo'rious undertaking I do not deny that he ſometimes 'commits faults. But, as they ſay, it is not very 'difficult to improve upon diſcoveries, and to obſerve 'miſtakes, to which, as men, we are all liable.' Junius had tranſlated the three books of Gelaſius Cyzicenus, concerning the council of Nice, and added notes to them (39). Voſſius (40) promiſed to get them printed. Junius tranſlated out of Greek into Latin, the books which are called Apocryphal: and from the Arabic, the Acts of the Apoſtles, and the eples of St Paul to the Corinthians. He tranſlated from the Hebrew, all the books of the Old Teſtament, not alone, but with Tremellius.

[O] Thuanus is very much miſtaken in what he ſays of him.]. Theſe are his words. 'Vir deſultorio in'genio qui multa conatus, an adſecutus ſit quod mo'liebatur, doctorum erit judicium. Lugduno Batavo'rum ubi diu profeſſus eſt, ob rerum novarum ſuſ'picionem ab Ordinibus Belgii exactus, ſicuti ſuo lo'co diximus, & Altorfii ubi defecit, à Norimbergen'ſi Rep. honorifico ſtipendio invitatus (41). ——— A 'man of an inconſtant genius, who attempting many 'things, whether he ſucceded in what he undertook, 'the learned will judge. Baniſhed from Leyden, where 'had been long Profeſſor, by order of the States, on 'ſuſpicion of caballing, as I have related in it's place, 'and invited to Altorf, where he died, by the Repub'lic of Nuremberg, with the offer of an honourable 'ſalary.' I do not examine whether Junius was juſtly cenſured for his levity, and for meddling with too many things. Voſſius, his ſon-in-law, has ſolidly juſtified him in this reſpect (42); but I ſhall obſerve after him (43), that Thuanus is ſtrangely miſtaken, in ſuppoſing, I. that Junius was expelled by the States of Holland, upon ſome ſuſpicions of a political cabal. II. That he was invited by the magiſtrates of Nuremberg, and that he died at Altorf. III. That he (Thuanus) has mentioned this exile under it's proper year. To begin with this laſt fault, I ſay, that Thuanus has not ſpoken of Junius, but of Donellus, in deſcribing the cabal which was diſcovered in the year 1587 (44). Junius was then in the Palatinate, and did not come to Leyden till five years after. No one is ignorant, that from the year 1592, till he died, he was profeſſor of Divinity at Leyden. It was Donellus who retired to Altorf, and died there (45).

[P] Scaliger's memoirs . . . . . prejudiced Thuanus.] It is Voſſius's conjecture (46), and it is very probable. Scaliger's hatred and fury againſt Junius, diſcovered themſelves both in his converſation (47) and letters. This is not ſo plain to every reader in his letters, becauſe Heinſius (48) who publiſhed them in the year 1627, put aſteriſms in the places, where Junius was abuſed, and left out the names; but the abuſes are not the leſs real for it. 'Hocce anno 'Heinſius noſter in lucem edidit Epiſtolas Scaligeri, 'in quibus non urbanatim ſed ruſticatim Junium tan'quam Cumanum aſinum tangit homo cætera mag'nus, ſed nimis malignus (49). ——— This year our 'country-man Heinſius, publiſhed Scaliger's letters, in 'which that author, in other reſpects a great man, 'but too ill-natured, jeſts with an awkard kind of 'wit on Junius, calling him the aſs of Cumæ.' Theſe are Voſſius's words: he had juſt been ſaying, that they had found in Junius's books, ſeveral groſs abuſes written with Scaliger's own hand. When a man proceeds thus far, what will he not do. 'Memor eram 'qualia ſuperſtes evomuerit adverſus Junium, cùm to'tus in fermento jaceret. Et meminiſſe ipſe potes. 'Adhuc in noſtris, & aliorum manibus verſantur co'dices Juniani, Scaligeri manu oppleti bellis illis e'logiis, ſimia, aſinus, cojone, & aliis id genus con'vitiis, βωμολόγῳ (ſcurra) non Scaligero dignis (50). '—— I remembered how injuriouſly, in his life-time, 'he treated Junius, loading him with all manner of 'reproaches. And you yourſelf may remember it. Ju'nius's books are ſtill extant, filled by Scaliger's own 'hand with the fine encomium's of ape, aſs, and the 'like ſcurrilities, worthy of a buffoon, not of Scaliger.' Note, by the way, that Scaliger did nevertheleſs beſtow many praiſes upon Junius's tomb (51). So true it is, that the verſes made upon the death of people, are a piece of the grand comedy, which is acted on the ſtage of the world. Note alſo, by the by, that Junius drew upon him the hatred of this great man, by the liberty he took of contradicting him ſometimes in points of Chronology, &c. Some young men threw oil into the fire, by reporting, in an invidious manner, what Junius ſaid of the other, either in his lectures or converſations. 'Scis quale fuerit illud maxi'mi Scaligeri ingenium. Non ferebat diſſentientem. 'Itaque ſemper eo nomine offenſior Junio fuit, quod 'in quibuſdam ad ſacram χρονολογίαν pertinentibus 'ac credo in aliis etiam nonnullis à ſe diſcreparet. 'Offenſam eam unus & alter diſcipulorum alebant, 'malignè interpretantes apud Scaligerum, quæ vel pub'licè docuiſſet Junius, vel privatim dixiſſet (52).' However it be, this is what made Voſſius (53) think that Thuanus had been prejudiced againſt Junius, by Scaliger's letters.

That thought kept him at firſt in ſuſpence, whether he ſhould make an apology for his father-in law againſt Thuanus, or no; for he foreſaw, that the ſon of this great hiſtorian would juſtify his father, by producing Scaliger's letters, which were injurious to Junius; and in that caſe Voſſius would have found himſelf obliged to write againſt Scaliger: but he found it more proper to conceal the faults of that great man, than to publiſh them. At laſt he took the method, that may be ſeen in the preface (54), which I have quoted. 'Si calamum adverſus Thua'num ſtringam, periculum video, ne filius Thuani, 'juvenis eruditus, & ut genere, atque opibus pollens, 'ita multis in Galliis carus, & maximis honoribus de'ſtinatus, quæ de imperitia Junii modeſtè Parens ſcrip'ſerit, ea apertè, & ſine circuitione prodita, oſtendat

à Magno

(i) See Colomeſius, Gallia Orient. pag. 95, & ſeq.

(36) And not Aymonius, as Placcius has it, de Pſeudonymis, pag. 220, who a little while after ſays Cornelius, inſtead of Codinus, and apprehendit, inſtead of reprehendit.

(37) See Voſſius, de Hiſtoricis Græcis, pag. 368.

(38) Voſſius, ibid.

(39) Ib. pag. 264.

(40) Ibid.

(41) Thuan. lib. cxxvii, ſub fin. ad ann. 1602.

(42) Voſſius, in Præfat. de Hiſtor. Latinis.

(43) Ibid.

(44) Thuan. Hiſtor. lib. lxxxviii, pag. 147.

(45) Idem. lib. c, pag. 405.

(46) Ubi ſupra.

(47) See the Scaligerana.

(48) See Voſſius's Letter to Grotius, amongſt thoſe of the Arminians, n. 448, pag. 726.

(49) Voſſius, in eadem Epiſtola.

(50) Ibid.

(51) See in Voſſius's preface to his book, de Hiſt. Latin s. the Latin verſes of Scaliger upon Junius's death.

(52) Voſſius, Epiſtola, lxv, pag. 105, Edit. Lond. 1693.

(53) See his Letter to Gomarus. It is the ſixty fifth.

(54) Operis de Hiſtoricis Latinis.

tion might be obtained in the church of Rome [Q]. He never underſtood better the deficiency of his knowledge, than when he was arrived to the higheſt pitch of his knowledge (k); which is a ſign of a good underſtanding.

à Magno Scaligero, Reip. literariæ dictatore, cui doctior orbis lubens eruditionis faſces ſubmittit. Hinc mihi nova cura, etiam tuendi eum adverſus Scaligeri calumnias, incumbet. Quem ego virum laudavi ſemper, ac porro laudare decrevi: non quia ejus impotentiam animi, aut maledicentiam ignorem; aut quaſi neſciam, quam multis in locis aliquid humanitus patiatur: ſed quia ejus tantæ virtutes, præclaraque adeo merita ſunt, erga hiſtoriam, ac bonas literas, ut propterea, quæ peccavit, cenſeam ei condonari, & æterna oblivione ſepeliri oportere (55). —If I draw my pen againſt Thuanus, I ſee the danger, leaſt Thuanus's ſon, a learned youth, and not only of a good family and fortune, but dear likewiſe to many in France, and deſigned for the greateſt honours, ſhould ſhew that the great Scaliger, dictator of the Republic of Letters, whom the learned world readily acknowledges as it's ſovereign, declared openly, and without mincing the matter, what his father modeſtly wrote concerning the unskillfulneſs of Junius. Hence a new task will lie upon me, even of defending him againſt the calumnies of Scaliger; a man, whom I always praiſed, and have reſolved ſtill to praiſe: not that I am a ſtranger to his impotency of mind, or faculty of ſlandering; or that I am ignorant, that in many places he is himſelf in an error; but that I think his faults ought to be excuſed and entirely forgotten, on account of his great virtues, and uncommon merits, in reſpect to hiſtory, and claſſical learning.' He ſpares the name of Scaliger in this preface, but not his perſon; it is true, that he gives him a ſtab in a very reſpectful manner. Theſe are his words. 'Acerbè adeo ut ſummus vir (Thuanus) pronuntiaret, fecit amicus ejus, vir cætera egregius; ſed, quod in aliis damnat, præſidens, planeque ἰδιογνωμων, καὶ αὐθεκαστος, ſæpe etiam turgens loliginis ſucco, ac ſi quis non per omnia aſſentiret, vehemens alieni nominis obtrectator: quo vitio non mediocriter fœdabat egregias, imo admirandas animi dotes. Non me ariolari hic, ſed certiſſima promere, multis poſſim indiciis comprobare: ſed ea ſunt viri illius merita, ut quædam ſatiûs ſit honoris cauſa taceri (56). —— So bitterly, that the great Thuanus pronounced, his friend did it, in other reſpects an excellent man; but, what he condemns in others, confident, opinionated, and ſevere, and apt to detract from the merit of thoſe, who do not aſſent to him in every thing; with which vice he greatly ſullied his excellent parts. That this is not meer conjecture, but ſtrict truth, I can ſufficiently prove; but ſuch are this man's merits, that reſpect induces me to conceal ſome things.' Nothing can be more moderate.

[Q] He believed ſalvation might be obtained in the church of Rome.] Nevertheleſs, he called her, as other miniſters did, the whore mentioned in St John's Revelation; but he ſaid that ſhe was ſtill the ſpouſe of the ſon of GOD; a ſpouſe, whoſe unfaithfulneſs JESUS CHRIST bears with, and whom he has not divorced. This did not pleaſe Beza, a great favourer of the monarchy of the Solipſi. Give me leave to call thus the communions, which believe that they only are in the way of Salvation. Junius gave a great latitude to the true church. Perhaps Mr Nicole did not know it (57). 'Doctiſſimus ſocer Junius cum nollet ab iis diſcedere, qui Romanam Eccleſiam cenſent eſſe meretricem Babylonicam, & tamen ſtatueret ſalvari in ea innumera millia, ajebat eſſe vivum corpus, ſed ulceribus obſitum: meretricem eſſe, ſed adhuc ſponſam Chriſti, vel conjugem, quia Chriſtus necdum ei miſerit libellum repudii. Sed non eo ſatiſfecit Genevenſibus: qui illam dicerent idololatricam, ac proinde neminem in ea ſalvari. Narravit mihi aliquando doct. Anthonius Thyſius, cum primam Genevam veniſſet, & ſoceri mei nomine multam ſalutem diceret D. Bezæ, illum continuo ſubjeciſſe; Et quomodo valet cariſſimus frater Junius: vir eſt egregie de Eccleſiis noſtris meritus: quamquam in uno capite diſſentiat à nobis. Id caput erat de Eccleſia: quam Junius negabat tam arctis limitibus concludi, ac multi volunt (58). —— My learned father-in-law Junius, when he would not diſſent from thoſe, who think the Romiſh church to be the whore of Babylon, and yet laid it down, that great multitudes are ſaved in it, ſaid ſhe was a living body, but covered with ſores: that ſhe was a harlot, but ſtill the ſpouſe, or wife, of CHRIST, becauſe CHRIST had not yet ſent her a bill of divorcement. But this did not ſatisfy the Genevois, who ſaid ſhe was idolatrous, and that therefore no body was ſaved in her. The learned Anthony Thyſius once told me, that when he firſt came to Geneva, and had complimented Beza in my father-in-law's name, he immediately anſwered; And how fares my deareſt brother Junius? he deſerves extremely well of our churches; though in one article he diſſents from us: That article was concerning the church; which Junius would not have confined within ſuch narrow bounds, as many would.'

This is what Voſſius ſays. He obſerves in another place, that Junius being much more free from prepoſſeſſion, than people generally are, uſed to ſay in his latter days, the longer I live, the more I diſcover my ignorance. 'Socer meus Fr. Junius, tanti cum à multis retro annis nominis foret, poſtremis tamen vitæ annis crebrò illud in ore habebat, magis & magis ſe in dies videre, quam multa ſe ſugerent. Ita ille, qui cum novellis Doctoribus ſociarat antiquos; qui etiam partium ſtudio non paulo minus laborabat quam vulgò fieri ſolet (59).'

JUNIUS (FRANCIS), ſon of the foregoing (a), was born at Heidelberg in the year 1589. His firſt deſign was to be a man of the ſword; but the truce which was concluded in 1609, for twelve years, made him take another reſolution; which was to apply himſelf to Literature. He travelled into France; from whence he went over into England in the year 1620. He was received in the houſe of the earl of Arundel, and lived there thirty years; after which he returned into Holland, and there went on with the ſtudy he had very much cultivated in England, I mean that of the northern languages [A]. He made an extraordinary progreſs in it. He was ſo paſſionately fond

[A] He applied .... to the ſtudy of the northern languages.] Having found in England ſeveral Anglo-Saxon books, he reſolved to make advantage of them; and knowing from the skill he got in the Anglo-Saxon language, that it would enable him to diſcover many etymologies for the illuſtration of the Dutch, Engliſh, and German tongues, he applied himſelf wholly to that ſtudy, and afterwards learnt the ancient language of the Goths, Franks, Cimbrians, and Friſons, whereby he found the etymology of ſeveral Italian, French, and Spaniſh, words: for the Goths, Vandals, Franks, Burgundians, and Germans, ſpread their language in the provinces which they conquered: there are ſtill ſome footſteps of them (1). He applied himſelf ſelf entirely to the writing of gloſſaries (2); and this is the pedigree he diſcovered. 'His omnibus linguis imbibendis cum ſatis diu inſudaſſet, vidit, quod & privatim apud omnes, quibus cum agebat de hac doctrina, tum publice teſtatus eſt, Gothicam eſſe matrem omnium cæterarum Teutonicarum linguarum, ex qua profluxerit vetus Cimbrica, monumentis Runarum poſteris tradita, nec non Suecica, Danica, Norwegica, Iſlandica, quibus, illius plagæ homines iſto tempore ſuas animi cogitationes explicant. Ex Anglo-ſaxonica, quæ & ipſa aut propago eſt Gothicæ, aut illius ſoror Germana, & ejuſdem matris filia, manavit Anglica, Scotica, Belgica, Friſica vetus. Ex Gothica & Saxonica orta eſt Francica, quæ Germanicæ

(k) See remark [Q], citat. (59).

(55) Voſſius, Epiſt. lxv, pag. 106.

(56) Voſſius, Præfat. de Hiſt. Latinis. See alſo his Letter to Gomarus: it is the ſixty fifth.

(57) See the preface to his treatiſe concerning the unity of the church, where he mentions ſome miniſters, who believed, that the true church is to be found in ſeveral communions.

(58) Voſſius, Epiſt. ad Hugon. Grotium. It is the 57th in Epiſt. Eccleſ & Theol. of the folio edition, pag. 818.

(59) Id apud Colomeſ. Gall. Oriental. pag. 96.

(a) By the third marriage contracted with Joan l'Ermite, daughter of Simon l'Ermite, lord of Betinſart, echevin of Antwerp, and related to Daniel l'Ermite, de quo ſuo loco.

(1) Taken from his Life, written by Mr Grævius, prefixed to the folio edition of his book de Pictura Veterum.

(2) Totus erat in contexendis Anglo-ſaxonicis, Francicis, & Cimbricis Lexicis ac Gloſſariis, & explanandis antiquiſſimis harum gentium ſcriptoribus. Grævius, ibid.

fond of this ſtudy, that underſtanding there were in Frieſland ſome villages, where the antient Saxon tongue was preſerved, he went and lived there two years. He returned into England in 1675, and having ſtayed two years at Oxford, he retired to Windſor to Iſaac Voſſius, his nephew, and died there within the ſpace of a year. The univerſity of Oxford, to which he bequeathed his manuſcripts, built him a very noble monument (b). I will ſpeak of the books he publiſhed [B]. He was not only a man of very great learning, but alſo of an excellent life. He was not obſerved to have any vitious paſſion. He did not mind the riches nor the honours of this world; his books were his only care: and perhaps no man did ever ſtudy more than he, without doing any prejudice to his health [C]. I ſhall ſet down a paſſage of Colomiés [D].

When I ſpoke of his ſtay at Oxford, and of the time of his death, I followed the account of Mr Grævius; but the ſame is not exact. I rectify it here by obſerving that Junius retired to Oxford in the month of October 1676, and continued there till the month of Auguſt 1677, when he went to Windſor upon the invitation of Iſaac Voſſius, his nephew, in whoſe houſe he died near that place, on the nineteenth of November 1677. He was ſick but a few days. He was buried in St George's chapel at Windſor (c).

(b) Taken from his Life, written by Mr Grævius, and prefixed to his book de Pictura Veterum, in fol.o.

(c) Taken from Athenæ Oxonienſis.

' manicæ ſuperioris parens eſt. Harum veterrimarum linguarum, & dialectorum, quæ ex illis ductæ ſunt, cognitionem invicto ſtudio, & incredibili aſſiduitate non primus tantum aſſecutus eſt, ſed & ſolus, viam ſecutus nullius ante tritam veſtigiis (3). —— Having applied himſelf long enough to the acquiring all theſe languages, he diſcovered, as he both privately aſſured all whom he converſed with on this ſubject, and alſo publickly declared, that the Gothic was the mother of all the other Teutonic languages, whence flowed the old Cimbric, handed down to poſterity by the remains of the Runæ, as alſo the Swediſh, Daniſh, Norwegian, Iſelandiſh, in which the men of that country then expreſſed their thoughts. From the Anglo-Saxon, which itſelf is either a branch of the Gothic, or it's ſiſter, and daughter of the ſame mother, flowed the Engliſh, Scotch, Belgic, old Friſeiſh. From the Gothic and Saxon ſprung the Frankiſh, which is the mother language of Upper Germany. He was not only the firſt, but the only one, who, following an untrodden path, with invincible labour and pains, acquired the knowledge of theſe antient languages, and the dialects, which are derived from them.'

[B] I will ſpeak of the books he has publiſhed.] In the year 1637, he put out a treatiſe de Pictura Veterum, which abounds with admirable literature. Afterwards he ſo enlarged it, that the ſecond edition that was made of it (4) is a pretty large folio, whereas the firſt was but a quarto of 318 pages. There are very few things in Greek and Latin authors concerning Painting, and the antient Painters, that have eſcaped the diligence of this author. In the year 1655, he publiſhed notes upon the Francica Paraphraſis of the Canticles, written by the abbot Willeram, and publiſhed the firſt time by Paul Merula. Being returned into Holland, after the two years that he had ſpent in Frieſland, he met with an old Gothic manuſcript, firnamed the Silver One (5); he applied himſelf entirely to the explication of it, and finiſhed it in a little time. He publiſhed therefore this Gothic paraphraſe of the four goſpels, with a Gothic gloſſary, to which he added an antient Anglo-Saxon verſion of the ſame goſpels, corrected from good manuſcripts, and illuſtrated with the notes of Thomas Marſhall. This is but a ſmall part of his works; that which remains to be printed is much more conſiderable. His gloſſary in five languages, in which he ſearches and explains the original of the Northern languages, contains eleven (6) manuſcript volumes, which Dr John Fell biſhop of Oxford ordered to be writ out fair to be ſent to the preſs. His commentary upon the harmony of the four goſpels by Tatian is very large, I ſay nothing of ſo many other books, upon which he has made notes (7). Conſult the catalogue of the manuſcripts which he left to the univerſity of Oxford. It is at the end of his life.

[C] No man ſtudied more than he without any prejudice to his health.] He roſe at four of the clock in the morning both in winter and ſummer, and ſtudied till dinner time. He dined at one, after dinner he uſed ſome exerciſe till three (8): He went again to his ſtudy at three, and left it not till eight to go to ſupper, and then he went to bed. He ſeldom went out; and when he did, it was upon ſome buſineſs. All this did not hinder him from enjoying a perfect health: he was never ſick. Firma fuit valetudine, ut proſperrima per omnem ætatem ſine ulla corporis offenſione uteretur, quamvis totos dies à ſummo mane uſque ad noctem incumberet litteris, & rariſſime, nec unquam niſi negotiorum ratio id ei quaſi imperaret, prodiret in publicum (9). Such a long ſolitude ſpent amongſt barbarous books, and wild words, and in making five Gothic or Teutonic Lexicons, did not in the leaſt leſſen his gaiety, no not in his old age: he was always free from peeviſhneſs, and affable to thoſe who viſited him, though he did not care to be interrupted. Mr Grævius deſcribes this in elegant terms. In aſſiduitate tanta licet invitus admodum avocaretur ab his, quibus inſudabat, curis, tam longe tamen aberat omnis moroſitas ingeniique triſtitia, quæ ſolet eſſe propria iis, qui à luce hominum & celebritate alieniores omne tempus & operam domi ſuæ in doctrinæ & litterarum ſtudiis conſumunt, præcipue ſenes, ut nihil ſene noſtro fieri poſſet ſuavius & facilius (10). The polite illiterate will doubtleſs believe that he was a very miſerable man; they had as good be condemned to the gallies as ſpend their lives as he did among his deſks, without taſting the pleaſures of gaming, love, good cheer, or converſation. How can a man live, ſay they, without wine in the day time, and without women in the night. But they are miſtaken, if they fancy their happineſs exceeds his. He was doubtleſs one of the happieſt men in the world, unleſs he had the weakneſs others have to be diſturbed about trifles: for as there are ſome people, who having no reaſon to be merry, find out chimerical pleaſures to amuſe themſelves (11); there are ſome, on the contrary, who cannot be moved with the moſt juſt cauſes of diſcontent, and yet diſquiet themſelves for ridiculous things, of which they ſhould be aſhamed to complain.

[D] I will ſet down a paſſage of Colomiés.] 'I knew at the Hague the learned Mr Junius, ſon of the famous Francis Junius, who was profeſſor of Divinity at Leyden. He is an old man near eighty, but ſtill very vigorous. He ſtudies thirteen or fourteen hours a day, and has lately publiſhed the four goſpels in Gothic, with a very learned gloſſary. He made me a preſent of this curious work, and told me, he would quickly print his book de Pictura Veterum, with the names and works of all the Painters of antiquity. It will be dedicated to the preſent earl of Arundel, who was his pupil, when he was in England library-keeper to this earl's father. I ought not to forget, for Mr Junius's glory, that Grotius highly commends his book concerning Painting, in the following letter (12).' That letter has been prefixed to the new edition of our Junius's book.

(3) Id. ibid.

(4) At Rotterdam, for Reinier Leers, 1694.

(5) Qui argenteus dicitur, quoniam quatuor Evangelia litteris Argenteis Gothicis in illo fuerat deſcripta. Grævius, ubi ſupra.

(6) There is XI in Junius's Life; but in the catalogue of the manuſcripts bequeathed to the univerſity of Oxford there is IX.

(7) Taken from his Life.

(8) Hora prima prandebat, ſequente corpus exercebat, vel in area ſubdivali ambulando contentius, aut etiam ſubſultim nonnunquam currendo, aut, ſi id non ferret aſperior tempeſtas, per omnes ſcalas in cœnaculum aſcendendo valetudinis tuendæ cauſſa Grævius, in Vita F. Junii

(9) Id. ibid.

(10) Id ibid.

(11) Dum careo veris, gaudia falſa juvant. Ovid. Heroïd. Epiſt. xiii, ver. 108. Conſult Mr Dacier on Horace, lib. i, Epiſt. viii, pag. 406, 410, 411.

(12) Colomiés, in his Opuſcula, pag. 116. Edit. Utrecht, 1669.

JUNO, ſiſter and wife of Jupiter, was the daughter of Saturn and Rhea. Her father being reſolved to devour his children, for fear they ſhould dethrone him, did not ſpare her any more than his two other daughters (a), whom he had already ſwallowed: but he was forced to diſgorge them ſome years after. They gave him a potion, which made him vomit up all the children he had devoured (b). And thus it was that Juno returned into the world. The circumſtances of her marriage with Jupiter are differently related. There is a tradition which ſays they loved one another, and lay together unknown to their father and mother [A], and it does not appear that ſhe kept her lover long in ſuſpence. But others ſay, that ſhe withſtood the ſollicitations of Jupiter like a maid of virtue and honour [B]; and that to avoid his further importunities, ſhe fled into a den. They add, that ſhe there met with a man, whoſe diſcourſe ſo ſoftened her heart in favour of Jupiter, that ſhe conſented to make him happy upon the ſpot (c). Others would perhaps confeſs, that this was the firſt time that Jupiter lay with her, but not the firſt time that ſhe lay with a man; for they pretend, that before Jupiter courted her, ſhe paſſed through the hand of Eurymedon, a ſtout and leud giant, by the ſame token, that he got her with child of a ſon, who was called Prometheus [C]. Jupiter did not know it till after he was married, and he diſcharged his revenge upon this baſtard under other pretences. Upon ſome other occaſions, the chaſtity of his wife appeared very doubtful to him [D]. He well deſerved it, whoſe gallantries were ſo common. There was ſcarce any animal, but he borrowed it's ſhape to get maidenheads. Every body knows that he metamorphoſed himſelf into a cuckoo, in order to compaſs his deſire with Juno [E]. This goddeſs preſided over marriages (d), (b) Apollodor. ibid.

(a) Veſta and Ceres, Juno's eldeſt ſiſters. Apollodor lib. i, pag. 4.

(c) See the article ACHILLES.

(d) See the remark [Z].

[A] A tradition ſays that Jupiter and Juno lay together unknown to their father and mother.] They who want a good proof of this matter, may find it in theſe words of the Iliad (1):

Ὡς δ' ἴδεν, ὥς μιν ἔρως πυκινὰς φρένας ἀμφεκάλυψεν,
Οἷον ὅτε πρώτιςον ἐμισγέσθην φιλότητι,
Εἰς εὐνὴν φοιτῶντε, φίλους λήθοντε τοκῆας.

Ut vero vidit, continuò illum amor prudentia præcordia cooperuit,
Perinde ac quando primùm miſti ſunt amore,
Ad cubile conſuetudinis gratiâ euntes, ſuis clam parentibus.

The god, whoſe lightning ſets the heav'ns on fire,
Thro' all his boſom feels the fierce deſire,
Fierce, as when firſt by ſtealth he ſeiz'd her charms,
Mix'd with her ſoul, and melted in her arms.

Pope.

Homer ſpeaks here of a certain occaſion, on which Jupiter, who had been married many ages to Juno, felt, as he ſaw her by chance, the ſame ardor, as when he lay with her by ſtealth the firſt time. I add to the teſtimony of a Greek Poet, that of a Latin one. It is a lover who ſpeaks; a lover, I ſay, who had found the critical minute (2), and is vexed that many before him had received the like gratifications by ſtealth.

Iſtius atque utinam facti mea culpa magiſtra
Prima foret: lethum vita mihi dulcius eſſet.
Non mea, non ullo moreretur tempore fama,
Dulcia cum Veneris furatus gaudia primus
Dicerer, atque ex me dulcis foret orta voluptas.
Nam mihi non tantum tribuerunt impia vota,
Auctor ut occulti noſter foret error amoris.
Jupiter ante ſui ſemper mendacia furti,
Cum Junone prius conjux quam dictus uterque eſt,
Gaudia libavit dulcem furatus amorem (3).

O! that my crime had taught her firſt the bliſs!
With pleaſure I had dy'd upon the kiſs.
My fame had liv'd, and future ages ſung
How firſt from my embrace love's tranſports ſprung.
In vain my impious wiſhes wou'd aſpire
To kindle in her breaſt the ſecret fire.
With Juno, tho' not yet his conſort, Jove,
Retir'd in private, ſtole the joys of love.

[B] Others ſay that ſhe reſiſted the ſollicitations of Jupiter like a maid of virtue and honour.] Her virtue was ſuch according to ſome, that if Jupiter had not found a remedy, inſtead of that which ſhe would not grant him, he would not have known what to do. But he went and ſat upon a mountain (4) as often as he was in the tranſport of his paſſion, which he calmed by that means (5). The author who furniſhes me with this ſtory, does not ſay whether Jupiter was then married to Juno, nor was it neceſſary to be ſo particular upon this ſubject: the moſt ſtupid readers will eaſily underſtand, that he was not married, and that he was in love with a cruel woman.

[C] Eurymedon . . . . . got her with child of a ſon who was called Prometheus.] You will find this ſtory in Homer's Scholiaſt (6). Jupiter's reſentment was not leſs violent againſt the father of the baſtard, than againſt the baſtard himſelf; for if Prometheus was put in chains, Eurymedon was caſt down into hell. I know not under what pretence Jupiter treated Eurymedon in that manner; but there is no queſtion, that he concealed the true cauſe of his anger: he had too much ſenſe to diſgrace himſelf by his revenge. His pretence againſt the baſtard was his ſtealing the celeſtial fire. The Scholiaſt (7) whom I cite has this from Euphorion.

[D] The chaſtity of Juno . . . . appeared very doubtful to him.] I will comment upon this text with the words of a modern author, who deſigning to prove, that Jupiter was a notorious cuckold, expreſſes himſelf thus: ‘ The giant Eurymedon had obtained the ‘ firſt favours of Juno his wife *, and not to ſpeak of ‘ the iſle of Samos, which was famous for the unchaſt ‘ amours of this goddeſs, do not we know that Jupi‘ter diſcovering a few days after his marriage, that ‘ ſhe would quickly be the mother of a child that was ‘ not his, ſhe knew how to wheedle him ſo as to ‘ perſuade him that ſhe had conceived of herſelf, and ‘ that ſhe had preſerved her virginity intire. She made ‘ him believe another time that ſhe was with child by ‘ eating wild lettuces. So that though the horns that ‘ were ſet upon his ſtatue in Libya, had not denoted ‘ him a cuckold, did not he deſerve that they ſhould ‘ have this ſignification, and to occaſion thoſe ways of ‘ ſpeaking, which have been ſo long in uſe, by the ‘ conſent of all nations (8)?’

[E] Jupiter . . . metamorphoſed himſelf into a cuckoo in order to compaſs his deſire with Juno.] To relate what is moſt curious upon this ſubject, I need only follow the diſpute of Coſtar and Girac. The foundation whereof is this: ‘ Jupiter was no leſs forgetful ‘ on many other important occaſions. Pallas complains ‘ in Homer that he did not think of wiſe Ulyſſes. ‘ Another upbraids him that in the eſtabliſhment of ‘ his houſhold, he had not conſidered cuckoldom, from ‘ which he had received ſo many ſignal ſervices (9) ‘ (§ α).’ They are Coſtar's words. His adverſary anſwers him, that this is a very unjuſt accuſation: ‘ For ‘ good Jupiter, ſays he (10), to ſhew the eſteem he ‘ had for cuckoldom, and the deſire of being a cuc‘kold, transformed himſelf into the bird of that name, ‘ when he courted his wife Juno. And afterwards to ‘ expreſs his gratitude, he commanded the Argivi to ‘ make a fine cuckoo of gold, and to perch him up‘on the ſceptre of Juno's ſtatue; with which this ‘ great goddeſs was not offended, having reaped at ‘ leaſt as many advantages from cuckoldom, as her huſ‘band had done. And even near the town of Her‘mione, there are two little mountains, one of which ‘ is called the Cuckoo Mountain, upon which in Pau‘ſanias's time † was ſeen a temple of Jupiter, and but ſhe ſhould not have had that employment. It was an ill omen, for ſhe led but an odd life with her huſband; and in ſpite of all the ſtrong reaſons, that engaged him to bear

---

(1) Lib. xiv, ver. 294.

(2) Et mecum tenera gaviſa eſt ludere in herba Purpureos flores, quos inſuper accumbebat Candida formoſo ſupponens brachia collo. Valerius Cato, in Diris, pag. 61, Catalectorum veterum Poëtarum.

(3) Valer. Cato, ibid.

(4) Called Leucate.

(5) Ὁ Ζεὺς ἀεὶ ἐρῶν Ἥρας ἐρχόμενος ἐπὶ τῇ πέτρᾳ ἐκαθίζετο καὶ ἀνεπαύετο τοῦ ἔρωτος. Jovem ſemper Junonis amore captum ad ſaxum hoc acceſſiſſe, atque ei inſidendo amoris impotentiam ſedaſſe. Ptol. Hephæſt. apud Photium, Cod CXC, pag. m. 492.

(6) Ἥραν τρεφομένην παρὰ τοῖς γονεῦσιν εἷς τῶν γιγάντων Εὐρυμέδων βιασάμενος ἔγκυον ἐποίησεν· ἡ δὲ Προμηθέα ἐγέννησε. Schol. in Iliad. lib. xiv, ver. 295.

(7) Id. ibid.

* Didym. in Hom. Iliad xiv. Euſtath. ibid.

(8) Girac, Replique à Coſtar, ſect. lxiv, pag. m. 545.

(9) Coſtar, Defenſe des Ouvrages de Voiture, pag. m. 116.

(10) Girac, Réponſe à la Defenſe de Voiture, ſect. xxvi, pag. 194.

† In Corinth.

‘ over againſt it on the other mountain that of Juno. In Libya, the ſtatue of Jupiter Hammon had great horns upon it's head. Which was ſo agreeable to this god, that tho' ſtatues were erected to him over all the world, he only delivered oracles thro' this (11). He was ſo well pleaſed with his horns, that he obliged his deareſt friends to follow his example. Bacchus ‡ and Pan, the ſatires, the gods of the rivers, and many others did not fail to imitate him, Juno herſelf did the ſame, to ſhew that ſhe had ſome complaiſance for her huſband, and we ſtill ſee ſeveral medals of this goddeſs with horns. Diana and Venus wore them too as an ornament that wonderfully became a handſome face.’ This anſwer is learned, but it is falſe; for there is nothing in it that proves the point in diſpute. The ſtate of the queſtion is this: whether Jupiter honoured the huſbands, whoſe wives had gallants? Prove as much as you pleaſe, that he honoured the bird we call a cuckoo, and add moreover that he would have his ſtatues to be adorned with horns; ſay withal, that the other gods followed the ſame faſhion; you do not come near the point, becauſe at that time, the words cuckold and horns were not taken in the ſame ſenſe, that is given them at preſent. Beſides, to diſguiſe ones ſelf in the ſhape of a cuckoo, in order to ſucceed in one's enterprizes, would not even in our age be a ſign, that a man deſires to marry a galanting lady. My readers will eaſily imagine, that Coſtar was aware of the vanity of the anſwers that were made him: but if any one ſhould doubt of it, I ſhall quickly undeceive him by citing his own words. In which we ſhall ſee, that the affectation of making too great a ſhew of his reading, makes him mix with his replies, ſome things which ſpoil his cauſe. He begins with Jupiter's metamorphoſis into a bird, which bears the name of cuckoo; and here follows what he ſays of it (12).

[(§ α) It would be in vain to look for this ſtory in the writings of the Antients; Rabelais is the author of it, book III. chap. XXXII, but the ground of it is found in Plutarch, No 17. of his conſolation to Apollonius on the death of his ſon. Rem. Crit.]

‘ This old woman's ſtory, and that ridiculous invention of a grammarian abuſing his leiſure, (thus Eraſmus * ſpeaks of him) is took from a ſcholiaſt upon Theocritus, who ſays that Juno having left her companions to divert herſelf all alone and at liberty, after a long walk, laid herſelf upon the graſs in a fine place of mount Thronax. Jupiter, who ſaw her in that poſture, found her ſo handſome, that he immediately fell violently in love with her, and to eaſe his paſſion, put on the ſhape of a cuckoo, and raiſing an extreme cold in the air, all trembling and frozen, he threw himſelf into this goddeſs's arms; and then reſuming his uſual form, and promiſing to marry her, he received from her the ſatiſfaction he deſired. The cold that Jupiter rais'd upon that occaſion was not greater, than that of the ſilly jeſt of our learned author. In effect it appears, that it was not out of love to cuckoldom that Jupiter turned cuckoo, ſince neither among the gods nor among men, the name of that bird did ſignify at that time a huſband, whoſe wife was unfaithful to him. At leaſt, there is no ſign of it among the Antients: on the contrary, there are ſome women in Plautus, who call their huſbands Cuckoos, whom they ſurprized in adultery, and Juvenal † calls a poor fellow Curruca [Hedge-ſparrow], who had that injury done him; doubtleſs, becauſe that bird feeds the young cuckoos that are laid in it's neſt.’ Coſtar afterwards goes on to the conſideration of the horns, and expreſſes himſelf in this manner (13). Has Mr de Girac ſeen any old manuſcript, which clearly proves that at that time horns were a ſign of cuckoldom? and you, SIR (14), who know every thing, can you ſhew me that theſe ways of ſpeaking, to bear horns, and to ſet horns, in the ſenſe that they are now taken in, are much more antient than Artemidorus, who flouriſhed under Hadrian? the horns of Jupiter Hammon were not thoſe of a cuckold, but of a fine ram, propheſying upon the ſands of Libya, as our Ronſard ſpeaks. He examines in particular, the horns of thoſe deities which Girac had produced, and makes it evident that they had no relation to the condition of the huſbands, which we call cuckolds, and that they were not taken in complaiſance to Jupiter; and this is his concluſion (15). If out of all this Mr de Girac can make any thing that may be ſerviceable to his deſign, I will not oppoſe him: but I am very much miſtaken, if he can ſucceed in it, and oblige me to acknowledge that Jupiter, when he ſettled his houſhould, did not forget cuckoldom, which had always been ſo ſerviceable to him. This is a good concluſion; it is to bring things to the ſtate of the queſtion, and to make all the lines terminate in the center.

Let us conſider the reply. Girac thinks it very ſtrange that Coſtar, ſhould treat this matter with a ſcholaſtic ſtrictneſs, and in a ſerious manner (16). He would have me to prove by demonſtration and authority, that it was the love of cuckoldom, that made Jupiter a cuckold. He is not ſatisfied, unleſs I ſhow him ſome manuſcripts that clearly prove, that at that time horns were the marks of cuckolds. Where is the juſtice of this man? he does nothing in all his writings but banter; he himſelf confeſſes that he cannot ſpeak a ſentence without the aſſiſtance of his beloved irony; and yet he will not ſuffer me to jeſt ſo much as once . . . . . . Although my railleries ariſe from my ſubject, and are ſupported by very fine antiquities; for is it not true that Jupiter was a downright cuckold, ſince the giant Eurymedon had obtained the firſt favours from his wife Juno? You will find above (17) the ſequel of this paſſage: it would be needleſs to repeat it here; the paper it would take up, will be more uſefully employed in theſe two remarks. The firſt is, that though it be permitted to jeſt in a criticiſm; yet it is not permitted to reaſon wrong. You may be merry if you pleaſe, and ſpeak according as occaſion ſerves, either in jeſt or in earneſt; but be ſure not to advance a falſity, and never pretend, that by jeſting upon a falſe ſuppoſition, or by building railleries upon ignorance, you will either make good objections, or ſolid anſwers to an objection (18). My ſecond obſervation is, that the adventure of the giant, and the unfaithfulneſs of Juno, come too late. The author had ſaid nothing of them in his anſwer, and ſo they can make nothing againſt Coſtar, who was not obliged to govern himſelf, by what his adverſary ſhould ſay afterwards. They cannot bring Mr de Girac off, for beſides that he did not make uſe of them to ſupport his criticiſm, they cannot prove the thing in diſpute. Suppoſe Juno had an hundred intrigues, will this prove that Jupiter remembered cuckoldom, when he ſettled his houſhold? every body ſees that my firſt remark ruins Girac's cauſe, ſince all that he alledges is grounded upon a falſe ſuppoſition. He might be reduced to this troubleſome dilemma. If you was ignorant, that when Jupiter transformed himſelf into a cuckoo, huſbands diſhonoured by their wives unfaithfulneſs were not called cuckolds, and cornutes, your raillery is very impertinent; for according to your own rules, a raillery is bad, when it is grounded upon the ignorance of things, which we are obliged to know (19). If you knew that at that time ſuch ideas were not annexed to thoſe words, you are extreamly to blame for making uſe of proofs, whereof you know the falſity. Let us ſee the ſequel of his reply.

Notwithſtanding all this, ſays he (20), our Sophiſt urges me to ſhew him, that when the father of the gods put on the ſhape of a cuckoo, the name of that bird ſignified a huſband, whoſe wife was falſe to him. I promiſe and ingage to ſatisfy him, if he proves by good authorities, that Jupiter was formerly reproached, that in the ſettlement of his houſhold he had not thought of cuckoldom. As for what relates to horns, that word in the ſignification I have given it, is more antient than is imagined. We learn from Nicetas, that the emperor Andronicus, to ridicule the inhabitants of Conſtantinople, and upbraid them with their wives lewdneſs, uſed to ſet up in the public places of that great city, the fineſt and largeſt ſtags heads, that could be found; and Artemidorus, who lived fifteen hundred years ago, makes uſe †† of the words, to beſtow horns, as a common proverb, which did not begin in his time (21). It would be an ill uſe of one's time, to ſeek the original of it, and to enquire whether it was in uſe in Jupiter Hammon's time. However it be, my adverſary,

(11) Coſtar, Suite de la Defenſe, pag. 382, confutes this in theſe words: Ariſtotle ſays ſomewhere in his Rhetoric, that Hegeſippus being returned from Elis, whither he went to conſult the oracle of Jupiter, reſolved likewiſe to conſult that of Delphi, where he aſked Apollo this queſtion: Will you be of the ſame opinion with your father? Dare you contradict him? But Girac complains, in his Reply, pag. 551, that his words have been falſified: He clearly ſhews that he was not ignorant that Jupiter gave anſwers in other places; but that he gave none through his ſtatue except in Egypt.

‡ Cicer. I, de Nat. Deorum.

(12) Coſtar, Suite de la Défenſe, pag. 380.

* Equidem vix credo hanc fabulam apud veteres inveniri, ſed ſuſpicor ab otioſo quopiam Grammatico fuiſſe confictam: adeo ſapit anile quiddam.

† Tu tibi nunc curruca places, fletumque labellis Exorbes. Sat. VI, ver. 276.

(13) Coſtar, ubi ſupra, pag. 381.

(14) He ſpeaks to Mr Menage.

(15) Coſtar, ubi ſupra, pag. 386.

(16) Replique à Coſtar, ſect. lxiv, pag. 544.

(17) In the remark [D].

(18) Confer quæ ſupra, in the remark [C], of the article COLOMIE'S.

(19) Girac, Réponſe à la Défenſe de Voiture, ſect. xxvi, pag. 190. See Coſtar, Suite de la Défenſe pag. 381.

(20) Girac, Repl. pag. 545.

†† Lib. ii, cap. xi.

(21) See Menage's Etymologies of the French Tongue in folio, at the words cornes and cocu.

bear with her, after ſo many juſt occaſions of jealouſy, which he gave her, their quarrels were driven ſo far as a divorce [F]; and I believe, that before they came to that, he tried if by beating her he could bring her to reaſon. He hung her up once betwixt heaven and earth for ſome time [G]. If on one hand ſhe preſided over marriages and weddings, adverſary, who pretends to be a ſubtle man, did not perceive, this time, that I laughed at him. This paſſage of Mr de Girac makes it plain, that he has loſt his cauſe: he does not find himſelf capable of proving what is denied him, and without which his criticiſm is inſignificant; he pretends that he deſigned to ridicule his adverſary. There is no writer but may uſe ſuch ſubterfuges, when he knows not what to anſwer: we ſhall ſee Mr Coſtar in his turn ſomewhat puzzled, His knowledge forſook him, when he made uſe of Eraſmus's authority, in a thing where Eraſmus was in the wrong (22). What was it to him if Jupiter was not metamorphoſed into a cuckoo? how came he not to ſee that this metamorphoſis is as credible as ſo many others we read in Ovid? does he not ſhew by his anger againſt thoſe who have related it, that he looks upon it as a thing advantageous to his adverſary; and does not he horribly deceive himſelf to his enemy's advantage? Girac did not fail to take advantage of it: conſider well what follows (23). 'Not being able to deny that I had very properly alledged Jupiter's metamorphoſis into a cuckoo; he calls that fable an old woman's ſtory, and a ridiculous invention; as if the change of the ſame god into a ſwan, a bull, and an eagle, had ſomething in it more ingenious and better; as if all fables in general were not equally frivolous, and this as well as others had not it's allegory and mythological explication. But when Mr Coſtar maintains, that it is an invention of a grammarian making an ill uſe of his leiſure; that it is taken from a ſcholiaſt upon Theocritus, and when he proves by the authority of Eraſmus, that it is not to be found in any antient author, what does he do but ſhew that he is ignorant in company, and that he reads authors only to learn their faults? in effect, I do not find any fable, that is mentioned by a greater number of celebrated authors, than this. And even the ſcholiaſt alledged by Mr Coſtar (ſo great is this man's ſtupidity) affirms that he took it from a tract †† which Ariſtotle had written concerning the temple of Hermione. Plutarch in like manner made mention of it in his book concerning rivers; Pauſanias ſpeaks of it in ſeveral places of his Corinthiaca; and Didymus, upon the fourteenth Iliad, relates it from Euphorio, a very antient author, not to cite the ſcholiaſt on the Greek epigrams, nor abundance of others, whoſe catalogue would be too tedious.' I omit the other things upon which Girac criticizes him learnedly and reaſonably, on the ſubject of horns and the cuckoo. The great number of good authors, who have ſpoken of this metamorphoſis of Jupiter, puts me in pain, out of kindneſs to Eraſmus. It were to be be wiſhed for his glory, that he had let that old ſcholiaſt alone. He had better have been aſleep, than writ ſuch a thing as this. Had he not read what Pauſanias ſays (24) concerning mount Thornax (25), which was called Coccygius, or Coccyx, from the time that Jupiter, transformed into a cuckoo, lay there with Juno? It is a mountain of Laconia. The ſame author ſays, that the reaſon why the Juno of Argus (26) bore a ſceptre with a cuckoo upon it, was becauſe Jupiter aſſumed the form of that bird, to lie with Juno. I do not believe that, adds Pauſanias; but nevertheleſs, ſays he, I thought I ought not to omit it. Κόκκυγα δὲ ἐπὶ τῷ σκήπτρῳ καθῆσθαί φασι, λέγοντες τὸν Δία, ὅτε ἤρα παρθένου τῆς Ἥρας, ἐς τοῦτον τὸν ὄρνιθα ἀλλαγῆναι, τὴν δὲ ἅτε παίγνιον θηρᾶσαι. τοῦτον τὸν λόγον, καὶ ὅσα ἐοικότα εἴρηνται περὶ θεῶν, οὐκ ἀποδεχόμενος γράφω, γράφω δὲ οὐδὲν ἧσσον. Cuculum vero avem idcirco ſceptro ajunt impoſitum, quod virginis Junonis amore captus Jupiter, in eam ſe avem verterit, quam puella tanquam ludicrum captarit. Hæc ego, & quæ his ſunt ſimilia de dîs vulgata, etſi vera neutiquam exiſtimo, non putavi tamen negligenda (27).

[F] Their quarrels were driven ſo far as a divorce.] Pauſanias (28) ſays, there were three temples of Juno at Stymphalum, a town of Arcadia. The firſt was called the temple of Juno, a maid; and the ſecond the temple of Juno, married; and the third the temple of Juno, a widow. Theſe three temples were built to her by Temenus, with whom ſhe had been educated. The laſt was built at the time that ſhe lived at Stymphalum, whither ſhe retired after her divorce. You will find in Charles Stephens's Dictionary, enlarged by Lloyd (29), by what means Jupiter cauſed Juno to return to him. He ſpread a report, that he was going to be married to Aſopus's daughter. This news made a greater impreſſion upon the provoked goddeſs's heart, than all Jupiter's intreaties. See the remark [Q], at the place where I relate the generation of Typhon.

[G] He hung her up once between heaven and earth for ſome time.] The reaſon of it was, that ſhe had raiſed a ſtorm againſt Hercules, Jupiter put her in mind of it, when he knew the tricks ſhe had plaid him during the ſiege of Troy. She knew ſo well how to charm him, and lay him aſleep in her arms, that Neptune had the time neceſſary to put the Trojan affairs in an ill condition. I ſpeak at large of this ſtratagem of Juno, in the following remark. Jupiter, who had given her ſo many ſweet words, and procured her great pleaſures, no ſooner knew the prejudice the Trojans had ſuffered, whilſt he had been lying with her, but he reprimanded her very ſharply. He threatned to whip her (30), and asked her, whether ſhe had forgot the time, when he faſtened an anvil to each of her feet, and ſuffered her to hang between heaven and earth in the ſight of all the gods, who in vain attempted to untie her; for he kicked from heaven to earth as many of them as he could catch.

Ἦ οὐ μέμνῃ ὅτε τ' ἐκρέμω ὑψόθεν, ἐκ δὲ ποδοῖιν
Ἄκμονας ἧκα δύω, περὶ χερσὶ δὲ δεσμὸν ἴηλα
Χρύσεον, ἄῤῥηκτον; σὺ δ' ἐν αἰθέρει καὶ νεφέλῃσιν
Ἐκρέμω, ἠλάστεον δὲ θεοὶ κατὰ μακρὸν Ὄλυμπον.
Λῦσαι δ' οὐκ ἐδύναντο παρασταδόν; ὃν δὲ λάβοιμι,
Ῥίπτασκον τεταγὼν ἀπὸ βηλοῦ, ὄφρ' ἂν ἵκηται
Γῆν ὀλιγηπελέων.

An non meminiſti quando pependiſti ab alto, à pedibus autem
Incudes demiſi duas, circum manus autem vinculum miſi
Aureum, infrangibilem? tu autem in æthere & nubibus
Pependiſti, indignabantur autem dii per excelſum Olympum:
Solvere autem non poterant circumſtantes: quemcumque autem apprehenderem;
Projiciebam correptum de limine-divino, donec perveniret
In terram vix ſpirans (31).

Haſt thou forgot, when bound and fix'd on high
From the vaſt concave of the ſpangled ſky,
I hung thee trembling in a golden chain,
And all the raging gods oppos'd in vain?
Headlong I hurl'd them from th' Olympian hall,
Stunn'd with the whirl, and breathleſs in the fall.

POPE.

It was Juno's beſt way to appear ſubmiſſive: ſhe excuſed herſelf with falſe oaths, and promiſed to comply with the deſires of her huſband. The quarrel went no farther at that time. I ought not to forget, that Juno was the cauſe of the war of the Titans. She encouraged them to dethrone her huſband (32), and to reſtore Saturn, whom Jupiter had depoſed. Jealouſy

---

(22) The paſſage of Eraſmus quoted by Coſtar, is in the explication of the Adage, Scit quomodo Jupiter duxerit uxorem. It is the twenty third of the IVth century of the IVth Chiliad, pag. m. 914. He obſerves that the Scholiaſt upon Theocritus relates this upon the credit of one Ariſtotle: Adjungit fabulam quam retulerit Ariſtoteles neſcio quis. From whence it appears that he did not believe, as Girac did, that this ſtory was mentioned by Ariſtotle, Alexander's tutor. Several Ariſtotles have writ books. See Jonſius, de Hiſt. Philoſoph. pag. 61.

(23) Girac, Replique, pag. 546.

†† Ἀριστοτέλης δὲ ἱστορεῖ ἐν τῷ περὶ Ἑρμιόνης ἱερῷ ἰδιώτερον περὶ τοῦ Διὸς καὶ τῆς Ἥρας γάμου, &c. Schol. Theocr. in illum Verſ. Eid. xv, Πάντα γυναῖκες ἴσασι καὶ ὡς Ζεὺς ἠγάγεθ' Ἥρην.

(24) Pauſan. lib. ii, pag. 78.

(25) So it ought to be called, and not Θρόναξ, Thronax, as we read in the Scholiaſt upon Theocritus. Meurſius is the author of that correction. Miſcell. Lacon. pag. 310. Coſtar follows Eraſmus, who ſays Thronax.

(26) It was a piece of Polycletus. Pauſan. lib. ii, pag. 59.

(27) Id. ibid.

(28) Id. lib. viii, pag. 253.

(29) He quotes Phylarchus lib. xix. But Natalis Comes, Mythol. lib. ii, cap. iv, pag. m 133, quotes Dorotheus, in lib. ii, Narrationum fabuloſarum.

(30) Καί σε πληγῇσιν ἱμάσσω. Et te verberibus cædam. Homer. Iliad. lib. XV, ver. 17.

(31) Ibid. ver. 18.

(32) Hygin. cap. cl.

weddings, ſhe had, on the other, the management of their natural conſequences: I mean, that ſhe preſided over child-births, and over ſeveral things depending thereon [H]. Michael de Montagne did not well know the origin of an adventure, which he takes from Plato, and expreſſes himſelf a little too wantonly [I]. Authors do not agree about the place where jealouſy was then ſtronger than ambition; for the indignation ſhe conceived when ſhe ſaw Epaphus (33) gratified with a kingdom, made her chuſe rather to be a dethroned goddeſs, provided her husband was ſo to, than to reign with him. But perhaps ſhe propoſed to herſelf a revenge, in which her ambition would be no loſer. She might hope that by preferring the intereſts of her father unjuſtly dethroned, before thoſe of her husband, who was an uſurper, ſhe ſhould have a ſhare in the government, under her father reſtored, and ſhould break for ever with Jupiter. We ſhall ſee hereafter (34) another conſpiracy ſhe ingaged in againſt her husband.

I cannot think of Juno hanging between heaven and earth, without propoſing to my readers a paſſage which I do not underſtand. Hyginus (35) relates, that Vulcan having forged golden ſhoes for Jupiter, and the other gods, Juno was no ſooner ſate down but ſhe found herſelf hung in the midſt of the air. Vulcan had notice of it, that he might come and looſe his mother whom he had bound; but he anſwered he had no mother. He had been kicked out of heaven, and was ſtill enraged for that ill uſage. Here are the Latin words. Vulcanus Jovi cæteriſque Diis ſoleas aureas ex adamante cum feciſſet, Juno cùm ſediſſet ſubitò in aëre pendere cœpit. Quod cùm ad Vulcanum miſſum eſſet ut matrem quam ligaverat ſolveret, iratus quod de cœlo præcipitatus erat, negat ſe matrem ullam habere. I commend the critics, who have made ſo many learned obſervations upon the firſt words of Hyginus (36); but I could wiſh, they had taught me, how by means of a pair of ſhoes, a woman as ſoon as ſhe ſits down, can find herſelf hanging in the air. I do not ſee how a chair or a throne can have that effect, and eſpecially upon a perſon bound. Methinks we may complain of this hiſtorian's want of judgment, Could he believe that the reader would be contented with ſo broken and falſified a narration? why did not he ſay, that as ſoon as Juno was ſate down, the floor of heaven ſplit aſunder, and her chair being no longer ſupported, fell towards the clouds, and ſtopped in thoſe ſpaces which are between heaven and earth. This had been intelligible to the reader. Servius tells the ſtory better; he ſays, that Vulcan made a chair, which Juno ſitting upon, could not riſe again (37), till ſhe had granted Vulcan's requeſt. It was to know, who thoſe were to whom he owed his life. ‘ Alii dicunt quod cum Vulcanus ‘ parentes ſuos diu quæreret, nec inveniret; ſedile ‘ fecit tale, ut cum eo qui ſediſſet ſurgere non poſſet; ‘ in quo cum adſediſſet Juno, nec poſſet exſurgere; ‘ Vulcanus negavit ſe ſoluturum omnino, niſi prius ‘ parentes ſuos ſibi monſtraſſet, atque ita factum eſt ‘ ut in Deorum numerum reciperetur (38). —— ‘ Others ſay, that when Vulcan had ſought his parents ‘ a long time, and could not find them, he made ſuch ‘ a chair, that whoever ſat in it, could not get up out ‘ of it; in which Juno happening to ſit down, and ‘ not being able to riſe up again, Vulcan proteſted he ‘ would not free her, till ſhe had informed him who ‘ were his parents; by which means he was received ‘ into the number of the gods.’ Conſult Pauſanias, and you will find, that Vulcan deſigning to be revenged of Juno, ſent her a throne of gold, to which ſhe found herſelf tied, as ſoon as ſhe ſate down on it (39). None but Bacchus could perſuade Vulcan to return into heaven (40); and he was even obliged to make him drunk to engage him in that voyage. The Athenians had a picture which repreſented Bacchus bringing Vulcan back to heaven (41): and the Lacedemonians had a piece of ſculpture, which repreſented the ſame Vulcan untying his mother (42).

[H] She preſided over child-birth, and over ſeveral things depending thereon.] When Terence ſuppoſes, that Glycerium the courtezan being in labour, made uſe of this prayer, Juno Lucina fer opem, ſerva me, obſecro (43); he manifeſtly ſhows, that Juno was the deity that preſided over that affair. She was called (44), Opigena & Lucina, under that function, ſive te Lucinam quod lucem naſcentibus tribuas, ac Lucetiam convenit nuncupari (45). She had other particular names given her, according to the different ſervices that were expected from her in theſe conjunctures; for ſhe was called Fluonia, as being able to prevent too great a loſs blood. Fluoniam Junonem mulieres colebant, quod eam ſanguinis fluorem in conceptu retinere putabant (46). She was called Februa, as preſiding over the ceremony of the purification of child-bed women. Theſe are the limitations which Martianus Capella gives to the ſirnames Fluonia and Februa: for he introduces Philology, who declares, that being a virgin, ſhe has no need of invocating the goddeſs Juno in thoſe two reſpects. Nam Fluvoniam Februalemque ac Februam mihi poſcere non neceſſe eſt, cum nihil contagionis corporeæ ſexu intemerata pertulerim (47). She might have wanted her help in another reſpect, ſince St Auguſtin affirms, that Varro ſaid that Juno preſided over the flowing of the menſtrual blood. Ibi eſt & Dea Mena, quæ menſtruis fluoribus præeſt, quanvis Jovis filia, tamen ignobilis. Et hanc provinciam fluorum menſtruorum, in libro ſelectorum deorum ipſi Junoni idem autor aſſignat quæ in diis ſelectis etiam regina eſt: & hic tanquam Juno Lucina cum eadem Mena privigna ſua eidem cruori præſidet (48). I know very well, that many authors make the goddeſs of child-births diſtinct from Juno; for ſome ſay, that Lucina was her daughter (49), and others affirm, that Diana was appointed to aſſiſt women in labour (50). But without inſiſting on the hypotheſis, that Lucina, Ilithya, Diana, Luna, and Juno, were the ſame deity (51), I ſay, it is very probable, that Juno was conſidered, as the chief of this function, and as having deputies, and ſubſtitutes in different places (52). If you will not therefore acknowledge her directly and immediately for the goddeſs Levana, who cauſed the new-born infants to be acknowledged by their fathers (53); nor for the goddeſs Rumina, who preſided over the acton of giving them ſuck; nor for the gooddeſs Cunina, who preſided over their cradles; nor for the goddeſs Nundina, who preſided over the impoſition of their name; nor for the goddeſs Vaticana, who preſided over their cries (54); nor for the goddeſs Fabulina, who preſided over the firſt looſnings of their tongue, that is, over the firſt words they pronounced; believe at leaſt; that all theſe goddeſſes were ſubdelegates to Juno, the ſuperintendant-general. The ſame ought to be ſaid of the goddeſs Proſa, and the goddeſs Poſtverta, who were worſhipped, that children might not take an ill poſture, when ready to be born. ‘ Quando contra naturam forte converſi (pueri) ‘ in pedes, brachiis plerumque diductis retineri ſolent: ‘ ægriuſque tunc mulieres enituntur. Hujus periculi deprecandi gratia aræ ſtatutæ ſunt Romæ duabus ‘ Carmentibus: quarum una Poſtverta nominata eſt, ‘ Proſa altera; à recti perverſique partus & poteſtate & nomine (55). —— When the poſture of children in the womb happens to be unnatural, it is with ‘ difficulty their mothers bring forth. To deprecate ‘ which danger, there are two altars in Rome dedicated to the two Carmentas; one of whom is named ‘ Poſtverta, the other Proſa, from the power and name ‘ of a right and perverſe birth.’

[I] Montagne . . . . . expreſſes himſelf a little too wantonly.] ‘ It was from ſome poet that was in great ‘ want, and very greedy of this ſport, that Plato had ‘ this ſtory. That Jupiter one day being in a violent ‘ fit of love, and not having patience till his wife ‘ had got into bed, tumbled her on the floor, and ‘ through the vehemence of the pleaſure, forgot the ‘ great and important reſolutions he had been taking ‘ with the other gods in his celeſtial court, boaſting ‘ that he had found that bout as good, as when he ‘ firſt got her maidenhead unknown to her parents (56). So far Montagne. He is to blame for aſcribing this notion to ſome poet greedy of amorous embraces, ſince Homer, the author of that ſtory, does plainly declare he does not think it probable, that a husband ſhould be in ſuch tranſports for his wife. Accordingly he ſuppoſes (57) that Juno was not ſatisfied with putting on her beſt attire, but beſides, had the policy to borrow Venus's Ceſtus, an inevitable charm, a philtre that never failed to produce it's effect. It is to the aſſiſtance of that loan, that he attributes Juno's power of

---

(33) He was a baſtard of Jupiter. Hygin. ibid.

(34) In the remark [F] of the article JUPITER.

(35) Hygin. cap. clxvi.

(36) In order to know whether we ought to read folia, or ſoleas. Whether one may ſay aureas ex adamante, and whether it were not better to ſay, folia aurea nexa adamante, or folia ex auro & ex adamante. See Hyginus of the Amſterdam edition, 1681.

(37) Compare what is ſaid of Theſeus, in the ſixth book of the Æneid, Sedet æternumque ſedebit Infelix Theſeus; and what the commentators ſay about the ſeat that he was placed upon. See Mr du Rondel concerning the Chenix of Pythagoras, pag. 95, & ſeq.

(38) Servius, in Eclog. iv, Virg. ver. 62.

(39) Pauſan. lib. i, pag. 18.

(40) Id. ibid.

(41) Id. ibid.

(42) Id. lib. iii, pag. 99.

(43) Terent. in Andr. Act. III, Sc. I.

(44) Feſtus, pag. m. cxxxix.

(45) Mart. Capella, de Nuptiis Philologiæ lib. ii. pag. m. 37.

(46) Feſtus, pag. m. lxiii.

(47) Mart. Capella, ubi ſupra.

(48) Auguſt. de Civit. Dei, lib. vii, cap. ii, pag. m. 618.

(49) Heſiod. in Theog. See Meziriac upon Ovid's Epiſtles, pag. 638, & ſeq.

(50) Catullus, Epig. xxxv. Horat Ode xxii, lib. iii, & multi alii.

(51) See Meziriac, ubi ſupra.

(52) See Kippingus, in Antiq. Romanis, lib. i, cap. i, n. xv, pag. m. 24, 25.

(53) This was performed by taking up the child which the midwife had laid on the ground.

(54) See Aulus Gellius, lib xvi, cap. xvii, where he ſays after Varro, Deus Vaticanus.

(55) Aul. Gell. lib. xvi, cap. xvi.

(56) Montagne, Eſſays, book i, chap. xxix, pag. m. 309.

(57) Iliad. lib. xiv.

where Juno was educated: ſome ſay it was at Samos (e): others ſay it was in the ocean [K]; but there was no town where ſhe was more honoured than at Argos [L]. She of inſpiring her husband with ſo violent a fit of love. Several other things might have been cenſured in Montagne's ſtory (58), had not he had the prudence to quote Plato. Wherefore he is not to be called in queſtion on account of the faults of this Philoſopher; but we muſt apply ourſelves to Plato.

It is certain, that he unſaithfully relates Homer's ſtory: his words are theſe. Ἡ Δία καθευδόντων τῶν ἄλλων θεῶν τε καὶ ἀνθρώπων, ὡς μόνος ἐγρηγορὼς, ἃ ἐβουλεύσατο, τούτων ϖάντων ῥᾳδίως ἐϖιλανθανόμενον, διὰ τὴν τῶν ἀφροδισίων ἐπιθυμέαν; καὶ οὕτως ἐκπλαγέντα, ἰδόντα τὴν Ἥραν, ὥστε μηδ' εἰς τὸ δωμάτιον ἐθέλειν ἐλθεῖν, ἀλλ' αὐτοῦ βουλόμενον χαμαὶ ξυγγίγνεσθαι, καὶ λέγοντα ὡς οὕτως ὑπὸ ἐϖιθυμίας ἔχεται, ὡς οὐδ' ὅτε τὸ ϖρῶτον ἐφοίτων ϖρὸς ἀλλήλους--φίλους λήθοντε τοκῆας. Jovem cæteris tum Diis, tum hominibus dormientibus omnium quæ vigilando tractaverat rerum venerearumcupiditate oblitum, & uſque adeò viſa Junone perculſum eſſe, ut nec domum venire ſuſtinuerit, ſed ibidem humi congredi ſtatim voluerit, dicens vehementiori ſe cupidine inflammari, quàm olim cùm primum clam parentibus invicem congreſſi fuerunt (59). —— Jupiter, the reſt of gods and men being aſleep, eaſily forgot all his counſels, thro' the deſire of venereal pleaſure, and was ſo ſtruck with the ſight of Juno, that he could not ſtay till he got home, but lay with her that inſtant on the ground, ſaying, he was fired with a more ardent deſire, that when they uſed to meet, unknown to their parents. Plato means, that one of the things, for which Homer's poems ought to be prohibited, is, that we there find, that, whilſt the other gods and men are at reſt, Jupiter cannot ſleep for a lewd temptation, and forgets all the reſolutions he had made; and that upon the ſight of his wife, he is tranſported with ſuch a vehement paſſion, as prompts him to lie with her immediately, without giving her time to go to bed, &c. I ſay once more, Plato alters the ſtory: for Homer does not ſay, that the other gods were aſleep, or that men were at reſt. He ſays on the contrary, that the Greeks and Trojans were vigorouſly fighting, and that Neptune was in action againſt the Trojans. Neither does he ſay, that Jupiter forgot his reſolutions; he ſuppoſes that Jupiter was poſted upon the top of mount Ida, and that Juno ſeeing him there, formed a deſign of inſpiring him with a deſire of lying with her. He ſuppoſes, that in order to execute this project, ſhe went and waſhed her body, ſhe dreſſed and tricked up her ſelf, as fine as ſhe could, and provided her ſelf with Venus's girdle. Whereby he undertakes to deſcribe Jupiter as a very amorous god, since the moſt potent charms were contained in that girdle.

---- ἔνθα δέ οἱ θελκτήρια ϖάντα τέτυκτο.
Ἔνθ' ἔνι μὲν φιλότης, ἐν δ' ἵμερος. ἐν δ' ἀοριστὺς,
Πάρφασις ἥτ' ἔκλεψε νόον πύκαπερ φρονεόντων.

- - - - in eo autem delinimenta omnia incluſa erant:
Ibi inerat quidem amor, inerat deſiderium, inerat & amantium colloquium,
Blandiloquentia quæ furtim ſurripit mentem prudentium licet (60).

In this was ev'ry art, and ev'ry charm,
To win the wiſeſt, and the coldeſt warm;
Fond love, the gentle vow, the gay deſire,
The kind deceit, the ſtill reviving fire,
Perſuaſive ſpeech, and more perſuaſive ſighs,
Silence that ſpoke, and eloquence of eyes.

POPE.

I do not pretend to excuſe him: I grant that Plato moſt juſtly condemns him; for in ſhort, it is a moſt ſcandalous thing thus to play upon the chief of ones gods. For the reſt, the eagerneſs of Jupiter was not ſo great, but that it gave him time to repeat a long catalogue of his miſtreſſes. Some think that Homer does not place this ſtory well; it is not, ſay they, prudence in a husband to repreſent to his wife his unfaithfulneſs to her; this is not a good way of cajoling her. Others juſtify Homer, by reaſon that it muſt needs be very agreeable to a wife to hear her husband ſay, that he feels a greater paſſion for her, than he ever did for ſuch and ſuch miſtreſſes upon the firſt enjoyment. This is what Jupiter's declarations comes to:

Νῶϊ δ' ἄγ' ἐν φιλότητι τραπείομεν εὐνηθέντε
Οὐ γὰρ ϖώποτέ μ' ὧδε θεᾶς ἔρος οὐδὲ γυναικὸς
Θυμὸν ἐνὶ στήθεσσι ϖεριπροχυθεὶς ἐδάμασσεν,
Οὐδ' ὁπότ' ἠρασάμην Ἰξιόνιης ἀλόχοιο, &c.

Nos autem age in amore convertamur in lecto dormientes.
Non enim unquam mihi ſic deæ amor neque mulieris
Animum in pectoribus circumfuſus domuit.
Neque quando captus fui amore Ixioniæ uxoris, &c. (61).

Let ſofter cares the preſent hour employ,
And be theſe moments ſacred all to joy.
Ne'er did my ſoul ſo ſtrong a paſſion prove,
Or for an earthly, or a heav'nly love:
Not when I preſs'd Ixion's matchleſs dame ...

POPE.

I add, that Homer has preſerved decorum on Juno's behalf. He brings her in repreſenting to her huſband the inconvenience that might happen, if any god ſhould ſee them lying together upon mount Ida, and ſhould go and give others notice of it; but, ſaid ſhe, ſince you have a mind to it, let us go into your chamber. Jupiter did not conſent to that expedient, but he found another; which was to form about his wife a cloud ſo thick, that the ſun itſelf could not ſee thro' it, and it was under this cloud that he ſatisfied his paſſion. He did not threw his wife upon the floor, as Montagne ſays; but upon the hard ground, in an open place. It is true, the earth immediately ſent forth flowers and graſs (62), which ſerved inſtead of a good quilt. Neither Homer nor Plato make Jupiter ſay, what Montagne does, that he was as much pleaſed at that time, as when he firſt lay with her unknown to her parents. Homer ſays only (63), that Jupiter perceiving Juno, felt the ſame paſſion as when he went to lie with her the firſt time. I am willing it ſhould be ſaid, to excuſe Montagne, that he did not believe there was a great difference betwixt theſe two things.

[K] Some ſay ſhe was educated at Samos, others ſay it was in the ocean.] She herſelf affirms the latter, in her diſcourſe to Venus, when ſhe borrowed her Ceſtus (64). She tells her, that ſhe wanted it to reconcile the ocean with his wife Thetys, who had not lain together for a long time. Her gratitude for the good education ſhe had received with them, engaged her to make a voyage to reconcile them. She promiſes herſelf, that ſhe ſhall for ever be loved and eſteemed by them, if ſhe can perſuade them to lie in the ſame bed.

Δὸς νῦν μοι φιλότητα καὶ ἵμερον, ᾧ τε σὺ ϖάντας
Δαμνᾷ ἀθανάτους ἠδὲ θνητοὺς ἀνθρώπους·
Εἶμι γὰρ ὀψομένη ϖολυφόρβου ϖείρατα γαίης.
Ὠκεανόν τε θεῶν γένεσιν, καὶ μητέρα Τηθὺν,
Οἵ μ' ἐν σφοῖσι δόμοισιν ἐΰτρεφον ἠδ' ἀτίταλλον,
- - - - - - -
Τοὺς εἶμ' ὀψομένη, καί σφ' ἄκριτα νείκεα λύσω.

Ἤδη

(e) See the remark [K].

(58) See, below, citat. (62), (63).

(59) Plato, de Republica, lib. iii, pag. m. 612. [A].

(60) Homer. Iliad. lib. xiv, ver. 215.

(61) Homer. ibid. ver. 314.

(62) Id. ibid. ver. 347.

(63) His words may be ſeen in the remark [A], citat. (1).

(64) See alſo what ſhe ſays to Oceanus, and Tethys, in Ovid. Metam. lib ii, deſiring them to exclude the conſtellation of the Bear.

She was alſo much reſpected at Carthage [M], and at Olympia. There was in this laſt town ſixteen ladies appointed overſeers of the games, which were celebrated to her honour every five years. Three claſſes of young maids diſputed there the prize of the race,

Ἤδη γὰρ δηρὸν χρόνον ἀλλήλων ἀπέχονται
Εὐνῆς καὶ φιλότητος, ἐπεὶ χόλος ἔμπεσε θυμῷ, &c.

Da nunc mihi amorem & deſiderium, quo tu omnes
Domas immortales atque mortales homines
Vado enim viſura almæ fines terræ,
Oceanumque deorum parentem, & matrem Tethyn,
Qui me in ſuis ædibus magna curâ nutrierunt & educarunt,
- - - - -
Hos vado viſura, ipſis ut difficiles compoſitu lites dirimam.
Jam enim diuturno tempore inter ſe abſtinent
Cubili & amore, ira enim invaſit animum, &c (65).

Then grant me, ſaid the queen, thoſe conqu'ring charms,
That pow'r, which mortals and immortals warms;
That love, which melts mankind in fierce deſires,
And burns the ſons of heav'n with ſacred fires.
For lo! I haſte to thoſe remote abodes,
Where the great parents (ſacred ſource of gods)
Ocean and Tethys their old empire keep,
On the laſt limits of the land and deep.
- - - - - - - - - -
For ſtriſe, I hear, has made the union ceaſe,
Which held ſo long that antient pair and peace,
What honour, and what love ſhall I obtain,
If I compoſe thoſe fatal feuds again?

Pope.

Had ſhe had Venus's Ceſtus to her lot, that charm ſo effectual to change the conduct of married people, who lie by themſelves, ſhe had with much reaſon been made to preſide over marriages; but ſhe wanted to borrow the pacific method, and potent inſtrument of reconciliation: why was not this employment given to the goddeſs, from whom the Ceſtus was to be borrowed? I leave it to thoſe who are at leiſure, to enquire into the reaſons of it.

As for her education at Samos, conſult Pauſanias, who ſays, that the inhabitants of that iſland maintained that Juno was born there under a little tree, which they ſtill ſhewed (66). The temple of this goddeſs was very ancient (67). Every body remembers theſe words of the Æneid (68):

Quam Juno fertur terris magis omnibus unam, Poſthabita coluiſſe Samo. . . . . . .

The iſle was called Parthenia, becauſe Juno was educated there, when ſhe was a virgin (69). There it was alſo, that her marriage with Jupiter was celebrated; whence ſhe came to be repreſented in her temple as a maid, that is a marrying, and the anniverſary of her feaſt was kept like a wedding. Inſulam Samum ſcribit Varro prius Partheniam nominatam, quòd ibi Juno adoleverit, ibique etiam Jovi nupſerit. Itaque nobiliſſimum, & antiquiſſimum Templum ejus eſt Sami, & ſimulacrum in habitu nubentis figuratum, & ſacra ejus anniverſaria nuptiarum ritu celebrantur (70).

[L] There was no town where ſhe was more honoured that at Argos.] The Argivi pretended, that Juno was bred up by the three daughters of the river Aſterion. One of them was called Eubœa; whoſe name was given to the mountain upon which Juno's temple was built: Eupolemus, a native of Argos, was the architect of it: In the porch of it ſtood the ſtatues of all the prieſteſſes of that goodeſs (71): their office was very conſiderable, as I have obſerved, ſpeaking of the unfortunate prieſteſs, who occaſioned the burning of the temple (72). Pauſanias ſays (73) ſhe made her eſcape to the altar of Pallas at Tegea, and that the indignation of the Argivi did not move them to throw down her ſtatue. He ſays, that the moſt antient image of the goddeſs was made of a wild pear-tree. It was carefully preſerved. Piraſus, the ſon of Argus, removed it to Tyrinthus; but the Argivi, having demoliſhed that town, reſtored it to the temple of Juno (74). See Benedictus upon Pin dar(75) concerning the games that were celebrated at Argos, in honour of this goddeſs. See alſo the commentators of Horace, upon theſe words of the ſeventh ode of the firſt book.

Plurimus in Junonis honorem
Aptum dicit equis Argos.

To honour Juno, many ſing
Argos, for horſes fam'd.

Silius Italicus, to ſhew Juno's fondneſs of Carthage, ſays that ſhe prefers it before Argos and Mycenæ.

Hic Juno ante Argos (ſic credidit alta vetuſtas)
Ante Agamemnoniam gratiſſima tecta Mycenem,
Optavit profugis æternam condere ſedem (76).

Theſe favour'd walls imperial Juno choſe,
To fix the exiles in ſecure repoſe.
This town ſhe honours with peculiar grace,
And Argos and Mycenæ muſt give place.

According to Homer (77) the three towns that Juno loved beſt, were Argos, Lacedæmon, and Mycenæ. It is ſtrange he ſays nothing of Samos, the only place that Virgil mentions, when he ſpeaks of the preference ſhe gave to Carthage.

I will ſay ſomething of the founder of Juno's temple at Argos, by which we ſhall diſcover the antiquity of this edifice. Phoroneus, the ſon of Inachus, cauſed it to be built; and was the firſt who armed this goddeſs, in recompence whereof, he was the firſt that reigned. Phoroneus Inachi filius templum Argis Junoni primus fecit, ſays Hyginus in his 225th chapter. And chapter 274, Phoroneus Inachi filius, arma Junoni primus fecit, qui ob eam cauſam primus regnandi poteſtatem habuit. Some critics inſtead of arma will have it read aram, or ſacra, but others maintain the common reading, and confirm it by a paſſage of Caſſiodorus, in the eighteenth chapter of the ſeventh book Variorum. See the commentators upon Hyginus in the Amſterdam edition, 1681. As for the antiquity of Phoroneus, ſee Scaliger, pag. 19. of his notes upon Euſebius's Chronicon. It is ſufficient to remember, that Phoroneus was cotemporary with Abraham, or wanted but little of it.

[M] . . . . And ſo ſhe was at Carthage.] I a long time thought that Virgil made uſe of a poetical licence, without any regard to hiſtory, when he repreſented Carthage as Juno's favourite city (78): Nor did I think my ſelf obliged to change my opinion, on reading in Ovid and Silius Italicus, the confirmation of Virgil's aſſertion; for one connot reaſonably doubt, that he was the occaſion of Ovid's making Juno ſpeak thus.

Pœniteat quod non ſovi Carthaginis arces,
Cum mea ſint illo currus & arma loco (79):

Repenting that I turn'd an angry eye
From Carthage, where my arms and chariot lye.

As alſo of Silius Italicus's aſſerting what we have ſeen above (80). But having conſidered other paſſages of ſeveral authors, I began to imagine that Virgil's hypotheſis was founded on tradition. Pſyche's prayer is not of the leaſt force with me: ' Magni Jovis germana, ſays ſhe (81), & conjuga: ſive tu Sami, quæ ' querulo partu vagituque & alimonia tua gloriatur, ' tenes vetuſta delubra; ſive celſæ Carthaginis, quæ ' te virginem vectura leonis cælo commeantem percolit, beatas ſedes frequentas: ſive prope ripas Inachi, ' qui te jam nuptam Tonantis, & reginam dearum ' memorat, inclytis Argivorum præſides mœnibus: ' quam cunctus oriens Zygiam veneratur, & omnis occidens

---

(65) Homer. Iliad. lib. xiv, ver. 198. Juno repeats the ſame thing upon Mount Ida, when Jupiter aſks her whither ſhe is going. Ibid ver. 301.

(66) Pauſanias, lib. vii, pag 209.

(67) Id. ibid.

(68) Lib. i, ver. 15.

(69) Scholiaſt. Apollonii, in lib. iv. He ſays upon the 187th verſe of the firſt book, that the Imbreſus, a River of Samos, was called Παρθένιος, becauſe Juno was brought up there when ſhe was a maid.

(70) Lactant. lib. i, cap. xvii, pag. m. 54. See alſo St Auguſtin, de Civitat. Dei, lib. vi, cap vii.

(71) Ex Pauſan. lib. ii, pag. 59.

(72) See the article CHRYSIS.

(73) Pauſan. ubi ſupra. See alſo lib. iii, pag. 86.

(74) Id. ibid.

(75) Pag. 142, 628.

(76) Silius Italicus, lib. i, ver. 26.

(77) Iliad. lib. iv, ver. 51.

(78) Æneid. lib. i, circa init.

(79) Ovid. Faſt. lib. vi, ver. 45.

(80) In the foregoing remark, citat. (76).

(81) Apuleius, lib. vi, Metam. circa init.

race, and came down to run at the Olympic games, and took almoſt all the time. The victorious ladies received a crown of olive. The ſame ladies made a peplus (f), which they conſecrated to this goddeſs every five years (g). For the reſt, Jupiter's unfaithfulneſs to his wife was ſo much the more inexcuſable, becauſe Juno had the ſecret of growing a maid again every year [N]. Her love for Jaſon has not been much talked of [O]. She with honour got out of the ſnares that Ixion had laid for her [P]. If we believe ſome authors, ſhe had no child by her huſband; and whenever ſhe conceived, ſhe

'cidens Lucinam appellat: ſis meis extremis caſibus 'Juno Soſpita, meque in tantis exantlatis laboribus 'defeſſam, imminentis periculi metu libera. —— 'Great ſiſter, and wife of Jove: whether thou inhabiteſt the antient temples of Samos, which glories to have given you birth, and nouriſhed you in infancy; or frequenteſt the happy ſeats of Carthage, which worſhips thy virgin deity, drawn by lions through the heavenly road: or, near the banks of Inachus, who now commemorates thee, wife of the thunderer, and queen of gods, thou preſideſt over the famed walls of Argos: whom the whole eaſt worſhips under the name of Zygia, and the weſt calls Lucina: be to me, in my greateſt difficulties, Juno the preſerver, and free me, tired with ſo great labours, from the fear of impending danger.' This concerns Juno directly, and without ambiguity. Herodian's paſſage concerning Urania (82) of Carthage, does not ſeem to have the ſame weight; for it induces us to believe that this Urania was not Juno, but the moon. Now I do not conſider here the Theology of thoſe who reduce many of the Pagan gods into one; I only keep to the public notions, according to which, Juno was worſhipped as the ſiſter and wife of Jupiter, and as a diſtinct object from Minerva, Diana, the moon, Proſerpina, &c. For the reſt, I cannot think on the worſhip that was paid to this goddeſs in ſo many places (83), and with ſo much pomp, without believing there were mixed with it, I know not what impreſſions of the cuſtom, which is obſerved with reſpect to women. When a woman has a ſhare in the government, ſhe is much more attended, honoured, and reſpected, than a man in the ſame authority. Conſider how the wives of the governours of provinces are courted, when they are known to have a great intereſt. The honours that are paid to them exceed thoſe that are given their husbands. This is the practice of the earth, and it is carried into heaven. Jupiter was ſerved as a king, and Juno as an ambitious, haughty, and revengeful queen, who divided with him the government of the world, and aſſiſted in all his councils.

Οὔτε ϖοτ' εἰς εὐνὴν Διὸς ἤλυθε μητιόεντος,
Οὔτε ϖοτ' εἰς θῶκον ϖολυδαίδαλον, ὡς τοπάρος ϖερ,
Αὐτῷ ἐφεζομένη ϖυκινὰς φραζέσκετο βουλάς.

Nunquam ad cubile Jovis venit conſiliarii,
Nunquam ad thronum varium, ſicuti antea
Cum ipſo ſedens, ſapientia conſultans conſilia (84).

I dare ſay that the extravagances that Chriſtans are fallen into, towards the Virgin Mary, which go beyond all that the Heathens invented in honour of Juno, are owing to the ſame original, I mean to, the cuſtom of honouring women, and making court to them, with greater zeal and reverence than to the other ſex. We cannot be without women either in a civil or religious life. He that ſhould take from the Romiſh communion the devotion to ſaints, and eſpecially to her whom they call the queen of heaven, and the queen of angels, would leave a frightful gap in it: the reſt would fall in pieces, and would be arena ſine calce, ſcopæ diſſolutæ. Eraſmus blaming the cuſtom of ſaluting the Virgin Mary in the pulpit, after the beginning of the ſermon, ſays, That it is contrary to the example of all the antients, who were rather to be imitated, than ſuch ſort of people, as perhaps to pleaſe women, have herein trod in the ſteps of the Heathens (85).

[N] She had the ſecret of growing a maid again every year.] This ſhe did by only waſhing herſelf in a fountain (86). 'Juno took great care, ſays the writer of a dictionary (87), to waſh herſelf every year in the fountain Canathus near Nauplia, which at preſent is called Napoli di Romania, where ſhe conſtantly recovered her virginity, which made her beloved by Jupiter, 'Pauſan. lib. 8.' It is not true that Pauſanias obſerves that ſhe hereby made herſelf beloved by Jupiter. He only ſays that the Argivi ſpoke of this return of Juno's virginity, and founded what they ſaid upon the practice of their occult ceremonies in the myſteries of this goddeſs. There are many writers, who quoting an author, are guilty of making him ſay whatever they think he ſhould have ſaid. This was the occaſion of imputing to Pauſanias what he did not ſay. The author of this falſe imputation, was probably full of what he had been relating: 'Diego de Torrez, in his hiſtory 'of the Cheriſs, ſays, that amongſt the felicities the 'Turks hope for in another life, they believe their 'wives will bring them new maidenhands, cap. 74.' The fountain of youth, ſo celebrated by our old poets and romancers, had not a virtue comparable to that of Canathus.

[O] Her love for Jaſon has not been much talked of.] Some authors ſay that Jaſon owed the friendſhip and protection of this goddeſs to a good ſervice he had done her, without knowing, who ſhe was. Juno diſguiſed like an old woman, deſired him to carry her over a river: he did it, and loſt one of his ſhoes by the bargain. But others ſay he owed to his beauty the intereſt he had in her. Juno could not withſtand ſo many charms, but grew paſſionately fond of that handſome youth. Ὅτι δὲ εὐπρεπὴς ἦν ὁ Ἰάσων δῆλον ἐκ τοῦ καὶ τὴν Ἥραν κατά τινας αὐτῷ ἐπιμανῆναι. Jaſonem fuiſſe perpulchrum hinc patet, quod juxta quoſdam ipſa Juno inſano amore eum proſecuta fuerit (88). Theſe are the authors who mention the other ſtory. 'Pelias ..... forte vidit Jaſonem nudo 'pede veniſſe, qui dum Junonem tranſmutatam in 'anus ſpeciem credens mortalem petentem per vadum 'fluminis transferret, alteram ex caligis in limo amiſerat (89), —— Pelias .... happened to ſee Jaſon arrive, with one foot bare, who, whilſt he was carrying Juno, transformed into an old woman, whom he took for a mortal, acroſs a river, loſt one of his ſandals in the mud.' You will find in Hyginus (90) the ſame particular more largely deſcribed, with the marks of gratitude which Juno gave him. Valerius Flaccus ſuppoſes that it was in very bad weather, that ſhe received this kindneſs; and he adds that Jaſon diſcovered her to be a goddeſs, by the fright that ſeized her, becauſe ſhe knew the thunder to be the voice of Jupiter, who called her home. It was therefore at a time of elopement: ſhe had left her husband, and had no great inclination to return.

Omnipotens regina, inquit, quam turbidus atro
Æthere cæruleum quateret cum Jupiter imbrem,
Ipſe ego præcipiti tumidum per Enipea nimbo
In campos & tuta tuli, nec credere quivi
Ante deam, quam te tonitru nutuque repoſci
Conjugis, & ſubita raptam formidine vidi (91).

Celeſtial queen, whom when tempeſtuous Jove
In ſtorms deſcended from the gloom above
In a thick cloud, unwittingly I bore
Thro' ſwoln Enipeus to a ſafer ſhore;
Nor deem'd thee goddeſs,
Till fear betray'd thee, from thy conſort fled,
And now recall'd by thunder to his bed.

[P] She with honour got out of the ſnares that Ixion laid for her.] Ixion having committed a parricide (92) of which he could find no body to abſolve him, received at laſt this good office from Jupiter himſelf. For which he was ſo ungrateful, as to attempt to graft horns on his benefactor's head: he fell in love with Juno, and earneſtly preſſed her to the point. But ſhe refuſed him, and complained of the affront to Jupiter, who deſiring to be witneſs of this baſeneſs, formed a cloud juſt like his wife, and left it to Ixion's diſcretion, who uſed it as amorous people uſed to do. Hence came

(f) A kind of gown or veil.

(g) Ex Pauſanias, lib. v, cap. xvi, pag. m. 417.

(82) It was ſaid, that her ſtatue had been conſecrated by Dido, when ſhe built Carthage. See Herodian, lib. v, cap. vi.

(83) I ſhall ſay in the remark [Y], ſomething concerning the temples ſhe had in Italy.

(84) See Homer in the Hymn to Apollo, where he ſays that Juno left her huſband for a year, by reaſon of Minerva's birth.

(85) Eraſmus in Eccleſiaſt. apud Colemiés, Rome Proteſtante, pag. 25.

(86) Called Canathus. It was in Peloponneſus. See Pauſanias, lib. ii, ſub fin. pag. 80.

(87) Cæſar de Rochefort. Diction. Général & Curieux, pag. 612, 613.

(88) Schol Pindari, in Pyth. Ode 4, apud Meziriacum, Not in Epiſt. Ovid. pag. 540.

(89) Servius, in Eclog. iv. Virgil. ver. 34.

(90) Hygin. cap. xxii. See alſo cap. xiii. Apollon. Rhodius, lib. iii, ver. 66.

(91) Valer. Flaccus, Argon. I, ver. 81.

(92) He had treacherouſly killed his wife's father.

ſhe did it in a manner altogether extraordinary [Q]: but ſhe had milk as is uſual; and this may well be ſuppoſed, ſince ſhe ſuckled a baſtard of her huſband's. He was obliged to uſe ſtratagems to bring her to it; and then they ſay was formed in the ſky what people call the Milky Way [R]. Some of thoſe who put the word regina in the number of Juno's epithets, are guilty of a childiſh error [S]; tho' under that name ſhe was the protectreſs of the Veientes (b), and placed at Rome upon one of the ſeven hills. I queſtion whether thoſe who ſay ſhe firſt began to favour the Romans in the ſecond Punic war [T], are in the right. She was honoured at Rome, under ſome other came the race of the Centaurs. He boaſted afterwards to have lain with Juno; which, as is ſaid, putting Jupiter out of patience, made him throw him into hell, and condemn him to the puniſhment of the wheel (93). He did not act like a jealous huſband: for is there any Italian who would ſuffer his wife's galants to gratify their paſſion with her figure. He would hinder, if he could, their diverſion with her in imagination or in a dream.

[Q] She always conceived in a manner extraordinary.] According to the common opinion, ſhe was mother but of three children, Mars, Vulcan, and Hebe. As for Mars, ſhe conceived him by the touch of a flower, which Flora ſhewed her. She had a mind to be revenged of her huſband, who had produced Minerva without her aſſiſtance, and to ſhew him that ſhe could do as much without the concurrence of any male.

> Protinus hærentem decerpſi pollice florem,
>   Tangitur, & tacto concipit illa ſinu.
> Jamque gravis Thracen & læva Propontidos intrat,
>   Fitque potens voti, Marſque creatus erat (94).

> I pluck'd the flow'r: it's wond'rous virtue ſuch,
> She touch'd it, and grew pregnant at the touch:
> Then enter'd Thrace, and the Propontic ſhore,
> Where, miſtreſs of her wiſh, god Mars ſhe bore.

As to Vulcan, ſhe conceived him by the wind, by an influence like that of the Spaniſh mares (95). Ὅμοια δὲ τούτοις καὶ περὶ τῆς Ἥρας ᾄδουσιν ἄνευ τῆς πρὸς τὸν ἄνδρα ὁμιλίας ὑπηνέμιον αὐτὴν παῖδα γεννῆσαι τὸν Ἥφαιςον. His autem ſimilia etiam de Junone canunt, nempe hanc citra virilem congreſſum ſubventaneo conceptu gravidam puerum edidiſſe Vulcanum (96). —— They tell juſt ſuch another ſtory of Juno; namely, that, without the help of man, and being impregnated by the wind, ſhe brought forth Vulcan. She became with child of Hebe, by feeding heartily upon lettuces. This daughter was the goddeſs of youth, and ſerved for a cup-bearer to the gods, till an unfortunate accident that happened to her at a great feaſt. She fell down, and ſhewed the gods all that was hid under her petticoats. She loſt her employment by that accident (97). I know that according to others, ſhe was the daughter of Jupiter and Juno, in the common way.

Natalis Comes ought here to be confuted, who probably has miſled ſome Lexicographers. He ſays that Juno reſenting the birth of Minerva, prayed heaven and earth, the celeſtial and infernal gods, to grant ſhe might be a mother, without the conjunction of a male. She ſtruck the ground with her hand, and at a certain period of time it brought forth Typhon (98). To prove this, he cites ſome Greek verſes, which manifeſtly ſignify that Juno brought forth Typhon. How well does he underſtand what he alledges?

> Ὃν ποτ' ἄρ' Ἥρη ἔτικτε χολωσαμένη Διῒ πατρὶ
> Εὖτ' ἄρα δὴ Κρονίδης ἐρικυδέα γείνατ' Ἀθήνην
> Ἐν κορυφῇ.

> Hunc (Typhona) irata Jovi patri Juno edidit olim,
> Quum fuit illius de vertice nata Minerva.

> Juno, enraged, the monſter Typhon bore,
> When from Jove's head the blue-ey'd goddeſs ſprung.

Homer in his hymn to Apollo tells this ſtory ſo plainly, that we may well wonder how ſo many authors came to take the one for the other. He ſays that Juno invoking heaven and earth, and all the infernal gods, to grant her a ſon, without the aſſiſtance of Jupiter, ſtruck the earth, and made it tremble, and took that earthquake for a good omen; upon which ſhe left her huſband a whole year, at the end whereof ſhe had a ſon who reſembled neither men, nor the gods: and this was Typhon.

> Ἡ δὲ ἔτεκ' οὔτε θεοῖς ἐναλίγκιον οὔτε βροτοῖσι,
> Δεινόν τ' ἀργαλέον τε Τυφάονα, πῆμα βροτοῖσιν.

> Hæc autem peperit neque diis ſimilem, neque mortalibus,
> Gravemque difficilemque Typhaona, damnum mortalibus (99).

[R] Then the Milky Way was made in the ſky.] It was Hercules ſhe gave ſuck to: but this child, whoſe ſtrength was already prodigious, ſo ſqueezed her breaſt, that ſhe could not endure it; and as ſhe haſtily ſnatched it from him, ſome of her milk dropped. From this matter was formed the circle, which the Greeks call γαλαξία, and the Latins orbis lacteus, via lactea, &c (100). The Poet Manilius has touched upon this fable:

> Nec mihi celanda eſt famæ vulgata vetuſtas
> Mollior: è niveo lactis, fluxiſſe liquorem
> Pectore Reginæ Divum, cœlumque colore
> Infeciſſe ſuo. Quapropter lacteus orbis
> Dicitur, & nomen cauſſa deſcendit ab ipſa (101).

> 'Tis fabled, that a milky liquor flow'd
> From Juno's breaſts, and ſtain'd the heav'nly road.
> From hence a Milky Way amidſt the ſtars,
> The name deſcending from the cauſe appears.

Some ſay that the milk, which made this circle, fell from Hercules's mouth, who had ſucked Juno too greedily (102). Theſe ſtories ſuppoſe that Juno was then in heaven; but the Thebans did not allow that: they ſhewed the place where this goddeſs, deceived by Jupiter, gave ſuck to Hercules (103).

[S] Some of thoſe who put the word regina in the number of her epithets, are guilty of a childiſh error.] For they bring (104) for a proof of it a paſſage of Virgil (105), in which there is no particular epithet. The father of the people, the magnificent, the great, the juſt, the wiſe, &c. are epithets or titles of diſtinction given to certain princes; but that cannot be ſaid of the title of king of France: nor can it be ſaid of that of queen of France. Now Juno in theſe words of Virgil, is called the queen of the gods, juſt as Anne of Auſtria, wife of Lewis XIII, was called queen of France. Juno was the wife of Jupiter the king of the gods and of men, Divum pater atque hominum rex (106), as ſhe ſtiles him herſelf in the Æneid (107). Elſewhere (108) ſhe tells him, that he rules over all the gods, σὺ δὲ πᾶσι μετ' ἀθανάτοισιν ἀνάσσεις. If proofs had been looked for in Livy, good ones might have been found there. See the following remark, where I relate what he ſays of Camillus, about the taking of Veii. Theſe words of Juvenal niveam Reginæ cædimus agnam (109), would have been a better proof, than what is pretended to be found in the firſt book of the Æneid.

[T] I queſtion whether thoſe are in the right who ſay ſhe firſt began to favour the Romans in the ſecond Punic war.] Camillus preparing to aſſault the Veientes, offered the tenth part of the booty to Apollo, and implored Juno, the protectreſs of the beſieged, to forſake them, and to come to Rome, where ſhe would

---

(b) See the remark [U].

(93) Taken from Natalis Comes, Mytholog. lib. vi. Abating ſome few circumſtances, all this is to be found in Diodor. Sicul. lib. iv, cap. 71. See alſo Lucian, in Deor. Dialogis, pag. 132, & ſeq. Tom. I.

(94) Ovid. Faſtor. lib. v, ver. 255.

(95) See the article HIPPOMANES, at the end of this work.

(96) Lucianus, de Sacrificiis, pag. 352, Tom. I.

(97) Servius, apud Lloyd, voce Hebe.

(98) Quæ cum manu humum percuſſiſſet, ſequenti poſtea tempore natus eſt ex ea terra Typhon, &c. Nat. Comes, Mytholog. lib. vi, cap. xxii, pag. m. 644. You will find the ſame thing in Lloyd's Dictionary.

(99) Homer. Hymn. in Apoll. ver. 351.

(100) Achilles Tatius, in Iſagoge ex Eratoſthene in Catameriſmo, apud Lloyd, voce Juno.

(101) Manilius, lib. i, pag. m. 24.

(102) See Philoponus, in I Meteor apud Philippum Cæſium, in Cœlo Aſtronomico-Poëtico, pag. 15.

(103) Pauſanias, lib ix, pag. 300.

(104) Franciſc. Pomey, in Pantheo Mythico, pag. m. 924.

(105) Aſt ego, quæ Divûm incedo regina, Joviſque Et ſoror, & conjux . . . Virgil Æneid. lib. i, ver. 46.

(106) Ariſtotle, lib. de Morib Θ, ſhews that Homer by theſe words, πατὴρ ἀνδρῶν τε θεῶν τε, which denote Jupiter, declares him to be king of the gods and of men. See Virgil, cum notis Varior. Edit. Leyden, 1680. Æn. lib. i, ver. 65.

(107) Æneid. lib. i, ver. 65.

(108) Iliad. lib. iv, ver. 61.

(109) Sat. XII, ver. 13.

other titles, as that of Moneta [U], Soſpita, &c. They were not contented to join with the inhabitants of Lanuvium in the year 416, in worſhipping her under this laſt title (i): ſhe had moreover a temple built to her in the Forum Olitorium in the year 560. Caius Cornelius have a temple worthy of her. ‘Tuo ductu, inquit, (Dictator) Pythice Apollo, tuoque numine inſtinctus pergo ad delendam urbem Vejos: tibique hinc decimam partem prædæ voveo. Te ſimul Juno Regina, quæ nunc Vejos colis, precor ut nos victores in noſtram tuamque mox futuram urbem ſequare: ubi te dignum amplitudine tua templum accipiat (110). —— Directed, and inſpired by thee, O Pythian Apollo, (ſaid the Dictator) I ſet forth to demoliſh the city Veii, and I dedicate to thee the tenth part of the plunder. I likewiſe ſupplicate thee, O Juno, who now inhabiteſt Veii, that thou wouldeſt follow us the conquerors to our city, hereafter to be thine own, where a temple worthy thy dignity awaits thee.’ After the plundering of the town, they proceeded to the removal of the gods, and behaved themſelves with a great deal of reverence in it. One aſked the ſtatue of Juno, whether ſhe was willing to go to Rome: ſhe made a ſign that ſhe was; nay, it was pretended that ſhe ſaid yes. There was no trouble in removing her; one would have thought that ſhe put herſelf in motion to follow the victorious. Camillus conſecrated a temple to her, upon mount Aventinus (111), according to the promiſe he had made her. The words of Livy are ſo fine and remarkable, that all thoſe, who underſtand Latin, will be glad to read them, without the trouble of turning to that author. ‘Cum jam humanæ opes aſportatæ egeſtæque à Veiis eſſent, amoliri tum Deûm dona ipſoſque Deos, ſed colentium magis quam rapientium modo, cœpere. Namque delecti ex omni exercitu juvenes, purè lotis corporibus, candida veſte, quibus deportanda Romam Regina Juno aſſignata erat, venerabundi templum inire, primo religioſe admoventes manus: quod id ſignum more Etruſco niſi certæ gentis ſacerdos attrectare non eſſet ſolitus. Deinde quum quidam, ſeu ſpiritu divino tactus, ſeu juvenili joco, Viſne Romam ire Juno? annuiſſe cæteri Deam conclamaverunt: inde fabulæ adjectum eſt, vocem quoque dicentis, Velle, auditam. Motam certè ſede ſua parvi molimenti adminiculis, ſequentis modo accepimus levem ac facilem tranſlatu fuiſſe: integramque in Aventinum æternam ſedem ſuam, quò vota Romani dictatoris vocaverant, perlatam; ubi templum ei poſtea idem, qui voverat, Camillus dedicavit (112). —— The wealth of Veii being removed, they began to carry off the dedications of the gods, and the gods themſelves, but more after the manner of worſhippers than ſpoilers. For a ſelect band of youth of the army, having waſhed their bodies, and being dreſſed in white garments, to whom the care of tranſporting the goddeſs Juno to Rome was aſſigned, entered the temple with reverence, at firſt religiouſly touching her: for, by the cuſtom of Etruria, a prieſt of a certain family had the ſole privilege of handling that ſtatue. But one of them, whether inſpired, or jeſtingly, ſaying, Will you go to Rome, Juno? the reſt cried out, that the goddeſs nodded: whence it was fabled, that a voice was likewiſe heard, which ſaid Yes. It is certain, ſhe was very eaſily removed, and tranſlated entire to mount Aventin, her everlaſting reſidence, whither the vows of the Roman dictator had invited her; where the ſame Camillus afterwards dedicated a temple to her.’ Plutarch makes Livy ſay, that Camillus intreating Juno to come to Rome, touched her ſtatue, and that ſhe anſwered ſhe conſented to it, and would gladly follow him. Λιούιος δὲ φησιν εὔχεσθαι μὲν τὸν Καμιλλον ἁπτόμενον τῆς θεοῦ καὶ παρακαλεῖν, αποκρίνασθαι δὲ τινας τῶν παρόντων ὅτι καὶ βούλεται καὶ συγκαταινεῖ, καὶ συνακολουθεῖ προθύμως. Livius tradit inter precandum attrectaſſe Camillum Deam & invitaſſe: inde velle & annuere ac ſequi libentem reſpondiſſe ex adſtantibus nonnullos (113). Compare this with Livy's words, and you will clearly ſee that Plutarch has not underſtood them; or rather that he has quoted them without book, and that he has disfigured the circumſtances: and as he probably truſted to his memory on many occaſions, I fear that in ſeveral particulars, we find in his books not what he had read, but the notion, which the hiſtories he had read, left in his imagination. The prayers that Livy aſcribes to Camillus, with relation to Juno, were before the taking of Veii. How then could he ſay that Camillus prayed, laying his hand upon the ſtatue? What I am going to ſay, comes nearer to my text.

Plutarch adds, that they who maintain that Juno's ſtatue anſwered either by ſigns, or by words, that ſhe conſented to Camillus's petition, have a very ſtrong argument to alledge, that is, the proſperity of Rome: for that town, ſays he, ſo little as it was, could never have raiſed itſelf to ſuch an height of power, without the continual favour of a tutelary god. Οἱ δ' ἰσχυριζόμενοι καὶ τῷ παραδόξῳ βοηθοῦντες, μεγίστην μὲν ἔχουσι συνήγορον τὴν τύχην τῆς πόλεως, ἣν ἀπὸ σμικρᾶς καὶ καταφρονουμένης ἀρχῆς ἐπὶ μέγα δόξης καὶ δυνάμεως προελθεῖν δίχα θεοῦ πολλαῖς καὶ μεγάλαις ἐπιφανείαις ἑκάστοτε συμπαρόντος, ἀμήχανον. Cæterum hoc miraculum adſtruentibus & defendentibus fortuna magnopere ſuffragatur urbis, quæ ex parvo & humili exordio, ſine numinis perpetuo ex multis & magnis ſignis præſentis favore, evadere ad eam gloriam & potentiam haudquaquam potuiſſet (114). He believes therefore that Juno being removed from Veii to Rome, made the Romans proſper, and procured that train of victories, which rendered them ſo formidable: and therefore Jupiter's prediction, that Juno ſhould at laſt favour the Roman nation, muſt have been fulfilled in the year of Rome 359 (115).

> —— quin aſpera Juno,
> Quæ mare nunc terraſque metu cœlumque fatigat,
> Conſilia in melius referet, mecumque fovebit
> Romanos rerum Dominos gentemque togatam (116).
>
> —— e'en ſhe, who now
> Embroils with anxious fear heav'n, earth, and ſeas,
> E'en ſullen Juno then ſhall bend her thoughts
> To better counſels, and with me promote > Rome's lordly ſons, the nation of the gown.
>
> TRAPP.

And yet, becauſe ſome Poets have been pleaſed to bring down this epocha to the ſecond Punic (117) war (118), the commentators rather depend upon this fiction, than upon the authority of the hiſtorians. I obſerve, that beſides the temple that Juno had at Rome upon mount Aventinus, ſhe had part of the temple of the capitol with her huſband and Minerva (119). The temple of Juno Moneta, which I ſpeak of in the following remark, affords me a good proof.

[U] She was honoured at Rome . . . . under the title of Moneta.] It appears from ſeveral paſſages of the antients (120), that the epithet Regina was given to that Juno whom Camillus brought from Veii, and to whom he built a temple on mount Aventinus. As for Juno Moneta, ſhe had her ſeat in the capitol. Valerius Maximus is perhaps the only author who has confounded theſe two Juno's. I doubt not but this is one of the miſtakes which are ſo plentiful in Valerius Maximus. ‘Nec minus voluntarius, ſays he (121), Junonis in urbem noſtram tranſitus. Captis à Furio Camillo Veiis, milites juſſu Imperatoris ſimulacrum Junonis Monetæ, quod ibi præcipua religione cultum erat, in Urbem tralaturi, ſede ſua movere conabantur. Quorum ab uno per jocum interrogata Dea, an Romam migrare vellet, velle ſe reſpondit. Hac voce audita, luſus in admirationem verſus eſt. Jamque non ſimulacrum, ſed ipſam cœlo Junonem petitam portare ſe credentes, læti in ea parte montis Aventini, in qua nunc templum ejus cernimus, collocaverunt. —— Nor was the tranſlation of Juno to our city leſs voluntary. For Furius Camillus having taken Veii, the ſoldiers, being commanded by the general to tranſport to Rome the image of Juno Moneta, which was there particularly worſhipped, endeavoured to remove it, one of whom jeſtingly aſking the goddeſs, whether ſhe would go into Rome, ſhe anſwered, yes. Hearing this, their jeſting was turned into admiration. And now, believing that they carried not the image of Juno, but the goddeſs herſelf, they joyfully placed her in that part of mount Aventin, where we now ſee her temple.’ What he ſays is ſufficient

---

(i) Livius, lib. viii, cap. xiv. See the beginning of the remark [Y].

(110) T. Livius, Dec. I, lib. v, cap. xxi.

(111) Tum Junoni reginæ templum in Aventino locavit dedicavitque matutæ matri. Idem, ibid. cap. xxiii.

(112) Id. ibid. cap. xxii.

(113) Plutarch. in Camillo, pag. 132. A.

(114) Id ibid.

(115) In which the town of Veii was plundered.

(116) Virgil. Æn. lib. i, ver. 279.

(117) Which began in the year of Rome 535.

(118) Quia bello Punico ſecundo, ut ait Ennius, placata Juno cœperit favere Romanis. Servius, in hunc locum Virgilii. See Silius Italicus, lib. xii, pag. m. 520. Horace, lib. ii, Ode i.

(119) See Dauſqueius, upon Silius Italicus, lib. x, pag. 435.

(120) Decretum eſt Junoni Reginæ in Aventino Junonique ſoſpite Lanuvii majoribus hoſtiis ſacrificaretur. Liv. lib. xxii, init. See alſo lib xxvii, cap. xxxvii, where he deſcribes the ceremonies that were performed in honour of Juno regina in Aventino. They ſung an Hymn compoſed by the poet Livius. Carmen in Junonem reginam . . . illa tempeſtate forſitan laudabile rudibus ingeniis, nunc abhorrens & inconditum ſi referatur.

(121) Valer. Maxim. lib i, cap. viii, n. 3.

Cornelius Cethegus, who had vowed it four years before, when he was conſul, and made war with the Inſubres (k), conſecrated it when he was cenſor (l). This temple was repaired in 663, which was occaſioned by a woman's dream (m). Juno's worſhip at Rome was very antient [X]. The honours ſhe received in other towns of Italy were very great [Y]. She wrought there many miracles. She had a temple at Falerii, before ſufficient to ſhew his confounding things; for in another book (122) he ſays, that the temple of the goddeſs Moneta was in the capitol, in the place where Manlius's houſe had been. Now according to Livy, the temple that was built where that houſe ſtood, was conſecrated to Juno Moneta, at the time of the war with the Aurunci. It was conſecrated the year after, that is, in the year of Rome 413 (123). Ovid, in the ſixth book of the Faſti, perfectly agrees in this with Livy. The verſes in which he ſpeaks of it, inform us, that it was Camillus who conſecrated that temple. Hereupon a critic obſerves (124), that nevertheleſs Plutarch ſays nothing of this vow of Camillus, but is contented to ſay, that Manlius's houſe was raſed, and that the temple of the goddeſs Moneta was built in the place where that houſe ſtood. This critic doubtleſs thought, that the Camillus mentioned by Ovid, is the ſame whoſe life is written by Plutarch; he, I ſay, who mightily ſtrove to bring Manlius to puniſhment. I do not believe that Ovid was ſo groſsly miſtaken. He who conſecrated the temple of Juno Moneta, was Camillus the ſon. Therefore it is not to be thought ſtrange, that the hiſtorian of the father ſhould ſay nothing of this conſecration; but he may be blamed for his careleſs relation of the fate of Manlius's houſe. He ſays (125) that the Romans having demoliſhed it, ordered the temple of the goddeſs Moneta to be built in the room of it, and decreed, that from thenceforth no patrician ſhould live in the capitol. Is there any reader but would from ſuch a narration conclude, that theſe three things were performed at the ſame time? who could imagine, that this temple was not conſecrated till above forty years after Manlius puniſhment? there is ſomething in Cicero, that a little perplexes this matter; which is, that Juno, who had a temple in the capitol, was ſirnamed Moneta, becauſe ſhe adviſed the people of Rome to ſacrifice a big-bellied ſow. 'Scriptum à multis cum terræ motus, factus eſſet ut ſue plena procuratio fieret, vocem ab æde Junonis ex arca exiiſſe, quocirca Junonem illam appellatam Monetam (126). ——— Many have recorded, that, there being an earthquake, a voice was heard from the ſhrine in the temple of Juno, commanding to ſacrifice a pregnant ſow; whence that Juno was called Moneta.' According to this, it ought to be ſaid, that there was a temple of Juno in the capitol, before the dictator Camillus the ſon conſecrated the temple of Juno Moneta; or elſe it muſt be ſaid, that he only conſecrated a temple to Juno, but that in proceſs of time this goddeſs had the ſirname Moneta given her by reaſon of the advice ſhe gave in this temple. The firſt of theſe two hypotheſes has no foundation in any author; and the ſecond would charge the hiſtorians with an extream negligence, ſince they expreſsly obſerve, that the dictator Camillus conſecrated a temple to Juno Moneta, which was built in the ſame place where Manlius lived. Perhaps this obſcurity might be removed, by ſuppoſing that the place where Juno gave the advice, was the chapel which had been built for her in Jupiter's temple, in the Capitol (127). From that time ſhe might have been (128) ſirnamed Moneta, without having a particular temple with that epithet; but during the war with the Aurunci, Camillus would have built a temple to her under that ſirname, which ſhe had already. This would be an argument that ſhe had given advice to the people of Rome, before the year 413, and conſequently, that her friendſhip for Rome preceeded the ſecond Punic war. Roſinus (129) makes Cicero to ſay, that the earthquake which was the occaſion of Juno's adviſing the ſacrifice of a big-bellied ſow, happened before the Gauls took Rome. Cicero does not ſay this: Roſinus is in an error.

[X] Juno's worſhip at Rome was very antient.] Tatius, the colleague of Romulus, had appointed the honours that were to be paid to Juno Quiritia or Quiritis (130). We find that in the reign of Tullus Hoſtilius, the pontiffs being conſulted concerning the expiation of involuntary murders, erected two altars, and performed the ceremonies they thought proper to purify Horatius, who had killed his ſiſter. One of thoſe altars was conſecrated to Juno (131), and the other to Janus (132). It is ſaid (133) that before that time there was at Rome a temple of Juno, built by Numa Pompilius, who deſiring to gain the favour of this goddeſs, forbad, by a formal law, all lewd women to enter into that temple . . . . . or even to touch it. Theſe are the words of the law. Pellex ædem Junonis ne tangito. Si tangat Junoni agnum fœminam demiſſis crinibus cædito. This was the reparation they were obliged to make, by ſacrificing a lamb to her, with their hair hanging loſe. In a word, we may ſay, that it was not by too bold an hyperbole, that Virgil introduced Jupiter promiſing his ſpouſe, that the deſcendants of Æneas ſhould ſerve her more devoutly than all the other nations. This dialogue is one of the fineſt paſſages of the Æneid. Juno engages to perſecute Æneas no longer, and asks a favour as a recompence for her deſiſting. I adviſe my readers to go to the fountain head: I ſhall only produce theſe four verſes.

Hinc genus, Auſonio miſtum quod ſanguine ſurget,
Supra homines, ſupra ire Deos pietate videbis.
Nec gens ulla tuos æquè celebrabit honores.
Annuit his Juno, & mentem lætata retorſit (134).

This blended lineage, from th' Auſonian blood
Deriv'd, in piety you ſhall behold
Excelling men and gods; nor any race
Shall equal honours to your altars pay.
Juno aſſents, and pleas'd retorts her mind.

TRAPP.

[Y] The honours ſhe received in other towns of Italy were very great.] She was worſhipped under the title of Soſpita, with great devotion at Lanuvium, near Rome, in the Via Appia. The Romans were ſo fond of this worſhip, that their conſuls were obliged in the beginning of their conſulſhip, to go and pay their homages to this Juno. Nolite à ſacris propriis Junonis Soſpitæ, cui omnes Conſules facere neceſſe eſt, domeſticum & ſuum Conſulem potiſſimum avellere (135). When the inhabitants of Lanuvium were made Roman citizens, it was ordained that this worſhip ſhould be common to them with the people of Rome. Lanuvinis civitas data, ſacraque ſua reddita cum eo ut ædes lucuſque Soſpitæ Junonis communis Lanuvinis Municipibus cum populo Romano eſſet (136). There was a treaſure in the temple of this goddeſs, out of which Auguſtus took great ſums, and promiſed to pay intereſt for it (137). It is thought that this temple was founded by the Pelaſgi, who came originally from Peloponneſus, which opinion is ſupported by Ælian's calling this Juno of Lanuvium, Juno Argolica (138). Here is the attire of this goddeſs. 'Noſtram Soſpitam . . . tu nunquam ne in ſomnis quidem vides niſi cum pelle caprina, cum haſta, cum ſcutulo, cum calceolis repandis (139). ——— You never ſee our goddeſs, Juno Soſpita, even in dreams, without her goat-skin, her ſpear, her ſhield, and her ſhoes, with the ends bent backwards.' It is not obſerved in this paſſage, whether the goat's skin was adorned with horns; but there are very learned men who do not doubt of it. 'It is certain that Juno of Lanuvium had her head veiled with a goat-skin, ſet off with true horns, which is plainly to be ſeen in Goltzius's Roman medals, and in that mentioned by Vigenere, in his annotations upon Livy.' Thus Mr de Girac ſpeaks in the ſixty fifth ſection, and five hundred and fifty ſixth page of his reply. You will find in the margin of his book the following paſſage: Romani Junonem Soſpitam colebant, cujus caput pellis caprina cum cornibus exornabat *. Mind this: the ſerpent of the temple of Lanuvium was ſomething miraculous; it knew whether young women had loſt their virginity or not. See Ælian (140).

(k) Id. lib. xxxii, cap. xxix.

(l) Id. lib. xxxiv, cap. liii.

(m) Cicero, de Divinat. lib i, init. fol. 304, B, & fol. 311, B.

(122) Lib. vi, cap. iii, n. 1.

(123) Livius, lib. vii, cap. xxviii.

(124) See Valer. Maximus, cum notis Variorum, put out by Thyſius, lib. i, cap. viii, n. 3, pag. 105.

(125) Plutarch. in Camillo, pag. 148. C.

(126) Cicero, de Divinat. lib. i.

(127) See Dionyſ. Halicarnaſſ. lib. iv, cap. lxix. Dauſqueius, in Silium Ital. lib. x, pag. 435, quotes ſeveral authorities.

(128) It appears from Livy, lib. iii, pag. m. 79, that Juno, in the temple of Jupiter Capitolinus, was ſirnamed Regina.

(129) Antiquit. Rom. lib. ii, cap. vi.

(130) Dionyſius Halicarnaſſ. lib. ii, cap. lii.

(131) Overſeer of the ſiſters, ſays Dionyſius Halicarnaſſeus; but ſhe is ſirnamed Sororia, apud Feſtum, quem vide pag. m. cclxii, voce ſororium tigillum.

(132) Id. Dionyſ. lib iii, cap. xxviii.

(133) See Du Boulay's Threſor des Antiquitez Romaines, pag. 149.

(134) Virgil. Æn. lib xii, ver. 838.

(135) Cicero, Orat. pro Muræna, ſub fin.

(136) Livius, lib. viii, cap. xiv.

(137) Appian. lib. v, de Bello Civil. pag. m. 399.

(138) Ælian. Hiſtor. Animal. lib xi, cap. xvi.

(139) Cicer de Nat. Deor. lib. i, cap. xxix.

* Lud. Nonnus, in Goltzii Græc.

(140) Ælian. Ubi ſupra. See alſo Propertius, Eleg. viii, lib. iv.

fore Rome was built. It was like that of Argos, and the ſame ceremonies were uſed in it as the Argivi had conſecrated to her worſhip. This we learn from Dionyſius Halicarnaſſeus in the twenty firſt chapter of the firſt book.

I would

Juno LACINIA, whoſe temple was ſix miles from Crotona, was wonderfully famous. This temple was twice as large as the largeſt in Rome (141). It was covered with marble, part whereof was brought to Rome to cover the temple of Fortuna Equeſtris, which the cenſor Quintus Fulvius Flaccus was building : but as he came to a miſerable end, the ſenate ordered the marble to be carried to the ſame place it was taken from (142). Annibal did not execute the deſign of carrying away the column of gold, which was in the temple of this Juno (143). Pliny tells us, that the aſhes which were left on the altar of this goddeſs, being expoſed to all the violences of the weather, never moved from their place (144). Servius tells another miracle ; if any one engraved his name upon the marble covering of this temple, the Letters vaniſhed away when that man died. In hoc templo illud miraculi fuiſſe dicitur, ut ſi quis ferro in tegula templi, ipſius nomen incideret, tamdiu illa Scriptura maneret, quamdiu is homo viveret qui illud ſcripſiſſet (145). Livy ſpeaks of another miracle, which is, that the beaſts of every kind, that were conſecrated to this goddeſs, fed on the meadows of the temple, without any one's keeping, and retired at night of themſelves, being undiſturbed either by wild-beaſts or thieves. Læta in medio paſcua habuit (Lucus) ubi omnis generis ſacrum deæ paſcebatur pecus ſine ullo paſtore : ſeparatimque egreſſi cujuſque generis greges, nocte remeabant ad ſtabula, nunquam inſidiis ferarum non fraude violati hominum (146). He gives ſufficient intimation, that he would not ſwear to the truth of it ; and that the ſtory of the unmoveable aſhes had no greater certainty. They almoſt always, ſays he, aſcribe ſome miracles to ſuch ſort of places. Miracula aliqua affinguntur plerumque tam inſignibus locis. Fama eſt aram eſſe in veſtibulo templi, cujus cinerem nullus unquam moveat ventus. No body underſtands this better than the Chriſtian Monks. He adds, that this temple was famous, not only for it's holineſs, but alſo for it's riches (147).

It is no wonder, that there have been different opinions concerning the founder of this temple, and the occaſion of it's foundation ; for all people are inclined to invent a thouſand pretty things on ſuch matters. See Servius (148), who relates, amongſt other opinions, that king Lacinius cauſed it to be built, in honour to Juno, becauſe ſhe hated Hercules, whom he had refuſed to lodge. But if theſe variations ought not to ſurprize us, we cannot however but wonder, that authors are not agreed about the ſituation of this building. Livy places it ſix miles from Crotona : 'Sex ' millia aberat ab urbe (149) nobile templum ipſa urbe ' nobilius, Laciniæ Junonis, ſanctum omnibus circa ' populis (150). —— Six miles from the city was a ' noble temple, more magnificent than the city itſelf ; ' ſacred, among all the neighbouring people, to Juno ' Lacinia.' But Valerius Maximus ſays, it was at Locri, which is not the only point wherein he differs from Livy. His words are theſe : 'Q. Fulvius Flac' cus impune non tulit quod in cenſura tegulas mar' moreas ex Junonis Laciniæ templo in ædem For' tunæ Equeſtris, quam Romæ faciebat, tranſtulit. ' Negatur enim, poſt hoc factum, mente conſtitiſſe : ' quin etiam per ſummam ægritudinem animi expira' vit, cum ex duobus filiis in Illyrico militantibus, al' terum deceſſiſſe, alterum graviter audiſſet affectum. ' Cujus caſu motus ſenatus tegulas illico Locros re' portandas curavit : decretique circumſpectiſſima ſancti' one impium opus cenſoris retexuit (151). —— Q. Ful' vius Flaccus ſuffered, for that, in his cenſorſhip, he ' transferred the marble tiles from the temple of Juno ' Lacinia, into that of Fortuna Equeſtris, which he was ' building at Rome : for, after this action, they ſay he ' never enjoyed his ſenſes ; nay that he even died of ex' treme grief, hearing that of two ſons, who ſerved in ' Illyricum, the one was dead, and the other dangerouſly ' ill. The ſenate, moved with this action, ordered the ' tiles to be carried back to Locri, and, by the moſt ' cautious ſanction of a decree, unravelled the cenſor's im' pious work.' I have followed this narrative above, as to the motive that engaged the ſenate to reſtore the marble covering of the temple ; but I reſerved to myſelf the right of rectifying things as there might be occaſion, by Livy's account. You muſt therefore know, that this grave hiſtorian obſerves, that the cenſor Fulvius Flaccus was extreamly ſollicitous that the temple he built ſhould, neither in magnificence nor extent, come behind any in Rome. He thought a marble roof would give great luſtre to his edifice ; for which reaſon he ordered half of the temple of Juno Lacinia to be uncovered (152), which was ſufficient for his deſign. Having got that marble brought to Rome, he took care not to ſay what place they came from ; nevertheleſs it was publickly known, which occaſioned ſuch murmurs, that the conſuls were obliged to conſult the ſenate upon that affair. The ſenate ordered Flaccus to come before them, and having ſuffered him to be expoſed, for ſome time, to all ſorts of bitter reproaches, they unanimouſly reſolved, that the marble ſhould be carried back to Juno's temple, and that the goddeſs ſhould be appeaſed by what the ceremonies preſcribed. Livy's words have ſo charmed me, that I am perſuaded they will be very agreeable to the greateſt part of my readers : the expreſſion is admirable, and full of noble thoughts. 'Poſtquam cenſor rediit tegu' læ expoſitæ de navibus ad templum portabantur : ' quanquam unde eſſent ſilebatur, non tamen celari ' potuit : Fremitus igitur in curia ortus eſt ; ex om' nibus partibus poſtulabatur, ut conſules eam rem ad ' ſenatum referrent : Ut vero accerſitus in curiam cen' ſor venit, multo infeſtius ſinguli univerſique præſen' tem lacerare : Templum auguſtiſſimum regionis ejus, ' quod non Pyrrhus, non Annibal violaſſent, violare pa' rum habuiſſe, niſi detexiſſet fœde ac prope diruiſſet. ' Detractum culmen templo, nudatum tectum patere im' bribus putrefaciendum. Cenſorem moribus regendis ' creatum, cui ſarta tecta exigere ſacris publicis & loca ' tuenda more majorum traditum eſſet ; eum per ſocio' rum urbes diruentem templa, nudantemque tecta æ' dium ſacrarum vagari, & quod, ſi in privatis ſocio' rum ædificiis faceret, indignum videri poſſet, id Deûm ' immortalium templa demolientem facere, & obſtrin' gere religione populum Romanum, ruinis templorum ' templa ædificantem : tamquam non iidem ubique Dii ' immortales ſint, ſed ſpoliis aliorum alii colendi exor' nandique. Quum, priuſquam referretur, appareret ' quid ſentirent Patres : relatione facta in unam om' nes ſententiam ierunt, ut hæ tegulæ reportandæ in ' templum locarentur, piaculariaque Junoni fierent ' (153). —— After the return of the cenſor, the tiles ' were carried from on ſhip-board to the temple ; nor ' could it be kept a ſecret from whence they came. A ' murmur aroſe in the ſenate : it was on all ſides de' manded, that the conſuls ſhould lay the matter before ' the ſenate. But when the cenſor, being ſummoned, ap' peared, the whole aſſembly fell upon him with more ' rage. Was it not enough (they ſaid) that he had ' made no ſcruple to violate the moſt auguſt temple of ' that country, which both Pyrrhus and Hannibal had ' ſpared, but he muſt untile it, and almoſt demoliſh ' it : that the temple being uncovered, was expoſed to ' the injuries of the weather : that a cenſor, created ' for preſiding over the manners of the people, and to ' whom is committed, by the cuſtom of our anceſtors, ' the care of repairing and keeping up places of public ' worſhip ; went up and down through the cities of ' the allies, demoliſhing and untiling their temples, ' and ſhewing that indignity to the temples of the im' mortal gods, which would be thought ſcandalous to' wards the houſes of private perſons : that he had laid ' a burthen on the conſciences of the Roman people, ' building temples with the ruins of temples ; as tho' ' the immortal gods were not the ſame every where, ' but ſome were to be worſhipped and adorned with ' the ſpoils of others. The ſentiments of the fathers ap' pearing before the queſtion was put, it was unanimouſ' ly agreed, that the tiles ſhould be carried back to the ' temple, and Juno appeaſed with offerings.' The decree of the ſenate was not executed in all it's parts ; for they who were commiſſioned to ſee the roof repaired, reported, that no workman knew how to reſtore the marble pieces to their places, and ſo they were left in the court of the temple (154). Flaccus did not leave off building ; he made an end of the temple, and conſecrated it, and exhibited the Ludi Scenici for four days, and the Circenſes one day (155). Here is a notable difference betwixt Livy and Valerius Maximus, which

(141) See, below, citat. (152).

(142) Valer. Maximus, lib. i, cap. i.

(143) Cic. lib i, de Divinat. See the article SILENUS.

(144) In Laciniæ Junonis ara ſub dio ſita, cinerem immobilem eſſe perflantibus undique procellis. Plin. lib. ii, cap. cvii. Valerius Maximus, lib. i, cap. viii, in Exempl. Extern. n. 18, ſays the ſame thing. See Livy hereunder.

(145) Servius, in Æneid. lib. iii, ver. 552.

(146) Livius, lib. xxiv, cap. iii.

(147) Inclytum templum divitiis etiam, non tantum ſanctitate fuit. Id. ib See alſo Strabo, lib. vi, pag m 180.

(148) Servius, ubi ſupra.

(149) In Valerius Maximus, publiſhed by Thyſius, pag. 27, they make Livy ſay, that the temple was in the town, In urbe nobile templum, ipſa urbe erat nobilius.

(150) Livius, ubi ſupra.

(151) Valer. Maximus, lib. i, cap. i, n. 20.

(152) Profectus in Brutios, ædem Junonis Laciniæ ad partem dimidiam detegit, id ſatis fore ratus ad tegendum quod ædificaretur. Tit. Livius, lib. xlii, init. cap. iii, pag. m 809. This is the reaſon why I ſaid above, after Cluverius, Ital. Antiq. lib. iv, cap. xv, that the temple of Juno Lacinia was twice as large as the largeſt temple in Rome.

(153) Livius, ibid.

(154) Quæ ad religionem pertinent cum cura facta : tegulas relictas in area templi, quia reponendarum nemo artifex inire rationem potuerit, redemptores nuntiarunt. Id. ibid.

(155) Fulvius ædem Fortunæ equeſtris, quam Proconſul in Hiſpania dimicans cum Celtiberorum legionibus voverat, annos ſex poſtquam voverat, dedicavit, & ſcenicos ludos per quatriduum, unum diem in circo fecit. Id. ibid. cap. x.

I would gladly know whether any of the wiſe men among the heathens took notice of a thing, which methinks was not difficult to obſerve, which is, that no body did partake leſs of a happy life, a ſtate moſt eſſential to the divine nature (n), than the greateſt of the goddeſſes. We can ſcarce conceive a more miſerable condition than that of Juno. I do not conſider the character of her employments, though they were very toilſome and unpleaſant [Z], and have given juſt occaſion to turn the Theological ſyſtem

---

(n) Quæ nobis natura informationem Deorum ipſorum dedit, eadem inſculpſit in mentibus ut eos æternos & beatos haberemus. Cicero, de Nat. Deor. lib. i, cap. xvii. See alſo Ariſtotle, de Repub. lib. vii, cap. i, pag. m. 321. E. See alſo the remark [N], of the article SPINOZA, num. V.

---

which ſhews that the latter has done a great injury to the Roman ſenate; he ſuppoſes, that they neverthought of repairing the damage, till they had ſeen the prodigious vengeance that heaven had inflicted on the cenſor Flaccus. But Livy informs us, that the ſenate performed that pious and juſt action, upon the bare conſideration of the fact; and before they ſaw any ſign of the divine indignation. He does not deny the miſerable end of the cenſor: nay, he repreſents it more tragical than Valerius Maximus; for he ſays, that Fulvius Flaccus hanged himſelf, and he adds, that it was ſaid amongſt the people, that Juno had deprived him of his ſenſes. ‘Q. Fulvius Flaccus pontifex qui priore ‘anno fuerat cenſor . . . . fœda morte periit. Ex duobus filiis ejus qui tum in Illyrico militabant, nunciatum alterum deceſſiſſe, alterum gravi & periculoſo morbo ægrum eſſe. Obruit animum ſimul luctus, metuſque: mane ingreſſi cubiculum ſervi, laqueo dependentem invenere. Erat opinio, poſt cenſuram minus compotem fuiſſe ſui: vulgo Junonis Laciniæ iram ob ſpoliatum templum alienaſſe mentem ferebant (156).’ What concerns the taking away of the marble covering from Juno's temple, is ſaid to have happened the 579th year of Rome.

(156) Id ibid. cap. xxviii.

[Z] The character of her employments, tho' they were very toilſome and unpleaſant.] She had the ſuperintendance of marriages, and their conſequences. See Virgil's commentators upon theſe words:

Mactant lectas de more bidenteis,
Legiferæ Cereri, Phæboque patrique Lyæo:
Junoni ante omnes, cui VINCLA JUGALIA
CURAE (157).

(157) Virgil. Æn. lib. iv, ver. 57.

Selected victims, with accuſtom'd rites,
To Ceres law-giver, and Phœbus bleed,
And father Bacchus, but above the reſt
To Juno, who preſides o'er nuptial beds.

TRAPP.

They mention a hundred ſuch like paſſages, and the epithets pronuba, jugalis, ζυγία, γαμηλία, παράνυμφος, &c. which were given to Jupiter's wife, becauſe ſhe preſided over matrimonial engagements. See the following remark. This employment required great pains; the particulars of it were innumerable, and it was very difficult to perform it to her honour. If the buſineſs had been only to make matches, the difficulties would not have been ſo conſiderable: the diſpoſition of the ſubjects, and the inclination of nature, might have ſaved the director-general a great deal of pains; but a goddeſs of the firſt rank was engaged by the intereſts of her reputation and glory, to ſee that people ſhould marry well: I mean, that the ſorting of conditions and humours ſhould form an indiſſoluble bond of affection and concord, and therefore all marriages that were ill ſuited and unlucky, could not but give her a great deal of trouble, as being ſo many blots to her reputation, and juſt occaſions of reproaching her, that the pains they had taken to invoke and worſhip her, on the wedding-day, were all loſt labour. All thoſe who had a mind to abuſe her, had a fair opportunity; for, in ſhort, either ſhe did all ſhe could to procure happy marriages, or ſhe did not. If ſhe did, there was reaſon to conclude, ſhe was very unfortunate, ſince ſhe had an employment, which exhauſted all her ſtrength and induſtry; and yet ſhe could not avoid being unſucceſsful on a thouſand occaſions. That vaſt number of experiments, which ſhewed the uſeleſſneſs of her pains, was a proof either that ſhe had a ſubject to labour on that was very difficult, or that her power was very inconſiderable. In the firſt caſe, her misfortune, and the deplorable cruelty of her fate, or elſe her imprudence, were manifeſt; for if ſhe was not not at liberty to lay down her employment, in which doing her beſt, ſhe could not prevent ill ſucceſs on a thouſand occaſions, her fate was to be pitied. But if ſhe might have reſigned her office, and yet obſtinately continued in it, ſhe wanted judgment and prudence (158), and maintained herſelf unjuſtly in a function which exceeded her ſtrength, and which ſhe diſcharged to her diſhonour. It had been a poor excuſe to ſay, that her good deſigns were thwarted by the capriciouſneſs of another goddeſs.

(158) Metiri ſe quemque ſuo modulo ac pede verum eſt. Horat. Epiſt vii, lib. i, ver. ult.

Sic viſum Veneri, cui placet impares
Formas, atque animos ſub juga ahenea
Sævo mittere cum joco (159).

(159) Horat. Ode xxxiii, lib. i.

So Venus will'd, who binds in love's hard chains
Unequal forms and minds, and laughs at all their pains.

This had been to confeſs the limitation and dependance of her power, a mortifying confeſſion, beyond all that can be imagined for a goddeſs ſo haughty as Juno was. This was what might be ſaid, ſuppoſing that ſhe diſcharged her duty to the beſt of her power; but if it had been ſuppoſed, that ſhe could have ſucceeded better, ſhe would have been looked upon as guilty of extream negligence, or malice, and conſequently, as moſt unworthy of the honours that were paid her, and of the dignity ſhe was inveſted with. Theſe are reflexions, which the Heathens ſhould have made. Now the reſult of theſe thoughts is to determine, that her condition was very unhappy, whether by reaſon of the great pains her employment required, or becauſe of the ill ſucceſs they were attended with. Her dignity and her ſex, made her wonderfully ſenſible of contempt and diſgrace; and we cannot imagine, but ſhe had ſenſe enough not to be ignorant of what may be ſaid againſt her adminiſtration, and to believe that the other gods reflected upon her (160), and that if they had the complaiſance not to do it to her face, or not to tell her what was ſaid of her, they would not fail to aſperſe her behind her back, or at leaſt to think meanly of her. There needs no more to vex one that is touchy, ambitious, and proud: if he is ſenſible that his faults are known to others, that is enough to diſquiet him.

(160) The Heathens believed that jealouſies, quarrels, diviſions, and ſuch like diſorders happened among the gods.

All the reflexions I have produced might have been made with reſpect to Juno, as ſhe preſided over child-births. What a trouble was this! it was the way not to be at reſt one moment, and to be obliged to work in a thouſand places at once. This office is ſubject to many unpleaſant accidents. The induſtry of the beſt Surgeons does not hinder many children that come acroſs, ſome one way, and ſome another, from dying with their mothers. Theſe misfortunes were ſo many ſubjects of reproach for the cenſurers of Juno, who had been vainly invoked under particular and ſpecifical names, according to the exigency of the caſe (161). I know that it may be maintained with great probability, that all the deities who preſided over marriages, child-births, &c. ought not to be reduced to her alone, under different names; but on the other ſide, it is very likely, that all the other deities ought to be looked upon as the ſubſtitutes of the ſuperintendant-general: whence it follows, that the diſorders might be well placed to the account of the goddeſs Juno, as the bad adminiſtration of governors of provinces is imputed to the ſovereign, when he does not give a remedy for it. Beſides her having ſo many ſubſtitutes ſhew, that Juno's employment was thought too painful. Now all theſe ideas will make one form a diſadvantageous judgment of her. Add to all this, that two of the moſt glorious functions of this goddeſs's office were taken from her: for the care of reconciling married perſons

(161) See the remark [H].

ſyſtem of the Heathens into ridicule [AA]. I conſider the neceſſity ſhe found herſelf reduced to, of perſecuting the miſtreſſes and baſtards of her huſband, to ſeek ſome relief for the jealouſy that devoured her. She was as much poſſeſſed with this paſſion as could be expected from that haughty and imperious humour, which her quality of ſiſter and wife of the greateſt of the gods inſpired her with. This ſenſibility rendered her torment more inſupportable, and put her in a continual hurry to procure to herſelf the pleaſure of revenge. She omitted nothing to obtain it, and gave herſelf no reſt; but ſhe never had the ſatisfaction of a full and entire ſucceſs [BB]. She was always to begin again. We muſt not ſons was committed to another deity, named Viriplaca (162); and the care of the converſion of thoſe women, who had not by their chaſte conduct deſerved their husbands affection, was committed to Venus Verticordia (163). What an affront was it to Juno to have her ſuperintendance of marriages thus diſmembered?

---

[AA] . . . . . and have given juſt occaſion to turn the Theological ſyſtem of the Heathens into ridicule.] The ſirnames of Pronuba, Jugalis, &c. which may be ſeen above (164), were not the only ones that were proper to Juno, as ſhe preſided over marriages; ſhe had alſo particular ſirnames grounded upon her preſiding over the conduct of new brides, over their husbands houſes . . . . . . and over the unction, which the bride made upon the poſts of her husband's door . . . . and becauſe ſhe helped the husband to untie the Zona virginalis (165). You will find thoſe ſirnames in theſe Latin words taken from a prayer that was made to Juno (166): Interducam, or Iterducam, & Domiducam, Unxiam, Cinctiam (167) mortales puellæ debent in nuptias convocare, ut earum & itinera protegas, & in optatas domos ducas, & cum poſtes ungent, fauſtum omen affigas, & ſingulum ponentes in thalamis non relinquas. It was not expected, that ſhe ſhould ſtop at the door of the nuptial chamber, but her aſſiſtance was alſo begged in the nuptial bed, where ſhe came under the title of Dea mater Prema, and Dea Pertunda, accompanied with Deus pater Subigus. Upon this St Auguſtin has ridiculed Heatheniſm; and as it was very difficult to uſe only grave conſiderations, upon ſuch a ſubject, he has ſhewn the impertinence of it in very free terms. 'Cum mas '& fœmina conjunguntur, adhibetur deus Jugatinus. 'Sit hoc ferendum. Sed momum eſt ducenda, quæ 'nubit, adhibetur deus Domiducus. Ut maneat cum 'viro, additur dea Manturna. Quid ultra quæritur? 'Parcatur humanæ verecundiæ: peragat cætera concu'piſcentia carnis & ſanguinis procurato ſecreto pudo'ris. Quid impletur cubiculum turba numinum: quan'do & paranymphi inde diſcedunt? Et ad hoc imple'tur, non ut eorum præſentia cogitata major ſit cura 'pudicitiæ, ſed ut fœminæ ſexu infirmæ novitate pavi'dæ, illis cooperantibus ſine ulla difficultate virginitas 'auferatur. Adeſt enim dea Virginenſis, & deus pater 'Subigus, & dea mater Prema, & dea Pertunda, & 'Venus, & Priapus. Quid eſt hoc? Si omnino labo'rantem in illo opere virum ab diis adjuvari oportebat: 'non ſufficiebat aliquis unus, aut aliqua una. Nun'quid Venus ſola parum eſſet, quæ ob hoc etiam dici'tur nuncupata, quod ſine ejus vi fœmina virgo eſſe 'non deſinat? Si ulla eſt frons in hominibus, quæ non 'eſt in numinibus? Nonne cum credunt conjugati tot 'deos utriuſque ſexus præſentes, & huic operi in'ſtantes, ita pudore afficiuntur, ut & ille minus mo'veatur, & illa plus reluctetur? Et certè ſi adeſt 'Virginenſis dea, ut virgini zona ſolvatur: ſi adeſt 'deus Subigus, ut viro ſubigatur: ſi adeſt dea Prema, 'ut ſubacta ne ſe commoveat, prematur, dea Pertunda 'ibi quid facit? Erubeſcat, eat foras, agat aliquid '& maritus. Valde inhoneſtum eſt, ut quod vocatur 'illa, impleat quiſquam niſi ille. Sed fortè ideo tole'ratur, quia dea dicitur eſſe, non deus. Nam ſi maſ'culus crederetur, & Pertundus vocaretur, majus 'contra eum pro uxoris pudicitia poſceret, maritus au'xilium, quàm Fœta contra Silvanum (169). Sed 'quid hoc dicam, cum ibi ſit & Priapus nimis maſcu'lus, ſuper cujus immaniſſimum & turpiſſimum faſci'num ſedere nova nupta jubebatur more honeſtiſſimo '& religioſiſſimo matronarum?' Theſe objections are very ſtrong, and I cannot conceive how the beſt apologiſts for the Pagan religion could have eluded them. The cenſure that St Auguſtin grounds upon the unneceſſary multiplication of beings, was alone ſufficient to confound them. What a diffidence of human ſtrength was it believe that Venus ſtood in need of three or four other deities? We only conceive that an apologiſt might have anſwered, that St Auguſtin was to blame for reproaching as a thing uſeleſs, and which left nothing for the husband to do, the joining of the goddeſs Pertunda to the goddeſs mater Prema; for according to that Theology, the one was not leſs or more neceſſary than the other, and neither of them excluded the operation of the married couple. There was then a little want of exactneſs in this part of St Auguſtin's objections. The common anſwer of the Heathens at that time was perhaps to ſay, that the objected multiplication, was only a multiplication of the names of the ſame deity. A poor anſwer, for the books of the antient Heathens afforded the confutation of it.

A Reflexion upon the fate of the Philoſophers, who were obliged to write in vindication of Paganiſm, and upon an inconveniency ariſing from the unity of religion.

Note, by the by, that the Philoſophers who undertook to anſwer the Chriſtian doctors, were very much to be pitied. They bore the puniſhment of the folly of others: the antient prieſts had committed the fault, by ridiculouſly tranſplanting the fictions of the Poets into the public worſhip; and the Philoſophers many ages after were forced to bear the ſhame of all theſe fopperies, and to torment themſelves to put by the thruſts, that pierced them through. If thoſe who framed ſo abſurd a worſhip, had had as dexterous and powerful adverſaries as St Auguſtin was, they would have been circumſpect, and not have given ſuch a free ſcope to their impoſtures: this is a diſadvantage of the unity of religion. It muſt be confeſſed that the diverſity of religions, has it's inconveniencies, and even ſuch as are dangerous; but then it prevents the progreſs of corruption, and makes each party more cautious.

[BB] Her jealouſy . . . . put her in a continual hurry to procure to herſelf the pleaſures of revenge . . . but ſhe never had the ſatisfaction of a full and entire ſucceſs.] Conſider the journey ſhe took from heaven to earth, upon ſuſpicion that a cloud which ſhe diſcovered, might probably be the canopy under which her unfaithful husband ſported with ſome damſel. She was not miſtaken, Jupiter was then in the arms of Io. He converted her into an heiſer, that his wife might not ſurprize him in the fact. Juno begged the heiſer, and ſet Argus to watch her, and afterwards ſhe tormented her with a fury that made her run over all the earth; and at laſt ſhe was forced to ſuffer Io to reſume her former ſhape, and to become the goddeſs Iſis (170). Conſider alſo the ſupplications Juno made to Tethys and Oceanus, when ſhe ſaw the ſame Caliſto among the ſtars, whom ſhe had changed into a bear. She had uſed the utmoſt violence againſt this miſtreſs of Jupiter; ſhe took her by the hair of her head, and threw her upon the ground (171). But let us hear her moneful complaints. Nothing can be more lamentable: ſhe is afraid that hereafter ſhe ſhall be continually affronted; ſince the efforts ſhe makes to revenge herſelf, terminate only in the glory of her enemies.

Eſt verò, cur quis Junonem lædere nolit,
Offenſamque tremat, quæ proſum ſola nocendo?
O ego quantum egi! quàm vaſta potentia noſtra eſt!
Eſſe hominem vetui; facta eſt Dea: ſic ego pœnas
Sontibus impono: ſic eſt mea magna poteſtas (172).

Who now can fear immortal Juno's hate?
Alas! I hurt not, but advance their fate.
My baffled pow'r muſt to a ſtrumpet bow:
A brute I made her; ſhe's a goddeſs now.
'Tis thus I puniſh, thus exert my pow'r.
- - - - - - - - - - - - -

She was once ſo overwhelmed with grief, becauſe ſhe could not revenge her ſelf, that ſhe made a voyage to the bottom of hell, to demand the aſſiſtance of the three furies.

---

(162) See Valer. Maximus, lib. ii, cap. i, n. 6, pag. m. 135.

(163) See Ovid. Faſtor. lib. iv, pag. m. 74.

(164) At the beginning of the remark [Z].

(165) Du Boulay, Threſor des Antiquitez Romaines, pag. 149, 150.

(166) Mart Capella de Nuptiis Philologiæ, lib. ii, pag m. 37, 38.

(167) Here is a paſſage of Feſtus Pompeius, pag. xxxv. Cinxiæ Junonis nomen ſanctum habebatur in nuptiis, quod initio conjugii ſolutio erat cinguli quo nova nupta erat cincta.

(168) Auguſtin. de Civit. Dei, lib. vi, cap. ix, pag. m. 599.

(169) St Auguſtin had been ſaying, that ſome deities guarded the women lying in, leaſt the god Sylvanus ſhould come and torment them. Mulieri fœtæ poſt partum tres Deos cuſtodes commemorat (Varro) adhiberi, ne Sylvanus Deus per noctem ingrediatur & vexet.

(170) See Ovid in the ſecond book of the Metamorphoſis.

(171) Arreptum prenſis à fronte capillis Stravit humi pronam. Ovid. Metam. l b. ii, ver. 477.

(172) Id ibid. ver. 519.

not reckon among the leaſt of her diſgraces, the misfortune ſhe had to loſe her cauſe in

Nil poterit Juno, niſi inultos flere dolores?
Idque mihi ſatis eſt; Hæc una potentia noſtra eſt (173)?

Are tears the injur'd Juno's ſole relief?
No remedy but this for all my grief?
- - - - - - -
- - - - - - -

Suſtinet ire illuc, cœleſti ſede relictâ,
(Tantum odiis iræque dabat) Saturnia Juno.
Quò ſimul intravit, ſacroque à corpore preſſum
Intremuit limen; tria Cerberus extulit ora,
Et tres latratus ſimul edidit. Illa ſorores
Nocte vocat genitas, grave & implacabile numen (174).

Thither ſhe haſtes, from heaven's æthereal gate:
(Such is the force of anger and of hate)
Where, as ſhe enter'd, and the threſhold preſs'd,
The portal trembled at the heavenly gueſt:
Grim Cerberus wide his triple jaws extends,
And the dark vault with tripling barking rends.
She calls the dreary ſiſters, and implores
Th' implacable, and unrelenting pow'rs.

If ſhe ever had any reaſon to be ſatisfied, it was when ſhe perſecuted the nymph Thalia (175), whom Jupiter had got with child. The only way that was left for this nymph to eſcape, was to be ſwallowed up in the bowels of the earth; but when the term was expired, the two children, that ſhe was big with, came out of the earth, and became afterwards two famous deities (176), which had a wonderful veneration paid them (177); and ſo Juno's joy was but very ſhort. She ſhewed herſelf ſuch an inexorable perſecutor of Hercules, that Porphyrius has compared her to the moſt wicked devils, that perſecute good men. Τὺς γὰρ Δαίμονας διαγράφων τῷ λόγῳ (ὁ Πορφύριος) λέγει πυ, τὺς φαυλοτάτυς Δαίμονας τοῖς ἀγαθοῖς ἀνδράσι λόχυς καὶ ἐνέδρας καθίζειν, καὶ ἐξαίφνης ἐπιτίθεσθαι, καθάπερ ἡ Ἥρα τῷ Διονύσῳ καὶ Ἡρακλεῖ. Dæmones enim oratione deſcribens (Porphyrius) alicubi ait: peſſimos Dæmonas bonis viris inſidias & pericula tendere, exque eos inſidiis aggredi, ut Juno ſcilicet Baccho atque Herculi (178). What did ſhe get by it? Nothing but toil, diſgrace, and confuſion. She complained of it on the ſtage, in ſuch a manner as was able to ſoften the hardeſt hearts. Read theſe verſes of Seneca; in which ſhe declares, that ſhe is reſolved to leave heaven, ſeeing the multitude of the concubines and baſtards of her huſband. She expects to ſee Hercules aſcend thither, whom ſhe ſo often attempted to ruin, and who by that means made himſelf immortal.

Soror Tonantis (hoc enim ſolum mihi Nomen relictum eſt) ſemper-alienum Jovem,
Ac templa ſummi vidua deſerui ætheris;
Locumque, cœlo pulſa, pellicibus dedi.
Tellus colenda eſt: pellices cœlum tenent (179).
- - - - - - - - -
- - - - - - - - -

Non ſic abibunt odia, vivaces aget
Violentus iras animus, & ſævus dolor
Æterna bella pace ſublata geret.
Quid bella? quidquid horridum tellus creat
Inimica; quidquid pontus aut aër tulit
Terribile, dirum, peſtilens, atrox, ferum;
Fractum atque domitum eſt, ſuperat, & creſcit malis;
Iraque noſtra fruitur: in laudes ſuas
Mea vertit odia, dum nimis ſæva impero,
Patrem probavi: gloriæ feci locum (180).

Siſter of Jove (that name alone is left me)
Exil'd from heav'n, I fly the cruel god,
Deſert the widow'd temples of the skies,
And yield my throne to harlots: earth, receive me,
Since whores command in heav'n, and rule the skies.
- - - - - - - - -
- - - - - - - - - -

Yet ſhall not here my keen reſentment ceaſe,
But my loud griefs ſhall wage eternal wars . . .
What wars? . . . whate're of horrid, dreadful, dire,
Of peſtilent, and fierce, earth, ſea, and air
Create, is broken and ſubdued by Jove:
The cruel conqueror enjoys my rage;
My hatred ſerves but to encreaſe his fame,
And my fierce rule but added to his glory.

The ſatisfaction of ſeeing the ruin of Troy, was but an inconſiderable conſolation for the torments ſhe had ſuffered, during the long reſiſtance of the Trojans; and ſhe quickly found herſelf obliged to undergo new fatigues in perſecuting Æneas, and preventing his landing in Italy. She left no ſtone unturned; ſhe went to Æolus to beg a tempeſt of him; ſhe cajoled him, humbled herſelf before him (181). Another time ſhe placed herſelf upon a cold cloud (182), and expoſed herſelf to the injuries of the air, during a battle between the party ſhe protected, and the party ſhe hated. This was loſt labour. Read what deſpair made her ſay, before ſhe had recourſe to Æolus.

Cum Juno æternum ſervans ſub pectore vulnus,
Hæc ſecum: Me ne incepto deſiſtere victam?
Nec poſſe Italiâ Teucrorum avertere regem?
Quippe vetor fatis. Pallaſne exurere claſſem
Argivûm, atque ipſos potuit ſubmergere Ponto,
Unius ob noxam, & furias Ajacis Oilei (183)?
- - - - - - - - - -
- - - - - - - - - -

Aſt ego, quæ divûm incedo regina, Joviſque
Et ſoror, & conjux, unâ cum gente tot annos
Bella gero; & quiſquam numen Junonis adoret
Prætereà? Aut ſupplex aris imponat honorem (184)?

When Juno in her breaſt,
Vindictive, feeding an eternal wound,
Thus with herſelf. And muſt I then deſiſt
Baffled? Nor can I back from Latium turn
This Trojan prince? Belike the fates forbid.
Cou'd Pallas drown the Greeks, and burn their fleet,
For Ajax' phrenzy? - - - - -
- - - - - But I, the queen
Of gods, the ſiſter and the wife of Jove,
With this one race ſo many years make war.
And who will Juno's deity adore
Henceforth? or honour on my altars lay.

Trapp.

This is but a ſpecimen of the hiſtory of this goddeſs; but it is ſufficient to ſhew that the heathens ſhould have looked upon her, as one of the moſt unhappy perſons that ever was in the world, and fit to be propoſed as a picture of extream miſery, as Prometheus on mount Caucaſus, Siſyphus, Ixion, Tantalus, the Danaïdes, and the reſt of the great ſinners delivered over to infernal puniſhments. There is nothing more true, than what Horace ſaid, that the moſt cruel tyrants have not been able to invent a more intolerable rack than envy (185): Which more eſpecially agrees to the jealouſy of marriage. What is it then, when joined with continual fatigues in the purſuit of an unſucceſsful revenge? a natural immortality does not ſweeten the bitterneſs of this ſad condition, but rather increaſes it; for the hopes that death will put an end to our pain and grief is a conſolation.

Nec finire licet tantos mihi morte dolores,
Sed nocet eſſe Deum, præcluſaque janua lethi
Æternum noſtros luctus extendit in ævum (186).

It is my curſe that I muſt never dye,
But drag a wretched immortality:

The

---

(173) Id. ibid. lib. iv, ver. 426.

(174) Ibid. ver. 447.

(175) Others call her Ætna.

(176) They were called Palici.

(177) See Servius, in Æneid. lib. ix, ver. 585. Lutatius, in Statium, Theb. lib. xii, ver. 157. Macrobius, Saturn. lib. v, cap. xix.

(178) Æneas Gazæus, in Theophraſto, pag. m. 43.

(179) Seneca, in Hercule Furente, ver. 1.

(180) Id. ver. 27.

(181) Virgil. Æn. lib. i.

(182) Qua ſpe gelidis in nubibus hæres? Virgil. Æn. lib. xii, ver. 796.
N c tu me aëria ſ lam nunc ſede videres
Digna indigna pati. . . . Id. ib. ver. 810.

(183) Virgil. Æn. lib. i, ver. 35.

(184) Id. ver. 46.

(185) Invidius alterius macreſcit rebus opimis. Invidia Siculi non invenere tyranni Majus tormentum. Horat. Epiſt. ii, lib. i, ver. 57.

(186) Ovid. Metam. lib i, ver. 661.

in a diſpute concerning beauty [CC]: the reſentment ſhe expreſſed for the affront which ſhe thought ſhe had received from Paris, the judge of that tryal, was very violent, and attended with a thouſand fatigues and many afflictions. This doubtleſs was a more ſmarting wound than that of the three pointed arrow, which ſhe received from Hercules

The gate of death is ſhut againſt my woe,
And thro' eternity my griefs muſt flow.

The pompous title of queen of heaven, the ſitting upon a fine throne, with a ſceptre in the hand, and a diadem on the head, is all inſignificant to the inward diſtempers of the ſoul. Nay, a perſon is more ſenſible of theſe misfortunes, when in the higheſt poſts and dignities. We may ſay at leaſt that diſcontent is like a fever, which is not more eaſily cured in a good bed than upon ſtraw.

Nec calidæ citiùs decedunt corpore febres
Textilibus ſi in picturis, oſtroque rubenti
Jactaris, quam ſi plebeja in veſte cubandu'ſt (187).

Nor ſooner health is to the rich reſtor'd,
In pomp extended on a ſilken bed,
Than to the lab'rer on his humble couch.

It is not riches that can drive away a fever, or the uneaſineſs of the mind.

Non domus, & fundus, non æris acervus, & auri
Ægroto domini deduxit corpore febres,
Non animo curas (188).

'Tis not in houſe, or farm, or heaps of gold,
To cure a fever in the owner's blood,
Or heal his cares.

Note, that if the Heathens did not make the reflexions, which I have ſet forth in the preceding remark and in this, they are wholly inexcuſable; for it was not only by the poets that they were informed of this unhappy life of Juno: the public worſhip had adopted thoſe ſtories, and monuments were found of them in their temples; the conſecrated ſtatues, the pictures of devotion, thoſe objects which are called the books of the ignorant, informed every body of the jealouſies of this goddeſs, &c.

[CC] The misfortune ſhe had to loſe her cauſe in a diſpute concerning beauty.] Minerva and Venus were her two competitors. Every body knows that Jupiter (189), not willing to ſit as judge in ſo nice a tryal, ordered theſe three goddeſſes to be conducted to mount Ida, in order to plead their cauſe there, and that Paris ſhould decide the diſpute. Juno dreſſed her ſelf as ſplendidly as was poſſible, and made great promiſes to Paris in caſe he adjudged the apple to her, which was to be the lot of the greateſt beauty. Minerva and Venus did their beſt both in dreſſing themſelves, and promiſing rewards to their judge. The trouble of tricking up themſelves, and making ſpeeches, was all to no purpoſe; Paris declared, that he would ſee them all naked before he pronounced his judgment.

Car voſtre diſcord giſt à vos formoſitez,
De contempler vos corps, vos naïves beautez,
Prudement diſcerner le choix, l'equipolance,
Laquelle eſt la plus belle in face, & corpulance.
Les Déeſſes alors eurent timidité,
Parce qu'il leur falloit monſtrer leur nudité.
Toutesfois à lombrage un peu ſe retirerent,
En lieu d'une antichambre, ou ſe deſhabillerent
A part l'une de l'autre, ou leurs Nymphes avoient
Qui honorablement en cela les ſervoient.
Quand eurent deſſublé eſcoffions & guimples,
Leurs couronnes tourets, deſtaché leurs eſpingles,
Morrion & chappeaux, ceintures, fermaillets,
Cheſnes, bagues, carquans, bullettes, bracelets,
Robes, & cotillons, leurs manteaux & cuirace,
Leurs habits pleins d' odeurs, de treſgrande efficace,
Toutesfois retenoient leurs eſcarpins dorez,
Bravement enrichis decoupez & ouvrez,
De peur que l'aigu bout des pointues herbettes
Leurs plantes n'offençaſt fort tendres & douillettes.
Ainſi nues eſtant toutes trois vont marcher
Devant le beau Paris, & droit ſi vont ranger (190).

Your quarrel from your beauties doth ariſe:
To guide my choice, your native charms diſplay,
That I may weigh them in an equal ſcale.
Fear ſeiz'd the goddeſſes, compell'd to ſhew
Their naked charms: together they retir'd,
And, in the covert of a ſhady bower,
Diſrob'd, aſſiſted by th' attendant nymphs.
And now each part of dreſs was laid aſide,
Girdles untied, and ev'ry pin pull'd out.
Head-cloaths, and ſtomachers, bracelets and rings,
Gowns, petticoats, and mantles, all perfum'd
And breathing heav'nly odour, lay confus'd.
Their ſlippers, richly gilded, they retain'd,
To guard their feet againſt the pointed thorns.
Thus, naked, before Paris they appear,
March in his ſight, and ev'ry charm diſcloſe.

The French poet who gives us this deſcription, forgets a very material thing, which is, that theſe three goddeſſes waſhed their bodies in a fountain. Euripides tells us this particular (191), and there are ſome epigrams on it in the Anthologia (192). Juno muſt therefore ſubmit to very diſagreeable conditions; for after all, ſhe made profeſſion of modeſty, ſhe was grave and majeſtical, ſhe knew how to maintain her rank, and yet ſhe found her ſelf obliged to ſhew her ſelf naked before a mortal: and the worſt of it was, that another appeared handſomer to the judge, and Venus obtained the golden apple. He did not make it appear, that he found any reaſon of preference in the face or ſhape of theſe three litigants: on the contrary, he declared, that whilſt he ſaw them dreſt, he thought them equally handſome. Having then pronounced againſt Juno, after comparing what their cloaths concealed, it was a ſign he diſcovered in her ſome notable imperfections. This might at leaſt be ſuſpected, and it could not but be a terrible mortification to this goddeſs (193). This was enough to make her mad. I wonder that Lucian has not beſtowed ſome of his biting wit upon it in his dialogue about the judgment of Paris. See the margin (194). Our Scarron has not been ſo diſcreet, ſee how he jeſts in the firſt book of his Virgile traveſti:

Ce que craignant la bonne Dame (195),
Et gardant encor en ſon ame
Le beau jugement de Paris,
Et l'inſupportable mépris,
Qu'en faveur de Venus la belle
Il eût pour Pallas & pour elle,
Outre qu'il avoit revelé,
(Heureux s'il n'euſt jamais parlé)
Qu'elle avoit trop longue mamelle,
Et trop long poil deſſous l'aiſſelle,
Et pour Dame de qualité
Le genoüil un peu trop croté:

This the good lady fear'd, we find,
And ſtill preſerving in her mind
The ſlight, which Paris put upon her,
And haughty Pallas' injur'd honour,
When he adjudg'd the queen of love
The golden prize, for which they ſtrove:
Beſides, that Paris had revealed;
A ſecret, he ſhou'd have conceal'd;

---

(187) Lucret. lib. ii, ver. 34.

(188) Horat. Epiſt. ii, lib. 1, ver. 47.

(189) See Lucian, in Dearum Judicio, pag. m. 161. Tom. I, Oper.

(190) Chriſtopher Deffrans, Eſq; lord of la Jalaziere, and of la Chaſtonniere, near Nyort in Poictou, book xi, of his Hiſtoires des Poëtes, fol. 225, verſo, printed at Niort, 1595. He only puts here into verſe what John le Maire de Belges had ſaid in proſe. Illuſtrat. de Gaule, lib. i, cap. xxxiii, pag. 108.

(191) Eurip. in Helena ver. 682, & in Andromach. ver. 283.

(192) In the nineteenth chapter of the fourth book, pag. m. 745, 746.

(193) See, above, citat. (18), of the article HENRY III.

(194) Lucian, in Deor. Dial. pag. 154, Tom. I, did not forget to introduce Juno ſaying, that Diana revenged herſelf on Actæon for no other reaſon, but becauſe ſhe was afraid he would divulge the imperfections he had diſcovered, when he ſaw her naked.

(195) That is, Juno.

Hercules in her right breaſt (o). It has been ſaid, that after the conſummation of her marriage, ſhe waſhed herſelf in a fountain ſituated betwixt Tigris and Euphrates, and that from that time the waters of that fountain had a moſt agreeable ſmell, which perfumed the Air round about it [DD]. Juno was handſome, and for that reaſon Jupiter's

That Juno's breaſts hung down too far,
Had near her arm-pits too much hair,
And, for a dame of quality,
Was not ſo clean about the knee.

An author, who flouriſhed in the beginning of the XVIth century, pretends, that Juno did not appear quite naked. She and Minerva, ſays he, (196) being ſurprized with ſhame, and not willing to do it, anſwered not a word, when it was ſignified to them, that they muſt be at the pains of putting off their noble robes, ſince the diſpute lay in a compariſon of the beauty of their divine bodies, and in a prudent diſtinction of the preference of their illuſtrious members. But Venus the boldeſt of them, ſaid, that things were gone ſo far, that there was no denying of it, and began to untie her girdle. ‘ Then Juno ſeeing this ſaid, ‘ certainly, Lady Venus, we have no mind to refuſe ‘ it, for fear of being baffled: but I think it is indecent for immortal and chaſte goddeſſes; for Pallas ‘ who is a maid, and for me, who am the wife of a ‘ king and emperor, to ſhew ourſelves naked to any ‘ mortal man, as little account as you make of it, as ‘ being uſed to keep company with men. But however ſince it muſt be done, we will not be the laſt ‘ . . . . (197) Queen Juno full of a matronal ‘ gravity, and modeſty, kept on none of all her ornaments; only ſhe took a fine ha[illegible]cheif, long, broad ‘ and thin, all hemmed with [illegible]nd ſilk fringes, with ‘ which one of her nymphs was decked. And ſhe put ‘ it upon her left ſhoulder hanging like a ſcarf, and ‘ tied in a knot upon her right ſide. And becauſe ‘ the ends fluttering in the air flew up whether ſhe ‘ would or no, by her motion, ſhe held one of her ‘ hands upon her breaſt, and the other lower.’ I believe this is a meer fiction of this author. Lucian inſinuates nothing like it. However it be, Juno expreſſed an extream reſentment for the deſperate affront that ſhe thought her judge had put upon her. This was a wound that bled for a long time, and diſquieted her mind all the reſt of her life.

Nec dum etiam cauſſæ irarum ÆVIQUE DOLORES
Exciderant animo: manet alta mente repoſtum
Judicium Paridis, ſpretæque injuria formæ (198).

Nor were as yet the cauſes of her rage,
And keen reſentments, by her reſtleſs ſoul
Forgotten: deep within her boſom lay
The judgment giv'n by Paris, and th' affront
Of her ſcorn'd beauty.

TRAPP.

I ſhall obſerve, by the by, that Macrobius is miſtaken in one of the differences he mentions betwixt Virgil and Homer. Theſe are his words: ‘ Nullum ‘ commemorationem de judicio Paradis Homerus admittit: idem vates Ganymedem non ut Junonis ‘ pelicem à Jove raptum, ſed Jovialium poculorum ‘ miniſtrum in cœlum à diis aſcitum refert, velut ‘ θεοπρεπῶς. Virgilius tantum deam, quod cuivis de ‘ honeſtis feminæ deforme eſt, velut ſpecie victam ‘ Paride judicante doluiſſe, & propter catamiti pelicatum totam gentem ejus vexaſſe commemorat (199).’ It is certain that Homer has mentioned Paris's judgment, and aſſigned it as the cauſe of Juno's implacable anger againſt the Trojans (200): it is not therefore true, as Macrobius pretends, that Virgil has departed from Homer upon this point. It would ſignify nothing here to ſay, that Euripides (201), and Coluthus (202) have mentioned the ſame judgment of Paris.

[DD] She waſhed herſelf in a fountain . . . . . and that from that time the waters of that fountain had a moſt agreeable ſmell.] Ælian has preſerved this ſtory. He ſays (203), that this fountain was tranſparent to the bottom, and that the inhabitants of the country, and the Syrians alſo, had among them the tradition juſt mentioned, and attributed to it the agreeable ſmell that was all round the place. Ἐς νῦν ὁ χῶρος εὐωδίαν αναπνεῖ, καὶ πᾶς ὁ ἀὴρ κύκλῳ ταύτῃ κίρναται. Unde locus etiamnum ſuavem odorem ſpiret qui in vicinum etiam aërem circumquaque diſtribuitur (204). This ſhews the character both of a ſuperſtitious and fabulous ſpirit. People are eaſily led to derive from a celeſtial origin all the ſingular properties that are found in certain places of the world; and as the heathens ſuffered themſelves to be abuſed with a chimerical, and fooliſh tradition of the amours and marriages of the gods, they believed that Juno, being willing to waſh her body the next day after her wedding, choſe a very clear fountain, and left there ſome marks of her preſence. Note, that according to Turnebus, they fancied that the divine beings made themſelves known by their ſmell (205).

Omnia finierat: tenues ſeceſſit in auras.
Manſit odor: poſſes ſcire fuiſſe Deam (206).

She ſpoke no more, and vaniſh'd in the wind;
The heav'nly fragrancy, ſhe left behind,
Betray'd the goddeſs.

This is what Ovid ſays, ſpeaking of Flora, and here follows what Virgil ſays, ſpeaking of Venus.

Dixit, & avertens roſea cervice refulſit,
Ambroſiæque comæ divinum vertice odorem
Spiravêre (207).

She ſaid, and, and as ſhe turn'd, her roſy neck
Shone bright; her hair a fragancy divine
Ambroſial breath'd.

TRAPP.

John le Maire de Belges follows this opinion; for he affirms (208), that all terreſtrial beings kept ſilence and expreſſed a reſpectful admiration, during the appearance of the divine bodies (209), which had already perfumed the circumambient air with their fragrant, divine, and ambroſian odour. The Heathens would have eaſily believed that the ſpittle, &c. of the gods, was roſe-water at leaſt. Balzac (210) obſerves, that the Poet Furius makes Jupiter ſpit ſnow (211); and that another Poet makes Nectar enough to proceed from him to form the rivers of the golden age. Balzac adds, ‘ that he whom Matthieu's hiſtory names the Chryſoſtom of France, ſaid, preaching before the late king ‘ Henry the Great: Sir, though your majeſty ſhed ‘ pearls inſtead of tears, and ſpit emeralds, though rubies and diamonds proceeded from you whenever you ‘ ſneeſe and blow your noſe, &c.’ It would not have been difficult to perſuade the Heathens, that the gods actually did all this. Thus children are made to believe that Urganda, for example, or ſome other fairy, getting her head combed, and asking what is it that falls from my head? heard with pleaſure this anſwer, gold and ſilver. Moſt of thoſe who believe this in their infancy, would believe it all their lives, if they were not undeceived when they are grown up, or if they ſaw that theſe things were the common opinion in matter of faith. There are many natural properties, which the traditions of the Chriſtian people attribute to miraculous cauſes, as the Heathens attributed to Juno the fragrancy of the fountain before mentioned. Behold, ſaid one to me one day, that little tract of land where the graſs is ſo pale: it was that way a martyr went, when he was led from the priſon to the place of execution. All the way he went bears the marks of it ever ſince. The wheat, the graſs, whatever is ſown there has a tincture of it, and never acquires the verdure which you ſee on the right and on the left. There

---

(o) See Homer, Iliad. lib. v, ver. 39°, & ſeq. who ſays, it was a very painful wound. Τότε κέν μιν ἀνήκεςον λάβεν ἄλγος. Tunc ipſam graviſſimus occupavit dolor.

(196) John le Maire de Belges, Illuſtrations de Gaule, & ſingularitez de Troie, livr. i, chap. xxxiii, pag. 108. Lyons, 1549, in fol.

(197) Id. ibid. pag. 109.

(108) Virgil. Æneid. lib. i, ver. 25. See alſo the 36th verſe of the ſame book, cum Juno AETERNUM ſervans ſub pectore VULNUS.

(199) Macrob. Saturn. lib. v, cap xvi, pag. m. 407.

(200) Homer. Iliad. lib. ult ver. 25, & ſeq.

(201) Eurip. in Troadibus, ver. 924, & in Helena, ver. 23.

(202) Coluthus de raptu Helenæ.

(203) Ælian. Hiſtor. Animal. lib. xii, cap. xxx.

(204) Id. ibid.

(205) Turneb. Adverſ lib xxx, cap xxxix. I am not very well ſatisfied with the proofs he alledges, viz. the paſſage of Virgil, and that of Ovid, which I have ſet down.

(206) Ovid. Faſtor. lib. v, ver. 375.

(207) Virgil. Æneid. lib. i, ver. 402.

(208) John le Maire de Belges, ubi ſupra, pag. 109.

(209) That is, of Juno, Minerva, and Venus, naked before Paris.

(210) Balzac, Entret V, cap. ii, pag. m. 88. See the remark [HH] of the article MAHOMET, what the followers of that falſe prophet ſay of his ſweat.

(211) Jupiter hibernas cana nive conſpuit Alpes.

Jupiter's adulteries may be ſaid to be the more inexcuſable [EE]. It would be meer wrangling to criticize Arnobius, who has judged of it in this manner. The ſuperſtition of the Romans was ſo great, that ſome women honoured Juno by pretending to comb her and dreſs her, and hold a looking-glaſs before her [FF]; but others were in little fear of her, for they went and ſeated themſelves in the Capitol by her huſband, fancying themſelves to be his miſtreſſes. See my laſt remark.

There is hardly a pariſh, where you will not hear ſuch ſtories. I wiſh ſome travellers would make a large collection of them. They are contented to collect what concerns great towns, but a collection of what concerns the country pariſhes would have it's value too. And hereupon I remember I heard a man of judgment ſay, that his taſte was not like that of an antient father, who wiſhed he had ſeen at Rome a triumph. I rather wiſh, ſaid he, I had been preſent for ſome months at the converſations of the Roman citizens, and that I knew how the women practiſed their devotions, and how they talked of Jupiter and Juno; what was their common diſcourſe on a wedding-day, on a day of child-birth, or of a general proceſſion, a day of Lectiſternium, &c. concerning the gods and goddeſſes, Subigus or Subiga, Fabulinus, Pertunda, and the reſt. Books do not teach us thoſe particulars, it is only by converſation that we come to the knowledge of them.

[EE] Juno's beauty made Jupiter's adulteries more inexcuſable.] It is thus Arnobius argued: 'Et quid 'Regi Saturnio matrimoniis fuerat cum alienis rei? 'Non illi fuerat ſatis Juno, nec ſedare impetum cupiditatum in regina poterat numinum, cum nobilitas eam 'commendaret tanta, facies, oris dignitas & ulnarum 'nivei marmoreique candores (212). —— And what 'had Jupiter to do with other mens wives? Was not 'Juno enough for him; and could he not ſatisfy his luſt 'with the queen of the gods, ſo famed for her graceful 'air, beauty, and white hand?' A cavilling Sophiſt might attack this argument of Arnobius, and ſay that at a certain period of time, the beauty of women loſes all it's charms with reſpect to their huſbands, the nature of things being ſuch, that they no longer affect us, after we are uſed to them, ab aſſuetis non fit paſſio. He would maintain, that this political axiom, that the beſt methods of preſerving diminion, are thoſe that have been made uſe of to obtain it (213), is falſe in the empire of beauty: for if beauty makes a conqueſt, it does not preſerve it; a huſband who fell in love only becauſe his miſtreſs was handſome, will not continue in love, becauſe his wife continues to be ſo: cuſtom hardens him againſt that ſort of charm, and he makes every day ſome ſteps towards inſenſibility: Some come ſooner to it, others later; but at laſt all arrive at it, and the affection which may be, and is frequently preſerved, is not grounded upon beauty, but upon other qualities. Experience ſhews that the huſbands, whoſe love is moſt laſting and ſtrong, are not for the generality thoſe who have handſome wives. Look elſewhere than in beauty for that charm, which unites the hearts, and keeps them afterwards united (214). A Sophiſt might heap up many other obſervations of the ſame nature; but after all, he ought to be looked upon as a caviller; for it is certain that Arnobius's remark is grounded upon a kind of common notion. All the neighbours are much more ſcandalized with the intrigues of a man, who has a handſome wife, than with thoſe of another, whoſe wife is ugly. A whole nation, though never ſo numerous, will be more indulgent to the galantries of a king, when the queen is deformed, and loathſome, than when he is married to a princeſs of a rare and excellent beauty. Some body has inſerted in the Scaligerana a ſtory which has ſome affinity with this. 'Porthaiſe, a famous preacher, preaching at Poictiers, 'and having heard of the debaucheries of a Phyſician, 'named Lumeau, who though he had a handſome 'wife, ſometimes went elſewhere, pointing at him one 'day, very pleaſantly in the pulpit, when having ſpoke 'againſt this vice in general, he came to particulars, 'he ſaid, nay, we have heard with great concern, 'that there are ſome men who are ſo profligate, as to 'commit adultery, though they have wives in their 'own houſes, who are ſuch, that for our part, we 'ſhould be well enough contented with them (215).'

[FF] Some women honoured Juno by pretending to comb her . . . . . and hold a looking-glaſs before her.] What a misfortune it is that we have not the book, in which Seneca condemned this baſe ſuperſtition, and many others like it. St Auguſtin has cited it. 'In Capitolium perveni, ſaid Seneca (216), pudebit publicatæ dementiæ, quòd ſibi vanus furor attribuit officii: alius 'nomina Deo ſubjicet, alius horas Jovi nunciat, alius 'lictor eſt, alius unctor, qui vano motu brachiorum 'imitatur ungentem. Sunt, quæ Junoni ac Minervæ 'capillos diſponant, longè à templo non tantum à ſimulachro ſtantes, digitos movent ornantium modo. 'Sunt quæ ſpeculum teneant . . . . Sedent quædam in 'Capitolio, quæ ſe à Jove amari putant, nec Junonis 'quidem, ſi credere poëtis velis, iracundiſſimæ reſpectu 'terrentur. —— I came to the Capitol: you will be aſhamed of the public madneſs, which they practiſe under the notion of honouring him: one gives the god a 'liſt of names; another tells Jupiter the hour of the 'day; another is lictor, another anointer, who counterfeits the action of one that anoints. Some are employed in diſpoſing the hairs of Juno and Minerva, ſtanding at a diſtance, not only from the temple, but alſo 'from the image, and move their fingers as if they 'were adorning the ſtatues. Some women hold a glaſs . . . 'Some ſit in the Capitol, thinking Jupiter is love with 'them, nor are terrified with the ſight of Juno, though 'full of reſentment, if you will believe the Poets.' We may confirm this by a paſſage taken from a book which is ſtill in being. 'Deum colit qui novit. Vetemus 'lintea & ſtrigiles Jovi ferre, & ſpeculum tenere Junoni (217). — He worſhips a god, who knows how to 'worſhip him. I allow no one to carry napkins and combs 'to Jupiter, or to hold a glaſs to Juno.'

(212) Arnobius, lib. iv, pag. m. 141.

(213) Imperium facile iis artibus retinetur quibus initio partum eſt. Salluſt. in Prœm. Belli Catil.

(214) Hæc res & jungit, & junctos ſervat amicos. Horat. Sat. III, Lib. i, ver. 54.

(215) Scaligerana, pag. m. 192.

(216) Seneca, contra Superſtitiones apud Auguſt. de Civitate Dei, lib. vi, cap. x, pag. m. 605.

(217) Seneca, Epiſt. xcv, pag. m. 396.

JUPITER,

JUPITER, the greateſt of all the Heathen gods, was the ſon of Saturn and Cybele. There was no crime, but what he was defiled with; for beſides that he dethroned his own father, that he caſtrated him, and bound him in chains in the deepeſt hell [A],

he

[A] He dethroned his own father, . . . and bound him in chains in the deepeſt hell.] Saturn was dealt with according to the Lex Talionis, ſince he had uſurped the empire of the world, which his father Cœlus poſſeſſed (1); but Jupiter was nevertheleſs guilty of a horrible uſurpation; it is not lawful to puniſh one crime by another; one cannot abſolve himſelf by imitating the wicked. It is remarkable that Cœlus was betrayed by his own wife; for it was the earth, heaven's wife, who excited her children to rebel (2), and who put a fickle into the hands of the youngeſt (3) which he made uſe of to caſtrate him. Saturn who had done that exploit, was treated ſo exactly in the ſame manner, that Jupiter uſed the ſame inſtrument to cut off his privy parts, as he had uſed for the caſtration of Cœlus (4). Note, that Saturn's party made a long reſiſtance: it was not vanquiſhed till after ten years war (5). Saturn being conquered, was loaded with chains, and thrown into Tartarus, the darkeſt and deepeſt dungeon of hell. It was as remote from the earth, as the earth is from heaven. Τόπος δὲ οὗτος ἐρεβώδης ἐστὶν ἐν ᾅδου, τοσοῦτον ἀπὸ γῆς ἔχων διάστημα, ὅσον ἀπ' οὐρανοῦ γῆ. Is locus eſt ad Inferos tenebroſiſſimus, qui tantùm à terra diſtat, quantùm à cælo terram abeſſe ferunt (6). The chains were not very heavy; for they were made of wool (7). He had every year ſome days of liberty allowed him, during the Saturnalia; a time in which ſlaves were permitted to do what they pleaſed (8). Some ſay, that Saturn eſcaped from priſon, and retired into Italy to king Janus. Others ſay, that his ſon was contented only to expel him. Virgil is of this laſt opinion:

> Primus ab ætherio venit Saturnus Olympo
> Arma Jovis fugiens, & regnis exul ademptis (9).

Firſt

(1) Apollodorus, lib. i, init.

(2) Id. ibid.

(3) It was Saturn.

(4) Natalis Comes, Mythol. lib. ii, pag. m. 86.

(5) Apollodor, ubi ſupra.

(6) Id. ibid.

(7) Agathonymus in Perſide, apud Natal. Comitem, pag. 85.

(8) Age libertate Decembri, Quando ita majores voluerunt utere. Horat. Sat. VII, lib. ii, ver. 4.

(9) Virgil. Æn. lib. viii, ver. 319.

he committed inceſt with his ſiſters, daughters, and aunts [B], and even attempted to raviſh his mother. He debauched a great number of maids and wives; and to compaſs his deſigns, he borrowed the ſhapes of all ſorts of beaſts. He was guilty of the unnatural ſin; for he ſtole away the beautiful Ganymede (a), and preferred him to the office of cup-bearer to the gods, that he might have him at hand, as often as his heart deſired. Treacheries and perjuries, and in general, all actions that are

Firſt exil'd from Olympus Saturn came,
Flying his kingdom, and the arms of Jove.

Trapp.

But Statius is not, ſince he ſpeaks of the liberty that was granted to Saturn once a year.

Saturnus mihi compede exoluta
Et multo gravidus mero December,
Et ridens jocus, & ſales protervi
Adſint (10).

Come Saturn, from thy fetters looſed,
December, reeling in thy cups,
With pleaſantry, and wanton wit.

To which you may add theſe words of Arnobius (11): ‘ Numquid parricidii cauſa vinctum eſſe Saturnum, & ablui diebus ſtatis, vinculorum ponderibus & levari. —. That Saturn was chained on account of parricide, and that he was waſhed, and freed from his chains, on certain days.’ I forgot to ſay, that after the compleat victory that Jupiter's party had obtained, Apollo ſung upon his lyre a poem which he had made in praiſe of the conquerors. Tibullus informs us of this circumſtance in an elegy, which he inſcribes to Apollo (12).

Sed nitidus pulcerque veni, nunc indue veſtem
  Sepoſitam, longas nunc bene pecte comas,
Qualem te memorant, Saturno rege fugato
  Victori laudes concinuiſſe Jovi.

But come, adorn'd in all thy beauty's pride;
Reſume thy ſhining garment laid aſide;
Deck the long ringlets of thy flowing hair,
And in full majeſty of dreſs appear;
As erſt, when, Saturn driv'n from heav'n above,
You ſung the praiſes of the victor Jove.

The beſt allegories that may be found under theſe fables, is to ſay, that the Antients meant by them that ambition ſtifles all natural affection, and the duties of friendſhip and alliances (13), and that Poets and Orators are always ready to declare for the party that is uppermoſt.

[B] He committed inceſt with his ſiſters, daughters, and aunts.] He lay with his ſiſter Juno, without ſtaying till ſhe was his wife, and afterwards married her. I ſpeak of it in another place (14). He debauched his other ſiſter Ceres, and had Proſerpina by her. He lay with three of his aunts, namely, Themis, Dione, and Mnemoſyne. From his inceſt with the firſt came the Horæ and the Parcæ: by the ſecond he begat Venus, by the third the nine Muſes (15). Seeing his mother one day aſleep, he attempted to lie with her by ſurprize; but as ſhe awaked, and put herſelf in a poſture of defence; he made uſe of force, and would probably have accompliſhed his abominable deſign, if the ardour of his paſſion had not evaporated in his ſtruggle to overpower his mother (16). Arnobius very juſtly exclaims upon it: ‘ O rerum imaginatio indecora! ô habitus fœdus Jovis ad obſcœni certaminis expeditionem parati! Ergone ille rex mundi, cum incautus & properus obreptionis eſſet rejectus à furto, in impetum ſe vertit: & quum rapere voluptatem inſidioſa fraude non quivit, vi matrem aggreſſus eſt, & apertiſſimè cœpit venerabilem ſubruere caſtitatem? Colluctatus ergo diutiſſimè cum invita eſt, victus, fractus, ſuperatuſque defecit: & quem pietas dijugare ab infando matris non valuit appetitu, effuſa libido dijunxit (17)? — O indecent image of things! O filthy poſture of Jupiter, prepared to enter the obſcence liſts! Did then this king of the world, when he could not compaſs his deſign by ſtealth, have recourſe to violence, and openly attempt his mother's chaſtity? He ſtruggled a long time with the unwilling goddeſs; but, vanquiſhed at laſt, was obliged to deſiſt; and, whom filial piety could not keep from impiouſly luſting after his mother, paſſion extinguiſhed prevented from accompliſhing his deſire.’ He obſerves that the Heathens made advantage of thoſe vain efforts of Jupiter; for they ſaid, that a ſtone grew with child by him, and brought forth a ſon ten months after. ‘ Et ſane hoc loco frugalitatis magnæ viri, & circa res etiam Flagitioſi operis parciores, ne ſancta illa ſeminia fruſtra videantur effuſa, ſilex, inquit, ebibit Jovialis incontinentiæ fœditatem. Quid deinde, quæſo, conſecutum eſt, dicite? In ſinu medio lapidis, atque in illa cotis duritie informatus atque animatus eſt infans, Jovis magni futura progenies, &c (18).’ Such a ſort of propagation hath been obſerved about the attempts Jupiter made to debauch his daughter Venus. This maid, who was otherwiſe ſo bountiful in her favours to other men, made a vigorous reſiſtance to Jupiter. I explain this in the margin by the words of a modern author, which are ſomewhat coarſe (19). Arnobius makes mention of another wicked attempt of Jupiter, wherein he ſucceeded. But it is according to the opinion of thoſe, who ſaid that Ceres was the mother of this god. ‘ Quondam Dieſpiter, inquiunt, cùm in Cererem ſuam matrem libidinibus improbis atque inconceſſis cupiditatibus, æſtuaret, nam genitrix hæc Jovis regionis ejus ab accolis traditur, neque tamen auderet id, quod procaci appetitione conceperat, apertiſſima vi petere, ingenioſas comminiſcitur captiones, quibus nihil tale metuentem caſtitate imminueret genitricem: fit ex Deo taurus, & ſub pecoris ſpecie ſubſeſſoris animum atque audaciam celans; in ſecuram & neſciam repentina immittitur vi furens, agit inceſtius res ſuas, & prodita per libidinem fraude, intellectus, & cognitus evolat (20). —— Jupiter, they ſay, once luſting after his mother Ceres (for the inhabitants of that country pretend ſhe was his mother) and not daring openly to gratify his deſires, ingeniouſly contrived to rob her of her chaſtity by ſurprize: he was transformed into a bull, and, concealing himſelf under that brutiſh form, attacked her, when ſhe was off her guard, committed the inceſt, and, being diſcovered by the luſtful action, fled away.’ Ceres was angry to little purpoſe; that action made her big with Proſerpina, who went through the ſame trial as her mother: Jupiter got the maindenhead of Proſerpina, his daughter. ‘ Quam (Proſerpinam) cùm verveceus Jupiter bene validam, floridam, & ſucci eſſe conſpiceret plenioris, oblitus paulo ante quid malorum & ſceleris eſſet aggreſſus, & temeritatis quantum, redit ad priores actus: & quia nefarium videbatur ſatis, patrem cum filia comminus uxoria conjugatione miſceri, in draconis terribilem formam migrat: ingentibus ſpiris pavefactam colligat virginem, & ſub obtentu fero, molliſſimis ludit atque adulatur amplexibus (21). —— Jupiter, ſeeing Proſerpina ſtrong, florid, and healthy, forgetting the crime he had a little before attempted, returned to his former practices: and becauſe it looked ill for a father openly to uſe his daughter as a wife, he took upon him the terrible form of a ſerpent: he wreathed his monſtrous folds about the affrighted virgin; and, under this ſavage appearance, embraced and toyed with her in the ſofteſt manner.’ Meziriac (22) quotes ſeveral authors, who ſay, that Jupiter, transformed into a ſerpent, got the maidenhead of his daughter Proſerpina, by whom he got the firſt Bacchus, ſirnamed Zagræus. I will conclude this remark with a paſſage of Arnobius. ‘ Quid tantum, quæſo, ſays he to the Heathens (23), de vobis Jupiter iſte, quicumque eſt, meruit, quod genus eſt nullum probri infame, adulterium nullum quod in ejus non caput, velut in aliquam congeratis vilem luteamque perſonam? —— What has this Jupiter, whoever he be, deſerved ſo greatly of you; he, who ſtuck at no crime, no adultery, like the vileſt of mortals?’ This is to nonplus Paganiſm.

(a) See the article GANYMEDE.

(10) Statius, Silva VI, lib. i.

(11) Lib. iv, pag. m. 143.

(12) It is the fifth of the ſecond book.

(13) Natalis Comes, who is very fond of allegories, ſpeaks thus, pag. 85. Nulla ſunt enim vel naturæ vel amicitiæ, vel beneficentiæ ſatis firma vincula ubi majeſtatis & imperandi furioſum deſiderium invaſerit: illa omnia ſiquidem facillime conculcantur & proſternuntur.

(14) In the remark [A] of the article JUNO.

(15) Heſiodus, in Theogon. Apollodor. lib. i, pag. 9.

(16) Arnob. lib. v, pag. 161.

(17) Arnob. ibid. pag. 162.

(18) Id. ibid.

(19) Nonnus, book xiv, ſays, that the other Centaurs were begotten by the ſeed of Jupiter which fell upon the earth when he wanted to lie with Venus, who reſiſted him. Meziriac on Ovid, pag. 173.

(20) Arnob. ib. pag. 170.

(21) Ib. pag. 171.

(22) Ib. pag. 419. He quotes Nonnus, lib. v, & vi. Arnobius, lib. v. Clemens Alexandrinus, in Protreptico. Tzetzes upon Lycophron. The Scholiaſt upon Pindar, in the ſeventh Iſthm. The author of the Great Etymologicon, at the word Ζαγρεύς. The Scholiaſt upon Ariſtophanes, in Ran. Diodorus Siculus, lib. iii. Arrianus, lib. ii, de Expedit. Alexandri. Hyginus, cap. clv, & clvii. Cicero, lib. iii, de Nat. Deor.

(23) Arnob. lib. v, pag. 171.

are puniſhable by the laws, were familiar to him (b). They had gone ſo far, as to ſay, that he devoured one of his wives [C]; and therefore nothing can be more monſtrous, than the religion of the Pagans, who looked upon ſuch a God, as the ſupreme governour of the world, and ſuited to that notion, the religious worſhip that was paid him. The fathers of the church have laid a great ſtreſs upon this argument, to prove the falſhood of the Pagan religion; and it may be ſaid, that this ſyſtem was very proper to corrupt morality [D]. I ſhall ſay nothing about the fables, that concern the birth or education

[C] Some went ſo far as to ſay that he devoured one of his wives.] Heſiod obſerves, that the firſt wife Jupiter married, was called Metis (24). Seeing her big with child, he devoured her, and became himſelf big with child by that means, and afterwards brought forth Minerva. ‘ Gravidam factam deglutivit, ut ſcripſit ‘ Joannes Diaconus his verbis: Καὶ ἔγκυον ταύτην ‘ ποιησάμενος, καταπίνει αὐτὴν, ἵνα μὴ ἄλλος ‘ τὶς τῶν θεῶν ἀποκυνθείη παρ᾽ αὐτῆς ἀναιδὴς ‘ καὶ ἀτάσθαλος: quam cùm gravidam feciſſet, de‘ glutivit, ne quis alius Deorum naſceretur ex ea impu‘ dens ac fatuus. Ex eo cibo mox ipſe Jupiter pro ‘ uxore gravidus factus Palladem armatam è capite pe‘ perit (25). ——— Having got her with child, he de‘ voured her, as Joannes Diaconus has written in theſe ‘ words: having got her with child, he devoured her ‘ leſt any other impudent and fooliſh god ſhould be ‘ born of her. By this food Jupiter himſelf becoming ‘ pregnant, brought forth from out of his head the arm‘ ed Pallas.’

Since the firſt edition of this Dictionary, I have more exactly examined this, and I have found, that Natalis Comes advances nothing, but what is grounded upon the words of Joannes Diaconus, whom he cites. This Diaconus is a Greek author, and a Chriſtian, who compoſed allegorics and ſcholia upon Heſiod's poem, intituled Θεογονία, the Generation of the Gods. He poſitively ſays, that Jupiter having ſwallowed his wife Metis, brought forth Minerva, καὶ ταύτην καταπιὼν ἀποτίκτει ἐκ τῆς ἑαυτοῦ κεφαλῆς τὴν τριτογένειαν Ἀθηνᾶν. He makes uſe, I ſay, of theſe words immediately after thoſe contained in the paſſage of Natalis Comes, which I have quoted; and thereby he manifeſtly declares, that he would have it thought that Minerva ſprung from Jupiter's head, becauſe Metis being with child, had been devoured by Jupiter her huſband. But Heſiod does not lead us to this thought, nor does he ſo much as inſinuate, that the tragical end of Metis contributed to the birth of Minerva. Here follows the ſubſtance of what he ſays (26). Metis, Jupiter's firſt wife, was ready to be delivered of Minerva, but Jupiter hindred her; he uſed a flattering diſcourſe, which deceived her, and ſwallowed her into his belly. Cœlus and the earth had given him this advice, and had cautioned him, that unleſs he did it, he would loſe his ſceptre, ſince the deſtinies declared, that Metis after ſhe had brought the wiſe Minerva into the world, ſhould lye-in of a brave boy, who ſhould rule over the gods and men. Jupiter avoided the fatal blow; he ſhut up Metis in his bowels, before ſhe became a mother; he ſhut her up, I ſay, that ſhe might foretel him good and evil (27). He afterwards married Themis, by whom he had many children: he had alſo many by his miſtreſſes. He had by Eurynome the daughter of Oceanus, the three Graces; afterwards he lay with Ceres, who brought forth Proſerpina. After this he fell in love with Mnemoſyne, and made her the mother of the nine muſes. He had by Latona a ſon and a daughter, namely Apollo and Diana, and at laſt he married Juno, who brought him three children, Hebe, Mars, and Lucina; and as for himſelf, he conceived Minerva in his head, and was delivered of her. Thus you ſee, that if Heſiod had intended his readers ſhould think, that he meant that this birth of Minerva was an effect of Metis's being ſhut up in Jupiter's belly, he had done all that was neceſſary to fruſtrate his deſign; for he puts between this effect, and this cauſe, ſuch an interval as leads our thoughts to quite another thing from his intention. Let us ſay then, that he had no ſuch intention, or elſe, that he excelled in the ſhameful art of giving a wrong account of a thing, and expreſſing it obſcurely. Note, that if the nineteen verſes which we find in one of Galen's works (28), were Heſiod's, we could not blame this Poet for being too obſcure. It plainly appears from them, that the ſame Pallas, who was born from Jupiter's head, was conceived in Metis's womb. But it ought to be obſerved, that ſhe was not conceived, till after Metis had been ſwallowed up by Jupiter. This is a variation, which deſerves to be taken notice of. I add, that it is not probable theſe are Heſiod's verſes; for if they were, there would be in his poem of the Generation of the Gods a chaſm which the critics do not complain of. Galen is ſomewhat to blame, for not putting it out of doubt whether the pronoun αὐτὸς ipſe, which precedes the nineteen verſes, refers to Heſiod or Chryſippus. I believe it relates to the latter, and that this great Philoſopher, after he had produced Heſiod's verſes concerning Metis, cited thoſe of another Poet, in which the conception of Minerva was deſcribed ſomewhat differently. If you aſk me, to what end Chryſippus alledged theſe verſes of Heſiod, and the others, I anſwer, that it was to ſhew, that his opinion concerning the ſeat of the rational ſoul, was not contrary to the tradition of the birth of Minerva. He placed the rational ſoul in the heart, and yet Minerva, that is Reaſon and Wiſdom, was born from Jupiter's brain. This was the objection Chryſippus examined; he took advantage of the circumſtance of Minerva's being conceived by Metis, after ſhe was ſwallowed by Jupiter, and he maintained, that this ſignified, that reaſon was formed in the breaſt, and that the delivery of Minerva ſignified ſpeech, that is to ſay, that reaſon proceeds from the head, in as much as the mouth is the organ, by which the thoughts conceived in the heart, are outwardly produced. Galen (29) thinks it very ſtrange, that Chryſippus ſhould trouble himſelf to give a ſerious explication of poetical traditions (30). He cannot be too much blamed for ſpending his time ſo ill.

[D] The ſyſtem of the Pagan religion was very proper to corrupt morality (31).] ‘ Chriſtian authors have ‘ drawn potent arguments from theſe infamous actions ‘ of Jupiter, to convict the Heathens of the falſity of ‘ their gods; as may be ſeen in many places of La‘ ctantius, Tertullian, Clemens Alexandrinus, Arno‘ bius, and ſeveral others. For beſides that ſuch horrid ‘ crimes are inconſiſtent with the deity, the Gentiles ‘ might thence take a juſt pretext for giving them‘ ſelves up to all ſorts of wickedneſs . . . . . not ‘ believing themſelves criminal, whilſt they imitated ‘ their gods. This is what Ion means in a tragedy of Euripides, that bears his name.

- - - Οὐκ ἔτ᾽ ἀνθρώπους κακῶς
Λέγειν δίκαιον, εἰ τὰ τῶν θεῶν κακὰ
Μιμούμεθ᾽, ἀλλὰ τοὺς διδάσκοντας τάδε (32).

Blame not the wretch, who imitates the gods,
But charge the crime on thoſe, who ſet th' example.

Meziriac makes this reflexion upon a paſſage of Ovid, where Phædra (33) obſerves, that inceſt was ſcrupled in the ruſtical time of Saturn, but that under the reign of his ſucceſſor, a woman might be permitted to lie with her ſon-in law. Jupiter, ſays ſhe, authoriſes all by his marriage with his ſiſter.

Nec quia privigno videar coïtura noverca
  Terruerint animos nomina vana tuos.
Iſta vetus pietas, ævo moritura futuro
  Ruſtica Saturno regna tenente, fuit.
Jupiter eſſe pium ſtatuit quodcunque juvaret,
  Et fas omne facit fratre marita ſoror

Let not the name of ſtep-mother affright;
What now ſeems wrong, when Saturn reign'd was right.
Jove teaches us, whate'er we like, to prove,
And bids a ſiſter meet a brother's love.

Ovid falls here into a very groſs miſtake (34), ſince it is certain that Saturn was married to his ſiſter, juſt

(b) See the proofs which Natalis Comes gives for it, Mythol. lib. i, cap. xviii, and Arnobius, quoted below, in the remark [B].

(24) Ζεὺς δὲ θεῶν βασιλεὺς πρώτην ἄλοχον θέτο Μῆτιν. Uxorem primam Metim ſibi Jupiter addit. Heſiod. in Theog. ver. 886.

(25) Natalis Comes, Mythol. lib. ii, pag. m. 90.

(26) Heſiod. in Theog. ver. 887, & ſeq.

(27) Ἀλλ᾽ ἄρα μιν Ζεὺς πρόσθεν ἑὴν ἐγκάτθετο νηδὺν, ὡς δή οἱ φράσσαιτο θεὰ ἀγαθόν τε κακόν τε. Sed illam ſane Jupiter ante in ſuum condidit ventrem, Ut nempe ei indicaret dea bonumque malumque. Id. ibid. ver. 899.

(28) Galenus, de Hippocr. & Platonis, Placitis, lib. iii, cap. viii, pag. 131. Edit. Pariſ. 1679.

(29) Id. ibid. pag. 133.

(30) See, above, citations (49) and (68) of the article CHRYSIPPUS, the Philoſopher.

(31) See Mr Arnauld, in the fifth Denonciation du Peché Philoſophique, pag. 32.

(32) Meziriac upon Ovid, pag. 419, 420.

(33) In Epiſt. ad Hippolytum.

(34) Meziriac, pag. 419, makes this obſervation.

education of Jupiter (c). Moreri has mentioned ſomething of it; and this is to be found in a great many books, which ſchool-boys have daily in their hands. I ſhall only ſpeak of the eagle that brought him Nectar [E]. This particular is not ſo commonly known. Mr Charpentier does not faithfully relate a thing, for which he quotes Homer [F].

What the Heathens have ſaid of Jupiter's original; ſeemed to me for a long time ſo unaccountable, that the more I thought on it, the more monſtrous it appeared to me, and ſuch, in a word. as I could not apprehend how the Philoſophers could maintain it; but I have at laſt diſcovered, that they might be led into that error, by a ſort of reaſoning [G], the weakneſs whereof it was no eaſy thing for them to find out. They did

as Jupiter was to his. One might add to the paſſage of Euripides, quoted by Meziriac, a hundred others of the ſame force. Nothing is more common in the antient poets, than to ſee people, in order to excuſe their crimes, maintain, that they have only imitated the gods, or that the gods have inſtigated them to do evil (35). But not to diſſemble the truth, it muſt be ſaid to the glory of the Heathens, that they did not live according to their principles. It is true, that the corruption of manners was very great among the Heathens; but many of them did not follow the example of their falſe gods, and preferred the ideas of virtue before ſo great an authority. What is ſtrange is, that the Chriſtians, whoſe ſyſtem is ſo pure, come but a little ſhort of the Heathens in their vices. It is a miſtake to believe, that the morals of a religion anſwer the doctrines of the articles of faith.

[E] I ſhall only ſpeak of the eagle that brought him Nectar.] A woman named Moero, author of a poem intituled Memory (36), ſays, that Jupiter, unknown to all the gods, was bred up in a cave in the iſle of Crete, by pigeons that brought him Ambroſia, and by an eagle that brought him Nectar. The Ambroſia came from the ocean, and the Nectar was drawn from a ſtone. Jupiter having dethroned Saturn, immortalized this eagle, and tranſlated it into the heavens.

Νέκταρ δ' ἐκ πέτρης μέγας αἰετὸς αἰὲν ἀφύσσων,
Γαμφηλῇ φορέεσκε [πετῶν] Διῒ μητιόεντι.
Τὸν καὶ νικήσας πατέρα Κρόνον εὐρύοπα Ζεύς,
Ἀθανατὸν ποίησε καὶ οὐρανῷ ἐγκατένασσεν.

Nectar verò ex ſaxo ingens aquila ſemper hauriens,
Advolans portabat conſulto prudentique Jovi.
Eam victo patre Saturno Juppiter altiſonus,
Immortalitate donatam, in cœlo habitare voluit (37).

[F] Mr Charpentier does not faithfully relate a thing for which he quotes Homer.] I ſpeak of Mr Charpentier of the French academy. He expected to harangue the king at the head of the academy, after the taking of Mons; but that prince would have no harangue at that time. That of Mr Charpentier was inſerted in the Mercure Galant for the month of May, 1691. We read in it, that the king is like Homer's Jupiter, againſt whom all the other gods are united, and who after having upbraided them with the vanity of their deſign, ſhews them by experience, that his force is not to be ſhaken; and whilſt they all pull againſt him, he lifts them up altogether with the globe of the earth. By his leave, Jupiter in Homer (38) does not put this in practice; he only boaſts of it, and threatens to do it.

The other gods were not perſuaded, that his boaſts were well grounded: they only believed, that in a ſingle combat he would be too hard for them. His menace appeared ridiculous to Mars, who remembred that it was not long ſince Neptune, Juno, and Minerva, having undertaken to ſeize Jupiter, and bind him, put him into a horrible fright, and had actually bound him, if Thetis had not had pity of him, and called to his relief Briareus with his hundred hands (39). If Mr Charpentier had known the ſatirical wit of our libel writers, he would probably have abſtained from compariſons. He would have thought on Lucian.

[G] They might be led into this error, by a ſort of reaſoning.] Let us ſee firſt of all, what Heſiod ſays of the genealogy of the gods (40). He begins with the Chaos; this is the firſt being he lays down; afterwards he brings in the earth and love: he adds, that Erebus and the Night were begotten by the Chaos and that Æther and the Day proceeded from the marriage of Erebus and Night; and that the Earth, without any marriage begot Heaven and the Sea, and afterwards being married to Heaven ſhe produced Oceanus, Rhea, Themis, Tethys, Saturn, &c. This extraordinary fruitful marriage gave but little comfort to the earth; for Heaven, her husband, ſhut up all her children as they were born. She encouraged them to revenge, and did it ſo effectually, that Saturn with a ſtroak of a ſcythe cut off his father's nameleſs parts, and caſt them into the ſea (41). They produced a froth, from which ſprung the goddeſs Venus. The children of Saturn and Rhea, were Veſta, Ceres, Juno, Pluto, Neptune, Jupiter (42). This is what I take from Heſiod's poem. Some other Genealogiſts (43) ſaid that Æther and the Day, children of Erebus and of the Night, were the father and mother of Heaven, and had for their brothers and ſiſters, Love, Fraud, Fear, Labour, Envy, Deſtiny, Old Age, Death, Darkneſs, Miſery, Dreams, &c. We have ſeen in another place (44) how Carneades made uſe of this genealogy to confute the Theology of the Stoics. I ſhall only ſay now, that according to this tree of conſanguity, there muſt have been neceſſarily ſome god, whoſe father was not a god; for if on one hand it had been granted to Carneades, that Heaven, Æther, the Day, Erebus, the Night, were gods, they would have denied on the other, that the Chaos, which was antecedent to all theſe divine beings, was a god, and conſequently they were forced to ſay, that the gods had been been made of a matter, which was not a god, and without an efficient cauſe which had the nature of a god. This is certainly a thought, which contradicts the moſt ſolid and the moſt evident notions of natural reaſon; nevertheleſs, ſome great Philoſophers have ſuppoſed the generation of the gods, and have aſſigned them a cauſe of their being, which was not a god. 'Anaximenes omnes rerum cauſas infinito aëri 'dedit, nec deos negavit aut tacuit: non tamen ab ipſis 'aërem factum, ſed IPSOS EX AERE ORTOS credidit '(45). —— Anaximenes aſcribed the cauſes of all things 'to the infinite air, nor did he deny, or ſay nothing of 'the gods; yet he did not believe that the air was made by 'them, but that THEY SPRUNG FROM THE AIR.' By theſe words of St Auguſtin, we better underſtand the doctrine of Anaximenes, than by theſe of Cicero: 'Anaximenes aëra deum ſtatuit, eumque gigni, eſſeque 'immenſum & infinitum, & ſemper in motu (46). —— 'Anaximenes ſuppoſed the air to be god, and that it 'was immenſe and infinite, and always in motion.' Cicero does not ſeem to have well related the opinion of this Philoſopher; for ſince Anaximenes made the air the principle of all things, and aſcribed to it immenſity and infinity, we muſt believe, that he ſuppoſed it eternal, and unproduced, and that if he called it god under this notion, he did not believe the generation of god in that reſpect. When therefore he ſaid, that the infinite air was the cauſe of all beings, and that the gods themſelves were produced from it he did not aſcribe to it the name and nature of god, in the ſame ſenſe, that he aſcribed it to the gods, which owed their origin and exiſtence to the air. Perhaps he meant this: he was willing, in order to avoid all diſputes about words, to give the name of god to the immenſe and infinite air, which he looked upon as the principle of all things; but he did not pretend, that Saturn, Rhea, Jupiter, Juno, Neptune, Minerva, and the other gods, which the Heathens adored, were that air, or had produced it: he ſuppoſed on the contrary, that that air was their principle, as well as that of other beings which compoſe the univerſe. He gave this principle a perpetual motion, from whence it may be

(c) I ſhall ſay ſomething of it in the article METHYDRIUM.

(35) See the article HELENA, remark [C].

(36) Athen. lib. xv, pag. 490.

(37) Id. ibid. pag. 491.

(38) See the eighth book of the Iliad, at the beginning.

(39) Taken from Lucian, in Deor. Dialogis, pag. 173, 174. Tom. I See Homer, Iliad. lib. i, ver. 398, & ſeq.

(40) Heſiod. de Deor. Generat. ver. 116.

(41) Id. ibid. ver. 180.

(42) Id. ibid. ver. 453.

(43) See Cicero, de Natura Deor. lib. iii, cap xvii.

(44) Citation (87) of the article CARNEADES.

(45) Auguſt. de Civit. Dei, lib. viii, cap. ii, pag. m. 711. See, above, citat. (15) of the article DIOGENES, of Apollonia.

(46) Cicero, de Natura Deorum, lib. i, cap. x.

did not believe, that any thing could be created, and acknowledged no ſubſtances wholly diſtinct from extenſion. Now when once theſe two hypotheſes are laid down, it is almoſt as eaſy to imagine, that a ſubtilized matter might become a god, as to believe the ſoul of man to be material, as moſt Philoſophers believed. See the remark [G]. There was in Arcadia a temple of God the Good. Pauſanias conjectures that it was conſecrated to Jupiter: his reaſon is becauſe that epithet ought to belong by way of pre-eminence be concluded, that he took it for an immanent cauſe, which produced in itſelf infinite effects, without end; and he reckoned amongſt thoſe effects, not only the ſtars and meteors, plants, ſtones, and metals, but alſo the gods and men. Such a doctrine was at the bottom a meer Spinoziſm; for, according to this opinion, God, or the eternal and neceſſary being of Anaximenes, was the only ſubſtance, of which heaven and earth, the animals, &c. were but modifications. Thales perhaps was of ſuch an opinion, who taught that water was the principle of all things (47). Perhaps he called it god on that account. This was the god he meant, when he ſaid, that god having not been produced, was the oldeſt of all beings (48). He added, that the world being the work of God, was the beautifulleſt of all beings (49). Spinoza would acknowledge this; he does not deny that God is the cauſe of all things, that is to ſay, the immanent cauſe, which modifies itſelf a thouſand different ways, from whence reſults what we call the world, and the whole univerſe in general. If Thales ſaid alſo that the world is animated, and full of ſpirits (50), this ſignified perhaps, that water, the principle of all things, the unproduced god, had ſo modified itſelf, that it had formed a ſoul diſperſed through all the bodies, and the particular ſpirits like the gods, which were adored by the Heathens. This would help us to comprehend, what we have ſeen elſewhere (51), and which is doubtleſs very ſurprizing, namely, that Thales and the other Natural Philoſophers, who lived before Anaxagoras, explained the generation of the world, without interpoſing the direction of a divine intelligence. Thales and Anaximenes could not admit it, if they ſuppoſed, the one that water, and the other, that air was the principle of all things, a principle eternal, and unproduced; for though to avoid contention about words, they called this univerſal and uncreated principle, god, they could not conſider it as an intelligent cauſe antecedently to the particular beings, which it formed ſince it produced them in itſelf, and from itſelf, as an immanent cauſe, and not as a cauſe external, and diſtinct from it's matter. But becauſe Anaxagoras was the firſt (52) who acknowledged a ſpirit diſtinct from the matter of the world, a pure ſpirit, and unmixed with body, he muſt have reaſoned otherwiſe than the Natural Philoſophers his predeceſſors: he might ſay, arguing conſiſtently, that the world had been formed by the direction of a ſpirit, that diſentangled and put the parts of matter into order. His hypotheſis admitted an intelligence antecedent to the formation of the world; the other hypotheſes ſuppoſed nothing before the world, except the chaos, or water, or air, &c. And ſo they were to give a beginning to intelligent beings, as well as to the coarſeſt creatures. All things proceeded from the firſt principle by way of generation or production. Jupiter the greateſt of the gods, Saturn his father, and Heaven his grandfather, Æther his great grand-father, and all the genealogy upwards, was a particular being, which owed it's origin, birth, and exiſtence, to eternal and uncreated matter, the principle of all things, the chaos according to Heſiod, water according to Thales, and air according to Anaximenes. But, you will ſay, did not Thales acknowledge, that the gods knew the very thoughts of men (53). I anſwer, that we can only conclude from it, that he aſcribed a vaſt extent of knowledge to ſome of the beings, which the water had produced, and which were called Jupiter, Juno, Venus, Neptune, &c. Note, that Homer, who ſo pompouſly deſcribes the power of the gods, ſays, that all proceeded from the ocean.

> Ὠκεανόν τε Θεῶν γένεσιν καὶ μητέρα Τηθύν.
>
> Oceanumque Deorum parentem & matrem Tethyn (54).

The great and prodigious abſurdity of thoſe hypotheſes conſiſts in ſaying, that the gods, endowed with great knowledge, were formed from a principle, which knows nothing; for neither the chaos, nor the air, nor the ſea, are thinking beings. How then could they be the total cauſe of thoſe divine natures, which, in the ſyſtem of the Poets, and of the moſt antient Natural Philoſophers, know ſo many things? but though thoſe hypotheſes be never ſo falſe and abſurd, I no longer wonder, as I did, how they could be admitted by Philoſophers. Moſt of them ſuppoſed that the ſoul of man was material (55). They believed therefore, that it was formed of the ſubtileſt parts of the blood, or of the ſeed. Now when once this ſtep is made, one may go a great way in a little time. Set experience aſide; conſult only the ideas of the Theory, and it will not appear more eaſy for matter received in the womb to be converted into a child, who by eating and drinking grows into a man of great underſtanding, than for a child to be born of a tree. From thence a Heathen thinks it poſſible, that at the beginning men were born either from the mud of the earth, or from ſome liquor dropped from heaven (56). When this ſeems to be poſſible, it is eaſy to go on, and to believe what the Poets did of the birth of Venus (57). It is no longer thought ſtrange, that by the fermentation which cleared the chaos, or formed the different degrees of rarefaction and condenſation in the infinite extenſion, the ſtars ſhould begin to exiſt in the firmament, and the gods in heaven, as plants and animals on the globe of the earth. The common opinion of the Heathens about the divine nature made but a difference of more or leſs between the gods and men. Now in conſequence of this, nothing hindred them from imagining, that the fineſt and ſubtileſt parts of matter had conſtituted the gods, ſince thoſe which remained maſſive and groſs, and which as the lees and ſediments of all, had compoſed the earth, were nevertheleſs converted into men. Note, that they thought, that ſome ſpirituous particles falling from heaven, were ſufficient to animate theſe groſs and terreſtrial parts: hence it is that Lucretius acknowledged that living bodies have a celeſtial original.

> Denique cœleſti ſumus omnes ſemine oriundi
> Omnibus ille idem Pater eſt, unde alma liquenteis
> Humorum guttas Mater cum Terra recepit,
> Fœta parit nitidas fruges, arbuſtaque læta.
> Et genus humanum, & parit omnia ſæcla ferarum
> Pabula cùm præbet, quibus omnes corpora paſcunt,
> Et dulcem ducunt vitam, prolemque propagant.
> Quapropter merito Maternum nomen adepta'ſt (58).

> Laſtly, we all ſpring from celeſtial ſeed:
> The univerſal father he, from whom
> When mother earth receives the watry drops,
> She teems with ſhining fruits, and flow'ring herbs,
> Gives birth to men and beaſts, and food prepares,
> By which they live, and propagate their race.
> Hence does ſhe juſtly claim a parent's name.

We may infer from all this that there is nothing more dangerous or contagious, than to lay down a falſe principle. It is a bad leaven, which though it be but ſmall, may ſpoil the whole lump. One abſurdity once laid down, draws after it many others. If you only err concerning the nature of the human ſoul; if you falſly think that it is not a ſubſtance diſtinct from matter; that falſity will lead you to believe that there are gods, who at firſt were born from fermentation, and afterwards multiplied by marriage. I cannot conclude, without obſerving a thing at which I am amazed. Nothing appears to me grounded upon clearer and more diſtinct ideas than the immateriality of every thinking being, and yet ſome Chriſtian Philoſophers maintain, that matter is capable of thinking (59); and they are Philoſophers of great parts, and of pre-eminence to the greateſt of the gods [H]. It is certain that Jupiter's goodneſs was denoted by ſeveral names, under which he was adored. But he was likewiſe adored, under ſeveral names, which ſhewed how terrible he was. Nay, his quality of thunderer was denoted by the bare idea of his deſcent upon earth [I]. There were ſome places, where they ſaid he required human ſacrifices [K]. I ſhall ſay in another place (d), that the book intituled Cymbalum Mundi contains ſeveral jeſts upon Jupiter's actions; but I queſtion whether it is poſſible to go farther than Arnobius on ſuch a ſubject. The vivacity of his imagination flows like a torrent, and as he had lately been a profeſſed Rhetorician, there are no colours nor figures but what he animates his ſtile with. I relate in ſeveral places of this Dictionary ſome of his thoughts, and I have mentioned in one of them (e) his jeſt upon the great Jupiter for ſpending nine nights in getting a boy, who wanted only one night to get fifty maids with child. There is ſome probability that his memory failed him, and that he confounded things. He had read that Jupiter ſpent

---

(47) Diog. Laërt. lib. i, n. 27.

(48) Πρεσβύτατον τῶν ὄντων θεός ἀγέννητον γάρ· κάλλιστον κόσμος· ποίημα γὰρ θεοῦ. Antiquiſſimum eorum omnium quæ ſunt, Deus; ingenitus enim. Pulcherrimum mundus; à Deo enim factus eſt. Id ibid. n. 35.

(49) See the foregoing quotation.

(50) Τὸν κόσμον ἔμψυχον καὶ δαιμόνων πλήρη. Animatum mundum ac dæmonibus plenum Diog. Laërt. lib. i, n. 27. See alſo Ariſtotle, de Anima, lib. i, cap. v.

(51) In the remark [D] of the article ANAXAGORAS.

(52) See the ſame remark.

(53) Ἠρώτησέ τις αὐτὸν εἰ λήθοι θεοὺς ἄνθρωπος ἀδικῶν. Ἀλλ' οὐδὲ διανοούμενος ἔφη. Interrogatus lateret ne Deos homo male agens: ne cogitans quidem, inquit. Laërt. lib. i, n. 36.

(54) Homer. Iliad. lib. xiv, ver. 201.

(55) See Plutarch. de Placit. Philoſophor. lib. iv, cap iii, pag 898, and Ariſtotle in the firſt book de Anima.

(56) See, above, remark [B] of the article ARCHELAUS, the Philoſopher.

(57) See, above, remark [C] of the article DIOGENES, of Apollonia.

(58) Lucret. lib. ii, ver. 990. To which may be added theſe words of Virgil, Georg. lib. ii, ver. 325. Tum pater omnipotens fœcundis imbribus æther Conjugis in gremium lætæ deſcendit, & omnes Magnus alit, magno com mixtus corpore, fœtus.

(59) See, above, remark [L] of the article DICÆARCHUS, diſciple of Ariſtotle.

(d) In the article PERIERS.

(e) In the article HERCULES, citat. (13).

of a moſt profound meditation. Can we depend after this on the clearneſs of ideas? but do not theſe Philoſophers ſee, that upon ſuch a foundation the antient Heathens might err ſo far as to ſay, that all intelligent ſubſtances, had a beginning, and that eternally there was nothing beſides matter: this was the opinion of the Philoſopher Anaximenes, as we have ſeen above. It was alſo the doctrine of Anaximander, his maſter (60). This inconvenience cannot be prevented by this corrective; namely, that matter becomes thinking, only by a particular gift of God. It would be true, notwithſtanding that in it's nature it is ſuſceptible of thought; and that to make it actually thinking, it ſuffices to put it in motion, or to order it's parts in a certain manner: from whence it follows, that an eternal, unintelligent, but moveable matter, might have produced both gods and men, as the Poets and ſome Heathen Philoſophers have fooliſhly given out.

[H] Pauſanias conjectures . . . that the epithet, the good, ought to belong . . . to the greateſt of the gods.] This thought of Pauſanias ſeems to me to be very good, and I think it will not be amiſs to ſet down this paſſage. Ἔστι δὲ τῆς ὁδοῦ ἐν ἀριστερᾷ, Ἀγαθοῦ Θεοῦ ναός. εἰ δὲ ἀγαθῶν οἱ θεοὶ δωτῆρες εἰσίν ἀνθρώποις, Ζεὺς δὲ ὕπατος θεῶν ἐστιν, ἑπομένως ἄν τις τῷ λόγῳ τὴν ἐπίκλησιν ταύτην Διὸς τεκμαίροιτο εἶναι. Ad ejus viæ lævam Boni Dei ædes eſt. Quod ſi dii hominibus bonorum autores ſunt, deorum vero ſupremus eſt Jupiter, recte quidem hoc Jovis maxime proprium cognomen eſſe conjicere poſſis (61). ——— To the left of that way is the temple of the good god. But if the gods are the authors of good to men, and Jupiter is the ſupreme god, we may well ſuppoſe this to be the peculiar appellation of Jove. See, in the article PERICLES (62), ſeveral collections concerning the notions which the Heathens had of the goodneſs of Jupiter, and of the other gods.

[I] Jupiter's goodneſs was denoted . . . . . but he was likewiſe adored . . . . . . nay, his quality of thunderer was denoted by the bare idea of his deſcent upon earth.] Theſe two ſorts of epithets have been obſerved by Lucian. Ὦ Ζεῦ φίλιε, καὶ ξένιε, καὶ ἑταιρεῖε, καὶ ἐφέστιε, καὶ ἀστεροπητά, καὶ ὅρκιε, καὶ νεφεληγερέτα, καὶ ἐρίγδουπε· καὶ εἴ τι σε ἄλλο οἱ ἐμβρόντητοι ποιηταὶ καλοῦσι. O Jupiter Philie, hoſpitalis, ſodalitie, domeſtice, fulgurator, juramenti præſes, nubicoge, grandiſtrepe, & ſiquid aliud tibi cognomen attoniti poëtæ tribuunt (63). You ſee that Jupiter appears there firſt as the protector of friendſhip, as an hoſpitable, familiar, and domeſtic deity; and afterwards as the god of thunder and lightning. &c. You will find in Pauſanias in what places he was adored under the name of mild, μειλίχιος (64), the diſtributer of good things, ἐπιδώτης (65) &c. and under the name of thunderer, κεραύνιος (66). His title of καταιβάτης, is not leſs common both in books and upon medals, It ſignifies only deſcendens, coming down upon earth, if we conſider the Grammar of it; but uſe has determined it to the action of thundering. You need only read the diſſertation which Mr Burman (67) has publiſhed at Utrecht, in the year 1700, to be convinced, that this is the notion, under which Jupiter καταιβάτης was honoured. Not that it was believed, that he never deſcended upon earth, but to puniſh and to thunder; but they thought fit at laſt to ſettle the ſignification of it; either becauſe of the maxim, à majori, or à nobiliori parte ſumitur denominatio, or for other reaſons. The French have ſaid in one of their Opera's:

Jupiter vient ſur la terre
Pour la combler de bienfaits:
Il eſt armé du tonnerre;
Mais c'eſt pour donner la paix.

That is,

Jove comes on earth,
To heap bleſſings on it:
He is armed with thunder,
But 'tis to give peace.

I know not whether they have found that notion in the monuments of antiquity that are extant.

[K] It was ſaid that he required human ſacrifices.] There was ſcarce any temple of Jupiter, more celebrated than that which was built on mount Lycæus, in Arcadia. The tradition of the country imported (68), that he was educated upon that mountain by three nymphs, one whereof gave her name to a fountain, which had a wonderful property; for when any long drought waſted the fruits of the earth, they never failed of a plentiful rain, provided the prieſt of Jupiter Lycæus threw an oaken branch upon the ſurface of that fountain, after the requiſite prayers and ſacrifices (69). There was upon the ſame mountain, a court conſecrated to this god, and famous for wonderful qualities; for the men and the beaſts, that went into it, caſt no ſhade. Every body was forbidden to ſet his foot into it; and if any had the boldneſs to go in notwithſtanding the prohibition, he neceſſarily died before the year expired. Arcas having purſued as far as that place the bear, into which his mother was metamorphoſed, had been put to death with her, if Jupiter had not placed them among the ſtars. 'In ſilvis cum venaretur (Arcas) inſcius vidit matrem in urſæ ſpeciem converſam, quam interficere cogitans, perſecutus eſt in Jovis Lycæi templum: quo & qui acceſſiſſet, mors pœna erat Arcadum lege. Itaque cum utrumque neceſſe eſſet interfici, Jupiter eorum miſertus, ereptos inter ſidera collocavit (70). ——— 'Arcas, hunting in the woods, ſaw his mother, whom he knew not, transformed into a bear, whom, thinking to kill, he followed into the temple of Jupiter Lycæus, which, by a law of the Arcadians, it was death for any one to approach. It being therefore neceſſary they ſhould both be ſlain, Jupiter taking pity of them, ſnatched them away, and placed them among the ſtars.' St Auguſtin informs us of what concerns the ſacrificing of infants. 'Nominatim expreſſit (Varro) quendam Demænetum, quum guſtaſſet de ſacrificio, quod Arcades immolato puero deo ſuo Lycæo facere ſolerent, in lupum fuiſſe mutatum, & anno decimo in figuram propriam reſtitutum, ad pugillatum ſeſe exercuiſſe, & Olympiaco viciſſe certamine (71). 'Varro has mentioned by name one Demænetus, who, having taſted of the ſacrifice, which the Arcadians, ſlaying a boy, were wont to offer to their god Lycæus, was turned into a wolf, and after ten years reſtored to his own form, and exerciſed himſelf at boxing, and came off victor in the Olympic game.' This ſacrifice had a ſtrange effect, it metamorphoſed thoſe who taſted it into wolves. Porphyrius (72), obſerves, that the cuſtom of ſacrificing men in Arcadia at the feaſt of the Lupercalia, remained in his time. Note, by the way, that Saturn was not the only deity that delighted in human victims (73). Jupiter his ſon would not degenerate in that reſpect.

[L] Jupiter

---

(60) Anaximander infinitatem naturæ dixit eſſe è qua omnia gignerentur Cicer. Academ. Quaſt. lib. ii, fol. 211. B. Anaximandri opinio eſt nativos eſſe Deos, longis intervallis Orientes, Occidenteſque. Id. de Nat. Deorum, lib. i, cap. x.

(61) Pauſan. lib. viii, cap. 36, pag. 673.

(62) In the remark [K].

(63) Lucian. in Timone, init. Tom. I, pag. 57.

(64) Pauſan. lib. i, cap. xxxvii, pag. 90; lib. ii, cap ix, pag. 132; & cap. xx, pag. 154.

(65) Id. lib. viii, cap. ix, pag. 616.

(66) Id. lib. v, cap. xiv, pag. 412.

(67) Intituled, Ζεύς καταιβάτης, five Jupiter fulgurator. Plutarch, in Demetrio, ſays the Athenians gave Demetrius the epithet καταιβάτης.

(68) Pauſan. lib. viii, cap xxxviii, pag 678.

(69) Id. ibid.

(70) Hygin. in Aſtronomico, cap. 4, pag. m. 362. See alſo cap. i, pag. 357.

(71) Auguſt. de Civit. Dei, lib. xviii, cap xvii, pag. m 589.

(72) Porphyr. lib. i, de non edendis Animal.

(73) See the Penſées diverſes ſur les Cometes, n. 69.

ſpent nine nights in the production of the Muſes [L], and he applied this to a quite different ſubject, I mean, to the adventures of Alcmena. Authors, who have a quick and lively fancy, are ſubject to the like miſtakes. Jupiter made love both in heaven and upon earth, he took all that came, whether goddeſſes or women; it was all one to him. Arnobius did not forget this, and obſerved that the bodies of mortal women, though tranſparent with reſpect to Jupiter, had yet ſufficient charms to inſpire him with a leud paſſion [M]. It is not improper to obſerve, that the ridiculous ſtories which the poets had vented concerning that God, ſerved as a foundation for the Pagan religion, and that ſome grave men endeavoured to explain them either by allegories or by the principles of Natural Philoſophy; but their labour was as ridiculous as that of the poets [N], and [L] Jupiter ſpent nine nights in the production of the Muſes.] Mnemoſyne, Saturn's ſiſter, having lain nine nights together with Jupiter her nephew, lay-in of the nine Muſes upon mount Pierius (74).

Τὰς ἐν Πιερίῃ Κρονίδῃ τέκε πατρὶ μιγεῖσα Μνημοσύνη - - - - - - -
- - - - - - - - - - - -

Ἐννέα γάρ οἱ νύκτας ἐμίσγετο μητίετα Ζεύς,
Νόσφιν ἀπ' ἀθανάτων, ἱερὸν λέχος εἰσαναβαίνων·
Ἀλλ' ὅτε δή ῥ' ἐνιαυτὸς ἔην, περὶ δ' ἔτραπον ὧραι
Μηνῶν φθινόντων, περὶ δ' ἤματα πόλλ' ἐτελέσθη,
Ἡ δ' ἔτεκ' ἐννέα κούρας ὁμόφρονας, ᾗσιν ἀοιδὴ Μέμβλεται.

Quas in Pieria Saturnio peperit patri mixta Mnemoſyne - - - - - - -
- - - - - - - - - - - -

Novem enim ei noctes mixtus eſt prudens Jupiter,
Seorſim ab immortalibus, ſacrum lectum conſcendens.
Sed cum jam annus exactus, circumvoluta vero eſſent tempora
Menſium decreſcentium, dieſque multi tranſacti eſſent,
Ipſa peperit novem filias concordes, quibus carmen
Curæ eſt (75).

Begot by Jove on fair Mnemoſyne.
- - - - - - -
Nine nights apart from the celeſtial choir,
He climb'd the ſacred bed, and preſs'd the dame,
Who, when the year had fill'd it's circling courſe,
Bore the nine ſiſters, who preſide o'er verſe.

A ſcholiaſt upon Heſiod pretends that Mnemoſyne was Jupiter's daughter; but it is not thus that the words of that Poet ought to be underſtood. We muſt not find in them that the Muſes owed their birth to an inceſt ſo odious. The ſame ſcholiaſt propoſes a doubt to himſelf: How, ſays he, could Hercules get fifty one ſons in a night, whilſt Jupiter ſtood in need of nine days to beget the nine Muſes? he anſwers, that Jupiter not being ignorant, that the love of the Muſes arrives ſlowly to it's perfection, reſolved to make uſe of a perfect number. If this Scholiaſt deſerves no commendation for the ſolidity of his thoughts, he at leaſt deſerves to be praiſed for his brevity upon a ſubject, that might have afforded an allegoriſt infinite obſervations and moral precepts.

[M] Arnobius . . . . . . obſerved that the bodies of mortal women, though tranſparent with reſpect to Jupiter, had ſufficient charms to inſpire him with a leud paſſion.] Perhaps, ſays he, his adulteries might be tolerated, if he had minded only the goddeſſes; but what could he find worthy of him in human bodies? ought he not to have an averſion for thoſe objects, which are under the skin, and which are not hid from his piercing eyes? ought not the ſight to produce in him the ſame diſguſt, which the bare imagination can produce in all others (76)? 'Et tolerari forſitan male-'tractatio hæc poſſet, ſi eum ſaltem perſonis conjungere-'tis comparibus, & adulter à vobis immortalium con-'ſtitueretur dearum. In humanis verò corporibus quid-'nam quæſo inerat pulchritudinis, quid decoris, quod 'irritare, quod flectere oculos poſſet in ſe Jovis? Cu-'tes, viſcera, pituita, atque omnis illa proluvies inte-'ſtinorum ſub involucris conſtituta: quam non modo 'Linceus ille penetrabili acie poſſit horreſcere, verume-'tiam quivis alter ſola vel cogitatione vitare (77). O 'egregia merces culpæ! ô digna & pretioſa dulcedo, 'propter quam Jupiter maximus cygnus fieret, & tau-'rus, & candidorum procreator ovium! ——— O 'egregious reward of guilt! O worthy and pretious 'pleaſure, for the ſake of which the ſupreme Jupiter be-'comes a ſwan, a bull, and a progenitor of fleecy ſheep!' This objection of Arnobius is a good one, and a hundred times more forcible than if a great king was cenſured for debauching not only princeſſes but alſo the meaneſt women. I ſhall ſet down what Juno told Thetis, ſhewing her the reaſon of her affection for her.

Οὕνεκεν οὐκ ἔτλης εὐνῇ Διὸς ἱεμένοιο
Λέξασθαι (κείνῳ γὰρ ἀεὶ τάδε ἔργα μέμηλεν Ἠὲ σὺν ἀθανάταις ἠὲ θνητῇσιν ἰαύειν.)

Propterea quod noluiſti Jovis quamquam optantis cubile
Uſurpare (quoniam hoc illi ſtudetur opus, Ut vel æternas inſomnis vel amplectatur humanas) (78).

Becauſe you ſhunn'd th' embrace of amorous Jove,
He, who promiſcuouſly divides his love
With mortal nymphs below, and goddeſſes above.

[N] Some grave men endeavoured to explain the ſtories of the Poets . . . . either allegorically, or phyſically; but their labour was as ridiculous as that of the Poets.] We have ſeen in another place (79) how Cicero ridiculed the Philoſopher Chryſippus, who had taken great pains to reconcile the fables of the antient Poets with the Stoical Theology. Here is a paſſage that will give us a ſpecimen of that attempt: 'Hic locus à 'Zenone tractatus, poſt à Cleanthe, & Chryſippo plu-'ribus verbis explicatus eſt. Nam vetus hæc opinio 'Græciam opplevit, exſectum Cœlum à filio Saturno; 'vinctum autem Saturnum ipſum à filio Jove. Phy-'ſica ratio non inelegans incluſa eſt in impias fabulas. 'Cœleſtem enim altiſſimam, æthereamque naturam; id 'eſt, igneam, quæ per ſeſe omnia gigneret, vacare vo-'luerunt eâ parte corporis, quæ conjunctione alterius 'egeret ad procreandum. Saturnum autem eum eſſe 'voluerunt, qui curſum, & converſionem ſpatiorum, 'ac temporum contineret . . . . Saturnus autem eſt ap-'pellatus, quod ſaturetur annis: ex ſe enim natos co-'meſſe fingitur ſolitus, quia conſumit ætas temporum 'ſpatia, anniſque præteritis inſaturabiliter expletur. 'Vinctus eſt autem à Jove, ne immoderatos curſus ha-'beret, atque ut eum ſiderum vinculis alligaret (80). '—— This topic was handled by Zeno, afterwards by 'Cleanthes, and explained at large by Chryſippus. 'For the old tradition obtained all over Greece, that 'Cælus was caſtrated by Saturn, and that Saturn him-'ſelf was bound in chains by his ſon Jupiter. There 'is an elegant phyſical meaning in theſe prophane fa-'bles: for they intended by them, that the celeſtial, 'ſupreme, and ætherial, that is fiery, nature was void 'of that bodily part, which ſtands in need of the con-'junction of another, in order to procreation: but by 'Saturn they meant that being, which contains the 'courſe and revolution of time . . . . And he is called 'Saturn, becauſe he is filled (ſaturatur) with years; 'he is ſaid likewiſe to devour his children, becauſe time 'conſumes it's ſeveral periods, and is filled, without 'being ſatiated, with paſt years. But he is bound by

'Jupiter

---

(74) Heſiod. in Θεογον, ver. 135.

(75) Id. ibid. ver. 53.

(76) Arnob. lib. iv, pag. m. 142.

(77) Compare with this the following words of Ovid. Tunc animo ſigna quodcunque in corpore mendæ eſt, &c. in Remedio Amoris, ver. 417.

(78) Apollonius, Argon. lib. iv, ver. 793, pag. m. 453, 454.

(79) Citat. (49), of the article CHRYSIPPUS, the Philoſopher.

(80) Cicero, de Natura Deorum, lib. ii, cap. xxiv, xxv.

and terminated very often in ſerious impieties. See the remark [N], where I ſhall ſpeak ‘ Jupiter, that he may not run to immoderate lengths, and that he may reſtrain him by the limits of the ſtars.’ This is ſufficient to ſhew the folly of thoſe explications. We cannot read them without pitying the Philoſophers who have ſo ill employed their time; and if we deplore on one hand the miſchievous conſequences of the fictions of the Poets, and the unruly licentiouſneſs with which they have ſported upon a ſubject, that deſerved to be reverently treated; we cannot but be diverted, on the other, with their agreeable inventions, whilſt we conſider them as witty conceits. But when we ſee ſome Philoſophers very gravely undertake to find myſteries in theſe follies, we can no longer bear their extravagance: and theſe words may well be applied to them.

Turpe eſt difficiles habere nugas,
Et ſtultus eſt labor ineptiarum (81).

'Tis labour miſapply'd, and ill-judg'd toil,
When trifles only waſte our time and oil.

The greateſt miſchief is, that whilſt they endeavoured to avoid one impiety, they fell into another; for by rejecting the gods of the Poets, animated and living gods, they brought in others deſtitute of life and knowledge. Cicero upbraids them with it. ‘ Hic idem (Zeno) alio loco æthera Deum dicit eſſe, ſi intelligi poteſt nihil ſentiens Deus, qui nunquam nobis occurrit neque in precibus, neque in optatis, neque in votis. Aliis autem libris rationem quandam per omnem naturam rerum pertinentem ut divinam, eſſe affectam putat. Idem aſtris hoc idem tribuit, tum annis, menſibus, annorumque mutationibus. Cùm verò Heſiodi Theogoniam interpretatur, tollit omnino uſitatas perceptaſque cognitiones Deorum, neque enim Jovem, neque Junonem, neque Veſtam, neque quemquam qui ita appelletur, in Deorum habet numero: ſed rebus inanimatis, atque mutis per quandam ſignificationem hæc docet tributa nomina (82). —— This ſame Philoſopher (Zeno), in another place, ſays the æther is God; if we can ſuppoſe an inſenſible God, who never occurs to us in our prayers, our wiſhes, or our vows. But, in other books, he ſuppoſes a certain divine reaſon diffuſed through the whole nature of things. The ſame Philoſopher aſcribes the ſame thing to the ſtars, to years, months, and the changes of years. But when he would explain Heſiod's Theogony, he quite takes away the uſual and received notions of the gods; for he neither allows Jupiter, nor Juno, nor Veſta, nor any ſo called, to be gods; but teaches, that theſe names are aſcribed, in a certain ſignification, to things inanimate and mute.’ By theſe falſe interpretations they uſed men to take the arched skies for Jupiter. ‘ Hunc Ennius nuncupat ita dicens,

- - - - - - Aſpice hoc
Sublime candens, quem invocant omnes Jovem.

‘ Planiuſque alio loco idem,

Qui, quod in me eſt, exſecrabor hoc, quod lucet, quidquid eſt.

‘ Hunc etiam Augures noſtri, cùm dicunt, Jove fulgente, tonante: dicunt enim cælo fulgente, tonante. Euripides autem, ut multa præclarè; ſic hoc breviter:

Vides ſublime fuſum, immoderatum æthera,
Qui tenero terram circumjectu amplectitur:
Hunc ſummum habeto Divûm: hunc perhibeto Jovem (83).

‘ This Ennius mentions in theſe words;

- - - - - - - - Look up, and ſee
The azure vault, which we invoke as Jove.

‘ And the ſame Poet more plainly in another place;

I will curſe this that ſhines, be't what it will.

‘ This our augurs mean, when they ſay, Jove lightening, thundering: for they ſay, the heaven lightening, thundering. But Euripides, as he expreſſes many things excellently well, ſo in brief this:

See'ſt thou yon wide, extended, vault of heav'n,
Which clips around this earth: 'tis the great god,
Supreme of deities, 'tis Jove himſelf.

As for Juno they reduced her to the air, as Cicero informs us. ‘ Aër autem, ut Stoici diſputant, interjectus inter mare, & cœlum, Junonis nomine conſecratur, quæ eſt ſoror & conjux Jovis, quod & ſimilitudo eſt Ætheris, & cum eo ſumma conjunctio. Effeminarunt autem eum, Junonique tribuerunt, quòd nihil eſt eo mollius (84). —— But the air, as the Stoics pretend, diffuſed between the ſea and the heaven, is conſecrated under the name of Juno, who is the ſiſter and wife of Jupiter, becauſe it reſembles both the Æther, and is cloſely united to it. But they effeminated it, and aſcribed it to Juno, becauſe there is nothing ſofter than air.’ Whatever they might ſay, there was no avoiding of abſurdities or impieties in that ſyſtem. Which I prove thus: let us aſk theſe Philoſophers ſome queſtions. You believe that Jupiter ſo much celebrated by the Poets; and he whom you adore in the capitol, and every where elſe, is that great ſpace wherein we ſee ſo many ſtars; and that Juno, ſiſter and wife of Jupiter, ſo jealous, ſo haughty, and powerful, to whom the Argivi and other nations pay ſo many honours, is the air that encompaſſes the earth, and gets into the lungs of animals, and in which the clouds, the rain, &c. are formed? but is it not evident that this celeſtial ſpace, and this air, are a portion of the matter of the world, and that matter, as matter, cannot think? Do not we clearly know that the air has no more life or knowledge than ſnow and hail? If therefore Juno is nothing but the air, it is ridiculous to direct prayers, and offer ſacrifices to her; for ſhe hears and knows nothing, and therefore your doctrine overthrows religion; it is a material Atheiſm; you rob Juno of all her Divinity; you only leave her the vain and indeterminate name of a goddeſs; and you are more abſurd than Epicurus, ſince you worſhip an illuſive and imaginary name. Juno is only an inſtance; but Jupiter and Neptune, and all the other deities fall in the ſame manner, by the force of the ſame argument. If you ſay that you do not conſider the air as a meer body, when you maintain that Juno is the air, explain to me, I deſire you, what other notion you have of it. Do you pretend that the air is united to the goddeſs Juno, that ſhe is the ſoul of it, that the ſaid air is the body of the deity? But is not this to ſuppoſe, a ſort of animal, of which we have no idea? Does not the notion of an animal imply a conjunction of parts, which conſtitute one entire continuum? Does it not exclude what we call diſcrete quantity? And is it not certain that the parts of the air are continually ſeparating from one another, and that the leaſt ſtone that is caſt into it, makes a ſolution of it's continuity, which muſt be a very ſmarting wound, if the air be an animal? To what inconveniencies do you expoſe the Divinity of Juno, in making her the ſoul of the air? Does ſhe not perpetually receive an infinite number of wounds? If you anſwer me that this deity is united to the air, not to be it's ſoul, but only to influence it, you fall into another abſurdity, which is no leſs ridiculous, than if we ſhould ſay, that a pilot is a ſhip, and that a rider is a horſe. Will you anſwer, that there is a great deal of difference betwixt theſe things, ſince a pilot is not united to the ſhip, as Juno is to the air? Explain therefore that union, and obſerve how Ariſtotle puzzles you, when he ſays, it is againſt reaſon, that the air and fire ſhould be animals; but that if they have a ſoul, it is an abſurdity to ſay, they are not ſo. Conſider well theſe words: Διὰ τινα μὲν γὰρ αἰτίαν ἐν τῷ ἀέρι, ἢ ἐν τῷ πυρὶ οὖσα ἡ ψυχη, οὐ ποιεῖ ζῶον· ἐν δὲ τοῖς μικτοῖς, καὶ ταῦτα βελτίων ἐν τούτοις εἶναι δοκοῦσα; ἐπιζητήσειε γὰρ ἄν τις, καὶ διὰ τίνα αἰτίαν ἡ ἐν τῷ ἀέρι ψυχὴ, τῆς ἐν τοῖς ζώοις βελτίων ἐστὶ καὶ ἀθανατωτέρα. συμβαίνει δὲ ἀμφοτέρως ἄτοπον καὶ παράλογον· καὶ γὰρ τὸ λέγειν ζῶον τὸ πῦρ, ἢ τὸν ἀέρα, τῶν παραλογωτέρων ἐστί· καὶ μὴ λέγειν ſpeak of thoſe who ſaid that Juno was the air, and Jupiter the Æther.

---

(81) Martial. Epig. lxxxvi, lib. ii.

(82) Cicero, de Natura Deor. lib. i, cap. xiv.

(83) Id. ibid. lib. ii, cap. xxv.

(84) Id. ibid. cap. xxvi.

γειν ζῶα ψυχῆς ἐνέσης, ἄτοπον. Quam enim ob cauſam anima in aëre quidem vel igne ſi ineſt, non facit animal, in miſtis autem facit; præſertim cùm in illis videatur eſſe præſtantior! Quæret etiam quiſpiam quam ob cauſam anima ea, quæ eſt in aëre, præſtabilior eſt ac immortalior ea, quæ in animalibus ineſt. Utrobique autem emergit quoddam abſurdum & rationis egrediens metas, nam ignem aut aërem animal eſſe dicere, rationis egreditur fines, & aſſerere rurſus animalia non eſſe, ſi inſit in ipſis anima, perabſurdum eſt ſane (85). —— If there be a ſoul in air or fire, why does it not conſtitute an animal, as well as in mixt natures, eſpecially as it ſeems to be more excellent in them? It may likewiſe be asked, why that ſoul which is in air, is of a more excellent and laſting nature, than that which is in animals. In both caſes, there is ſomething abſurd, and irrational; for to ſay that fire or air is an animal, is irrational, and again to aſſert they are not animals, if they have a ſoul, is certainly very abſurd. Thus you find yourſelves between two precipices. If Juno is the ſoul of the air, and if the air and ſhe do not conſtitute an animal, it is an intolerable abſurdity; but if they compoſe an animal, it is both an abſurdity, and a horrible impiety. Carneades, with that ſtrength of reaſon which was his peculiar talent, confuted invincibly the pretended exiſtence of this kind of animal (86).

I ſhall conclude with an obſervation which Pauſanias has furniſhed me with. He tells us that he diſputed one day with a Sidonian in the temple of Æſculapius. That man maintained that the Phenicians were much more skilled than the Greeks, in matters relating to the deity, and in others alſo. They ſay, added he, that Æſculapius is the ſon of Apollo, and they do not ſuppoſe that he had a woman for his mother; for he is the air, the fountain of health, both for men and beaſts. Apollo, who is the ſun, is juſtly eſteemed Æſculapius's father, ſince by the viciſſitudes of the ſeaſons, which his motion brings about, he makes the air healthy. Pauſanias granted all this; but he maintained, that they did not belong to the Phenicians more than to the Greeks, and that it is manifeſt even to children, that the health of men is an effect of the ſun's motion (87). Judge by this of the orthodoxy of the Heathens. Thoſe who pretended to underſtand beſt theological doctrines, made it appear when they explained themſelves clearly, that they acknowledged no other gods, beſides the air, the ſtars, &c. This was at the bottom a true Atheiſm; it was to convert the neceſſity of nature into God. I have obſerved in Euripides, a paſſage in which Jupiter is invoked, without knowing truly what he was. He is ſaid to govern all things juſtly by occult ways; but he who ſpeaks theſe words, adds, that it is very difficult to know him, and that he knows not whether he be the neceſſity of nature, or human underſtanding. What a faith is this! A Spinoziſt would not much ſcruple to ſubſcribe to it.

῏Ω γῆς ὄχημα, κἀπὶ γῆς ἔχων ἕδραν,
῞Ος τις πότ' εἶ σὺ δυστόπαστος εἰδέναι
Ζεὺς, εἴτ' ἀνάγκη φύσεως, εἴτε νοῦς βροτῶν,
Προσηυξάμην σε, πάντα γὰρ δι' ἀψόφου
Βαίνων κελεύθου, καὶ δίκην τὰ θνήτ' ἄγεις.

O terræ vehiculum, & in terra habens ſedem,
Quicunque tandem es, imperveſtigabilis animis noſtris
Jupiter, ſive es neceſſitas naturæ, ſive mens mortalium,
Te invoco, omnia enim per arcanam
Vadens viam ducis mortalia juſte (88).

O vehicle of earth, in earth reſiding,
Whoe'er thou art, being unſearchable,
Neceſſity of nature, or the mind
Of mortals, I invoke thee, Jupiter,
Who human actions and events do'ſt guide,
Thro' fate's inextricable maze, aright.

(85) Ariſtotle, de Anima, lib. i, cap. v, pag. m. 485, Tom. I, Oper.

(86) See his arguments in Cicer. de Natura Deor. lib. iii, cap. xvii.

(87) Taken from Pauſanias, lib. vii, cap. xxiii, pag. 583.

(88) Hecuba, apud Euripidem in Troadibus, ver 884, pag. m. 107.

JUSTINIANI (Augustin), biſhop of Nebbio in the iſle of Corſica, was born at Genoa in the year 1470. He became a dominican the twenty fifth of April 1487, and applied himſelf to his ſtudies with ſo much earneſtneſs, and under ſuch able maſters, that he became a very learned man. He underſtood Philoſophy, Mathematics, Divinity, Greek, Hebrew, Arabic, and Chaldee. He taught in the province of Lombardy eighteen years with great advantage to his hearers; he was made biſhop of Nebbio the fifteenth of November 1514, at the recommendation of cardinal Bendinello Saoli, his couſin, and received his bulls before he knew the good offices this cardinal had done him. He aſſiſted at the council of Lateran, and oppoſed ſome articles of the Concordate agreed upon between France and the court of Rome. Nevertheleſs Francis I. invited him to Paris, and made him his almoner. He made uſe of this prelate's great skill to ſet up the ſtudy of the oriental tongues in the univerſity of Paris. Juſtiniani finding himſelf ſo near England, took a voyage thither, and was very much careſſed by Henry VIII. He collected a very fine library, and left it by his will to the republic of Genoa [A]. He made many reparations in his biſhopric, and increaſed the revenues of it; he ſo beautified his cathedral church, dedicated to the Holy Virgin, that Maracci placed him among her faithful ſervants. He alſo tranſlated into the vulgar tongue ſome Latin works, the reading whereof might be uſeful to clergy-men (a). He loſt his life at ſea, in paſſing from Genoa to the iſle of Corſica, in the year 1536 (b) [B]. He was not only a learned prelate, but (a) Traſportando ancora da Latino in volgare de' libri per giovamento del ſuo Clero. The abbot Michael Juſtiniani, ubi infra, pag. 17.

(b) Taken from the abbot Michael Juſtiniani, gli ſcrittori Liguri deſcritti, pag. 16, & ſeq.

[A] He collected a very fine library, and left it by his will to the Republic of Genoa.] It was eſpecially valuable for the great number of antient manuſcripts in all languages, and ſciences, which he had collected with vaſt labour and expence. But ſome of them he had without any coſt or pains: I mean thoſe which Andreolo Juſtiniani, his grandfather, left him. It is remarkable that the republic made no advantage of this will; for thoſe manuſcripts are only to be found in the libraries of ſome private perſons, who, to conceal their theft, have taken off from the title pages the marks of that prelate. ' Benche al preſente non ſi trovi verun ' veſtigio di eſſi nel Palazzo publico, mà preſto diverſi ' particolari, che, per non eſſer ſcoperti, gli han levati nel frontiſpicio i contraſegni di quel buon Vecchio (1).'

[B] He loſt his life at ſea . . . . in the year 1536.] The abbot Michael Juſtiniani (2) proves this by the regiſters of dominicans of Genoa, and from the biſhopric of Nebbio's being given to cardinal Jerome Doria the fifteenth of November 1536. Voſſius ſays (3), it is not known whether Juſtiniani periſhed at ſea, or fell into the hands of the pirates; that it is only certain that he was never ſeen ſince the year 1530, when he embarked to go from Genoa to his biſhopric. I doubt not but he is miſtaken as to the year. Paul Jovius ſays in general, that it was never known, whether this biſhop was ſhipwrecked, or taken by the pirates of Barbary. ' In curſu fluctibus obrutus, aut à ' Pœnis prædonibus interceptus creditur, quum nullum uſquam naufragii, aut piratarum prædæ veſtigium ' apparuerit (4).'

[C] The

(1) Michael Juſtiniani, gli ſcrittori Liguri deſcritti, pag. 18.

(2) Id ibid.

(3) Voſſius, de Hiſtor. Lat. lib. iii, cap. xii, pag. 681.

(4) Paulus Jovius, Elog. cap. cxxx, pag. 275.

but very laborious, as it appears by the works he compoſed, and by thoſe which he cauſed to be printed [C]. I mention them in a remark. He deſigned to publiſh a Polyglot Bible, and the Pſalter which he printed may be looked upon as part of it. He was at great charges for the edition, and finding that he could not get his money by the ſale, and that princes did not favour his deſign, he complained of the Ingratitude of his age [D].

[C] The works he compoſed, and thoſe which he cauſed to be publiſhed.] His Precatio pietatis plena ad Deum omnipotentem compoſita ex duobus & ſeptuaginta nominibus divinis Hebraïcis, & Latinis cum interprete commentariolo, was printed at Venice in the year 1513 in 8vo. He publiſhed there the ſame year Æneæ Platonici de immortalitate animorum deque corporum reſurrectione aureus Libellus, cui titulus eſt Theophraſtus. He publiſhed at Paris in 1520, in folio, Chalcidii viri clariſſimi luculenta Timæi Platonis Traductio, & ejuſdem argutiſſima Explanatio ; as alſo Victoria Porcheti adverſus impios Hebræos in qua tum ex ſacris litteris, tum ex dictis Talmud, ac Caballiſtarum & aliorum omnium Authorum quos Hebræi recipiunt, monſtratur veritas Catholicæ fidei ; moreover Rabi Moſſæi Egyptii Dux ſeu Director dubitantium aut perplexorum. He ſpent five years upon writing a hiſtory of Genoa, with an extream application ; but death did not permit him to put the laſt hand to it. It was publiſhed in the year 1537 (5). They pretend that his manuſcript was interpolated in ſeveral places, by the perſon who put it to the preſs. Scriſſe gl' Annali della ſua patria, con grandiſſima diligenza, e ottima fedeltà i quali in molti luoghi dopo la morte di lui furono corrotti (6). This is the teſtimony of Franciſco Zazzera, which is confirmed by George Juſtiniani, in an epiſtle dedicatory : ‘ Magnam profecto inde me voluptatem cepiſſe fateor, & in eodem plane ſenſu fuiſſe gaudeo ipſius nepotem Auguſtinum Juſtinianum, illum ſcilicet qui poſtea ad Nebienſem Pontificatum evectus, rerum noſtrarum Annales orditus eſt, quos poſt ejus obitum imperitus, omniſque eruditionis expers, horridos ſane & incultos, ut hodie leguntur, ex defuncti Schedis evulgavit (7). —— I confeſs it gave me great pleaſure, and I rejoice that his grandſon Auguſtin Juſtiniani was of the ſame opinion, him I mean, who being afterwards advanced to the biſhopric of Nebbio, began the hiſtory of our affairs, which, after his death, an unskillful and illiterate perſon publiſhed, in the rude, unpoliſhed, manner we now read them, from the papers of the deceaſed.’ Theſe interpolations of the manuſcript gave Paul Jovius occaſion to cenſure this hiſtory (8) ; but he is in the wrong to ſay, that the author made too much haſte in publiſhing it ; for it was not printed till after our Juſtiniani's death. Paul Jovius's words are very offenſive. ‘ Scribendæ patriæ hiſtoriæ negotium ſuſcepit, adeo ineptis ad id ingenii viribus, ut præcipitatæ editionis male audiendo pœnas daret (9). ——— He undertook to write the hiſtory of his own country ; but was ſo unequal to the task, that he ſuffered in his character by a haſty edition.’ I ſhall ſpeak hereafter of his Polyglot Bible. Here is a paſſage taken from his Life, written by himſelf, in which you will ſee a ſpecimen of his labours : ‘ Hò fatto imprimere in Parigi dodici opere in utilità de Studioſi ; hò tradotto più coſe in materna lingua per utilita di Chierici della mia Dioceſi, che ſono tutti ignari di lettere : hò tradotto l'Economico di Senofonte per inſtruttione di mia cognata, e de miei nepoti : hò deſcritto molto minutamente l'Iſola di Corſica per utilita della patria intitolata al Principe Andrea d'Oria, e meſſa poi la deſcrittione in diſtinta pittura hò donato al magnifico Ufficio di S. Georgio (10). —— I have cauſed to be printed at Paris, twelve pieces for improving youth : I have tranſlated ſeveral things into Italian, for the benefit of the eccleſiaſtics of my dioceſe, who are all illiterate : I have tranſlated the œconomics of Xenophon, for the inſtruction of my ſiſter-in-law, and of my nephews : I have made a very exact deſcription of the iſland of Corſica, for the ſervice of my country ; inſcribed to the prince Andrea Doria, which deſcription I afterwards preſented to the office of St George.’ The laſt work mentioned in theſe Italian words, is in the library of the Vatican. It is a manuſcript.

[D] The Pſalter which he publiſhed . . . . . . he complained of the ingratitude of his age.] It was printed at Genoa in the year 1516, in Folio, in eight columns, ‘ Quarum prima habet Hebræam editionem ; ſecunda Latinam interpretationem reſpondentem Hebrææ de verbo ad verbum ; tertia Latinam communem ; quarta Græcam ; quinta Arabicam ; ſexta paraphraſim, Sermone quidem Chaldæo, ſed literis Hebraicis conſcriptam ; Septima Latinam reſpondentem Chaldææ ; ultima vero, id eſt octava, continet Scholia, hoc eſt annotationes ſparſas & interciſas (11). ——— The firſt of which has the text edition ; the ſecond the Latin interpretation anſwering to the Hebrew, word for word ; the third the common Latin ; the fourth the Greek ; the fifth the Arabic ; the ſixth the Paraphraſe, in Chaldee, but written in Hebrew letters ; the ſeventh the Latin anſwering the Chaldee ; but the laſt, that is the eighth, contains the Scholia, that is, ſcattered annotations.’ The author dedicating it to Leo X, tells him, that he deſigns to publiſh the whole bible in that manner, and that he does not queſtion to go through it, if the Pope approves it, and promotes the impreſſion. This is the ſenſe of theſe words (12). Quod ſi tu rem ipſam probaveris, & dignam editione duxeris, in promptu erit nobis univerſo operi manum extremam imponere, & utrumque inſtrumentum, iiſdem diſtinctum linguis, eademque ſerie & ſtructura, tradere impreſſoribus formandum, &c. He intimated in a letter, that he wrote to cardinal Bendinello Saoli, that all the New Teſtament was finiſhed, and that the old would ſoon be ready, and he intreated him to get the whole work printed (13). He gave leave to Pellican, who was at Rome, in the year 1517, to tranſcribe the preface of his new Teſtament into eight languages, with the firſt verſes of St Matthew's goſpel (14). Geſner affirms (15), that he ſaw it, and the two letters which Juſtiniani wrote to that cardinal. He has alſo inſerted part of that preface in his Bibliotheque. This honeſt prelate was at great charges for the impreſſion of the Pſalter ; he cauſed two thouſand and fifty copies to be printed off, and preſented it to all the princes of the world, Infidels as well as Chriſtians ; he cauſed fifty to be printed upon Vellum ; he expected not only to be praiſed, but alſo to get a great deal by it ; and he had already deſigned his gain for the relief of his relations. He hoped that the good ſucceſs of this ſpecimen would engage the prelates and the princes to be open-handed for the impreſſion of the whole bible, but unfortunately he got nothing but praiſes. His Pſalter was commended, and not bought ; he had much ado to ſell the fourth part of the edition, and was not in a capacity of printing the reſt of his work. Let us hear his complaints (16). ‘ Feci ſtampare in Genoua alle mie ſpeſe con quel travaglio, e con quella ſpeſa, ch'ogni letterato può giudicare due mila volumi del Davidico Pſalterio in le predette cinque lingue Hebrea, Chaldea, Greca, Latina, & Arabica, parendomi di queſt' opera dover' acquiſtare gran laude, e non mediocre guadagno, il quale panſavo eſporre in la ſouventione di certi mei parenti, ch'erano biſognoſi, credendomi ſempre che l'opera doveſſi havere grande uſcita, e che i Prelati richi, ò Principi ſi doveſſero movere, è mi doveſſero ajutare in la ſpeſa di far imprimere li reſtante della Bibbia in quella varietà di lingue ; ma la credulità mia reſtò ingannata, perche l'opera fù da ciaſchedun laudata, ma laſſata ripoſare, e dormire, perche a pena ſi ſono venduti la quarta parte de i libri, come che l'opera ſia per valent huomini, e per ingegni elevati, che ſono al mondo rari, e pochi, e con ſtento puoti ricavar i danari, ch' haveva poſte in la ſtampa che furono in buona quantità, perche oltra i due mila volumi ſtampati in papero, ne feci imprimere cinquanta in carta vitelline, e mandai d'eſſi libri à tutti i Rè del Mondo, coſì Chriſtiani, come Pagani.’ Paul Jovius was ſo barbarous as not to pity his unhappy fate. Nay, he takes delight in inſulting him for it, and will not allow at leaſt, that he received the praiſes of the public. If we believe him, that honeſt biſhop was at great charges, and got neither money nor glory by it (17).

(5) At Genoa, in folio.

(6) Franciſco Zazzera, apud abbatem Mich. Juſtinian. ubi ſupra, pag. 19.

(7) Georgius Juſtinianus, in epiſt dedicat. Æneæ Platonici de Immortalitate Animæ, apud Michael. Juſtinian. ibid. pag. 19, 20.

(8) Michael Juſtiniani, ibid. pag. 17.

(9) Paul. Jovius, Elog. cap cxxx, pag. m 275.

(10) Aug. Juſtiniani, in his Life. It has been inſerted in his Annals of Genoa. See the abbot Mich. Juſtiniani, ubi ſupra, pag. 20.

(11) Geſner, in Biblioth. fol. 104, verſo.

(12) Auguſt. Juſtin. Præf. Pſalter. apud Geſner. ibid. fol. 105, verſo.

(13) In altera quoque epiſtola ad eundem, novum teſtamentum jam abſolutum eſſe teſtatur, vetus autem brevi futurum paratum : & hortatur ut curet totum opus prælis excudi. Geſner. ibid.

(14) Id. ibid.

(15) Ibid.

(16) Auguſt. Juſtiniani, in the account of his Life, apud Lancellotti di Perugia, Hoggidi, Part. I, diſiganno, xxvii, pag. 273, 274.

(17) Gravi quidem ſumptu & tenui cum laude quum impreſſa domi præalta volumina emptores rariſſimos invenirent, ſic ut temerè conceptam ſpem lucri inanes initæ rationes eluſerint. Jovius, ubi ſupra.

K

KECKERMAN (Bartholomew) a native of Dantzic, was profeſſor of Philoſophy there towards the beginning of the XVIIth century. He had been before profeſſor of the Hebrew tongue at Heidelberg. He wrote a great many books, in which he diſcovered more method than wit [A]. He was a Calviniſt. He died in the year 1609, being thirty eight years of age (a). His books are full of Plagiariſms, and have been pillaged by the plagiaries.

(a) Konig places his birth in the year 1571, and his death in the year 1609. Voſſius, de Scient. Mathem. pag. 262, ſays, he lived forty two years.

[A] He wrote many books, in which he diſcovered more method than wit.] He made ſyſtems of almoſt all the ſciences. Here is Voſſius's judgment of him. ‘ Parum idoneè judicat de eo (Diogene Laërtio) vir ‘ cæteroquin eruditus, ſed noveilorum ſcriptorum quam ‘ antiquitatis ſtudioſior Bartholomæus Keckermannus. ‘ Ait ille libro ſuo de hiſtoria, ſcripſiſſe Laërtium lan- ‘ guidè & frigidè, ſæpè tamen non inutiliter. Quæ ‘ frigida profectò laus eſt operis utiliſſimi & auro con- ‘ tra non cari. Quippe ex quo diſcere ſit cum alia ‘ tam multa ad hiſtoriam temporum pertinentia; tum ‘ præclara tot veterum apoththegmata quorum Kecker- ‘ mannus, malo ſanè exemplo, Eraſmum laudare mavult ‘ autorem, quàm Plutarchum, Laërtium & ſimiles (1). ‘ ——— Bartholomew Keckerman, otherwiſe a very ‘ learned man, but more converſant in modern, than an- ‘ tient authors, paſſes a wrong judgment on Diogenes ‘ Laërtius. He ſays, in his book concerning Hiſtory, ‘ that Laërtius wrote without life and ſpirit, but often ‘ uſefully. This is in truth a cold commendation of a ‘ moſt uſeful and moſt valuable work. For we learn ‘ from it, not only many things relating to Hiſtory, but ‘ alſo many famous ſayings of the antients, which ‘ Keckerman, ſetting an ill example, chuſes rather to ‘ praiſe Eraſmus for recording, than Plutarch, Laërti- ‘ us, and ſuch like authors.’

[B] His books are full of plagiariſms, and have been pillaged by the plagiaries.] I have mentioned in another place (2), the complaint of a Scotch writer, who had been pillaged by Keckerman. Another Scot (3) did juſt the contrary, he pillaged Keckerman, as Thomaſius obſerves in his collection of plagiaries (4). He charged (5) ſome other writers with the ſame fault, with reſpect to Keckerman.

(1) Voſſius, de Hiſtor. Græcis, pag. 223.

(2) In remark [F] of the article DONALDSON.

(3) Called Andreas Aidius.

(4) Num. 349, pag 153.

(5) Ibid. n. 351.

KELLER (James), one of the beſt writers amongſt the Jeſuits of Germany towards the beginning of the XVIIth century, was born at Seckingen (a), in the year 1568. He became a Jeſuit in the 1588, and after he had taught Claſſical Learning, Philoſophy, Moral, and Scholaſtic Divinity, he was made rector of the college of Ratiſbon, and afterwards of that of Munich. The firſt of theſe two employments laſted two years; but he continued in the ſecond ſixteen years together. He was a long time confeſſor to prince Albert of Bavaria, and to the princeſs, his wife, and he was often conſulted and employed by the elector Maximilian in important affairs. He diſputed publickly with the moſt famous miniſter (b) of the duke of Newburg; and if we may believe his brethren, he had the better of him [A]. He publiſhed ſome books of controverſy [B], and ſeveral political pieces upon the affairs of that time. He appeared under (a) It is one of the four foreſt towns.

(b) Called James Hailbrunner.

[A] He diſputed . . . . . . with Hailbrunner, and if we may believe his brethren, he had the better of him.] Alegambe and Southwell ſay, that James Hailbrunner found himſelf ſo preſſed in that diſpute, that he was almoſt reduced to ſilence, and that he fell ſick the night following, or pretended to be ſo, that he might not be obliged to enter the liſts again the next day. Tam fortiter preſſus eſt, ut tantum non obmutuerit, morbumque reipſa nocte illa contraxerit, vel ne cogeretur iterum in arenam deſcendere, callide ſimularit (1).

This conference, as to the ſubject, was much like that of Du Perron, and du Pleſſis Mornai; for it run upon the accuſation brought againſt the Lutheran miniſter, of having quoted ſeveral paſſages of the Fathers with a thouſand falſifications, in a High Dutch book, intituled, Papatus Acatholicus. The conference of Keller and Hailbrunner, was held at Newburg, in the month of June, 1615 (2), and if we may believe the Lutherans, the innocence of their miniſter appeared with the greateſt evidence. Ex inſpectione & examinatione dictorum patriſticorum, innocentia Hailbronneriana luculentur patuit. Vid. Stratem. Theatrum hiſtoricum, pag. 1111. D. Dorſch. in Kircher. dev. prælim. 100. uſque 106 (3).

[B] He publiſhed ſome books of controverſy.] Theſe are the titles of them: Tyrannicidium, ſeu ſcitum Catholicorum de Tyranni internecione adverſus inimicas Calviniani Miniſtri Calumnias in Societatem Jeſu jactatas, at Munich, 1601, in 4to, in Latin and High Dutch. Papatus Catholicus, ſeu demonſtratio fundamentalis veritatis Eccleſiæ Catholicæ Romanæ contra Jacobum Hailbrunner, at Munich, 1616, in two volumes in Folio, in High-Dutch. Compendium ejuſdem operis, in the ſame place, at the ſame time, in 4to. Agonia ſeu ſudor mortualis Jacobi Hailbrunneri, hoc eſt refutatio Hailbrunneri qui extremam unctionem inſectatus fuerat ſcripto libro, in the ſame place, 1618, in 4to, in High-Dutch. Faſciculus olidus 50 floſculorum, id eſt abſurditas prædicantium in Colloquio (4) Ratisbonenſi. He took the name of Jacobus Silvanus in this work, printed in the year 1604, in 4to (5). He took the ſame name in a book printed at Ingolſtadt, in 1607, and intituled, Philippica in anonymum quendam prædicantem qui Societatem Jeſu mendaciis oneravit. The writers of the Jeſuits Bibliotheca, have not mentioned this book of James Keller, Placcius (6) tells us, that it was an anſwer to a book in High Dutch, wherein the author had collected ſeveral paſſages taken from the ſeditious books of ſome Jeſuits The author of the collection confuted Keller's Philippica, in the year 1608: his anſwer is intituled, Anti-Philippica; it is a High-Dutch book, in which the author compleated the collection of the ſeditious things that are to be found in the writings of the Jeſuits (7). The author of theſe two collections was counſellor to the Elector Palatine, and his name was Michael Loeffenius (8). I have read in the third volume of the Morale Pratique, that our Keller is the author of Cavea Turturis. The reader will be glad to ſee here Mr Arnauld's own words

(1) Alegambe & Sotuel, in Biblioth Scriptor. Societatis Jeſu.

(2) Andreas Carolus, in Memor. Eccleſiaſt. ſæculi xvii, pag. 384.

(3) Id. ibid. pag. 385.

(4) And not Collegio, as it is in Placcius, de Pſeudonymis, pag. 261.

(5) Taken from Alegambe and Southwell, ubi ſupra.

(6) Placcius, ubi ſupra.

(7) Id. ibid.

(8) Deckher. de Scriptis adeſpotis, pag. 153.

under a diſguiſed name, in the title of his political writings [C]. He died at Munich the twenty third of February 1631 (c).

(c) Taken from Nathanael Southwell, in the Bibl. Scriptor. Societ. Jeſu, pag. 373, 374.

words: '(9) Gravina . . . . . a learned Dominican, 'having complained with a great deal of modeſty in 'his Vox Turturis, that cardinal Bellarmin had ſpoke 'ſharply of the antient orders in his book De Gemitu Columbæ; and having repreſented that it was 'no wonder if they had abated of their auſterity in 'the ſpace of ſo many ages ſince their foundation: 'your father James Keller anſwered him haughtily in 'his book, intituled, Cavea Turturis, ch. 14. Societati Jeſu non eſt periculum, ne poſt aliquot annorum 'centurias ſibi multum diſſimilis appareat. Habet enim 'aromata à putredine præſervantia.——The ſociety of 'the Jeſuits is in no danger of degenerating from itſelf after ſome centuries: it has ſpices and perfumes 'to perſerve it from putrefaction.'

Mr Mayer aſcribes the Cavea Turturis to ſome other authors. His words are theſe. Cui (Voci Turturis) etſi D. Riedelius, Eccleſiæ Landsbutanæ Decanus, aut ſub Riedelii nomine Jacobus Balde, Jeſuita, Caveam Turturis oppoſuiſſet, Gravina Vocem congeminantem Turturis publico dedit, &c. (10).

[C] He appeared under a diſguiſed name, in the title of his political writings.] The bloody war, which deſolated Germany from the year 1618, to the peace of Munſter, was doubtleſs a religious war; for the league which the Proteſtants formed, againſt which the Roman Catholics oppoſed a league, whereof the elector of Bavaria was the head, owed it's birth to the ſuſpicions they had conceived, that the Imperial court, animated by the Jeſuits, had a mind to break the peace of Paſſau. The elector of Bavaria, a very able prince, would not ſuffer the Catholics to lie under that imputation. He cauſed ſome books to be publiſhed, in which the Proteſtants were accuſed of having confederated for pernicious deſigns, and particularly to oppreſs the Romiſh church. This accuſation came out in the year 1621, in a book intituled, Cancellaria ſecreta Anhaltina, id eſt, Occulta Conſilia, Inaudita Propoſita, Periculoſæ adinventiones, & prodigioſæ Machinationes Capitum ac Directorum unionis correſpondentium in Germania, occaſione Rebellionis Bohemicæ ad ejuſdem Coronæ, & Imp. Rom. perniciem agitata. Poſt nuperam illam, omnibus poſteris memorabilem Victoriam Pragenſem, 8. Novemb. 1620, in Originalibus Scripturis ac documentis Cancellariæ Anhaltinæ, Divinâ Providentiâ deprehenſa. The Proteſtant princes cauſed this book to be refuted, which was ſaid to have been compiled by William Jocher, counſellor to the elector of Bavaria, and by Dr Leickard (11). It was thought, that theſe princes made uſe, for that end of Volrad Pleſs, counſellor to the elector Palatine (12). Our James Keller believed it; for he confuted their confutation, in a work printed in the year 1624, and intituled; Volradi Pleſſii (13) Heidelbergenſis olim Conſiliarii Ajax poſt oppugnatam fruſtra Cancellariam Anhaltinam in ſpongiam incumbens, ſive Appendix Cancellariæ Anhaltinæ, auctore Fabio Hercyniano J. C. Alegambe, and his continuator, knew not, that Keller had taken the name of Fabius Hercynianus in this work. He had taken it, the foregoing year, in the anſwer to a book, publiſhed by Lewis Camerarius, in the year 1622, and intituled, Cancellaria Hiſpanica: adjecta ſunt Acta publica, hoc eſt; Scripta & Epiſtolæ authenticæ, è quibus partim infelicis belli in Germania, partim Proſcriptionis in Electorem Palatinum ſcopus prætipuus apparet. Adjecti ſunt ſub finem Flores Stoppiani, ex Claſſico belli Sacri. This work has another title after the index, viz. Viva demonſtratio cauſſarum præſentis in Germania belli religionis ergo ſuſcepti. Keller's anſwer to this book of Camerarius is intituled, Litura, ſeu Caſtigatio Cancellariæ Hiſpanicæ, à Ludovico Camerario Excancellario Bohemico, Exconſiliario Heidelbergenſi, &c. inſtructæ. Auctore Fabio Hercyniano J. C. There was a new edition of it in 1624, with this title: Cancellariæ Anhaltinæ, pars ſecunda. In qua non ita pridem à quibuſdam edita Cancellaria Hiſpanica nervoſè ſimul & lepidè refutatur: tum ex quibuſdam interceptis ad Gaborem litteris, Hungaricorum qui ſequuti ſunt & adhuc durant motuum incentores ſeu auctores demonſtrantur. Auctore Fabio Hercyniano J. C. Alegambe, and his continuator, were ignorant, that James Keller took this falſe name in the title of this work. They were not ignorant of it, with reſpect to two pieces, which were intituled: Rhabarbarum domandæ bili quam in Apologia ſua proritavit Ludovicus Camerarius propinatum à Fabio Hercyniano J. C. anno 1625. Tubus Gallilæanus, hebeſcentibus Ludovici Camerarii oculis, in litura Hiſpanicæ Cancellariæ male advertentibus, ad clariùs videndum tornatus, à Fabio Hercyniano. Additis in fine teſtimonii cauſâ, & pro tubo, & pro Rhabarbaro, ipſius Camerarii epiſtolis anno 1625. Nicolas Harſtein, anſwering the Ajax or the Appendix Cancellariæ Anhaltinæ, obſerves, that the Jeſuit, who was the author of it, was very much accuſtomed to diſguiſe himſelf. 'Nihil huic homini inſolens eſſe, 'ut veritatem, ita nomen ſuum pervertere & modo 'ſub Aurimontii (à matre ſua Goltbergera) modò ſub 'Didaci Tamiæ, modò ſub Fabii Hercyniani (à ſylva 'Hercynia, ſive Nigra, prope quam ſupra Baſileam 'in oppido Seckingen natus eſt) nomine ſallere, & his 'literis, J. C. quæ non Juriſconſultum, ut alias, ſed 'Jacobum Cellarium denotant, lectori imponere (14). '——As he made no ſcruple of perverting truth, neither did he of falſifying his name; for ſometimes he 'diſguiſed himſelf under that of Aurimontius, from 'his mother Goltberg; ſometimes under that of Didacus Tamias; and at other times that of Fabius 'Hercynianus, from the foreſt Hercynia, or the black 'foreſt, near which, above Bazil, in the town of 'Seckingen, he was born: he likewiſe impoſed upon 'the reader by theſe letters J. C. which denote, not 'Juriſconſultus, as upon other occaſions, but Jacobus 'Cellarius.' Theſe diſguiſes were unknown to the two Jeſuits, who compiled the Bibliotheque of the writers of their order. The ſame Nicolas Harſtein informs us, that James Keller was the author of the Myſteria politica (15), a work, which made a great noiſe (16), and which was very injurious to the court of France. But he aſcribes (17) to another Jeſuit a work intituled, Secreta ſecretorum Calvino-Turcica, the author of which had concealed himſelf under the name of Honeſtus Cogmandolus, He who anſwered him, in a book intituled, Secreta Secretorum Turco-Papiſtica, took the falſe name of Juſtinus Juſtinopolitanus, inſtead of Ludovicus Camerarius, his true name. The conteſts of writers about the affairs of the time, were then more grave, than they are in this preſent war (18), and as vehement in their kind, as thoſe of warriours. At preſent, we ſee hardly any thing but ſcurrilous ſatires.

(9) Arnauld, Morale Pratique, Tom. III, pag. 112.

(10) Jo. Frider. Mayerus, de Fide Bellarmini ſuſpecta, pag. 197, 198.

(11) Keller, in the Appendix Cancellariæ Anhaltinæ, ſays that this is falſe.

(12) Nicolas Harſtein denies it in the preface of his Reſponſio Apologetica to the Ajax of Fabius Hercynianus.

(13) Alegambe has miſtaken that name; for he ſays Bleſſii, and that he was chancellor. Father Southwell has not corrected thoſe two faults: he ſays Bleſſii, &c. Placcius, de Anonymis, n. 256, pag. 71, has not corrected them, and falſly places this work among the anonymous ones, not knowing that the author took the name of Fabius Hercynianus.

(14) Nicolaus Harſteinius; Sicamber, in Præfat Reſponſionis Apologeticæ, printed in 1625.

(15) Legat myſteria politica nuper à vobis, & quidem à te Jacobe Kellere (ut multorum fuit opinio) edita. Nicol Harſtein. Apolog. pag. 8. In the Mercure François, Tom. XII, that book is aſcribed to an Italian.

(16) See the Mercure François, Tom. XI, pag. 1062, & ſeq.

(17) Harſteinius, ubi ſupra, pag. 10.

(18) I write this in October, 1695.

KEPLER (JOHN) one of the greateſt Aſtronomers of his age, was born at Wiel in the country of Wirtemberg, the twenty ſeventh of December 1571. He began to ſtudy Philoſophy at Tubingen, in the year 1589, and two years after he ſtudied Mathematics in the ſame univerſity, under the famous Michael Mœſtlin. He made ſo great a progreſs in that Science, that, in the year 1595, he wrote an excellent book, which was printed at Tubingen the year following, with this title, Prodromus Diſſertationum de proportione orbium cæleſtium, deque cauſis cœlorum numeri, magnitudinis, motuumque periodicorum genuinis & propriis, &c. He had been already invited to Gratz in Stiria, to teach Mathematics (a). Tycho Brahe being ſettled in Bohemia, and having obtained of the emperor all ſort of conveniencies to perfect Aſtronomy, paſſionately deſired to have Kepler with him, and wrote to him ſo many letters upon this ſubject, that he engaged him to leave the univerſity of Gratz, and to remove into Bohemia with his family and library, in the year 1600 (b). Kepler in this journey got a quartan ague, which laſted ſeven or eight months, ſo that he could not do Tycho Brahe all the ſervices he was capable of. He was even not well pleaſed with the reſervedneſs with which Tycho

(a) Taken from Gaſſendus, in Vita Tychonis Brahei, lib. v, pag m. 451.

(b) Id. Gaſſend. pag. 4.6, & 459

Brahe treated him (c), for he did not communicate to him all his knowledge. And as that great Aſtronomer died in the year 1601, Kepler could not in that ſhort time be very uſeful to him, nor improve much by him. From that time Kepler had the title of Mathematician to the Emperor all his life (d), and acquired more and more great reputation by his works [A]. The emperor Rodolphus put him upon finiſhing Tycho's Tables (e), which were to be called Rodolphine (f). Kepler ſet heartily about them; but the king's treaſurers were ſo ill affected towards him [B], that he could not publiſh them till the year 1627. He died, in November 1630, at Ratiſbon, where he was endeavouring to get the arrears of his penſion paid him (g). LEWIS KEPLER, his ſon, a Phyſician at Koningſberg in Pruſſia, finiſhed the impreſſion of his father's Somnium, Lunariſve Aſtronomia; and he was in great fear that it would occaſion his death [C]. John Kepler's opinions

(c) Ib. pag. 460.

(d) See the remark [F].

(e) Gaſſendus, ubi ſupra, lib. vi, pag. 471.

(f) They came out with that title.

(g) Gaſſendus, ibid. pag. 472.

[A] He acquired . . . . . a great reputation by his works.] I ſhall only ſet down the titles of ſome of his books. Harmonices mundi libri V. Apologia pro ſua harmonica mundi contra demonſtrationem analyticam Roberti de Fluctibus. De Cometis libri tres. Ad Vitellionem Paralipomena, quibus Aſtronomiæ pars optica traditur. Epitome Aſtronomiæ Copernicanæ. Aſtronomia nova, ſeu phyſica cæleſtis tradita commentariis de motibus ſtellæ Martis ex obſervationibus Tychonis Brahei. Chilias logarithmorum in totidem numeros rotundos. Supplementum Chiliadis logarithmorum. Nova Stereometria doliorum vinariorum & Stereometriæ Archimedeæ ſupplementum. Dioptrice. De vero natali anno Chriſti. Eclogæ Chronicæ de tempore Herodis Herodiadumque, baptiſmi, miniſterii, paſſionis, mortis & reſurrectionis Chriſti, deque tempore belli Judaici. Tychonis Brahei Hyperaſpiſtes adverſus Scipionis Claramontii Anti-Tychonem in aciem productus. This is ſufficient to ſhew, that our John Kepler was not one of thoſe genius's who only move in a narrow ſphere; his activity extended to a great many objects. See, in the text of this article, the title of the firſt book he publiſhed. It is the ſame with his Myſterium Coſmographicum, and it is that which, of all his works, he moſt eſteemed. He was ſo charmed with it for ſome time, that he declared he would not renounce the glory of the diſcoveries of that book for the electorate of Saxony. ‘Thomas Lanſius in Mantiſſa orat. pag. 792. memorat, Keplerum aliquando à ſe rogatum, quem ex editis à ſe libris loco dignaretur præcipuo, primatum dediſſe Myſterio coſmographico, teſtatum in illo ſcripto quinque corporum regularium ſublime ſecretum tot ſæculis abſconditum pandi: inventum autem illud cum adhuc recens eſſet, tanti ſe feciſſe, ut, ſi eodem tempore Saxoniæ electoratus ſibi dono oblatus fuiſſet, addita conditione, alterutrum, aut donum ut inventionem repudiandi; ampliſſima, & tot metallorum copiis fœta provincia excidere, quàm invidenda & perpetuam gloriam ſecum ductura inventione carere maluerit (1). —— Thomas Lanſius, in Mantiſſa, orat. p. 792. relates, that Kepler, being asked by him, which of his works he eſteemed moſt, gave the preference to the Myſterium Coſmographicum, affirming, that the ſublime ſecret of the five regular bodies, hidden for ſo many ages, was laid open in that work; and that he ſet ſuch a value on that diſcovery, being yet new, that, if at the ſame time, the electorate of Saxony were offered him, on condition of rejecting either the gift or the invention, he would prefer the immortal honour of that diſcovery to that large and rich country.’

[B] The treaſurers were ſo ill affected towards him.] Wo to the learned, who depend on thoſe gentlemen, and cannot perfect a work without the good humour of the Intendants of the Finances; a ſort of men, who to ſerve their prince well, muſt tire his penſioners with a thouſand difficulties. They leave him by that means whilſt it coſts him but little, the glory of being liberal. I uſe Gaſſendus's expreſſions, to ſhew Kepler's diſſatisfaction. ‘Alacriter quidem ille ſe accinxit; verùm illæ brevi, ac aliæ deinceps, partim ex operis natura, partim ex tergiverſatione Præfectorum ærarii, ſubortæ fuere difficultates, ut priuſquàm Tabulæ perfectæ, evulgatæque fuerint, annus ſæculi XXVII. adventarit. Conqueſtus eſt certè ab annis II. ac III. configi ſe limis Præfectorum oculis; & cum anno IX. ſpecimen laboris inſigne, Commentaria de motibus Stellæ Martis edidiſſet, ac Rudolphus præter editionis impenſas, perſolvi illi confeſtim mandaſſet, tum ſtipendiorum reſidua, quæ inquit, ad dua millia monetæ argenteæ majoris excreverant, tum alia inſuper duo millia; expoſtulabat tamen adhuc biennio poſt, decreta Rudolphi in ſe munificentiſſima nullum eventum conſequi, ac ſe incaſſum facere ſumptus, pulſareque jam Cameræ Sileſiacæ, jam Imperialis ærarii fores (2). —— He ſet about it with a good will; but he met with ſuch difficulties from time to time, partly from the nature of the work, and partly from the backwardneſs of the treaſurers, that, before the tables were compleated and publiſhed the twenty ſeventh year of the century was come. It is certain, he complained, from the ſecond and third years, of the cold looks of the Financiers; and when, in the ninth year he had publiſhed a noble ſpecimen of his works, viz. Commentaries on the motions of the planet Mars; and the emperor Rodolphus, beſides the expence of the publication, had ordered the immediate payment, both of the arrears of his penſion, which, he ſays, amounted to two thouſand crowns, and of two thouſand over and above; yet he complained two years after, that the bountiful orders of the emperor were fruitleſs, and that he knocked at the doors of the Imperial chamber, and that of Sileſia, to no purpoſe.’ Kepler was no leſs diſcouraged by the Financiers under the emperor Matthias, than under Rodolphus (3). He had occaſion ſtill for his patience, under the reign of Ferdinand; but at laſt he received his arrears. ‘Perſeverarunt adhuc querelæ poſt exactum XIX. quo Ferdinandus Matthiæ ſucceſſit, etiamque poſt XXI, quo edidit partem doctrinæ Copernicanæ theoricam juxta quam deductio tabularum foret: quouſque optimus Imperator rebus licet nondum penitus compoſitis etiam vetera quæ Anteceſſores debebant ſtipendia perſolvit, ac ut neceſſarii ad maturationem editionemque operis ſumptus ſuppeditarentur mandavit (4). —— His complaints ſtill continued after the year XIX, in which Ferdinand ſucceeded Matthias, and even after the year XXI, in which he publiſhed the theoretic part of the Copernican doctrine, according to which the tables were to be deduced: till at laſt that good emperor, tho' his affairs were yet unſettled, diſcharged even the debts of his predeceſſors, and ordered the neceſſary expences for compleating and publiſhing the work to be defrayed.’ The payment of his penſion was interrupted; for the reaſon why he went to Ratisbon in the year 1630, was to ſollicit the payment of his arrears (5).

[C] LEWIS KEPLER . . . . was in great fear that the publication of his father's Somnium would occaſion his death.] The laſt work that Kepler compoſed, was the deſcription of the moon; he had not the ſatisfaction of publiſhing it, becauſe he died whilſt it was printing. James Bartſchius, his ſon-in-law, and his faithful follower in Aſtronomical opinions, took care of the book, and continued the impreſſion; but death interrupted it again. Lewis Kepler, the author's ſon, was ſo ſurprized at theſe accidents, that it proved a very difficult thing to perſuade him to meddle with this work. He feared he ſhould loſe his life in it, as his father, and brother-in-law had done; and his mother-in-law, John Kepler's widow, who was poor, and had many children, was obliged to uſe a great many intreaties and arguments to engage him to that undertaking. At laſt ſhe obtained her deſire. A learned Profeſſor of Utrecht made uſe of theſe circumſtances to cry down the doctrine of John Kepler concerning the world in the moon. ‘Unum, ſays he, præterire nequeo, quod ſpectat Selenographiæ Keplerianæ natales, unde jure merito male ominor Levaniæ, ejuſque incolis. —— One thing I cannot omit, which relates to the nativity of Kepler's Selenography, whence I bode ill to Levania, aud it's inhabitants.’ He relates the death of the author, and that of Bartſchius, and then adds: ‘Iſta vero ut intellexit Ludovicus Keplerus, Johannis filius, novercæ viduæ inopis ac liberis onuſtæ precibus atque erga patrium nomen affectu, vix vinci potuit ut li-

‘belli

(1) Konig. Biblioth pag. 444. in voce Keplerus.

(2) Gaſſendus, in Vita Tychonis Brahei, lib vi, pag. m. 471.

(3) Licet anno inſequente Matthias Rudolphi ſucceſſor & continuari ſtipendia, & exſolvi reſidua juſſiſſet, querebatur tamen anno XVI, exſpectare ſe adhuc mandatorum exoptatiſſimum effectum. Id. ibid.

(4) Id ibid.

(5) Cum . . . . anno XXX . . . ad Comitia Ratisbonenſia, ut ſtipendiorum reſidua poſtularet, ſe contuliſſet, incidit in ardentem febrim, ex eaque obiiſſe initio Decembris, ut certe ad Deoditum ſcripſit Beneggerus, cum & eximius Eichſtadius ad me ſcripſerit, fuiſſe eum catharro exſtinctum, quem apoſtemata quædam cerebri ob nimiam equitationem præceſſerant. Id. pag. 472.

nions are ſometimes very ſingular; one would think that he aſcribed to the earth a ſoul, endowed with ſenſe [D]. It is pretended, that he afforded very good hints to Des Cartes [E]. We may place him among thoſe authors, who have ſaid, that they

‘belli inchoatæ editioni abſolvendæ manum admoveret, territus (quod ipſe fatetur) improviſo & patris & affinis obitu, metuenſque ne cum illis in Levaniam relegaretur (6). —— Lewis Kepler, the ſon of John, hearing of theſe accidents, was hardly prevailed upon by the intreaties of his mother-in-law, who was left a widow, poor, and burthened with children, and by filial affection, to finiſh the publication of the book, being alarmed (as he himſelf confeſſed) with the ſudden death of his father and brother-inlaw, and fearing leſt, with them, he ſhould be baniſhed to Levania.’ I have hardly met with any author ſo violent againſt Kepler as Schoockius; as if this great mathematician had made himſelf the moſt ridiculous man in the world, by endeavouring to apply mathematical ſpeculations to Natural Philoſophy. I do not believe, that this deſign can ever ſucceed; for the object of Mathematics, and that of Phyſics, are things irreconcileable; the one is a quantity, which only exiſts in idea, and cannot exiſt any other way; the other exiſts out of our mind, and can never be really in it. However it be, I ſhall ſet down Schoockius's words: ‘Ubi Mathematicus, nemo eodem (Johanne Keplero) melior & ſubtilior, ubi vero Phyſicus, nemo eodem pejor atque ineptior, ut ſæpiſſime doleam, ſi non ingemiſcam, virum tam eximium, divinam illam Matheſin nugamentis ſuis Phyſicis adeo fœde commaculaſſe. Quid abſurdius enim vel febricitans anus in ſomnio videat, quam quod terra ingens animal ſit, quæ per montium crateres & caminos, ceu os aut nares, ventos exſpiret? & hoc tamen expreſſe docet, lib, 4. Harmonicæ, cap. 7. ubi ſerio quoque probare nititur, quod terra cum cœlo ſympathiam colat, & naturali inſtinctu ſiderum poſituram cognoſcat. Similiter in ſcripto de Motibus Martis fol. 173. contendit ſolem magnum magnetem, ſeu magneticum corpus eſſe, ſupra proprium centrum diurno motu circumactum, quod ſecundum ſpeciem quandam diffuſam, omnes reliquas Planetarum ſphæras commoveat, & in orbem agitet. Nec ſic Keplerus ſolum, per Matheſin imprudenter & infeliciter Phyſicæ applicatam, in errorum præcipitium ruit; ſed cum eo multi quoque alii quorum indicem alio in ſcripto, ſi Deo placuerit vitam prorogare, exhibebo (7). ——— Where Mathematics were concerned, no one excelled John Kepler; where Natural Philoſophy, no one was ſo unskillful; inſomuch that I have often lamented, that ſo great a man ſpoiled that divine ſcience with his phyſical follies. For what greater abſurdity could a feveriſh old woman dream of, than that the earth is a huge animal, which breathes out winds through the chinks and crannies of the mountains, as thro' a mouth and noſe? Yet this he expreſly teaches, in the fourth book of his Harmonica, ch. 7. in which he gravely endeavours to prove, that the earth maintains a ſympathy with the heavens, and perceives the poſition of the ſtars by inſtinct. In like manner, in his treatiſe of the motions of Mars he contends, that the ſun is a large load-ſtone, or magnetic body, revolving by a diurnal motion on it's own centre, and giving motion to the whole ſyſtem of planets, by a certain diffuſed power. Nor has Kepler erred alone, by raſhly applying Mathematics to Natural Philoſophy; but many others with him, a catalogue of which, if God grant me life, I will give in another work.’

[D] One would think that he aſcribed to the earth a ſoul endowed with ſenſe.] Voſſius obſerving the abſurdity of placing the earth among the gods, the earth, I ſay, which all the world took for a body, trampled under foot, and covered with all ſorts of filth, adds, that the wiſer ſort were well aware of this abſurdity, and ſaid, the earth was either an animal, or part of a great animal, called the world (8). Kepler, continues he, was not far from this opinion for he not only ſaid, that the diurnal motion of the earth proceeds from the earth, but alſo, that the earth perceives beforehand the appearance of comets, that it ſweats for fear of them, and that thence proceed great rains. ‘Audiamus eum loquentem libro de cometis anni poſt milleſimum & ſexcenteſimum ſeptimi, atque item duodevigeſimi: Facultas mundi ſublunaris cometam PERSENTISCIT, ET OBSTUPESCIT, unaque facultates cæteræ omnium rerum ſublunarium. Ac poſtea: Facultas telluris, inſolenti Cometæ apparitione CONSTERNATA, uno terreſtris ſuperficiei loco multum exſudat vaporum, pro qualitate illius partis ſui corporis, hinc diuturnæ pluviæ, & eluviones (9). —— Let us hear what he ſays in his book of the comets of the years 1607 and 1618: The faculty of the ſublunary world PERCEIVES the coming of a comet, and is TERRIFIED, and together with it the other faculties of ſublunary things. And afterwards, the faculty of the earth, AFFRIGHTED at the unuſual appearance of a comet, ſweats out a large quantity of vapours from one part of the terreſtrial ſurface, according to the quality of that part of it's body, whence proceed great rains.’ Gaſſendus obſerves, that, according to Kepler, all the ſtars are animated, and that, as animals move by means of their muſcles, the earth and the planets have alſo muſcles proportioned to their bulk, which are the inſtruments, by which they move. He gives the ſun a moſt noble and active ſoul, and will have it, that the beams of the ſun put the ſouls of the planets in action. ‘Adnoto dumtaxat Keplerum ita ſidera feciſſe animata, ac ut inſtrumenta motus in Animalibus ſunt fibræ digeſtæ per muſculos; ſic cenſuiſſe illum eſſe & in Terra, & in Planetis cæteris ingenteis fibras aliquas pro ratione molis cujuſque, per quas Anima vim ſuam motricem exerceat. Cenſuit verò etiam, præter ſpecialeis Animas, & vireis, quæ inſunt in cæteris, eſſe in ipſo Sole Animam nobiliſſimam potentiſſimamque, quæ dum Solem circa proprium axem (à centro Mundi propterea non diſcedentem) circumagit, immateriatas ſpecies (ſic enim appellat) irradiando, circumfundit, quibus, Planetæ velut correpti, ipſi Soli circumducantur (10). ——— I only obſerve, that Kepler ſuppoſed the ſtars to be thus animated and as in animals the inſtruments of motion are the fibres digeſted thro' the muſcles, ſo he ſuppoſed there were in the earth, and the other planets certain large fibres, in proportion to their reſpective magnitudes, by which the ſoul exerciſes it's motive force. He believed likewiſe, that, beſides the ſouls and forces, which are in the reſt, there is in the ſun a moſt noble and powerful ſoul, which, whilſt it carries the ſun round it's own axis, keeping it thereby in the centre of the univerſe, darts all around immateriated ſpecies (ſo he calls them), which, ſeizing on the planets, whirl them round the ſun.’ Here is what I quote out of Mr Leibniz, and obſerve, that it would be pretty difficult to confute Kepler's hypotheſis; for we are no more in a condition of knowing, whether the earth be animated, than a louſe is of knowing, whether we are living creatures. ‘Tantarum tamque conſtantium veritatum cauſas dare nondum potuit (Keplerus) tum quod Intelligentiis aut ſympathiarum radiationibus inexplicatis haberet præpeditam mentem, tum quod nondum illius tempore Geometria interior & ſcientia motuum eo quo nunc profeciſſent (11). ——— Kepler could not yet aſſign the cauſes of ſuch great and conſtant truths, both becauſe his mind was perplexed with intelligencies and radiations of ſympathies, of which he could give no account, as alſo becauſe at that time, the interior Geometry, and the ſcience of motion, had not arrived to their preſent perfection.’ A louſe is contented with feeding on what it draws from the ſurface of our bodies: it knows not whether we think, nor can it diſcover the ſecret ſprings that move us. Can we make more diſcoveries upon the queſtion, whether the earth thinks and whether it has ſenſations, which, like ours, determine certain inward ſprings to move themſelves in a certain manner?

[E] It is pretended that he afforded very good hints to Des Cartes.] ‘Kepler, ſays Mr Baillet (12), had particularly cultivated Aſtronomy and Optics, and tho' he left many things to be diſcovered, or perfected, yet it muſt be confeſſed, that the reading of his writings has not been uſeleſs to Des Cartes.’ In another place (13) he mentions three things, which ſeemed to have been common to Des Cartes and Kepler. ‘The firſt is the knowledge of the celeſtial vortices, which it is pretended Kepler had at leaſt a confuſed idea of, as well as Jordanus Brunus. The ſecond is, the explication of gravity, which Kepler gave they valued a production of the mind above a kingdom (b). Moreri has beeen guilty of more faults of omiſſion than of commiſſion [F].

---

(6) Gerardus de Vries, in Diſſertatione de Lunicolis, pag. 253, 254. It is printed with the Phyſiologia of Daniel Voëtius, at Utrecht, 1688.

(7) Martinus Schoockius de Scepticiſmo, lib. iv, pag. 387, 388.

(8) Voſſius, de Origine & Progreſſu Idolatriæ, lib. ii, cap. lxii, ſub fin. pag. m. 641.

(9) Id. Ibid.

(10) Gaſſend. Phyſica, Sect. II, lib. iii, cap. vi, Oper. Tom. I, pag m. 635.

(11) Act. Erudit. Lipſienſ. 1689, pag. 82, 83.

(12) Vie de Des Cartes, Tom. I, pag 226.

(13) In Tom. II, p. 542. He quotes G. G. Leibn. Tom. I, Act. Eruditor. Lipſ. Indeed Mr Leibniz ſpeaks thus, pag. 187. Cl. Speiſſius . . . notat ſolemne fuiſſe Carteſio præterire nomina autorum, & exemplum affert mundanorum vorticum, ad quos Jordanus Brunus & Johannes Keplerus ita digitum intenderint, ut tantum iſtud vocabulum ipſis defuiſſe videatur. - - - Speiſſius obſerves, that Des Cartes was wont to conceal the names of authors, and he inſtances in the mundane vortices, which Jordanus Brunus and John Kepler, had ſo deſcribed that they ſeem only to have wanted the name.

‘ firſt of all, by the compariſon of ſmall pieces of ſtraw, which, by the motion of water circulating in a veſſel, gather in the center. The third is the knowledge of Optics, in which Des Cartes has owned Kepler for his maſter in the year 1638. Here is the teſtimony he gave of it to Father Merſenne. He, ſays he *, who accuſes me of having taken the Ellipſes and Hyperboles of my Dioptrics from Kepler, muſt be ignorant or malicious. For as to the ellipſis, I do not remember, that Kepler ſpeaks of it; or, if he does, it is, no doubt, to ſay, that it is not the anaclaſtic, which he looks for. And as for the hyperbole, I remember very well, that he pretends to demonſtrate, that it is not that neither, though he ſays, it is not very different from it. Now I leave you to judge, whether I could learn, that a thing was true, from a man, who endeavoured to prove, that it was falſe. Which does not hinder me from acknowledging, that Kepler was my firſt maſter in Optics, and that he knew more of it than all thoſe that went before him. Mr Leibniz, whoſe words I have mentioned concerning the Vortices, ſays ſomething in another place about the ſubject of gravity. He pretends, that we are indebted to Kepler for the cauſe of that Phænomenon, and he accuſes Des Cartes of having made uſe of that excellent diſcovery, without aſcribing the invention of it to it's true author. ‘ Ipſi (Keplero) primum indicium debetur veræ cauſæ gravitatis, & hujus naturæ legis, à qua gravitas pendet, quod corpora rotata conantur à centro recedere per tangentem, & ideo ſi in aqua feſtucæ vel paleæ innatent, rotato vaſe, aqua in vorticem acta, feſtucis denſior, atque ideo fortius quam ipſæ, excuſſa à medio, feſtucas verſus centrum compellit; quemadmodum ipſe diſerte duobus & amplius locis, in Epitome Aſtronomiæ expoſuit; quanquam adhuc ſubdubitabundus, & ſuas ipſe opes ignorans, nec ſatis conſcius quanta inde ſequerentur; tum in Phyſica, tum ſpeciatim in Aſtronomia. Sed his deinde egregie uſus eſt Carteſius, etſi more ſuo autorem diſſimularit (14). —— We are indebted to Kepler for the firſt diſcovery of the true cauſe of gravity, and the nature of that law, on which gravity depends; to wit, that bodies whirled round endeavour to recede from the centre in a tangent; and therefore, if ſtraws ſwim in water, and the veſſel be whirled round, the water, being driven into a vortex, and being denſer than the ſtraws, and therefore forced more ſtrongly than them from the centre, drives the ſtraws towards the centre; as he has expreſsly taught in two or more places, in his Abridgement of Aſtronomy; tho' ſtill expreſſing his doubts, and ignorant of his own ability, nor well aware what conſequences follow from thence in Natural Philoſophy, and eſpecially in Aſtronomy. But Des Cartes afterwards made an excellent uſe of this diſcovery, tho', according to cuſtom, he ſays nothing of the author.’ See the biſhop of Avranches (15), who cites ſome paſſages of Kepler, accuſing Des Cartes of having ſtolen ſeveral things from this German.

[F] Moreri has been guilty of more faults of omiſſion than of commiſſion.] The faults of the firſt kind will eaſily appear to all thoſe, who will be at the pains of comparing his article with this; and much more, if it were compared with an article, containing thoſe things, which I have not obſerved. Here are his faults of commiſſion. I. The emperor, who ſucceeded Rodolphus, was not called Matthew, but Matthias. Theſe two names are very different, and no body ſhould have known it better than Moreri, who, as a prieſt, read every day his Breviary. Are not the feaſts of St Matthew and St Matthias diſtinct? II. He ſhould not have ſaid, that Kepler died about the year 1620, but in the year 1630. An error of ten years is inexcuſable in ſpeaking of a great man of our age. III. He ſhould not ſay, that John Kepler is different from Lewis Kepler, he ſhould ſay that Lewis Kepler was John's ſon. Moreri might eaſily have avoided the firſt fault, ſince Voſſius, whom he copied, ſpeaks thus: ‘ Primum Rodolphi Imperatoris, exinde MATTHIAE, tandem & Ferdinandi Cæſ. Mathematicus fuit (16). —— He was Mathematician, firſt to the emperor Rodolphus, then to MATTHIAS, and laſtly to Ferdinand.’ I ſhall occaſionally ſay here, that, before Kepler had that title, he had been profeſſor at Gratz in Stiria. His engagement with Tycho Brahe had like to have been broke, becauſe the States of Stiria did not approve of it (17). Tycho gave Kepler to underſtand, that he had procured him a greater ſalary at the court of the emperor, with the character of Mathematician to his Imperial majeſty, ſo that the loſs of his ſalary in Stiria ought not to ſtop him (18). Hereupon Kepler leſt the univerſity of Gratz. The emperor Rodolphus made him his Mathematician: but he obliged him to ſerve Tycho as an Arithmetician (19). I find, that the emperor Matthias gave Kepler a fixed ſettlement at Lintz, and that he ordered him a ſalary from the States of the Upper Auſtria, which was paid for ſixteen years. ‘ Neque enim ſibi ſatis eſſe, quod Cæſar etiam ante Imperium decreviſſet idoneam, fixamque ſedem Lincii; ac adjeciſſet exhibenda à Proceribus Auſtriæ ſuper Aniſanæ ſtipendia, quibus, donec res pacatiores evaderent, ſuſtentaretur; uti & fuit illis reipsâ per annos ſexdecim ſuſtentatus (20). You ſee the reaſon why Voſſius, ſpeaking of the Stereometry that was printed in 1617, calls Kepler ‘ Cæſaris Matthiæ & illuſtrium Ordinum Archiducalis Auſtriæ ſupra Onaſum Mathematicus (21). —— Mathematician to the emperor Matthias, and the States of arch-ducal Auſtria, above the Onaſus.’ I find alſo, that Walſtein ſettled Kepler at Sagan in Sileſia, and there it was that this Aſtronomer cauſed the continuation of his Ephemerides to be printed in the year 1630 (22). ‘ Deinceps autem anno xxx. poſt editas Sagani Sileſiorum (ubi Dux Meckelburgi Wulſtemius (23) ſedem illi tribuerat) Ephemeridas (24) ad Comitia Ratisbonenſia . . . . ſe contuliſſet.’

KERMATIANS, a ſect in Arabia. See the remark [A] of the article ABUDHAHER.

KESLER (ANDREW), a Lutheran Divine, was born at Coburg in Franconia, in the year 1595. He did not follow his father's profeſſion, which was that of a Taylor (a); he applied himſelf to ſtudy, and diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his wit, and the progreſs he made; which was doubtleſs the cauſe that John Caſimir, duke of Saxony, who had erected a famous ſchool at Coburg, gave him a penſion (b). This enabled him to maintain himſelf in the univerſity of Iëna, and afterwards in that of Wittemberg. In the later, he was admitted into the faculty of Philoſophy, and ſhewed by ſeveral theſes he maintained, that he was well verſed in Logic, and that he ſucceſsfully employed this ſcience in refuting the Socinians [A]. He was prevailed upon to leave Wittemberg

[A] He was well verſed in Logic, and ſucceſsfully employed it in refuting the Socinians.] He publiſhed a tract de principiis Logicis quæ in Photinianorum librorum lectione occurrunt, containing thirteen diſputations which he had maintained in the univerſity of Wittemberg. He dedicated it to his Mecænas prince John Caſimir of Saxony. The Epiſtle Dedicatory is dated from Wittemberg the firſt of Auguſt 1621. He gave a ſecond edition of this work in the ſame town, in 1624, in 4to. It is intituled, Logicæ Photinianæ examen, ſeu Principiorum Logicorum quæ in Photinianorum ſcriptis occurrunt, Conſideratio: cui præmiſſus eſt tractatus breviſſimus de illegitimo Photinianorum diſputandi modo, & legitima ratione pie philoſophandi. A new edition

---

(b) See the remark [A], at the end.

* Tom. III, of the Letters, pag. 397.

(14) Acta Erudit. Lipſ. 1689, pag. 83.

(15) In Cenſura Philoſoph. Carteſianæ, cap. viii, pag. m. 216.

(16) Voſſius, de Scient. Mathem. pag. 198.

(17) Ex inopinato literas accepit quibus Keplerus inſinuavit non eſſe ſibi integrum pactis conditionibus ſtare, quod à Styriæ proceribus quorum in ære erat, undequaque non probarentur. Gaſſend. in Vita Tychon. Brahei, lib. v, pag. 453, ad ann. 1600.

(18) Id. ibid.

(19) Deducto ad Cæſarem Keplero, lætatus eſt Cæſar ipſum convaluiſſe, ac teſtatus eſt velle ſe eum quidem Mathematicum ſibi habere, ſed addictum tamen Tychoni, quaſi miniſtrum à calculis. Id. ibid. pag. 460, col. 1.

(20) Id. lib. vi, pag. 471, col. 2.

(21) Voſſius, ubi ſupra, pag. 340.

(22) Gaſſend. ibid. pag. 472, col. 2.

(23) So it is in my edition of Gaſſendus. It ſhould be Walſteinius.

(24) This is only to be underſtood of the ſecond part of the Ephemerides; for the firſt was printed at Lintz, in 1617.

(a) Spizelius, in Templo Honoris, pag. 155.

(b) Keſlerus, Epiſt. Dedicat. Logicæ Photinianæ Examinis.

Wittemberg (c), to accept of an employment (d) in the college of Coburg, and at the end of a year and half he was made paſtor and ſuperintendant of Eisfeld. He diſcharged this office well, and this was the reaſon why prince John Caſimir would not permit him to accept the ſuperintendance of all the churches of the country of Eiſenach. He took his doctor's degree, and accepted an invitation to Steinfurt. He was offered the ſuperintendance of the church: he declined it; but he readily accepted it after the misfortune he had to loſe his library, when the Imperial troops ſacked the town of Eisfeld in the year 1632. Beſide the ſuperintendance of the church, he had likewiſe at Steinfurt the direction of the college, when he was called to Coburg, to ſucceed the ſuperintendant of the churches. He diſcharged this employ with applauſe. His ſermons were very much followed on account of his eloquence and his doctrine. He was ſeized with an Apoplexy in the very pulpit (e), and died, after languiſhing ſome months, the fifteenth of May, 1643 (f). He compoſed ſome books [B], ſome in Latin, and others in German, only part of which have been publiſhed.

(c) Spizelius, ubi ſupr., pag. 156.

(d) That of profeſſor of Logic.

(e) Taken from Spizelius, ubi ſupra, pag. 156.

(f) Henn. Witte, in Diario Biographico.

edition of it in 8vo, was publiſhed at Wittemberg in the year 1642. Michael Wendelerus, profeſſor of Philoſophy (1), prefixed to it a ſmall preface, in which he placed among the Socinian authors Smiglecius, one of the Jeſuits who have the moſt ſtrongly refuted them. Keſler next attacked the Socinian Metaphyſics in a work, intituled Metaphyſicæ Photinianæ partis generalis examen, ſeu principiorum ad generalem Metaphyſicæ partem pertinentium quæ in Photinianorum ſcriptis occurrunt, Conſideratio. I have ſeen only the third edition of it, which is that of Wittemberg, 1648, in 8vo, but I conjecture, that the firſt is of the year 1623; for the Epiſtle Dedicatory is dated from that town the tenth of March, 1623. The Metaphyſicæ Photinianæ partis ſpecialis examen, ſeu principiorum ad ſpecialem Metaphyſicæ partem pertinentium quæ in Photinianorum ſcriptis occurrunt Conſideratio apppeared, if I am not miſtaken, in the year 1626; for the author's Epiſtle Dedicatory is dated from Eisfeld the fourteenth of January of that year. I have ſeen only the third edition, which is that of Wittemberg, 1648, in 8vo. He attacked likewiſe the Phyſics of the Socinians: the Epiſtle Dedicatory of his Phyſicæ Photinianæ examen, ſeu principiorum Phyſicorum quæ in Photinianorum ſcriptis occurrunt, Conſideratio is dated from Eisfeld the firſt of January 1628. I have ſeen only the edition of Wittemberg, 1656, in 8vo. There is a good deal of method and exactneſs in theſe writings.

[B] He compoſed ſeveral books.] We ſee the titles of them in Spizelius's Templum Honoris reſeratum (2), and in Henningus Witte's Diarium Biographicum; but without any mark of the time or place of the edition. I have remedied this fault as much as I could with regard to the books, which I have mentioned in the foregoing remark. I cannot go on with regard to the reſt, which are Tractatus de Conſequentia: Quadriga Diſcurſuum Philoſopho-Theologicorum: Hiſtoria Epiphaniæ Dominicæ: Reſponſio belli ubiquiſtici Laurentio Forero oppoſita, &c.

(1) At Wittemberg.

(2) At Pag 160, &c.

KILIANUS (CORNELIUS), a native of Brabant, was an excellent corrector of the preſs, for the ſpace of fifty years, at Plantin's Printing-houſe. He did not content himſelf with exactly correcting the proofs of other peoples works; but he wrote ſome books which were eſteemed [A]. He had no ill ſucceſs in making Latin verſes, as it appears from his Apology for the Correctors againſt Authors [B]. He died very old on Eaſter-day in 1607. Moſt of the things I have been ſpeaking of will be verified in the remark, wherein I inſert his epitaph [C].

[A] He wrote ſome books which were eſteemed.] Swertius (1) begins the liſt of them with theſe words. 'Scripſit Etymologeticon Teutonicæ Linguæ, ſive Dictionarium Teutonico-Latinum à Juſto Lipſio laudatum. Typis Moreti 1599, in 8vo. —— He wrote an Etymologeticum of the Flemiſh tongue, or a Dictionary Flemiſh and Latin, cited by Juſtus Lipſius. Printed for Moret, 1599, 8vo.' His other works are Latin verſes, and a Flemiſh tranſlation of Philip de Comines, and of Lewis Guicciardin (2).

[B] His apology for the correctors againſt authors.] It is an epigram of eighteen verſes, which we find in Beyerlinch's Theatrum vitæ humanæ (3). Mr Chevillier has inſerted it in his Origine de l'Imprimerie de Paris (4), after having ſaid a thing, which deſerves to be mentioned, 'We will not however charge the Printers or Correctors with all the faults that are in the printed books. They have their excuſe upon the authors. Faults remain ſometimes in an edition through the ignorance, or negligence, of the writer, or the publiſher. He gives a very incorrect copy, which is faithfully printed, and conſequently with the faults of the manuſcript: but it happens, that the learned, who judge without flattery, cenſuring what deſerves it; he, who is not guilty, is accuſed, though the fault be entirely in the author. An excellent corrector of Plantin's preſs, called Cornelius Kilian, made an apology for the Correctors againſt the authors, who, being miſtaken for want of learning and judgement, and giving incorrect copies, do neverthleſs blame the innocent.'

[C] I inſert his epitaph.] It was made by Francis (5) Swertius, his friend, and conſiſts of theſe words: 'D. O. M. CORNELIO KILIANO Dufflæo, conſtantis laboris, & perennis induſtriæ laude ornato & amato viro. L. ann. Plantin. Typographiæ correctorem geſſit. Quam fideliter, perite, docte, ipſos rogate libros elegantia, nitore, fama æternæ artis primos. Nec ſemper alienos tractavit, cum & ſuos reliquerit, Latina oratione diſertus, verſificatu felix, patriam quoque eloquentiam excoluit, cultumque ejus & proprietatem revocavit. Obiit ætate operibuſque gravis M DC VII ipſo paſchatis feſto (6) —— To the memory of the very induſtrious and beloved CORNELIUS KILIANUS. He was fifty years corrector of the preſs to Plantin; how faithfully, skillfully, and learnedly, the elegant and beautiful editions he was concerned in ſufficiently ſhew. Nor was he wholly converſant with other writers; ſince he left works of his own, being an eloquent Latiniſt, an happy Poet, and a reſtorer of the purity of his native tongue. He died full of years and works, in the year 1607, on Eaſter day.'

(1) Athen. Belg. pag. 190.

(2) Deſcription of the Netherlands.

(3) Tom. VII, pag. 327.

(4) Pag. 203.

THE faults in books are not always to be imputed to the Printers.

(5) Mr Chevillier, pag. 106, calls him Peter.

(6) Franc. Swertius, Athen Belg. pag 189, 190.

KIRCHER (JOHN), a native of Tubingen in the duchy of Wirtemberg, ſtudied with great ſucceſs in the univerſity of his country, and raiſed very great hopes of himſelf; but, having choſen another ſort of life, and ſeeing no probability of a ſettlement in it, he changed the Lutheran for the Romiſh religion, and went into Hungary (a). This was about the year 1640. He publiſhed, according to cuſtom, the motives of his change, to which were made ſeveral anſwers [A]. I can proceed no farther in my account of him; and (a) Joh. Georgius Dorſcheus, Epiſt. Dedicat. Hodegetici Catholici.

[A] He publiſhed . . . . . . the motives of his change, ſo which were made ſeveral anſwers.] The book he publiſhed is intituled, Ætiologia in qua migrationis ſuæ ex Lutherana Synagoga in Eccleſiam Catholicam veras and I ſhould be to blame, if I did not own it, ſince the learned Mr Baillet made no ſcruple to acknowledge, that he was ignorant of this perſon's adventures [B].

veras & ſolidas rationes ſuccinctè exponit, & perſpicuè, doctiſque omnibus & judicandi dexteritate pollentibus ritè, accuratè & modeſtè conſiderandas proponit. It was printed at Vienna in Auſtria, in the year 1640, and dedicated to Emeric Loſi, archbiſhop of Strigonia. This work turns upon theſe two hinges; one is, that the Lutheran religion ought to be quitted, becauſe it has no infallible authority to direct us to judge what we ought to believe: the other is, that Popery ought to be embraced, becauſe we find in it ſuch an authority (1). He was confuted. Conſult Mr Baillet (2) who will tell you, that John Conrad Schragmuller publiſhed an Anti-Kircher in High-Dutch in the year 1654. and that Abraham Calovius put out an Examen Anti-Kircherianum at Konigsberg in Pruſſia, in the year 1643. He does not there mention (3) the book of John George Dorſcheus, profeſſor of Divinity at Strasburg, though it may be reckoned an Anti Kircher. The title of it is; M. J. Kircherus devius, ſive Hodegeticus Catholicus, quo oſtenditur M. Johannem Kircherum Tubingâ Wirtembergicum migrationis ſuæ ex ſynagoga, quam vocat, Lutherana in Eccleſiam Catholicam inſtitutione iviſſe, non qua eundum eſt ſed qua itur. It was printed at Strasburg in the year 1641, in 12mo, and contains two parts, the running titles whereof are 1°. Hodeget. Cathol. Antikirch. prælim. 2°. Hodeget. Cathol. Antikirch. Dorſcheus maintains the perſpicuity of the ſcripture, which is the foundation of the Proteſtant faith, and ſhews, on the other hand, that neither the councils, nor the deciſions of the Popes, can be a good foundation of certainty. The citations take up more than half the book, and eſpecially in the places, wherein are examined Kircher's complaints, that the Proteſtants impute to the Catholic church all the impertinencies of particular authors. This book of Dorſcheus was anſwered by a German Jeſuit, called Henry Wangnereck, who publiſhed an Anti-Dorſcheus in the year 1653, and, in his turn, was confuted by an Anti-Vangnereck, which Balthaſar Bebelius (4) publiſhed by way of Theological Theſes in the year 1682.

[B) Mr Baillet made no ſcruple to acknowledge, that he was ignorant of this perſon's adventures,] As there is a good deal of wit in his confeſſion, I will relate at large what he ſays (5). ' You would have no occaſion to reproach me for it (6), if I could have diſcovered the regiſter of his baptiſm or burial. Of the four German Kirchers, whom I know to have been authors, and whereof two were Jeſuits, ours whoſe name was John, is he, whoſe life and employments I am leaſt informed of. I believe, that if he had died a Lutheran, Mr Henning Witten would have done him the honour to place him in his memoirs, with ſo many others, who did not deſerve it better than he; another of his fraternity would have made his funeral oration, or publiſhed an hiſtorical elogy on him. Perhaps alſo, if Kircher, when he turned from Lutheraniſm to the church of Rome, had become a monk, ſome Bibliographer, or other curious perſon of his order, would have been at the pains of collecting his actions and writings, and of placing him among the famous men of his order. But I have too good an opinion of your memory, to repeat what I have told you upon this ſubject in the article of the Anti-Cochleus, when you was deſirous to know, why the Proteſtant writers are generally better known to us than the Catholics, and why, among the latter, the Monks, of whatever order they be, are commonly better known than the other Catholics.'

KIRCHMAN (JOHN), famous for his works, was born at Lubec the eighteenth of January 1575. He ſtudied in his country till he was eighteen years of age, after which he went to Francfort upon the Oder, where he ſpent four years, conſtantly attending the lectures, and avoiding the amuſements and debaucheries, in which moſt ſcholars loſe their time [A]. He ſtudied afterwards in the univerſity of Iëna, and then in that of Strasburg. He deſired to travel into foreign countries; but having not ſufficient means for that, he was forced to refrain his deſire. He was not long under that conſtraint; for he was made governour to the ſon of a burgomaſter of Luneburg, and went with him into France and Italy. He returned into Germany in the year 1602; and, being at Roſtoch, he ſo well diſcovered his capacity, that he was made profeſſor of Poetry the year following. The work he publiſhed in the year 1604, de Funeribus Romanorum, procured him the reputation of a very learned man, and contributed, perhaps, to his meeting with a good match as readily as he deſired; for he had no leſs an inclination to increaſe the number of the inhabitants of the world [B], than that of his books.

[A] He avoided the amuſements and debaucheries, in which moſt ſcholars loſe their time.] It has been a diſpute for many ages, whether it be better to educate children at home, or to ſend them to the univerſities (1). There are reaſons on both ſides; but that which is moſt plauſible againſt ſending them to the univerſities, is the great danger of being drawn into debauchery. Studious ſcholars are very ſcarce; but thoſe who diſturb others, either by their bad example, their ſollicitations, or their railleries, are very numerous. See what is ſaid of our Kirchman, and of moſt of his ſchoolfellows. ' Ibidem per quadriennium fere ſubſtitit; non cibos & potiones tantum percolando, non Charadrii viam agendo, non ludicris aliorum exagitationibus, aut laſcivis Gynæcei luſtrationibus ſe oblectando, non ſcurrilibus Lurconum nugis optimum juventutis florem peſſime corrumpendo, quibus egregiis, ſcilicet! exercitiis, deplorato & exulcerato hoc ſeculo, maxima (2), proh dolor! Academicorum pars dedita eſt; ſed lectiones & diſputationes publicas diligenter viſitando, cum viris doctis familiariter converſando, & interdiu noctuque bonis literis, quibus animum totum applicuerat, ſtrenuè incumbendo (3). —— He continued there almoſt four years, not ſpending his time in feaſting and diverſions, which is too much practiſed in moſt of our univerſities, but in attending public lectures and diſputations, in converſing with learned men, and applying himſelf with the utmoſt diligence to his ſtudies.'

[B] He had a great deſire to encreaſe the number of the inhabitants of the world.] It is here neceſſary, more than in other places, to ſet down the very words of my author. ' Quemadmodum prole animi bonas litteras promovere ſtuduit Kirchmannus, ita etiam prole corporis humanum genus augere apud ſe conſtituit. Quamobrem eodem anno, quo Funera Romanorum publici juris fecit, iiſque nominis ſui funera planè exterminavit, vitæ ſociam ſibi elegit Virginem caſtiſſimam & pudiciſſimam, Emerentiam, Joachimi Schellii, Senatoris Roſtochienſis prudentiſſimi, filiam (4). ———— Kirchman, as by the offſpring of the mind he endeavoured to promote learning, ſo by the offſpring of his body he reſolved to encreaſe the human race. Wherefore, the ſame year that he publiſhed the Funerals of the Romans, by which he immortalized his name, he took to wife a moſt chaſte and modeſt lady, Emerentia, the daughter of Joachim Schellius, a Senator of Roſtoc.' Here you ſee a man, who very much regarded the public good; he confined not his zeal to the advantage of the Republic of Letters; he laboured alſo for that of the ſtate, by the procreation of children; he conſecrated both his body and mind, to the benefit of mankind. The learned Helena Piſcopia Cornara had very different notions; for, to ſhew, that ſhe trod in the ſteps of Minerva, the goddeſs of ſcience, who always preſerved her virginity, ſhe got herſelf admitted into the academy of Gli infecondi. But then the moſt learned Tiraquellus was an books. It was therefore very fortunate for him, to find a wife the ſame year that he ſet up for an author, eſpecially ſince the wife he met with made him attain the end he aimed at; for ſhe brought him children; beſides, ſhe lived with him with great union and concord [C]. Being looked upon as a man who educated youth well, and ſuffered not his boarders to commit any irregularity in his houſe [D], he had many ſcholars ſent him from the other towns of Germany; and at laſt, when the magiſtrates of Lubec ſaw, that their ſchool wanted a new rector, they intreated him to take upon him that employment. One of the reaſons that ingaged him to accept it, was, his fear of offending God, if he ſhould refuſe ſo lawful a requeſt [E]. He took poſſeſſion of that employment in the year 1613, and continued it all the reſt of his life, with wonderful induſtry, though he had the mortification of being expoſed to many ſlanders [F], under pretence, that the ſchool viſibly decayed. It is alledged that it was not his fault. He died the twentieth of March, 1643 (a). I will give a catalogue of his works [G].

---

(1) Taken from Dorſcheus's Hodegeticus Catholicus, pag. 1, & 329, 330.

(2) Baillet, in the firſt Tome of the Anti, n. 25, pag. 204, 205.

(3) Note, that he ſpeaks of it in the 267th page of the ſame Tome, but not under the notion of Anti-Kircher.

(4) Profeſſor of Divinity at Straſburg. See the Acta Eruditor. in 1682, pag. 249, and Mr Baillet, ubi ſupra, pag. 268.

(5) Baillet, ubi ſupra, pag. 206, 207.

(6) That is, for ſaying nothing of that Kircher's Life or Death.

(1) See Quintilian, Inſtit. Orat. lib i, cap. ii, and Mr Dacier's Remarks upon the Life of Numa Pompilius, at the end, and the Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres, for June 1700, pag. 886.

(2) See the remark [D], citat. (12). See likewiſe the article ERFORT, remark [D].

(3) Jacob. Stolterfhotus, Orat. Funebri Johannis Kirchmanni, apud Witten Memor. Philoſ. Orator. &c. pag. 525.

(4) Idem, Stolterfhotus, pag. 530.

an example to our Kirchman; for it is ſaid, he produced every year a book and a child. See the Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres (5), on the ſubject of Mrs le Fevre. The following words ſhew, that our Kirchman was not diſappointed in his good intentions. 'Quoniam vero præcipuus conjugii ſcopus quo Kirchmannus collimavit eſt procreatio liberorum . . . . . . etiam hunc ſcopum attigit, & conjugium ex benedictione divina uti jucundum, ita & fœcundum habuit. Ex uxore quippe ſuaviſſima, nunc proh dolor! Vidua mœſtiſſima, quinque liberos ſuſcepit, filios tres & filias duas (6). ——— But, whereas the chief end of matrimony, at which Kirchman aimed, is the procreation of children . . . . . he attained this end, and, by God's bleſſing, met with a wife, both agreeable and fruitful. For ſhe brought him (though now a moſt diſconſolate widow) five children, viz. three ſons and two daughters,'

[C] They lived together with great union and concord.] The funeral oration ſays, that for thirty ſeven years that their marriage laſted, they had no need of a reconciliation. 'Quod conjugium felicibus auſpiciis cœptum felici etiam ſucceſſu non caruit. Tanto enim amore hi conjuges ſe mutuo ſunt complexi, tantâ concordiâ ſeptem & triginta annos tranſegerunt, ut nunquam in gratiam redire, aut ad aram Bonæ Deæ litare neceſſe ipſis fuerit (7). — Which match, happily begun, proved ſo in the end. For they lived together thirty ſeven years, in ſuch mutual affection, that they never ſtood in need of a reconciliation or had occaſion to ſacrifice at the altar of the Bona Dea.' Pomponius Atticus had the like good fortune with his ſiſter, and with his mother (8), but not with his wife. The author of the funeral oration pretends that this conjugal concord proceeded from this, that both the husband and the wife well underſtood, that it was pleaſing to God and men, and that the inconveniencies of marriage, great enough in themſelves, ought not to be aggravated by diſſenſions, but rather ſweetened by an agreeable converſation. 'NIMIRUM uterque ipſorum probe intellexit, Deo hominibuſque gratum; ſi bene inter maritum & uxorem conveniat, nec conjugii moleſtias, alias ſat graves, odioſis rixis & acerbis concertationibus cumulandas, ſed ſuaviſſimâ potius oblectatione, & jucundiſſimâ converſatione leniendas eſſe (9).' Hereupon he makes a very pathetical wiſh: would to God, ſays he (10), that all thoſe, who do not live well together, would conſider this great truth. I do not believe this author has hit upon the true cauſe. This great truth is univerſally known; even thoſe families, where diſcord reigns moſt, are fully convinced of it: but they are not governed by this perſuaſion; and I queſtion whether the quarrelling part be not pitched upon as the leaſt inconvenient; they would be more tormented by their diſcontent and antipathy, if they kept them within their breaſt. Scolding is like tears (11); it aſſwages the grief, with which one is oppreſſed.

[D] He permitted not his boarders to commit any irregularity in his houſe.] There are ſome profeſſors ſo covetous, that, for fear of having their boarding cried down, they are very cautious how they croſs their boarders in their pleaſures. Young men, to revenge themſelves of the reſtraint they are kept under, would make their relations believe a thouſand lies, in order to remove to ſome other place. Kirchman did not govern himſelf by ſuch apprehenſions. 'Non enim Bacchanalia cum convictoribus ſuis Kirchmannus vivebat, non ſcyphos ad ordinem evacuabat; non ad menſuras ſine menſura vivebat, non noctem Baccho ut perviligem ducerent domeſticis ſuis permittebat, quemadmodum nunc nonnullos in Academiis Profeſſores & Juventutis cenſores, egregios ſcilicet! facere audimus; ſed ita in omnibus ſe gerebat, ut ſtudiis mores convenienter irent; ipſiuſque domeſtici, adeoque omnes litteris humanioribus addicti vivum haberent exemplum, ad quod vitam, mores, & res ſuas omnes examuſſim componerent (12). —— For Kirchman did not revel with his boarders, did not put the glaſs about, did not live irregularly, did not ſuffer his family to ſit up all night drinking, as we are informed ſome profeſſors in our univerſities (excellent inſtructors of youth, truly!) do at preſent; but he always took care to poliſh the manners, as well as direct the ſtudies, of his pupils, and to ſet his family, and all men of letters, a lively example of good behaviour and conduct.'

[E] He was afraid of offending God, if he ſhould refuſe ſo lawful a requeſt.] This is a proof of a very nice conſcience. Many reaſons diſſuaded him from leaving Roſtoch; but this is the firſt thing that he oppoſed to them. 'Contra vero ab hac parte non minus ſollicite ſecum perpendebat divinam & legitimam vocationem, quam ſi contemptim repudiaret, in graviſſimam Dei iram & certiſſimam ejus vindictam incurreret (13).' I think he was too ſcrupulous: his call was not like that of Abraham; and he might have refuſed to anſwer it, without any danger of provoking heaven.

[F] He was expoſed to many ſlanders, under pretence that the ſchool . . . . . . decayed.] When the ſcholars plaid any mad tricks, the rector was blamed, and publickly cenſured for it. 'Statim bonus Kirchmannus cum ſuis Collegis vapulabat, & neglecti officii ac diſciplinæ reus agebatur. Neque hæc cantilena in conviviis, tranſtris, & privatis congreſſibus tantum à vulgo, cui neque judicium, neque veritas, identidem canebatur; verum etiam in publico ſæpius Vir optimus acerbè perſtringebatur ab iis, quorum officium potius fuiſſet, Kirchmanni & Scholæ noſtræ cauſam agere, ipſiuſque Authoritatem & exiſtimationem, ſi qua à malevolis arroderetur, defendere (14).' He bore it patiently, and courageouſly deſpiſed thoſe injurious reflexions (15). His ſon-in-law enlarges much upon this, and, without denying that Kirchman had his faults (16), he maintains, that the decay of the college proceeded from introducing into the town the uſe of domeſtic tutors. 'Qui primum clancularios Præceptores in noſtram civitatem introduxit, quiſquis etiam fuerit, & quot domos tot ferè ſcholas in noſtra urbe aperuit, hunc violentas huic Lyceo manus intuliſſe, & ad proſternendum primo ictu petiiſſe, tam confidenter aſſevero, ut nihil confidentius. Quid præterea acceſſerit, & ſcholæ noſtræ fundamenta penè everterit, unuſquiſque ipſe ſecum reputet, in animo enim mihi non eſt omnia refricare, & Camarinam, quod aiunt, movere (17). —— Whoever he was, that firſt introduced private tutors into this city, and opened in it as many ſchools as there are houſes, I will venture to affirm, that he laid violent hands on this Lyceum, and firſt attempted it's ruin. What farther contributed to it's downfall, every one will recollect; for I have no mind to rub up old ſores.'

[G] I will give a catalogue of his works.] It is at the end of his funeral oration (18). Oratio funebris Ampliſſimo Viro, Jacobo Bordingo, Conſuli Reipublicæ Lubecenſis, ſcripta: Roſtochii 1616, in 4to. De Funeribus Romanorum libri quatuor: Hamburgi 1605, in 8vo. Lubecæ, 1623, 1637. Brunſvigæ, 1661. Francof. 1672,

---

(a) Taken from his Funeral Oration, pronounced by James Stolterfhotus, his ſon in law. Witten has inſerted it in the Memoria Philoſophorum, pag. 516.

(5) For Novemb. 1684, art. XII, pag. 977.

(6) Orat. Funebr. apud Witten, Memor. Philoſ. pag. 531.

(7) Id. ibid. pag. 530.

(8) See his article remark [C].

(9) Orat. Funebr. ubi ſupra, pag. 530.

(10) Utinam id ſecum probe volverent illi, qui conjugium, quod debebat eſſe caritatis vinculum, faciunt certamen, rixoſum, quo ſeipſos excarnificant, & quotidiana quaſi morte mulctant! Satius iſtis eſſet, nunquam matrimonium contraxiſſe, quam contractum tam fœde deturpaſſe. Id. ibid. pag. 531.

(11) Eſt quædam flere voluptas: Expletur lacrymis, egeriturque dolor. Ovidius, Triſt. lib. iv, Eleg. iii, ver. 37.

(12) Orat Funeb. pag. 533.

(13) Ibid. pag. 535.

(14) Ibid. pag. 540.

(15) Ut magni & nobilis erat animi, more magnæ feræ latratus minutorum canum ſecurus exaudiebat, & ut culicem, aut muſcam moleſte circumſtrepentem levi manu, & citra iracundiam abigimus: ſic ipſe perverſe judicantium calumnias ſine ulla triſtitia eludebat, probe intelligens, ſapientis virtutem per ea, quibus petitur, illuſtrari. Ibid.

(16) Ibid. pag. 542.

(17) Ibid.]

(18) Apud Witten, pag. 553.

1672, in 8vo. Ludg. Bat. 1672, in 12mo. De ira cohibenda diſputatio: Roſtoch. 1611, in 4to. Oratio de vita & obitu Pauli Merulæ: ibid. 1607, in 4to. & Ludg. Bat. 1672, in 12mo. Εὐχαεισήειον, de Pacificatione Boitzenburgenſi ad Legatos Ordinum Unitarum Belgii Provinciarum: Lubecæ, 1620, in 4to. Oratio de vita & obitu Georgii Stampelii, Eccleſiæ Lubecenſis Superintendentis, habita: ibid. 1622, in 4to. De Annulis liber ſingularis: ibid. 1623, Sleſvigæ, 1657. Francof. 1672, in 8vo. Ludg. Bat. 1672, in 12mo. Rudimenta Rhetorica: Bremæ, 1652, in 12mo. Rudimenta Logicæ Peripateticæ: Lub. 1669, & ſæpius in 8vo. Tabulæ Logicæ & Rhetoricæ: ibid. in Folio. Genethliacon Illuſtriſſimi Principis, Adolphi Friderici, Ducis Megapolitani, Primogenito Filio ſcriptum: ibid. 1624, in 4to. He deſigned to publiſh a manuſcript, with notes, which did not come out till 1684, by the care of his grandſon (19).

KIRSTENIUS (Peter) profeſſor of Phyſic at Upſal, and Phyſician extraordinary to the queen of Sweden, was born at Breſlaw, the capital city of Sileſia, the twenty fifth of December 1577. He learned, in his own country, Latin, Greek, a little Hebrew and Syriac, Natural Philoſophy, Anatomy, and Botany; after which he went to ſee the univerſities of Leipſic, Wittemberg, and Iëna; and, having improved much in four years time, under the profeſſors of thoſe three univerſities, he travelled into the Low-Countries, and into France. He had heard ſay, that, in order to be eminent in the practice of Phyſic, it was neceſſary to underſtand Avicenna; whereupon he was very deſirous to learn Arabic, for he knew that the tranſlation of that Phyſician's works was very bad. He therefore applied himſelf to the ſtudy of Arabic, and deſigned to read not only Avicenna, but alſo Meſue, Rhaſis, Abenzoar, Abukaſis and Averroës. He was confirmed in this deſign by Scaliger and Caſaubon, who thought him capable of maſtering that language, to the great advantage of the Republic of Letters (a). This inclination did not retard his deſire of travelling. He ſaw Italy, Spain, England [A], and ſpent ſeven years in his travels, before he came home again. He took his degree of doctor of Phyſic at Baſil, being twenty four years of age. A little after his return into Sileſia, he went to Iëna, and married there; afterwards he was invited by the magiſtrates of Breſlaw, to be director of their college, and ſchools. A fit of ſickneſs obliging him to quit that painful employment, which beſides he was weary of, he applied himſelf wholly to Phyſic, and the ſtudy of the Arabic. Nay, he gave the preference to that language [B], and made it appear, that he was born to ſucceed in it. He added a great deal of piety to the practice of Phyſic [C]. We are not told why he removed with his family into Pruſſia; but that removal proved advantageous to him; for it gave him an opportunity of being admitted into chancellor Oxenſtiern's houſe, who took him into Sweden, where he was honoured with the profeſſorſhip of Phyſic in the univerſity of Upſal, in the year 1636; and was alſo made Phyſician to the queen. He would have diſcharged much better the duties

[A] He ſaw Italy, Spain, and England.] The funeral oration ſtops there, and ſpeaks not of Kirſtenius's travels in Greece and Aſia. But they are mentioned in his epitaph. ‘ Neve huic ſatis fuit tot vidiſſe populos Europæ celeberrimos, ni matrem olim artium ‘ permearet Græciam, & Alcurani ſedem permigraret ‘ Aſiam, vinoſamque per Hungariam reverteret (1). ‘ ——— Nor was he ſatisfied with ſeeing the moſt famous people of Europe: he travelled through Greece, ‘ formerly the mother of arts, and Aſia, the ſeat of ‘ Mahometiſm, and returned thro' Hungary, famous for ‘ it's wines.’ Such travels were ſuitable to his intentions.

[B] He even gave the preference to the Arabic.] For he not only beſtowed on that ſtudy all the time that he ſtole from the practice of Phyſic, but alſo ſpent, upon the impreſſion of Arabic books, all that he ſaved out of his gain. ‘ Quicquid ſucciſivi temporis laborioſæ ‘ praxi Medicæ ſuffurari potuit, hoc excolendæ Arabicæ linguæ totum deſtinavit: adeo ut cum linguâ ‘ iſthæc, velut cæteræ, ſuperiorum facultatum, ut vocant, & imprimis Medicinæ miniſtra eſſe debuiſſet, ‘ contra praxis Medica iſti linguæ ſæpe ſerviret: dum ‘ quicquid herus inde lucri redundantis abradere potuit, illud Arabicæ typographiæ adornandæ, & monumentis in illa edendis impendit (2).’ His Panegyriſt had reaſon to ſay, that few men make ſuch an uſe of their gain. They, who have a profitable profeſſion, are infinitely more careful to buy lands, or put their money out at intereſt, or to eat and drink well, than to be at the expence of printing books. ‘ Raro ſane & laudando exemplo. Quales ſunt hujus ‘ ævi mores, plerique ſi rem faciant, aut fœnori eam ‘ locant, aut fundis emendis, aut gulæ deputant. In ‘ publicandis ingenii monumentis ſumptus facere, rem ‘ ſterilem eſſe credunt, & quæ nihil hæredem juvet (3).’ To the ſhame of learning, the profeſſors of it are wholly bent on growing rich in lands and money:

Dives agris, dives poſitis in fœnore nummis (4);

and they follow this bad maxim,

Vos ſapere & ſolos aio bene vivere, quorum
Conſpicitur nitidis fundata pecunia villis (5).

Wiſdom and happineſs is theirs alone,
Whoſe wealth in villas and eſtates is ſhewn.

[C] He added a great deal of piety to the practice of Phyſic.] This would be no leſs a rarity, than his diſintereſtedneſs, if the common reports concerning the religion of Phyſicians are to be believed. It is ſaid, that Kirſtenius expected nothing from remedies, without the divine aſſiſtance, and made the ſucceſs of Phyſic depend on the bleſſing of heaven. ‘ Auſpicium ſuorum laborum à pietate Chriſtiana fecit, quam Æſculapius ignorabat. Noſter autem ſenex ſciebat, virtutem herbarum & uſum medendi inutilem eſſe ſine ‘ virtute divina; itaque à Deo, cui ſoli eſt poteſtas ‘ ſumma in omnia à ſe creata, in ipſam vitam & mortem hominum, Medicinæ felicitatem & ſucceſſum petendum eſſe (6).’ Nay, it ſeems that commonly he did not undertake to cure his patients, till after they were reconciled to God (7). He uſed likewiſe to encourage them, by exhorting them to truſt in God, who in a moment can cure the moſt deſperate diſeaſes, unleſs he thinks fit to tranſlate his children from this vale of tears into heaven. ‘ Ægroti malo ex lege humanitatis indolebat, eumque bono animo eſſe Deoque fidere jubebat, etiam in morbo dubiæ ſalutis, quod ‘ cum Comico ſciret, bonum animum in re mala dimidium eſſe mali. Ægrotum jam à Medico deſertum, vel ſolo Dei nutu facile ad ſanitatem reduci ‘ poſſe, ſi Deo volenti, ipſi ſaluti eſſet. Aut ex hac ‘ calamitoſa vita ad meliorem transferri (8).’ He was very careful to frequent pious exerciſes; he began and ended the day with the reading of the Bible; and he had read that ſacred book ſixteen times from the beginning to the end. ‘ A Bibliorum lectione diem ordiens ‘ & claudens, multoties illa pervolutavit. Sedecies ‘ ab illo perlecta liberi ferunt (9). He died very piouſly (10).

[D] He

2

(19) See the Nouv de la Rep. des Lettres, February, 1685, art. II.

(a) Qui cum indolem hominis viderent, animum verbis & exemplis addiderunt, ut pertenderet, atque iſtas literas, quæ nondum inter Chriſtianos debitum cultum & nitorem accepiſſent, à barbarie vindicaret ac liberali manu aſſereret. Iſtud magno fore Reipub. literariæ bono, & ſibi ornamento illuſtriori. Orat. Funebr. Kirſtenii, apud Witten, Memor. Medicor. pag. 114.

(1) Apud Witten, Memoriæ Medicorum, pag. 122.

(2) Orat. Funebr. Kirſtenii, apud Witten, ibid. pag. 115.

(3) Ibid.

(4) Horat. Sat. II, lib. i, ver. 13.

(5) Idem, Epiſt. XV, lib 1, ver. 45, 46 Compare the remark [B] of the article HORSTIUS (James).

(6) Orat. Funbr. Kirſtenii, pag. 117.

(7) Ita ægroti non minus Deo reconciliati curationem aggrediebatur Ab ægrotis tamen invaletudine adhuc recenti quam ingraveſcente advocari malebat, præſertim in gravibus & acutis morbis Ibid.

(8) Ibid. pag. 118.

(9) Ibid. pag. 119, 120.

(10) Ibid. pag. 121.

duties of his profeſſorſhip, if the ſtrength of his body had been anſwerable to the vigour of his mind; but he was very much worn out, and lived but till the eighth of April 1640 (b). He publiſhed ſeveral books [D]. It is ſaid in his epitaph, that he underſtood twenty ſix languages.

(b) Taken from his Funeral Oration delivered by John Loccenius, his colleague, profeſſor of the Civil Law. Witten has inserted it in his Memoriæ Medicorum.

[D] He publiſhed ſeveral books.] The following catalogue is to be found at the end of his funeral oration (11). Decas Sacra Canticorum & Carminum Arabicorum ex aliquot MSS. cum Latina interpretatione. Breſlæ, 1609. Evangeliſtarum quatuor ex antiquiſſimo Codice MSS. Arabico Cæſareo erutæ. Francof. 1609. in Folio. Tria Specimina Characterum Arabicorum, nempe Oratio Domini noſtri Jeſu Chriſti, Pſalm. L. &c. ibid. 1609, in Folio. Grammatica Arabica, ibid. 1609, in Folio. Liber Secundus, de Canone Canonis à filio Sina ſtudio, ſumptibus ac typis Arabicis, quâ potuit fieri fide, ex Aſiatico & Africano exemplari MSS. Cæſareo Arabicè per partes editus, & ad verbum in Latin. tranſlatus, notiſque textum concernentibus illuſtratus, ibid. 1610, in Folio. Epiſtola S. Judæ ex MSS. Heidelbergenſi Arabico ad verbum tranſlata, additis notis ex textuum Græcorum & verſionis Latinæ vulgaris collatione, Breſlæ, 1611, in Folio. Liber de vero uſu & abuſu Medicinæ, Francof. 1610. & Germanicè, ibid. 1611, in 8vo. Oratio Introductoria in Gymnaſio Uratiſlavienſium habita, ibid. 1611, in 4to. Notæ in Evangelium S. Matthæi, ex collatione textuum Arabicorum, Syriacorum, Ægyptiacorum, Græcorum & Latinorum, Breſlæ, 1612, in Folio. Ὑποτύπωσις, ſive informatio Medicæ artis ſtudioſo perutilis, aliquandiu in Pharmacopolio verſaturo Caſpari Peuceri, edita è MSS. Petri Kirſtenii. Upſaliæ, 1638, in 8vo.

(11) Apud Witten, ubi ſupra, pag. 124.

KNOT (a) (EDWARD) an Engliſhman, born in Northumberland, turned Jeſuit at twenty ſix years of age; which was in the year 1606, being already a prieſt. He taught a long time at Rome in the Engliſh college; afterwards he was made ſub-provincial of the province of England, and, after he had exerciſed that employment out of the kingdom, he was ſent thither to perform the functions of provincial. That employment was twice conferred upon him. He aſſiſted in the quality of provincial at the general aſſembly of the order held at Rome in the year 1646, and was elected Definitor. He died at London the fourteenth of January, in 1656 (b). Alegambe placed, among the works of this Jeſuit, a piece which concerns the hierarchy [A], and diſpleaſed the biſhops. Southwell has left it out. We ſhall ſee in one of the remarks his catalogue of the books of Edward Knot [B].

(a) Vero nomine Matthias Wilſonus. Sotuel, ubi infra.

(b) Sotuel, in Bibl. Script. Soc. Jeſu, pag. 185.

[A] Alegambe has placed, among his works, a piece, which concerns the hierarchy] Alegambe ſpeaks thus. ‘Scripſit doctiſſimum libellum, qui ſub nomine Nicolai Smithei eſt editus hac epigraphe, Modeſta & brevis diſcuſſio aliquarum aſſertionum D. Doctoris Kelliſoni, quas in ſuo de Eccleſiaſtica Hierarchia tractatu probare conatur, ex Anglico in Latinum à Georgio Wrighto converſa, & plurimis Doctorum atque adeo Catholicarum Univerſitatum ſuffragiis approbata (1). —— He wrote a very learned piece, which was publiſhed under the name of Nicolas Smith, with this title; A modeſt and ſhort Examination of ſome Aſſertions of Dr Kelliſon, which he endeavours to prove in his Treatiſe of the Eccleſiaſtical Hierarchy, tranſlated out of Engliſh into Latin by George Wright, and approved by ſeveral doctors and Catholic univerſities.’ This book was printed at Antwerp, in the year 1631, in 12mo. I am ſatisfied, that moſt of my readers will be pleaſed to find here the occaſion and progreſs of this hierarchical diſpute. You muſt know then, that Richard Smith, biſhop of Chalcedon, having received the authority of an ordinary over the Catholics of England, in the year 1626, went into that iſland a little after. He undertook to extend his juriſdiction over the Jeſuits, and the other Regulars; but he met with ſo many obſtacles, that he was obliged to deſiſt, and to return into France. They perceived, that the charities, which were beſtowed upon this prelate, that he might keep up the dignity of his character, came no longer to them, which did not pleaſe them; therefore they formed a party ſo artfully, that they obliged the biſhop to retire. This retreat was quickly followed by a furious paper-war. The firſt that entered the liſts, was Dr Kelliſon, profeſſor at Doüay; he wrote in defence of the biſhop's authority. Knot, provincial of the Jeſuits, anſwered him under the name of Nicolas Smith (2). A little after, a book came out upon this ſubject (3), the author whereof took the name of Daniel à Jeſu, though his name was John Floyd. He was a Jeſuit, profeſſor at St Omer. The archbiſhop of Paris cenſured the books of both theſe Jeſuits: the Sorbonne, and the general aſſembly of the clergy of France, did the ſame: (4) Which was ſo far from ſtopping the mouths of the Jeſuits, that it engaged them to reprint their books in the Latin tongue, with great approbations. They publiſhed alſo a remonſtrance againſt the biſhop of Chalcedon, in the name of the Catholics of England. The ſecular clergy publiſhed, the ſame year, 1631, three pieces, in England (5), ‘in oppoſition to the Jeſuits, who were ſo far from quitting the field by reaſon of the number of their enemies, that they began a freſh combat againſt both the Sorbonne doctors, and the French clergy, under the feigned name of Hermannus Loemelius, whoſe chief author was the above-named Jeſuit Floyd, with the aſſiſtance of his brethren, as the diverſity of the ſtyle ſhews. And another book came out againſt the faculty of Paris, in vindication of Knot, or Nicolas Smith, with many approbations of biſhops, univerſities, and private doctors, and in vindication of the propoſitions of Ireland, which had been likewiſe cenſured at Paris. Another book came forth, under the name of Edmondus Urſulanus, whoſe true name was Macmahone, prior of the Franciſcan convent in Louvain. About the ſame time the Jeſuits publiſhed their cenſure (6) of the Apoſtolical Creed, in imitation of the cenſures, at Paris, againſt their doctrines (as though their doctrines were as certain as that, and themſelves as infallible as the apoſtles:) wherein they charge the biſhops, their enemies, with reviving old hereſies, and broaching new ones. The Jeſuits, having now done ſuch great things, triumph unreaſonably in all places, as having utterly overthrown their enemies, and beaten them out of the field: when, in a little time after, Hallier and Le Maiſtre, two doctors of the Sorbonne, undertake the quarrel againſt them; but none was ſo highly magnified, and infinitely applauded by the French clergy, as a perſon under the diſguiſed name of Petrus Aurelius; whoſe atchievements in this kind they celebrated, next to thoſe of the Pucelle d'Orleans, and printed all theſe works together at their own charge: and wrote a high elogium of him, which is prefixed to them. The ſecular clergy of England ſent him a letter of congratulation on his triumphs, ſubſcribed by John Colleton, dean of the chapter, and Edmond Dutton, ſecretary; wherein they ſadly lament the diſcords that have been among them here, and the hereſies broached by their adverſaries, occaſioned by them. The main of this controverſy related to the dignity, neceſſity, and juriſdiction of the epiſcopal order; as appears by the cenſures of the biſhops of France, and by Aurelius, who ſays, “* that although the diſpute began on occaſion of the biſhop of Chalcedon, and the Engliſh clergy, yet it was now carried farther, to wit, whether the epiſcopal order was neceſſary to the being of a particular church? whether it was by divine right, or no? whether confirmation might be given without biſhops? whether the epiſcopal order was more perfect than the monaſtical? whether the regulars were under the juriſdiction of biſhops (7)?”.

DISPUTE concerning epiſcopal juriſdiction between the Jeſuits and the other Catholics.

[B] We ſhall ſee . . . . . Alegambe's catalogue of the books of Edward Knot.] Mercy and Truth; or, Charity maintained by Catholics. It is a book printed at at St Omer, in 1634, in 4to, againſt Dr Potter, who had charged the church of Rome with want of charity, in maintaining, that Proteſtancy deſtroyeth ſalvation. Chriſtianity maintained, againſt the reply of Chillingworth, at St Omer, in 1638, in 4to. A Direction to be obſerved by N. N. (i. e. Chillingworth), at London, 1636, in 8vo. Infidelity Unmasked: or, the confutation of a book of Mr Chillingworth, intituled, The Religion of Proteſtants, a ſafe way to ſalvation, at Ghent, 1652, in 4to. His Monita utiliſſima pro patribus Miſſionis Anglicanæ (8), have not been printed. We may eaſily gueſs, that ſome political reaſons hindred the publication of this laſt book.

---

(1) Alegambe, Biblioth. Script. Societ. Jeſu, pag. 99.

(2) A Jeſuit, who was lately dead.

(3) Intituled, Apologia S. Sedis Apoſtolicæ quoad modum procedendi circa regimen Catholicorum in Anglia, 1631, in 8vo. Alegambe, pag. 242, mentions it; but Southwell ſays nothing of it.

(4) Stillingfleet, ubi infra, citat. (7), pag. 394.

(5) Idem, pag. 394, 395, 396.

(6) See, above, remark [A], of the article GEDICCUS.

* Petri Aurelii, Opera, Tom. I, pag. 62.

(7) Taken from a book of Dr Stillingfleet, intituled, A Diſcourſe concerning the idolatry practiſed in the Church of Rome. London, 1676, pag. 421, & ſeq. See alſo the Letters, intituled, Les Imaginaires, letter iii, pag. m. 49, & ſeq.

(8) See Nathan. Southwell, pag. 185.

KNOX (John) a Scotch miniſter, was one of the principal inſtruments in the work of the Reformation, in his own country, in the XVIth century. He had been a diſciple of John Major, one of the ſubtileſt ſchoolmen of that time; whoſe ſteps he followed ſo ſucceſsfully, in teaching ſchool Divinity, that, in ſome things, he was more ſubtile than he; but, having examined St Jerom's and St Auguſtin's books, he quite altered his taſte, betook himſelf to a plain and ſolid Theology, diſcovered abundance of errors, and publiſhed a confeſſion of faith, which made him paſs for a Heretic. He was impriſoned [A]; and, had he not fortunately eſcaped, he had died upon the ſcaffold. He retired into England, where he was ſo much eſteemed by king Edward, that he might have been made a biſhop: but he was extreamly angry when they offered him a biſhopric; he rejected it as a thing, that ſavoured too much of Antichriſtianiſm [B]. After the death of that prince, he left England, that he might not fall into the hands of the perſecutors, and retired to Francfort, and afterwards to Geneva, where he preached to the refugees of his country, and entered into a ſtrict friendſhip with John Calvin. He returned into Scotland in the year 1559, and laboured to eſtabliſh the Proteſtant doctrines with an extraordinary zeal, both by word of mouth and in writing. His enemies having expelled him from Edinburgh, he retired to St Andrews, where the devil raiſed him many enemies, and eſpecially when he oppoſed certain perſons, who conſpired againſt the royal majeſty (a). The news of the Paris maſſacre overwhelmed him with grief; but he quickly found himſelf comforted by the ſucceſs of affairs in Scotland. The baniſhed were recalled to Edinburgh and he among the reſt (b), where he reſumed the functions of the miniſtry. They granted him the colleague he deſired, and he inſtalled him, the ninth of November 1572, and this was the laſt ſermon that he preached. He fell ſick a little after, and, till the twenty fourth of November following, which was the day of his death, he was altogether taken up with pious diſcourſes to his wife, his ſervant, and thoſe who viſited him (c). He lived fifty ſeven years (d). Nothing can be more abuſive, than what Moreri ſays of our John Knox, from Spondanus. Thoſe paſſages have been left out in the Dutch editions. The misfortune is, that the epiſcopal clergy of England agree with the Popiſh authors

(a) Quo ut primum venit multos illi Satanas excitavit hoſtes, præſertim cum ſe illis qui contra regiam majeſtatem conſpirarant oppoſuiſſet. Melch. Adam. in Vit. Theol. Exter. pag. 138.

(b) It does not appear, that Beza knew he had been expelled from thence.

(c) Taken from his Life in Melchior Adam, ubi ſupra.

(d) Beza, in Iconibus.

[A] He was impriſoned.] Melchior Adam gives us here but a lame account, and in ſome things contrary to that of Beza. Let us rectify it, and ſay, that John Knox, not being contented with renouncing the ſchool divinity, but having alſo very freely cenſured ſeveral other things, was forced to leave Edinburgh, and eſcape to Hameſton, the only ſanctuary of the faithful at that time (1). He there (2) publiſhed a confeſſion of faith, the conſequence whereof was, that David Beton, archbiſhop of St Andrews, cauſed him to be condemned for contumacy, as a Heretic, and degraded him from the prieſthood (3), and that he would have been aſſaſſinated, had not a Scotch gentleman ſaved him. Great revolutions followed. This archbiſhop, who was alſo a cardinal, was killed: the French made themſelves maſters of the fortreſs of St Andrews: Knox fell into their hands, and obtained his deliverance, and betook himſelf to Berwick, an Engliſh town on the borders of Scotland. He there diſputed, according to Beza, with the biſhop of that place (4) illius civitatis pſeud Epiſcopo: their diſpute was referred to the parliament of England, who adjudged the victory to Knox. ‘Utroque ad ſupremum Angliæ ſenatum rejecto, (tum ‘autem Eduardus regnare cœperat) tantum effecit ut ‘victoria penes veritatem ſtante, damnaretur quidem ‘falſæ religionis pſeudepiſcopus, ipſum vero tum pie‘tas, tum diligentia magnopere commendaret (5).’ I cannot tell whether this diſpute was not the ſame with that which happened to John Knox in the dioceſe of Durham. He was obliged to ſpeak his thoughts concerning the maſs, and he expoſed, in a ſermon, with ſo much ſtrength, the blaſphemy and idolatry of that ſacrifice, that biſhop Tonſtal, and his doctors, could give him no good anſwer. I ſuſpect they have made two events of one. However, here is the proof of what I have ſaid concerning this ſermon. ‘Specimen ejus il‘luſtre depoſuit tum alias, tum anno 1550, in terra ‘Dunelmenſi: quando coactus coram Epiſcopo Tonſtal‘lo & ejus doctoribus ſuper Miſſa Pontificia opinio‘nem ſuam exponere; pro concione illius idololatrias ‘& horrendas blaſphemias tam ſolidis argumentis de‘monſtravit, ut adverſarii, quod vere opponerent, non ‘haberent (6).’ Perhaps, Knox's life (7), which I have not by me, if conſulted, would clear this matter. We ſhall, in the next place, ſee what the king did for him.

[B] He might have been made a biſhop; but he rejected it as a thing, that ſavoured too much of Antichriſtianiſm.] His zeal againſt the hierarchy appeared upon that occaſion, for this we find in Melchior Adam, at the 137th page of the lives of foreign divines. ‘Cum ‘Epiſcopatus de Regis voluntate Cnoxo eſſet oblatus, ‘indignabundus Cnoxus non ſolum honorem recuſa‘vit, ſed etiam Oratione gravi titulos illos improba‘vit, quaſi regni Antichriſtiani quiddam redolentes.’ His refuſal of ſuch an office is very much praiſed by Beza, who, doubtleſs, whatever ſome modern miniſters may ſay of it, was fully perſuaded, with his colleagues, that the equality of paſtors is of divine right, and that therefore the eccleſiaſtical hierarchy is a fundamental corruption. Here are ſome ſharp ſtrokes of Beza againſt epiſcopacy. ‘Inde Novocaſtrum ac de‘inceps Londinum ad Regem accito (Knoxo) quum ‘Epiſcopatus quidam offerretur, tantum abeſt ut illum ‘receperit, ut etiam in totam illam verè Satanicam ‘poteſtatem graviter ſit invectus, ut quæ divino jure ‘nullo nitatur, ac ne ex veteribus quidem canonibus ‘adminiſtretur: qua in re, etſi non obtinuit (quod ſi ‘in Anglia & alibi factum eſſet, id eſt ſi cauſa illa ‘Tyrannidis omnis Eccleſiaſticæ præcipua & primaria ‘eſſet ſublata, longè alia facies Eccleſiarum eſſet) con‘ſcientiam tamen ſuam ſingulari cum Chriſtianæ Mo‘deſtiæ exemplo liberavit (8). —— Knox, being ſent ‘for by the king to Newcaſtle, and afterwards to Lon‘don, and being offered a certain biſhopric, was ſo far ‘from accepting it, that he inveighed heavily againſt ‘all that truly diabolical power, as not founded on di‘vine right, nor even ſupported by the antient canons: ‘in which though he did not prevail (which if it were ‘brought about in England, and elſewhere, that is, if ‘that principal cauſe of eccleſiaſtical tyranny, were ‘taken away, the church would wear a quite different ‘face) yet he diſcharged his conſcience with a ſingular ‘inſtance of Chriſtian modeſty.’

[C] The

(1) Hameſtonum unicum tunc piorum aſylum perfugere cogeretur. Beza, in Iconibus.

(2) And not at Edinburgh, as Melchior Adam affirms, in Vitis Theol Exteror. pag. 137.

(3) Melchior Adam is guilty of a conſiderable omiſſion, in not ſaying, that Knox was a prieſt.

(4) Berwick is not an epiſcopal town: Beza expreſſes himſelf wrong.

(5) Beza, ubi ſupra.

(6) Melch. Adam. ubi ſupra, pag. 142.

(7) Written by Thomas Smeton.

(8) Beza, in Iconib. A little after he has theſe words: Non veram tantum doctrinam, ſed etiam veram & ad divini verbi normam exactam diſciplinam paſſim tum verbis, tum reipſa ſtatuerit. . . . . Sibi non in ulla gradus pſeud-Epiſcopatus tyrannide cui merito fuit inimiciſſimus, ſed in Evangelico miniſterio una cum reliquis Collegis & Preſbyteris æquo prorſus jure adminiſtrando, Joannem Lauſonium ſucceſſorem deſignatum amplexus. - - - He eſtabliſhed not only true doctrine, but even true evangelical diſcipline, both in words and facts . . . Being deſervedly an enemy to every degree of epiſcopal tyranny, and rightly diſcharging his miniſterial duty, together with the reſt of his colleagues and preſbyters, he appointed John Lauſon to ſucceed him.

thors in aſperſing him as an apoſtle, who eſtabliſhed his reformation by fire and ſword [C], and who taught the moſt ſeditious doctrines [D]. I have not been able to verify by the reading of his works, whether all that is imputed to him be true: but when I conſider the anſwers that are made for him [E], I cannot doubt, but that his opinions concerning

[C] The biſhops of England agree with the Papiſts, in aſperſing him as an apoſtle, who eſtabliſhed his reformation by fire and ſword.] Spondanus, having ſaid that Knox, an apoſtate prieſt and Monk, a corrupter of many women, and even of his mother-in-law, and a Magician, was returned into Scotland with full inſtructions from Calvin, in the year 1559, adds what follows. ‘Adeo prædicationibus ſuis & invectivis rem auxit, ut non ſolùm paſſim templa & monaſteria deſtructa fuerint, ſacra conculcata, imagines confractæ, ornamenta & bona expilata, exturbati monachi, ſacerdotes pulſi, Epiſcopi ejecti; verùm etiam omnis obedientia Regenti renunciata, omniſque auctoritas abrogata, & in quorundam, quos tanquam conſiliarios eligebant, tranſlata (9). —— He ſo far prevailed by his ſermons and invectives, that not only churches and monaſteries were demoliſhed in many places, images broken to pieces, ornaments deſtroyed, the Monks, prieſts, and biſhops driven out; but all obedience to the Regent renounced, all authority abrogated, and veſted in certain perſons, whom he pitched upon as his counſellors.’ He ſays in another place (10), relating the different opinions of thoſe, who voted concerning the deſtiny of queen Mary Stuart, that ſome, by Knox's advice, were for putting her immediately to death. Laſtly, he ſays, that king James recommended it to his ſon not to read Buchanan's libels, nor Knox's chronicle, but on the contrary to puniſh ſeverely ſuch as kept thoſe pernicious books, and to ſuppoſe, according to the doctrine of Pythagoras, that the ſouls of thoſe ſeditious authors were tranſmigrated into the bodies of ſuch as read them, or maintained their opinions, and that therefore they deſerved the ſame puniſhment, as would be juſtly inflicted upon thoſe authors, if they were raiſed from the dead. ‘Haud tamen famoſos libros Buchanani, aut Knoxii Chronica evolveret: ſed ſi quod ejuſmodi ſcriptum inveniret, cum ejus depoſitariis ex legis ſeveritate ageret. In eo Pythagoræ diſcipulum ſe profiteretur; ut exiſtimaret ipſos manes iſtorum ſeditionum flabellorum metampſychoſi quadam in eorum corpora tranſiſſe, qui eorum vel libros retinerent, vel dogmata defenderent: eoſque non minori ſupplicio plectendos, quàm ſi ipſi auctores jam à mortuis eſſent reſuſcitati (11).’ He cites the ſecond book of the Baſilicon Doron: I have conſulted it, and find nothing in it but what follows. ‘I do not mean thoſe hiſtories full of gall and invectives, thoſe defamatory libels, which ought neither to be read nor kept by your ſubjects under great penalties, which you ought to lay upon them. For in this caſe I would have you, as a diſciple of Pythagoras, believe that the ſouls of thoſe inſtigators of ſedition are paſſed into thoſe that keep their writings, and defend their opinions; who ought to be puniſhed neither more nor leſs than the authors themſelves.’ Theſe are king James's words; ſee the Baſilicon Doron. Spondanus goes beyond the bounds of an hiſtorian, when he makes king James expreſsly quote theſe two authors: he ſhould have been contented to ſay by conjecture, that this prince meant them. Let us ſee what the epiſcoparians cited by Brerley ſay; for, not being able to come at their books, I have been forced to depend on him, and to tranſcribe what he cites, whether in the body of the page or in the margin (12). ‘Et primo quidem de Joanne Knoxio . . . . notum atque ipſorum Proteſtantium teſtimonio confirmatum eſt, eum poſtquam Geneva in Scotiam rediiſſet, Religionem vi & armis ad phantaſiam ſuam ibi reformare aggreſſum eſſe, Cumque Caſtrum Sancti Andreæ clanculariis inſidiis occupaſſet *, & Cardinalem horrendo aſſaſſinatu in cubiculo ſuo occidiſſet, & ob id ſcelus a Regina Stryulingam ad jus dicendum vocatus fuiſſet †, nec compareret, perduellem declaratum eſſe. Ille vero audaciam non deponens, ſed confirmans, mox Perthæ turbas ciere. Magiſtratum Sancti Joannes & Dundeæ cum plebe ibidem tumultuante ut imagines, & Altaria, per omnes Eccleſias, & monaſteria, aliaque Religioſorum domicilia undique per circuitum diruerent, hortari: ipſe autem poſt concionem qua talia auditoribus ſuaſit, habitam, Carthuſianorum, Prædicatorum, & Carmelitarum Domos ſubvertere, Imagines & Altaria Fiſæ, Anguſæ, Mernæ, & aliis in locis deſtruere, & ſic omnes Religionis illius Eccleſias (novo ſcilicet modo) reformare pergebat. Poſt hæc inquit Bancroftus (qui & ipſius Knoxii Chronicon citatis ipſis foliis ubi ſingula facta narrantur, in teſtimonium adducit ⸸.) Alia vice coierunt reformatores ad Sancti Andreæ, ubi ex inſtigatione Knoxii pro concione tam fratrum Religioſorum domos, quam reliqua illius oppidi Monaſteria ſpoliarunt, dejecerunt, vaſtarunt. Idem Sconi, Stryulingæ, Lithquo, & Edenburgi patrarunt: Regina ob metum fugam capeſcente, duobus menſibus in campo caſtra metati ſunt, & monetæ cudendæ inſtrumenta diripuerunt, & factum defenderunt, &c. Reginam mentitam eſſe ſæpe conviciati ſunt, eamque indigniſſimis lædoriis onerarunt, eique obedientiam præſtare renuerunt, immo eam ‡ omni authoritate regali exuerunt, expreſſo inſtrumento ad id a Knoxio exarato. —— And firſt as to John Knox . . . . it is known, and confirmed by the teſtimony of the Proteſtants, that, after his return from Geneva into Scotland, he attempted to reform religion there, after his own fancy, and by force; and, that having by treachery ſeized the caſtle of St Andrews, and barbarouſly murdered the cardinal, and being ſent for by the queen to Sterling, to anſwer for that crime, and not appearing, he was declared a rebel. But he, not in the leaſt terrified, ſoon after raiſed commotions at Perth. He exhorted the magiſtrates of St John and Dundee, together with the tumultuous mob, to demoliſh the images and altars in all the churches and monaſteries round about, together with other religious houſes: and he himſelf, after a ſermon, in which he adviſed his hearers to do ſo, deſtroyed the houſes of the Carthuſians, preaching Fryars, and Carmelites, and threw down the images and altars at Fiſe, Angus, Merns, and other places; and thus went on, in this new manner, to reform all the churches of that religion. After this, ſays Bancroſt, (who alledges the chronicle of Knox himſelf, and the very pages, where each fact is mentioned, in proof of what he ſays). Another time, the Reformers met at St Andrews, where, at the inſtigation of Knox, they pulled down, and plundered all the monaſteries of that town. They did the ſame at Scoone, Sterling, Lithgow, and Edinburgh. The queen flying away thro' fear, they encamped two months in the fields, and ſeized on the mint, &c. They often reproached the queen with a lie, inſulting her after a ſhameful manner, refuſing obedience to her, and even deprived her of the regal authority by an expreſs inſtrument drawn up by Knox.’

[D] . . . . . and who taught the moſt ſeditious doctrines.] Let us hear Brerley again, page 625. ‘Summa autem opinionis ejus, ut ex ſcriptis ſuis colligitur, & ex ipſo folio pro qualibet harum aſſertionum citato patet, his propoſitionibus (quas citat Bancroftus  continetur, †† Proceres tenentur ſi modo Rex nolit, Religionem reformare. Plebis ⸸⸸ eſt Religionem reformare. ‡‡ Deus conſtituit Proceres ad effrænes Principum appetitus coercendos.  Principes ob juſtas cauſas deponi poſſunt. ††† Si Principes adverſus Deum ac veritatem ejus tyriannicè ſe gerant, ſubditi eorum à juramento fidelitatis abſolvuntur. Cum pleriſque aliis id genus dogmatibus. —— The ſum of his opinion, as is collected from his writings, and appears from the very leaf, cited for each of theſe aſſertions, is contained in theſe propoſitions, quoted by Bancroft; The nobility are obliged, if the king will not, to reform religion. It is the buſineſs of the vulgar to reform religion. God appointed the nobility to reſtrain the unbridled appetites of princes. Princes may be depoſed for juſt reaſons. If princes behave themſelves tyrannically againſt God, and his truth, their ſubjects are abſolved from their oath of fidelity. With many the like tenets.’ Compare with this the words of Petra Sancta, which ſhall be cited in the following remark.

[E] When I conſider the anſwers that are made for him.] The firſt thing I am to ſay, is, that thoſe, who defame the actions and opinions of our Knox, maliciouſly concerning the royal authority were ſuch as the epiſcopal clergy, and the Catholic party maliciouſly preſuppoſe, that he acted in concert with Calvin, and brought from Geneva the notions that he advanced in Scotland (13). With this view, they affect to produce the encomiums, which Calvin and Beza beſtowed upon him. We muſt hear Brerley, page 619. ‘ Hinc Joan. Knoxius ſcholæ ⸸⸸⸸ Genevæ diſcipulus (quem Calvinus ‡‡‡ Virum inſignem vocat & fratrem ſuum reverendum) doctrinæ Calvini probe conſcius, ex opinione Calvini & aliorum quorundam Miniſtrorum Genevæ commorantium (teſte * Sutcliffo & Bancrofto) docuit: Licere ſubditis ſi Principes nollent, immo ſi id opus eſſet, vi & armis Religionem reformare. Hinc eſt quod licet doctrina & facta Goodmanni & Knoxii ſic conjurationi faveant, ut id nulla tergiverſatione celari poſſit, eos tamen ambos Calvinus † fratres ſuos venerandos nominet, & audacem Knoxii in eo genere temeritatem laudet ⸸, quem egregiam Chriſto & Eccleſiæ operam navaſſe ait ‡, & ſe vehementer lætari dicit, quod tam fœlices & lætos progreſſus fecerit. —— Hence John Knox, a diſciple of the ſchool of Geneva, (whom Calvin calls an excellent man, and his reverend brother) being well acquainted with Calvin's doctrine, taught, agreeably to the opinion of Calvin, and other miniſters reſiding at Geneva, (as Sutcliff and Bancroft witneſs): that ſubjects are at liberty, if princes refuſe, and there be occaſion for it, to reform religion by force. Hence it is, that tho' the doctrine and actions of Goodman and Knox are ſo favourable to conſpiracy, that they cannot pretend to deny it, yet Calvin calls them both his reverend brothers, and commends the bold raſhneſs of Knox, who, he ſays, was of great ſervice to Chriſt and the church, and he rejoices greatly, he ſays, at the happy ſucceſs of his endeavoars.’ They do not forget that Beza, in Icones, calls him the apoſtle of Scotland. ‘ A quibus (Anglis), ſays Spondanus under the year 1559 n. 30. (14) ad Scotos tranſeuntibus primus occurrit magnus ille JOANNES KNOXUS, quem ſi Scotorum in vero Dei cultu inſtaurando velut Apoſtolum quendam dixero, dixiſſe me quod res eſt exiſtimabo, & ſequens vera ipſius vitæ narratio teſtabitur.’ Cardinal Richelieu, when he was yet but biſhop of Luſſon, publiſhed a book of controverſy, wherein he made great uſe of John Brerley's collections, and particularly in what relates to Knox's ſeditious opinions. I have conſulted the anſwers that were made to this book of the biſhop of Luſſon; but I confeſs, I could find nothing in them to make me ſuſpect the credit of Brerleys's citations.

---

(9) Spondanus, ad ann. 1559, n. 30, pag. 587.

(10) Ad ann. 1567, n. 3, pag. 690.

(11) Idem, Spon. ad ann. 1539, n. 7, pag. 456.

(12) Joannes Brerleius Sacerdos Anglus in Apologia Proteſtantium pro Romana Eccleſia, Tract. III, ſeq. ii, pag. 623, 624.

* Vide Holinſhedi magnum Chron. ultimæ editionis, pag. 340, initio & fine; & Bancroft. in lib. Propoſitiones, &c. pag. 15, ante medium, ubi ait: Horrenda illa Card. & Archiepiſcopi Sancti Andreæ, quippe qui & ante fuerat & tunc erat præfractus (novi ſcilicet Evangelii) adverſarius, & ejus cædes anno 1545 perpetrata, nuper ſcripto defenditur, tanquam facinus pium, aliique ad paria facinora audendum excitantur per Knoxium in Hiſtoria Scotiæ, pag. 187. - - - - The horrid murther of the cardinal and archbiſhop of St Andrews, a zealous adverſary of the new Goſpel, perpetrated in the year 1545, has been lately defended in writing as a pious action, and others are exhorted to the ſame attempts by Knox, in his Hiſtory of Scotland.

† Holinſhedus, ubi ſupra, pag. 366, b. lin. 14, 15, &c.

⸸ Bancroftus, in libro cui titulus, Aſſertiones ſandaloſæ, &c. pag. 12.

‡ Ibid. pag. 13, initio, & Sutcliffus in Reſponſione ad libellum quendam ſupplicem, pag. 193, prope finem quærit à Puritanis, Num rationes à Knoxio & Wollocko allatæ ſatis probarent, nempe Principem, ſeu Gubernatricem legitime conſtitutam, à ſubditis deponi poſſe, quemadmodum ipſi de facto Reginam Scotiæ gubernatricem regno abdicarunt? - - - Sutcliff . . . demands of the Puritans, whether the reaſons, alledged by Knox and Wollock, ſufficiently prove, that a prince, or lawful governeſs, may be depoſed by the ſubjects, as they in fact dethroned the queen of Scotland.

 In lib. cui titulus Aſſertiones ſcandaloſæ, pag. 14, 15.

†† Knoxius, Apellat. fol 25.

⸸⸸ Idem, ad plebem, fol. 49, 50.

‡‡ Idem, Hiſt. pag. 343.

 Idem, Hiſt. pag. 371.

††† Idem, ad Angliam & Scotiam, folio 76.

Peter de la Vallade, miniſter of Fontenai le Comte, publiſhed a book at Rochelle, in 1619, in 4to, intituled, ‘ An apology for the epiſtle of the miniſters of the goſpel at Paris, inſcribed to the king; in anſwer to the book, written againſt them by Armand John du Pleſſis de Richelieu, biſhop of Luſſon: containing a ſummary deciſion of the principal controverſies of this time, concerning religion, by the authority of the ſcripture, and the teſtimony of the antient doctors of the church; with a brief defence againſt the reproaches, which are made againſt the Proteſtants, on occaſion of the troubles and wars, that have happened in France, Germany, Scotland, and Denmark. extracted for the moſt part from the hiſtory of James Auguſtus Thuanus, preſident in the parliament of Paris, or from the very hiſtorians alledged and approved by the biſhop of Luſſon.’ He quotes the very words of the objection. ‘ I could, ſays the biſhop, prove your opinion in this matter by a great number of authors, if what you teach upon this ſubject was as advantageous, as it is prejudicial to you. I am contented to deſire the reader to conſult a book intituled Apologia Proteſtantium, one of the moſt uſeful books that has been printed for a long time; in which he will find more paſſages upon this ſubject, and ſome, amongſt others, which prove, that ſome of your writers have written, that by divine and humane laws, it is permitted to kill impious kings; that it is a thing agreeable to the word of God, that a private perſon, by a ſpecial inſtinct, may kill a tyrant; a doctrine every way deteſtable, which will never enter into the thoughts of the Catholic church.’ Here follows the anſwer to that objection. ‘ There was no need here, where we are only concerned in the ſearch of truth, of ſuch rhetorical flouriſhes which are only fictions and falſities; for how is it poſſible, that he ſhould have ſo many authors at hand who make us guilty of ſo deteſtable a doctrine, and yet not produce one that ſpeaks a word of it? Nay, to produce the weak proof that he has advanced, he was forced as it were to run over all the earth, and to go into the other world among the ſavages, and bring Buchanan to life again, who had his birth there: And who, yet, never made profeſſion of Divinity. How is it credible, that the biſhop ſhould be ſo moderate as not to produce thoſe many authors, becauſe it is not to our advantage, but to our prejudice; ſince he has undertaken to write againſt us? It is a prevarication to conceal what is detrimental to one's Antagoniſt, and adverſe party, and to alledge what is advantageous to him. Such diſſimulations are not becoming a biſhop, who profeſſes to ſpeak the truth; he ſhould not have ſpared us, ſince the buſineſs was to make us acknowledge our fault in ſo important a point; he ſhould not have referred us to the Apologia Proteſtantium, which book I never ſaw, nor know where to find it, but I know very well, that the author of it, if he be one of ours, does not ſpeak as the biſhop ſays he does; but if he be one of their writers, he advances this of his own head, and has no good proof for it (15).’ It is manifeſt that this anſwer does not at all clear John Knox. Another miniſter (16), much more learned than he of Fontenai le Comte, anſwered the biſhop of Luſſon: he had (17) read John Brerley's book, and gives a ſatisfactory anſwer to the objections grounded on ſome paſſages of Calvin: but he forſakes John Knox, and maintains, that the encomiums, which Calvin and Beza give him, no ways concern his notions about the royal authority, nor his particular actions, in which ſome footſteps of rebellion might be found. This miniſter's words are theſe (18). ‘ As for Knox, Goodman, and Buchanan, the occaſion and time, in which they wrote, leſſen in ſome meaſure the odium of the doctrine, which they ſpread in Scotland, inconſiderately and againſt the truth; which their anger, natural to that nation, and the general troubles of the ſtate, hindered them from diſtinctly diſcovering; according to the cuſtom of men, who chuſe rather, even with ſharpneſs and obſtinacy, to defend an ill thing, in which they are engaged thro' paſſion, and without any ill will, than to confeſs what has been ill done, or ill contrived, either by themſelves or their party. Notwithſtanding thoſe exceſſes, they were all three great men, and in other things very ſerviceable; Buchanan particularly in tutoring the king of Great Britain, and the others in the work of the miniſtry, to which they ſhould have been entirely and wholly dedicated. Granting then that Calvin  (in the letters that he wrote to them) called the two firſt Brethren and excellent men; and that Beza gave . . . . . the firſt . . . the title of Reſtorer of the goſpel in Scotland; doth this prove, that they ſubſcribed to their opinions concerning the ſupream authority of kings, or that they were communicated to them, or that they ſo much as knew what paſſed in Scotland after the change of religion, or that our adverſaries go upon good grounds, in affirming, againſt the truth, that the books of Knox and Goodman were printed at Geneva with the approbation of Beza and Calvin. If thoſe gentlemen are pleaſed to prove what they certify upon their bare word, and to aver, that the miniſters of Geneva communicated with the abovenamed in other than eccleſiaſtical things, or that they were informed of their particular opinions concerning the rights of kings, or that they truly underſtood, and afterwards approved, what they have taught concerning politics, then they ſhall have liberty to complain. But, on the contrary, it appears, from the letters cited in the biſhop of Luſſon's little book, that the miniſters of Geneva never gave, nor received advice from foreigners, except in matters purely eccleſiaſtical; and particularly (from thoſe, which Beza wrote to Knox) that at Geneva they had no certain news of the Scotch tranſactions . . . . If therefore Calvin, Beza, Whitaker, or ſome others of our religion, have called Knox and Goodman their brethren, it does not follow from thence that they adopted their opinions, but only that they called them ſo,

(13) See Spondan. ad ann. 1559, n. 30.

⸸⸸⸸ Sic Bancroftus in Aſſertionibus, ſeditioſis, pag. 10, initio.

‡‡‡ Calvin. in Epiſt. & Reſponſ. Epiſt. cccv, fine: & pag. 565, in concluſione illius Epiſtolæ quæ ad Knoxium ſcribitur, ubi ſic habet: Vale eximie vir, & ex animo colende frater. Et Beza, in Epiſt. Theolog. Epiſt. lxxiv, ſic habet: Joanni Knoxio Evangelii apud Scotos reſtauratori, fratri, & ſymmiſtæ obſervando.

* Vide hoc in Hiſt. Eccleſiæ Scotiæ per Vautrouielleirum, pag. 213, & citatur à Sutcliffo in Reſponſ. ad Libellum ſupplicem, pag. 102, & 71. In Aſſertionibus, &c. pag. 10.

† Calvinus, ut ſupra, ad ‡‡‡: & vide Calvin. Epiſt. cccvi, ubi eum virum eximium vocat, fratrem colendum, & Knoxio coadjutorem fidelem.

⸸ Calvinus, Epiſt. ubi ſupra, pag. 566, circa med. ait, Strenuè operam ſuam Chriſto & Eccleſiæ impendit.

‡ Calvinus, ubi ſupra, Epiſt. cccv, Joanni Knoxio, pag. 565, ait: Evangelium apud vos tam fœlices lætoſque progreſſus facere vehementer, ut par eſt, lætor: certamina vobis moveri non novum eſt, ſed eo clarius refulget Dei virtus, &c. quando ad reſiſtendum pares nunquam fuiſſetis, niſi à cœlis vobis opem tuliſſet, qui ſuperior eſt toto mundo.

(14) Quoting Beza's own words.

(15) La Vallade, Apologie, pag. 544.

(16) David Blondel. His anſwer, printed at Sedan, 1610, in 8*vo, is intituled:* Modeſte Declaration de la Sincerité & Verité des Egliſes Reformées de France.

(17) See his anſwer, pag 287.

(18) Blondel, pag. 294.

 There are but five Letters written to Knox, three of Calvin, and two of Beza: One of Calvin to Goodman, and one of Beza to Buchanan. There is not one word of advice about ſtate affairs to be found in any of them.

party charged him with. Some aſcribe to him a ſpirit of prophecy [F]. It is, doubtleſs, doing ſome ſervice to the memory of John Knox, to ſhew the extravagancies of thoſe, who have aſperſed his reputation. This obliges me to ſet down a paſſage of Thevet wherein we ſhall ſee ſuch groſs and outrageous abuſes [G], as will alone be ſufficient ſo, with reſpect to the eccleſiaſtical office, with which they were inveſted. If they praiſed them, they did it only according to their knowledge, not becauſe they thought them impeccable; for it is not impoſſible, but that, amongſt thoſe, who preach Chriſt (as St Paul ſays to the Philippians) ſome ſhould preach him out of envy and contention, and mix the fervour of their zeal with their infirmities; amongſt which if the lord frequently accompliſhes his work, drawing light from darkneſs, and order from confuſion; it is that the glory of what is well done may belong to his conduct, and the evil to the imperfections of his inſtruments.' Is not this to acknowledge, that Brerley, and thoſe he quotes, have not calumniated Knox with reſpect to the opinions they impute to him?

Juſt as the biſhop of Luſſon had made uſe of John Brerley's collections, the Jeſuit Petra Sancta, ſome time after, made uſe of this biſhop's book, to object againſt du Moulin, what ſeveral Proteſtants had ſaid about the obedience of ſubjects. Here follows what he alledged againſt Knox (19); 'Si principes, inquit ††, adverſus Deum & veritatem ejus tyrannicè ſe gerant, ſubditi eorum à juramento fidelitatis abſolventur. Idem præter alia multa. Illud, inquit, audacter affirmaverim, debuiſſe Nobiles, Rectores, Judices, Populumque Anglicanum, non ſolùm reſiſtere & repugnare Mariæ illi Jezabel, quam vocant Reginam ſuam; verùm etiam de eâ & Sacerdotibus ejus, & aliis omnibus, quotquotei auxilium tulerunt, mortis ſupplicium ſumere, ut primùm cœperunt Evangelium Chriſti ſupprimere. ——— If princes behave themſelves tyrannically againſt GOD and his truth, their ſubjects are abſolved from their oath of fidelity. He goes on: This I boldly aſſert, that the nobles, rulers, judges, and people of England, ought not only to have reſiſted that Jezabel, Mary, whom they call their queen, but even to have put to death her, and her prieſts, and all who were aſſiſting to her, as ſoon as ever they began to ſuppreſs the goſpel of CHRIST.' What did Mr du Moulin reply? He made no mention of John Knox, but was contented to ſay, that Buchanan, whom the Jeſuit alſo ſpoke of, had only treated of the right of the Scotch, and that, if other authors had run into exceſs, it ought to be aſcribed to their particular temper, and not to the ſpirit of their religion (20). Rivetus, in his anſwer to the ſame Jeſuit, referred him to the two abovementioned books written againſt the biſhop of Luſſon, and expreſsly declared, that the Proteſtants diſapproved the opinions of John Knox, and of others like him, who had rather acted according to the ſpirit of their nation, than according to the ſpirit of their religion. Upon which he obſerves (21), that of the 105 kings, who reigned in Scotland before Mary Stuart, there had been three depoſed, five expelled, and thirty two killed. 'Nemini noſtrum probantur quæ vel ex Goodmanno, vel ex Knoxo, vel ex Buchanano in eam ſententiam deſcribuntur, quamvis eò uſque non procedant, quo Jeſuitæ proceſſerunt, vel alii qui in Gallia ſcripſerunt de Juſta Henrici tertii abdicatione, & etiamnum in Belgio foventur, ubi ſcribit Jeſuita Romanus. Id prætereà obſervandum eſt, ſi quæ duriſſimis perſecutionum temporibus à Scotis & Anglis nonnullis temerè ſcripta fuerunt, ea poſſe imputari non tam Religioni, quam nationum illarum, Scoticanæ præſertim, fervido ingenio, & ad audendum prompto: quod tamen valde mitigatum fuiſſe accenſa veritatis Evangelicæ luce, ex eo conſtat, quod ex centum quinque regibus ſuis, uſque ad Mariam, tres exautorarunt, quinque expulerunt, & triginta duos necarunt: quod ne religioni imputetur magis veſtra intereſt, quam noſtra (22).' After this, I may be allowed to believe, that Knox's books contain the propoſitions, which Brerley quoted out of them upon the credit of the epiſcopalians.

[F] Some aſcribe to him a ſpirit of prophecy.] Petra Sancta having mentioned the praiſes, which Calvin and Beza beſtowed upon Knox, adds (23), à Witakero ex omnium Scotorum ſententia, Spiritu Prophetico, & Apoſtolico præditus appellatur. David Blondel (24) ſays ſomething more particular; 'endowed with a prophetical ſpirit, by which as it is reported by thoſe of his nation he foretold many things that are come to paſs, as Whitaker obſerves in his writings.'

[G] Here is a paſſage of Thevet, wherein we ſhall ſee groſs and outrageous abuſes.] This man might paſs for a ſtripped Monk, though he always profeſſed himſelf a Catholic. No one can queſtion that he was a bad compiler. He was ſo little exact, that, when he undertook to write of the affairs of Scotland, he did not ſo much as give himſelf the trouble to obſerve the true names of perſons. You will ſee, that he knew not the right name of our John Knox. 'All this while, ſays he (25), the Scotch ſuffered not England to be at reſt; which happened, when Henry VIII plaid his pranks with chalices, relics, and other ornaments of the Engliſh churches: which tragedies and ſports have been plaid in our time in the kingdom of Scotland, by the inſtigation of Noptz, the firſt Scotch miniſter of the bloody goſpel. This diaphoriſt, who was fond of diſſentions, was not contented to tread in the ſteps of Luther, Zuinglius, and Farel, much leſs in thoſe of his maſter Calvin, who had lately redeemed him from the gallies of the prior of Capua, in which he had remained three years for his crimes, unlawful amours, and execrable whoredoms, and for his diſſolute life, and for having been convicted of parricide and murther, committed upon the perſon of James de Beton, archbiſhop of St Andrews, by the connivance and treachery of the earl of Ropphol, James Leſcle, John Leſcle their uncle, and William du Coy. This Simoniſt, who had been a prieſt before in our church, and fattened with benefices, which he ſold for ready money, ſeeing he could not prove his cauſe to be good, fell into the moſt horrid blaſphemy in the world. Firſt, he denied the power of GOD; he preached openly, that virginity was no better than marriage: which he had ſtolen from Luther's hereſy, out of his new Epithalamium. Likewiſe he induced many devout wives, and religious virgins, to proſtitute themſelves. He taught likewiſe, that we muſt reject, deſpiſe, and trample under foot the holy criſm, pull down images, take up and burn the bodies of ſaints, and ſeize the treaſures of the church. This is not all. He did not ceaſe for two years to animate the people to take up arms againſt the queen, to drive her out of the kingdom, which he ſaid was elective, as it had been in the days of Paganiſm. Could the greateſt Barbarians in the world ſay any thing more cruel and miſchievous . . . . . The Lutherans have temples and oratories; their miniſters ſing pſalms and ſay maſs; and, though it be different from ours, yet they add to it, Kyrie Eleiſon, Credo, Sanctus, Agnus, and other prayers like ours. In like manner their miniſters in the time of divine ſervice, wear copes, chaſubles, and ſurplices like ours: being careful of their ſalvation, and of the public weal. Whereas the people of Scotland have lived theſe twelve years without law, without faith, without ceremonies, and without acknowledging either king or queer, any more than brutes, being better pleaſed with the fables of this rank hypocrite of Noptz, a man unfaithful to GOD and his country, than with the purity of the goſpel, the canons of the councils, and the doctrine of ſo many holy Greek and Latin doctors of the Catholic church. This fine preacher, after the deceaſe of his firſt wife, ſuddenly provoked with his venomous tongue the nobility of Scotland to ſet up againſt the clergy, more than he had done before; and then the clowns aſſaulted, plundered, burnt, and ruined the caſtles and houſes of the gentlemen, merchants, and others, who would not join in their debaucheries and murthers . . . . . It is certain, that this traitor, puffed up with the ſpirit of ambition, and prompted by the fleſh, came into ſo great credit and honour with the ignorant people of that country, that he married for his ſecond wife a gentlewoman of an antient family, related to the Scotch princes of the royal blood.' Are not authors, who write with ſo little judgment, well qualified to make us queſtion the truths they advance, ſuppoſe any ſuch eſcape them?

(19) Silveſter Petra Sancta, Not. in Epiſtol. Molinæi ad Balzacum, pag 104. That book was printed at Antwerp, in 1634, in 8vo.

†† In Admonit. ad Nobil. & Pop. Scot. atque Angliæ.

(20) Buchananus ſcripſit de jure regni apud Scotos, ſed hoc nihil ad Galliam, Angliam, Germaniam, Hiſpaniam. Nec ſi quis aliquid ſcripſit quod modum excedat, debet continuo adſcribi ejus religioni, potius quam ejus genio. Nam ejuſmodi libri quos citat Jeſuita, ſive veri ſive falſi, nullam præferunt fronte approbationem Doctorum. Petrus Molinæus in Hyperaſpiſte, lib. iii, cap. xi, pag. 492.

(21) David Blondel had already obſerved it, ubi ſupra, pag. 213.

(22) Rivet. in Caſtigation. Notarum, in Epiſtol. ad Balzacum, cap. xiii, n. 14. Oper. Tom. III, pag. 539.

(23) Petra Sancta, ubi ſupra, p. 105. He cites Witak. Contr. 2. q 5, cap. xiii.

(24) Blondel, ubi ſupra, pag 295. He quotes Witaker, de Eccl. q' 5, cap. xiii.

(25) Thevet, Coſmographie Univerſelle, livr. xvi, Tom. II, fol. 666.

ſufficient to prejudice us againſt whatever the Catholic writers have publiſhed concerning that great Scotch reformer. I wiſh it were as eaſy to confute the accuſation of a Lutheran, who charges him with inconſtancy [H].

[H] The accuſation of a Lutheran, who charges him with inconſtancy.] James Thomaſius, profeſſor of Leipſic, publiſhed a little diſcourſe, intituled, Hiſtoria affectuum ſe miſcentium Controverſiæ de Gynæcocratia. He there ſpeaks of the paſſions that attend the diſpute concerning the government of women; and he ſays, that this queſtion was warmly debated in the XVIth century, when Mary ſucceeded Edward king of England, and Elizabeth ſucceeded her ſiſter Mary. Thoſe two queens took oppoſite methods, as to religion; the one baniſhed the Non-Catholics, the other recalled them, and made the Reformation triumph. Thoſe, whom Mary had perſecuted, maintained, that it was contrary to natural right, and divine and human laws, that a woman ſhould rule over a whole nation; but their language was quite different under the reign of queen Elizabeth. See how Schluſſelburgius inſulted hereupon our Knox and others. ‘ Qui Calvini placita ſequerentur, his nihil erat magis exoſum fœmineo Mariæ regimine; iiſdem viciſſim, ubi ad clavum Reip. feliciter evectam conſpexiſſent Eliſabetham, nihil magis venerabilè, quàm Regina talis. Atque ut hoc de ſuo Schluſſelburgius *, magnæ conſtantiæ doctrinæque Theologus, largiatur mihi, ex eadem Calvini religione Gilbius, Goodman & Knoxus, (qui ſcilicet exilium ſuum Mariæ imputabant) publicis libris Genevæ impreſſis, docuerunt, eſſe contrà jus naturale, divinum, & humanum, ut mulier etiam in rebus politicis regnet. At ubi Mariæ imperium Eliſabetha excepiſſet, eximia & Pontificiorum hoſtis, & Calviniſequarum fautrix, protinus verſo remigio à Reformatis Anglis, non regina tantùm in temporalibus illa eſt proclamata, ſed etiam caput Eccleſiæ in ſpiritualibus. Ita ſpacio duorum annorum (ipſiſſima Schluſſelburgii verba recito,) quod prius fuit Calviniſtis Genevæ moratis ipſiſſimum verbum D E I, mox atque in Angliam redierunt, mutatum eſt in verbum Diaboli. Tantum videlicet potuit amor in religionem, quam ſub alterius fœminæ regno conculcatam viderent, ſub alterius reſurgentem, ut à perſonis in ipſum imperii genus deflectente ſe affectu jam proſcriberent Gynæcocratiam, jam dignitati ac famæ reſtituerent (26). ——— To thoſe who followed Calvin's tenets, nothing was more odious than the female government of Mary; and the ſame perſons, when they ſaw Elizabeth happily raiſed to the throne, thought nothing more venerable than ſuch a queen. And as Schluſſelburgius, a divine of great conſtancy and learning, affords me this, ſo, out of the ſame religion of Calvin, Gilbius, Goodman, and Knox, (who imputed their baniſhment to Mary) taught, in public books, printed at Geneva, that it was contrary to natural, divine, and human laws, that a woman ſhould govern even in political matters. But, when Elizabeth ſucceeded Mary, an eminent adverſary of the Pope's, and favourer of the Calviniſts, immediately the Reformed Engliſh proclaimed her not only queen in temporal matters, but even head of the church in ſpirituals. Thus in the ſpace of two years (they are the very words of Schluſſelburgius) what was before, to the Calviniſts reſiding at Geneva, the very word of God, as ſoon as they returned to England, was changed into the word of the devil. Such was the force of of the love of religion, which they ſaw oppreſſed during the reign of one of theſe women, and reviving under that of the other, that, turning their affection from the perſons to the kind of government itſelf, they one while proſcribed female government, another time reſtored it to it's dignity and credit.’ Thomaſius, who furniſhes me with theſe words, pretends that the Calviniſts of France changed alſo their maxims, after the perſecution they ſuffered under Charles IX: and he expreſly cites Lambert Danæus, who on the one hand declared againſt the monarchical power, and on the other for the authority of women, in favour of Elizabeth queen of England. ‘ Ut Anglico regimini præ Gallico faveret (Danæus) illud maxime fecit, quòd ſuæ ſectæ hominibus & ſub Elizabetha lautiſſima eſſet fortuna, & ſub Carolo Gallo vix aliud præter gladium, crucem, ignis exſpectandum. Notæ ſunt Pariſinæ nuptiæ † eo actæ eventu, ut ab illis maximè temporibus ſcriptores Galli peſtilentem inciperent in Politica doctrina ſectam ſive novam condere, ſive ſepultam reſuſcitare, quam ſolemus vocare Monarchomachorum. Huic nomen addixit etiam ſuum Danæus: ut mirari aliquis poſſit, quomodo ſcriptor ille, qui vix Regem æquo animo pati poſſet in ſolio Monarchico, ferre in eodem potuerit Reginam. Nempe vereor, ut non hic ſuas partes egerit hinc odium in perfidiam Galli, illinc amor tùm in feliciſſimam Eliſabethæ gubernationem ‡, tùm in Religionem Calvini, cui perſugium eâ tempeſtate in iſtâ inſulâ ſatis tutum erat (27). —— Danæus, that he might favour the Engliſh government above the French, brought it about, that thoſe of his ſect ſhould expect the mildeſt treatment under Elizabeth, and nothing but perſecution under Charles. The Pariſian nuptials are well known, attended with this event, that, from that time eſpecially, the French writers began, in their politics, either to found a new ſect, or revive an old one, which we call antimonarchy men, or republicans. Danæus inliſted with this ſect: ſo that one might wonder, how this writer, who can ſcarce bear a king on the throne of monarchy, yet can bear a queen on it. I ſuſpect, that he is influenced, on the one hand, by reſenting the perfidy of the French king, and, on the other, by affection for the happy government of Elizabeth, and the religion of Calvin, which met with an Aſylum in that iſland.’ It is certain, that, in that century, the general affairs whirled about in ſuch a manner, both in France and England, that each party changed their maxims. See the remark [I] of the article HOTMAN. The Roman Catholics, who ſpoke very ill of the government of women in the reign of Elizabeth, had very much commended it in the reign of queen Mary. Knox, and ſome others, on the other ſide, had the ſame inconſtancy. The Roman Catholics, under Charles IX, preached nothing ſo much as ſubmiſſion to the authority of the king (28); but they ſpoke and did quite the contrary in the time of the League, and their adverſaries thought it very ſtrange. I have read, in Savaron, a thing which I thought very curious (29). ‘ Pedro Corneio, a Spaniard . . . thinks it ſtrange and wonderful, that this town (30) ſhould have remained firm in it's fidelity to it's prince, and that the late troubles did not diſturb it's conſtancy, nor ſhake it's reſolution: ſince, ſays he, it is a very Catholic town, and beautified with a church, in which GOD is ſerved with great modeſty, ceremony, and muſic, and as much reverenced, as in any church I have ſeen.’ Generally ſpeaking, it is a proof, that the paſſions make men ſpeak either for or againſt the right of princes, to ſee the ſame people diſputing for the affirmative or negative, juſt as the intereſts of their cauſe happen to change.

* Lib. iv, Theol. Calviniſt. pag. 324, 325. Conf. Reſponſ. ad Calvin. & Bez. pro Franciſco Balduino, pag. 75.

(26) Jacobus Thomaſius, in Præfatione 56, pag. 328. Edit. Lipſ. 1681.

† Anni 1572.

‡ Hoc noſtro tempore (inquit Polit. Chriſtian. lib. vi, cap. iii, pag. 398) ELISABETHÆ, Sereniſſimæ Anglorum Reginæ, imperio nihil ulla unquam ætas vidit felicius & optatius. —— At this time, ELIZABETH reigned with the greateſt glory and ſucceſs.

(27) Thomaſ. ibid. pag. 331.

(28) See the remark [E] of the article SAINCTES.

(29) John Savaron, Traicté contre les Maſques, pag. 44. Paris Edit. 1611. He quotes Breve Relation de la Liga, en Brucellas en las caſas de Roger Velpio, 1591.

(30) Clermont in Auvergne.

KNUZEN (Matthias) a native of the country of Holſtein (a), arrived to ſuch a degree of extravagancy, as publickly to maintain Atheiſm, and undertook great journies to gain proſelytes. He was a reſtleſs man, who diſcovered his impieties firſt at Konigſberg in Pruſſia (b). He boaſted, that he had a great number of perſons of his opinion in the principal towns of Europe [A], and even ſeven hundred in the ſingle

(a) Oldenſworta Eiderſtadienſis. Moller. Iſagoge ad Hiſtor. Cherſon. Cimbr. Part. III, pag. 164.

(b) Tobias Pfannerus, Syſtem. Theologiæ gentilis, pag. 35.

[A] He boaſted, that he had a great number of perſons of his opinion in the principal towns of Europe.] Theſe are his words. ‘ Nemo homo mihi vitio vertet, ſi una cum meis gregalibus, (quorum innumerus mihi numerus Lutetiæ, Amſtelodami, Lugduni, in Anglia, Hamburgi, Hafniæ, nec non Holmiæ, imo Romæ & in contiguis locis adſtipulatur) univerſa Biblia bellæ fabellæ loco habeam, qua belluæ, id eſt, Chriſtiani, rationem captivantes, & cum ratione inſanientes delectantur (1). —— No one will impute it to me as a crime, if, with my companions (an infinite number of whom, at Paris, Amſterdam, Leyden, in England

(1) Apud Micrælium Syntagm. Hiſtor. Eccleſ. pag. 2291. Edit. 1699.

ſingle town of Iëna (c). His ſect was called the Conſcientiaries, becauſe he ſaid, there was no other God, religion, or lawful magiſtracy, than conſcience, which teaches all men the three precepts of Juſtice, to do no injury, to live honeſtly, and give every one his due. He drew up a ſummary of his ſyſtem, in a ſhort letter, of which ſeveral copies were ſpread [B]. It is dated from Rome. You will find it entire in the laſt editions of Micrælius. He diſperſed alſo ſome German writings (d). All this was confuted in the ſame tongue, by John Muſæus, a Lutheran profeſſor [C]. This ſect began about the year 1673.

A book was printed againſt Knuzen at Wittemberg in the year 1677 [D].

(b) See, below, citat. (4).

(d) Mollerus, ubi ſupra, p. 165.

'England, at Hamburgh, Copenhagen, Stockholm, and 'even at Rome, and the adjacent places, agree with me 'in opinion) I look upon the whole Bible as a fine invented tale, with which the beaſts, that is the Chri'ſtians, captivating their reaſon, and running reaſon-mad, 'are delighted.' We muſt not imagine, that he uſed the ſtratagem of ſtate-conſpirators, who, to bring more people over to their party, always pretend they have a vaſt number of accomplices. It is more probable he ſpoke in this manner, becauſe that he was a hair-brained fool.

[B] He drew up a ſummary of his ſyſtem in a ſhort letter, of which ſeveral copies were ſpread (2).] Micrælius's continuator has reduced the contents of that letter to ſix articles. I. Non eſſe Deum neque Dia'bolum. II. Magiſtratum nihil æſtimandum, templa 'contemnenda, Sacerdotes rejiciendos. III. Loco 'Magiſtratus & loco Sacerdotum eſſe ſcientiam & ra'tionem cum conſcientia conjunctam, quæ doceat ho'neſte vivere, neminem lædere, & ſuum cuique tri'buere. IV. Conjugium à ſcortatione nihil differre. 'V. Unicam eſſe vitam: poſt hanc nec præmium 'nec pœnam dari. VI. Scripturam ſacram ſecum ip'ſam pugnare (3). ——— I. That there is neither 'God, nor Devil. II. That the magiſtrates are to be 'looked upon as nothing, the churches are to be deſpi'ſed, and the prieſts rejected. III. That knowledge 'and reaſon, together with conſcience, which teaches to 'live honeſtly, to hurt no body, and give every one 'his own, is in the room of magiſtrates and prieſts. 'IV. That there is no difference between marriage and 'whoring. V. That there is but one life: that after 'the preſent there is neither reward nor puniſhment. 'VI. That the Scripture contradicts itſelf.' This ſyſtem, beſides its horrible impiety, is alſo plainly extravagant; for one muſt be ſtark mad, to believe that mankind can ſubſiſt without magiſtrates. It is true, they would not be neceſſary, if all men would follow the dictates of conſcience, which this impious man exhibits to us; but are they followed even in thoſe countries, where the judges puniſh, with the greateſt ſeverity, the injuſtice done to our neighbour? I do not know but it may be ſaid, that there is no impertinence, be it never ſo extravagant, but may teach us ſome truth or other. The follies of this German ſhew us, that the ideas of natural religion, the ideas of virtue, the impreſſions of reaſon, in a word, the light of conſcience, may ſubſiſt in the mind of man, even after the ideas of the exiſtence of God, and the firm belief of a life to come, are extinguiſhed in it.

[C] He was confuted by John Muſæus, a Lutheran profeſſor.] The author I have this from, obſerves, that Muſæus engaged in this work, to remove all ſuſpicions that might be entertained to the diſadvantage of the univerſity of Iëna: for this wretched man had boaſted of abundance of aſſociates there (4). That book of Muſæus contains a great many ridiculous things, concerning the life of this ſpark; but, if you would have a ſolid apology for the ſcripture againſt the blaſphemies of this man, you muſt have recourſe to the ſecond edition. And if you underſtand High-Dutch, conſult, as Mr Mollerus adviſes (5), the book, which he names (6), and obſerve his reflexion. He ſays, that if people continue to make their enemies ſuſpected of Atheiſm, as the author of this piece with a haſty zeal, and mixed with his paſſions, has done, they will afford matter enough to Mr Chriſtian Thomaſius, who is about an apology for thoſe, who have been unjuſtly expoſed to ſuch accuſations. The author of ſeveral Thoughts upon Comets has inſinuated (7) the deſign of ſuch a work, and given a curious idea of it. But let Mr Mollerus's words inform us of the malignity of ſuch ſort of accuſers. 'Quo in opere op'tandum eſſet ut Theol. celeberrimus (Jo. Mullerus 'Antiſtes Hamb.) ſuo in Antagoniſtas odio minus indul'ſiſſet, nec per inſignem animi impotentiam, Schuppii 'τȣ̃ μακαρίτȣ Demegorias, piis omnibus commen'datiſſimas, & Chriſt. Hoburgii, ad extremum Atheiſ'mo contrarium, ſuperſtitionem ſc. & Enthuſiaſmum, 'proclivioris, ſcripta collo obtorto iis, quæ Atheiſ'mum vel occultant, vel quadamtenus promovent, 'aggregaſſet. Certe, ſi zelo hujuſmodi præcipiti, pri'vatiſque affectibus obnoxio, Theologi Atheomaſtiges 'ſibi inviſos in ſuſpicionem impietatis Atheiſmo affi'nis pergent adducere, vereor ne calamo Chriſt. 'Thomaſii ϖαῤῥησιαϛικῷ, Gabr. Naudæi (qui ma'giæ reis eſt patrocinatus) exemplo apologiam pro 'Atheiſmi falſo inſimulatis parturienti, campus ſe pan'dat ampliſſimus innocentiam illorum, cum hominum 'cordatorum applauſu, vindicandi (8). —— In which 'work, it were to be wiſhed, that the famous divine, 'John Mollerus, Antiſtes at Hamburgh, had leſs in'dulged his hatred towards his adverſaries, and had 'not perverſely, ranked among the writers, who conceal 'Atheiſm, or in ſome meaſure promote it, the Deme'goriæ of Schuppius, ſo acceptable to pious men, and 'the works of Chriſtopher Hoburgius, who is more in'clined to ſuperſtition and enthuſiaſm, the very reverſe 'of Atheiſm. Certainly, if the divines, who write a'gainſt Atheiſm, go on, through ſuch a raſh and partial 'zeal, to charge with atheiſtical principles thoſe whom 'they hate, I fear, leſt, after the example of Gabriel 'Naudé, who defended thoſe accuſed of Magic, the 'free pen of Chriſtopher Thomaſius may find ample oc'caſion to juſtify, with the approbation of all ſenſible 'men, the innocence of thoſe, who are falſly accuſed of 'Atheiſm.'

[D] A book was printed againſt Knuzen at Wittemberg, in 1677.] The title of it is, Exercitationes Academicæ II de Atheiſmo Renato des Cartes & Matthiæ Knuzen oppoſitæ. Autore Valentino Greiſſingio Corona-Tranſſylvano Elector. Saxon. alumno. This I have from a book of Caſpar Sagittarius (9).

(2) Hæc epiſtola plus millies deſcripta eſt. Micral. ubi infra.

(3) Micræl. Syntagm. Hiſt. Eccleſ. pag. 2289. Edit. 1699.

(4) Blaſphemiis ſuis . . . . in ſolo oppido Jenenſi 700 cives atque ſtudioſos falſo jactabat adſtipulari. Mollerus, Iſagoge ad Hiſtor. Cherſon. Cimbr. Part. III, pag. 166.

(5) Ib. pag. 167.

(6) Atheiſmus devictus. It was printed in the year 1672. The author calls himſelf Jo. Mullerus, Antiſtes Hamburgenſis.

(7) In the preface to the Addition printed at Rotterdam, 1694.

(8) Mollerus, ibid.

(9) Intituled, Introductio in Hiſtoriam Eccleſiaſticam, pag. 8-9. It was printed in 1694, in 4*to*.

K O N I G (George Matthias) in Latin Konigius, profeſſor of Poetry, and of the Greek tongue, and library-keeper in the univerſity of Altorf, deſerves a place here in a particular manner; for I ſhould be ungrateful, ſhould I not acknowledge, that the book he publiſhed in the year 1678 (a) is of conſiderable uſe to me. I make no doubt that it is ſerviceable to a great many men of letters, notwithſtanding the cenſure that was paſſed upon it [A]. Our Konig died towards the end of the year 1698,

(a) Intituled, Bibliotheca vetus & nova, in fol. I often quote it, and ſometimes I criticiſe upon it.

[A] The cenſure that was paſſed upon it.] John Mollerus, a very learned man, who publiſhed at Hamburg, in the yeat 1691, an Iſagoge ad hiſtoriam Cherſoneſi Cimbricæ, had given us, four years before, Cimbriæ literatæ Prodromus, wherein, according to the liberty which ought to prevail among the ſubjects of the Republic of Letters, he freely ſpoke his thoughts as to the defects which he found in Konig's book. Daniel William Mollerus, an Hungarian, and profeſſor of Metaphyſics and Hiſtory, in the univerſity of Altorf, immediately oppoſed the Critic, and yet could not deny, but that part of the faults, obſerved by him, were real. Now ſee what the Critic in general pretends, as he explains himſelf in a preface (1). 'Innumeros in opere 'Konigiano autores eſſe omiſſos, de Antiquis pauciſ'ſima ſatiſque confuſe in medium allata, è Recentio'rum,

(1) In the preface to the Iſagoge ad Hiſtoriam Cherſoneſi Cimbricæ.

1698, being eighty two years old (b). He was ſon of GEORGE KONIG (c), a native of Amberg, who died in 1654, after he had taught Divinity thirty eight years in the univerſity of Altorf.

'rum, etiam Polygraphorum Scriptis quamplurimis plerumque vix unius aut alterius factam mentionem, ac raro Synopticam aliquam de Autoris patria, ætate, ac vita, librique editi loco ac tempore, narrationem adjectam, manifeſtius eſt, quam ut latere lectorem eruditum, aut negari ab homine candido poſſit. Nomina etiam ſæpius, uti in Prodromo monui, & ſcripta falſa auctoribus eſſe attributa, circa patriam atque vitam illorum erratum, inedita pro editis venditata, & ex uno ſcriptore duos aut tres inepte procuſos, exemplis plurimis ὀφθαλμοφανερῶς poſſem oſtendere, ſi in expurgando hoc Augiæ ſtabulo tempus pariter atque operam vellem perdere, aut ſordes illius in præfationem hanc convectare. —— That innumerable authors are omitted in Konig's work, that but few of the antients are produced, and thoſe very confuſedly, that of the moderns, even thoſe who have written many works, the writings of one or two at moſt are mentioned, and that there is ſeldom added a ſuccinct account of the author's country, age, and life, and of the time and place of the publication of his works, is ſo plain, that it cannot eſcape the learned reader, nor be denied by any man of candour. That he likewiſe aſcribes falſe names, and falſe works, to authors, as I obſerved in the Prodromus, that he miſtakes as to their country and life, that he pretends books were publiſhed, which never were, and ignorantly ſplits one author into two or three, I could demonſtrate by many inſtances, if I would loſe my time and my labour in cleanſing this Augean ſtable, or transfer it's filth into this preface.' He adds, that, in this, he agrees in judgment with many learned men of the firſt rank. 'Agnoverunt eandem, quotquot ex chori literarii primiceriis, de Opere Konigiano, aut eadem mecum, aut his etiam aſperiora judicarunt. Petrus ſcil. Lambecius, non alio, quam Rhapſodi, titulo Autorem dignatus †, Dan. Georg. Morhofius ⸸, & (qui meum de eodem judicium ſuo verbotenus adjecit) Ἀκριβέϛατος Wilh. Ern. Tenzelius ‡, alii item complures, quorum verba allegare ſuperſedeo, cum rerum teſtimonia ipſi adverſario, nolenti volenti, veritatis confeſſionem extorſerint. Non audet enim is Bibliothecam hanc, cui patrocinatur, veterem ac novam pro accurata, aut tali, quæ Seculi applauſum mereatur, venditare, ſed fatetur nomen in iſta interdum cum nomine eſſe confuſum, errata nonnulla commiſſa, & Autores aliquot omiſſos, in qua ipſius confeſſione acquieſco. —— The ſame has been acknowledged by ſuch learned men, as have paſſed the like, or even a more ſevere, judgment on Konig's work. To wit, Peter Lambecius, who thinks the author deſerves no other title than that of Rhapſodiſt; Daniel George Morhofius, and the moſt accurate William Tenzelius, who added, word for word, my judgment of this author to his own; with many others, whoſe words I forbear to alledge, ſince the force of truth has extorted a confeſſion from the very adverſary himſelf. For he dares not put off this work, which he patronizes, for an accurate performance, or ſuch as deſerves the applauſe of the age, but confeſſes, that the author ſometimes confounds names, that he has committed ſome miſtakes, and omitted ſome authors.' Obſerve, that he does not rob Konig of the praiſe of an old profeſſor, who had done good ſervices to the Republic of Letters (2).

KOORNHERT (THEODORE) a native of Amſterdam, and ſecretary of the town of Haerlem, in the XVIth century, made himſelf famous by ſome writings that were very ſingular in point of religion (a). He is ranked amongſt thoſe Spiritualiſts or Enthuſiaſts, who believed, that all the ſects of Chriſtianity had been corrupted for many ages, and that, without an extraordinary miſſion, authorized by miracles, no body had a right to intrude into the functions of the goſpel miniſtry (b). Upon this footing, he publickly condemned Calvin and Luther's undertaking, though he acknowledged, that the church of Rome was no true church. He would have all Chriſtians of whatever ſect, (till it ſhould pleaſe God to raiſe Reformers, like the Apoſtles) unite under one form by way of Interim, or proviſionally [A], the model whereof was, that the Scripture ſhould be read to the people without offering any explication, or preſcribing any thing to the auditors by way of precept or prohibition, but only by way of advice.

[A] He would have all Chriſtians ..... unite under one form, by way of Interim, or proviſionally.] Hoornbeeck, who had read his Dutch book, explains this fancy. 'Iſte Coornhert paſſim ſuis libris ...... aliquod ſchema Eccleſiæ communis erigendæ proponit, in quâ, vel ſolus Scripturæ textus legeretur, abſque gloſſis & expoſitionibus, vel etiam admonitiones ex Scripturâ ſub aliorum judicio, non autem ex authoritate, aliquando fierent, ad modum alterius & novi Interim, uſque dum novâ divinâque ad extruendam aliam Eccleſiam miſſione accederent miniſtri, quales Apoſtoli fuerunt, Eccleſiam ex Chriſti præſcripto novam erecturi, qua jam divinâ miſſione ad erigendam per Reformationem aliam Eccleſiam omnes, juxta eum, careant. Tomo primo, pag. ult. in delineatione iſtius Eccleſiæ ſic loquitur: "Raro, aut nunquam utuntur hic humanis gloſſis, non quod peccatum ſit, ſed quia incertum, à ſole ad ſtellas, & à fontibus ad ciſternas recurrere. Atque ita etiam nemo hic ſibi (abſque certâ & ſpeciali miſſione) arrogat docendi officium, ut cum authoritate mandet vel prohibeat, benè quidem ut ſub meliori ſententiâ admoneat, idque ex Scripturâ (1)." —— 'This Coonhert in many parts of his works ..... propoſes ſome plan for erecting a common church, in which, the text of the ſcripture alone is to be read, without gloſſes and expoſitions, and admonitions out of the ſcripture to be ſometimes delivered as matter of advice, not authority, in the manner of a ſecond and new Interim; till miniſters ſhould come, ſuch as the apoſtles were, with a new and divine commiſſion, to found a new church, after the inſtitution of Chriſt; which divine authority, for erecting another church by a reformation, all, according to him, want. In his firſt volume, pag. ult. in delineating that church, he thus expreſſes himſelf: "Here they ſeldom or never, uſe human gloſſes; not becauſe it is unlawful, but becauſe of the uncertainty of running from the ſun to the ſtars, from ſprings to ciſterns. And thus alſo no one here (without a certain and ſpecial appointment) arrogates to himſelf the office of teaching, ſo as to command, or forbid, with authority, but fetches admonitions ſolely from the ſcripture." This viſionary would have had the magiſtrates lay their injunctions on the preachers to ſay nothing but what was contained, word for word, in the ſcripture, and to oblige the laity, under the penalty of a fine, to lay aſide all their divinity books. You will ſee this more exactly in theſe Latin words (2): 'Hoc libello vel dialogo (3) ita ſententiam ſuam exponit: "exiſtimo, Magiſtratui ſignificandum, quæcunque ſcripta humana, gloſſas, dogmataque quid impuri, errores & ambages continere, à quibus omnibus immunis eſt Scriptura, certam pandens ſalutis viam. Quare reverenter rogandus eſſet, ut vellet, ad modum novi alicujus Interim, (& hoc ad tempus uſque quo concorditer decretum eſſet quæ doctrina ſequenda foret) omnibus Concionatoribus interdicere, ne è ſuggeſtu populum aliud quid docerent, prælegerent, dicerentve, præter clarum Scripturæ textum,

---

(b) Acta Eruditor. Lipſ. 1699, pag. 360.

(c) Konig, Biblioth. pag. 448. See his Elogium in Witten's Memoriæ Theolog. Renovatæ, Decade VIII, pag. 1100, & ſeq.

† V. locum celeberr. Tenzelii mox allegandum.

⸸ P. I. Polyhiſt. Litterarii, cap. xviii, pag. 202.

‡ In Colloquiis menſtruis vernaculis, M. Martio A. 1680, pag. 316, 317.

(2) Senis de re literaria bene meriti elogium Konigio ob alios ejus Philologici argumenti libellos non invideo. Molleros, Præfat. Iſagog.

(a) Hoornbeeck, Summa Controv. lib. vi, pag. m. 435.

(b) Id. ibid.

(1) Hoornbeeck, Summa Controv. lib. vi, pag. m. 435, 436.

(2) Id. ibid. pag. 436, 437.

(3) Viz. de minuendis Sectis.

advice. He did not believe, that, in order to be a true Chriſtian, one ought to be a member of any particular church, and he practiſed it accordingly [B]; for he neither communicated with the Catholics, nor with the Proteſtants, nor with any other ſect. He wrote with great aſſurance againſt the Reformed Religion, and particularly againſt Calvin and Beza (c), and was accounted ſuch a diſturber of religion, that the magiſtrates of Delft expelled him from their town, and the States of Holland decreed many things, upon which he complained, that the Inquiſition was renewed (d). Nothing appeared to him more contrary to reaſon and the Goſpel, than to perſecute thoſe, who are not of the religion of the ſtate. He wrote thereupon againſt Beza and Lipſius [C]. He died the “ textum, citra unius ſyllabæ aut additionem aut demtionem, quomodo in Veteri Novoque Teſtamento ſolebat fieri. Hoc demum pacto ſectas evanituras. Præterea populo ſub mulctâ injungendum eſſet, ut omnes ſuos libros de Scripturâ tractantes, quæ ipſæ non eſſent mera Scriptura, ad manus Magiſtratus deferrent, ibique ſervarentur, ut vel redderentur poſtmodum ſuis Dominis, vel prout viſum foret, de illis diſponeretur. Hæc Coornhertus. —— ‘In this book, or dialogue, he thus lays down his opinion: “ I think, the magiſtrate ſhould be told, that all human writing and gloſſes contain ſomething impure, errors, and intricates, from all which the ſcripture is free, which ſhews the true way to ſalvation. Therefore he is reſpectfully to be deſired to forbid all preachers to teach, read, or deliver any thing from the pulpit, to the people, beſides the plain text of the ſcripture, without adding, or taking away, one ſyllable, as was wont to be done in the Old and New Teſtament; and this, till it be unanimouſly decreed what doctrine is to be followed. By this means ſects will be at an end. Beſides, the people ſhould be obliged, under penalty, to give into the magiſtrate all their books of Divinity, but ſuch as are meer ſcripture, to be kept by him, and afterwards returned to the owners, or otherwiſe diſpoſed of, as ſhall be thought proper.” Thus Coornhert.’

[B] He did not believe, that ..... one ought to be a member of any particular church, and he practiſed it accordingly] Not believing, that there was any Chriſtian ſociety upon earth, that was pure, and directed by true paſtors, he no where communicated at the Lord's table. He denied not, but that, for the ſecurity of the weak, there ought to be an external communion appointed; but he pretended, that no body ought to aſcribe to himſelf a heavenly miſſion, or teach the neceſſity of the uſe of the ſacraments. This is the ſum of the following Latin words. ‘ Coornhertus palam ſcribebat inter omnes ſectas ſe nullibi Chriſti Eccleſiam deprehendere; Romanum noſtrâ, quam ne quidem Eccleſiæ nomine dignabatur, meliorem eſſe, Tom. I. in Dialogis, fol. 484, nec S. Cœnam ullibi id circo participabat, quia veram Eccleſiam, & legitimos miniſtros ſcilicet deſiderabat: unde & communionis illam eſſe neceſſitatem, quæ vulgo docetur, negabat. Tom. I. lib. Conſiſtorium, in initio. Tom. III. in Delineatione impartialis Eccleſiæ: ubi ſtatim à principio docet, poſſe nunc quem eſſe verum Chriſtianum, utcunque non ſit membrum viſibilis alicujus Eccleſiæ: Rogatuſque, quid præſtaret, an extra viſibilem Eccleſiam vivere, quouſque ipſe Deus per certos Miniſtros Eccleſiam reſtauret; an Eccleſiam, infirmorum gratiâ, non valentium vivere abſque externâ illâ formâ, quin ad Sectarum partes prolabantur, colligere? reſpondit: prius quidem eſſe magis certum; at ſecundum videri ſibi neceſſarium. Collapſam quidem eſſe Dei Eccleſiam, ſed non apparere manifeſtum mandatum eam reſtaurandi: attamen ovile aliquod pro infirmis, adverſus varios lupos defendendis, ſub tali nempe libertate, qua nemo ſibi arroget, à Deo ſe ad docendum miſſum eſſe, & Sacramentorum Baptiſmi ac Cœnæ uſus relinquatur liber, pro infirmis habendum; nullum verò iſtorum urgeri debere præceptum, aut neceſſitatem (4). ———— Coornhert openly declared in writing, that, among all the ſects, he no where found the church of Chriſt; that the Romiſh was better than ours, which he did not think worthy the name of a church; nor did he communicate with any, becauſe he could not find a true church, or lawful miniſters: whence he denied there was that neceſſity of communicating, which is commonly taught; Tom. I. lib. Conſiſt. at the beginning: Tom. III. in Delineat. impartial. Eccleſ. where he begins with laying it down, that one may, now, be a good Chriſtian, without being a member of any viſible church: and being asked which was the beſt, to live without the pale of a viſible church, till God ſhould reſtore it by proper miniſters, or to unite a church, for the ſake of the weak, who are unable to live without that external form, and muſt otherwiſe fall off to the ſects? he replied, that the firſt was more ſure; but that he thought the latter neceſſary: that the church of God was fallen; but that there did not appear an evident command to reſtore it; nevertheleſs, that there muſt be a fold for the weak, to defend them againſt the many wolves; to wit, under ſuch a liberty, that no one ſhould pretend a commiſſion from God to teach, and that the uſe of the ſacraments of Baptiſm, and the Euchariſt, ſhould be left free, for the ſake of the weak; but that no precept or neceſſity ſhould be pleaded for ſuch things.’

[C] He wrote concerning perſecution againſt Beza and Lipſius.] There is ſomething to be found fault with in theſe words of Voëtius: ‘ Cornhertus qui Latino Dialogo contra Lipiſii politicam hanc cauſam agit eumdemque Dialogum poſtea contra Lipſii reſponſum (cui tit. adverſus Dialogiſtam) defendit, idem Belgico ſcripto Proceſſum de Hæreticidio edidit contra Bezam (5).— Coornhert, who, in a Latin dialogue againſt Lipſius's Politics, pleads this cauſe, and afterwards defends the ſame dialogue againſt Lipſius's anſwer, intituled Adverſus Dialogiſtam, publiſhed, in Dutch, a piece againſt Beza, intituled, Proceſſus de Hæretecidio.’ It is not true, that Koornhert's dialogue againſt Lipſius's Politics is in Latin: it is in Dutch (6). Voëtius himſelf acknowledges it in a paſſage which I ſhall preſently cite. Note likewiſe, that the title of that Dutch book anſwers to Lis, ſeu Proceſſus de Hæreticidio. Koornhert's Reply is in Latin (7); it had been larger, if he had lived longer (8). The title of it is: Defenſio Proceſſus de non occidendis hæreticis contra tria capita libri IV Politicorum J. Lipſii: ejuſque Libri adverſus Dialogiſtam confutatio. Sub extremum mortis fatum per ſuæ patriæ libertatis ſtudioſiſſimum THEODORUM VOLCHARDUM COORNHERT conſcripta. The edition I make uſe of is of Hanaw, 1593. If you deſire to ſee what perplexity Lipſius was thrown into by that reply, read what follows: ‘ Lipſius petitus libello Belgico à Diederico Volckero Coornhert, poſtea libro, de Unâ religione dicto Died. Coornhert repoſito addidit, ſe veram & probam intelligere: ſed non explicat, & explicaturum ſe negat, quænam ſit vera & proba religio. Hinc dictus Coornhertus in refutatione libelli Lipſiani anno 1591. tit. Defenſio proceſſus de non occidendis hæreticis, &c. ita conſtrinxit Lipſium, ut à Papiſticâ, aut Ethnico-Machiavellicâ (quarum alterutram pectore premebat, quamvis tunc Leidæ conciones publicas frequentaret) ſe liberare non potuerit. Et hanc unam putant ex cauſis præcipuis fuiſſe, cur ſtatione Leidenſi turpiter deſertâ hypocriſios larvam deponeret, ad partes hoſtiles transfugeret, atque ibi Papiſmi profeſſionem ſuſciperet (9). —— Lipſius, being attacked in a Dutch book by Theodore Volcker Coornhert, afterwards in his book, of the one Religion, againſt the ſaid Coornhert, added, that he meant the right and true religion: but he does not explain, and declares he never will, which is the right and true religion. Hence the ſaid Coornhert, in the refutation of Lipſius's book in the year 1591, intituled, Defenſio, &c. drove Lipſius to ſuch extremities, that he could not clear himſelf from the Popiſh, or Heathen-Machiavellian, one of which he concealed in his breaſt, tho' at that time he frequented the public ſermons at Leyden. And this is thought to be one of the principal reaſons, why he ſhamefully left Leyden, threw off the maſk of hipocriſy, went over to the enemy, and openly profeſſed the Popiſh religion.’ Add to this the remark [B] of the article LIPSIUS.

(c) Ex oppugnata in herbis Reformatione noſtrarum Eccleſiarum, præſertim noſtra Catecheſi, & probatâ ſibi nec noſtrâ Eccleſiâ, nec aliis, ſolum intentus carpendis omnibus, & magnis impetendis nominibus, Calvinum dico, Bezam, Danæum, Saraviam, alios, gloriam hinc inanem inter ſuos aucupatus fuit. Id. ibid.

(d) Voëtius, de Politia Eccleſiaſt. Tom. II, pag. 454.

(4) Hoornbeck, ibid. pag. 438.

(5) Voëtius, de Politia Eccleſ. Tom. II, pag. 386.

(6) Plebeia (ſcriptio) futilis, & concepta plebeio ſtilo. Lipſius, in Præf. libri de una Religione adverſus Dialogiſtam.

(7) He wrote it in Dutch; but his heirs procured it to be tranſlated into Latin.

(8) See the advertiſement to the reader, at the end of that Reply.

(9) Voëtius, ubi ſupra, pag. 433.

the twentieth of October 1590 (e), acknowledging the doctrine of Predeſtination, which he had ſo much oppoſed [D]. His works were publiſhed in the year 1630, in three volumes in folio. He began to ſtudy ſomewhat late [E]. Lewis Guicciardin (f), ſpeaks of an excellent Engraver, a native of Haerlem (g), whoſe name was THEODORUS COORNHERT. He is doubtleſs the ſame that is mentioned in Freherus's Theatrum [F], and who makes the ſubject of this article. This is all I could collect from ſome Latin books; and I was ready to ſend it to the preſs, with the ſix firſt remarks ſubjoined to it, not thinking to add any thing elſe, when, being informed that Coornhert's Life was prefixed, in Dutch, to his works, I procured ſome extracts to be made out of it, which have occaſioned the addition of what follows. They import, that Koornhert was born in 1522, of an antient and good family of Amſterdam; that he took a journey into Spain and Portugal when he was very young; that, at his return, he married againſt the intention of his father's will, and without conſulting his mother; that his wife having hardly any fortune, he was obliged to get into the ſervice of Renaud de Brederode baron of Vianen; that he became his ſteward, and got into his favour; but quickly left him, becauſe he could not reconcile himſelf to a court life; that he ſettled at Haerlem, and maintained himſelf by Engraving; that, having ſome ſcruples about ſome matters of Divinity, and thinking he could find them reſolved in St Auguſtin, and in ſome other fathers, he learned the Latin tongue at thirty years of age, wherein he made ſuch a progreſs, that he ſoon found himſelf able to tranſlate Tully's Offices, and ſeveral other books, into Dutch; that he underſtood Muſic and Poetry; that he was very good company at table, but his mirth was inoffenſive, and that he never exceeded the rules of ſobriety; that he loved to work, and made it a law to himſelf to be but ſix hours in bed; that he was made notary in 1561, and ſecretary to the town of Haerlem in 1562, and ſecretary to the burgomaſters of the ſame town in 1564; that in 1565 and 1566, he was frequently deputed to the prince of Orange, governour of Holland; that he had ſeveral conferences with Henry de Brederode upon the ſubject of the troubles [G] that began to riſe in the Low-Countries, and of the famous petition, that was preſented to the ducheſs of Parma in April 1566; that he was carried away by force from Haerlem, and removed to the Hague, where he endured a long and ſevere impriſonment; that there he wrote ſeveral poems in Dutch, that his wife, being perſuaded he would never have his liberty, endeavoured to catch the plague, that ſo, infecting him, they might both die together, that he ſeverely reprimanded her for it, and commanded her patiently to ſubmit to providence; that he vindicated himſelf ſo well, that he was releaſed, and only prohibited to go out of the Hague; that, underſtanding there were freſh orders come from Bruſſels to re-impriſon him, he privately retired to Haerlem, and afterwards into the country of Cleves, where he maintained himſelf

(e) See the advertiſement to the reader, at the end of his Reply to Lipſius. Note, that Konig has wrongly placed his death in the year 1599.

(f) Ludov. Guicciard. in Deſcript. Belgii, cap. de Antuerpia, pag. m. 118.

(g) He is miſtaken; for Coornhert was a native of Amſterdam.

[D] He died ...... acknowledging the doctrine of Predeſtination, which he had ſo much oppoſed.] He cried out, as he was dying, my God, from thee I have my ſoul; it is in thy power to ſave, or reprobate it, according to thy good pleaſure; I have no reaſon to complain. ‘Obiit a. CIϽ IϽ XC, & quod valde obſervandum, is qui tam impotenter de Prædeſtinatione multa, ſibi nequaquam intellecta, adverſus Theologos noſtros conſcripſit, ſub mortem, veritatem ejus in ſe ſentire & agnoſcere coactus fuit, ad Deum exclamans: “ſe animam ſuam ab eo poſſidere, quam Deo integrum ſit pro ſuo beneplacito ſervare, an reprobare, ſibi nil eſſe quod conqueratur.” Quod nil eſt, quam vim & ſummam prædeſtinationis divinæ in nobis aut ſalvandis, aut abjiciendis, pro Die ſummo in nos omnes arbitrio, proprio ſenſu confiteri, & in morte ſincerius teſtari, quam tot infrunitis & impetuoſis adverſus eam ſcriptis, per vitam (10). —— He died in the year 1590, and, what is very remarkable, he, who had written ſo violently againſt our divines, concerning the doctrine of Predeſtination, which he did not well underſtand; at the time of his death was ſenſible of the truth of it, and forced to acknowledge it, crying out to God; “that he received his ſoul from him, which he might ſave, or damn, as he pleaſed, and that he had nothing to complain of.” Which is nothing elſe, but acknowledging, that he felt the force of the divine Predeſtination in ſaving, or rejecting us, according to his ſupreme authority over every one of us, and bearing teſtimony to it, at his death, with more ſincerity, than he had oppoſed it, in ſuch vehement writings, during his life.’ This citation was neceſſary, conſidering the reflexions it contains, and may ſuggeſt.

[E] He began to ſtudy ſomewhat late.] ‘I have ſeen at the Hague, in Mr Van Beuning's library, the works of Theodore Volcard (11) Cornhert, in Dutch. He was an Enthuſiaſt, who had a very ready wit. He learned of himſelf Greek and Latin (12), at forty years of age, and made ſo great a progreſs in theſe two languages, that he tranſlated into Dutch any author he had a mind to. He wrote ſeveral treatiſes of Divinity, ſome of which have been confuted by Calvin and Danæus. He wrote alſo againſt Lipſius, who anſwered him, in his book De una Religione. The Hollanders ſpeak of him as of a wonderful man. He died in the year 1590, being ſixty eight years old (13).’ There are ſome exaggerations in this paſſage of Colomiés. I have read in a good author, that Koornhert was but thirty years old, when he began to ſtudy the Latin tongue (14). He never was a great maſter of it, and his writings have been in no great repute for this long time. Note, that Boxhornius (15) ſays moſt of the things contained in this paſſage of Colomiés.

[F] In Freberus's Theatrum.] There we ſee, that Theodorus Cornhertzius, an excellent Sculptor, exerciſed his art with praiſe at Amſterdam, where he was born, and left many works made upon the model of Martin Hemskerk, whom he imitated. He was alſo a good Poet; he died at Tergou, in the year 1590, being ſeventy eight years of age (16). This is our Koornhert: but it ſhould have been ſaid, that he lived ſixty eight years, and not ſeventy eight. See the margin (17).

[G] He had ſeveral conferences with Henry de Brederode, upon the ſubject of the troubles.] Koornhert had been ſteward to Renaud de Brederode, and had done him good ſervices. By that he diſcovered himſelf to the beſt advantage to Henry de Brederode, Renaud's ſon. He conferred with him at Vianen, and at Utrecht, Amſterdam, and Haerlem, about the means of preſerving the liberty of their country, and he engaged him to preſent to the ducheſs of Parma, the petition, which had ſuch remarkable conſequences. He was the author of the firſt Manifeſto that prince William publiſhed in his camp (18), the title of which was, Advice to the inhabitants of the Low-Countries, for the law, for the king, and for the flock (19). Bor, who mentions that Manifeſto, in the fourth book of his hiſtory, Fol. 182, declared to ſome people that he knew very well, that Koornhert had writ it (20).

(10) Hoornbeck, ubi ſupra, pag. 435.

(11) Volcard was his father's name, and not his own.

(12) It is ſaid in his Life, that Dr John Baſius, who was afterwards counſellor to the prince of Orange, taught him the Latin tongue. No mention is made of the Greek.

(13) Colomiés, Melanges Hiſtoriques, pag. 63.

(14) Vir ingenii quidem alicujus, ſed uti ὀψιμαθής (quippe ad annum demum ætatis XXX linguam Latinam cœpit addiſcere.) Ita, &c. Hoornb. ubi ſupra.

(15) Boxhorn. in Theatro Hollandiæ, cap. de urbe Amſtelodamo, pag. m. 263.

(16) Paul Freher. in Theatro, pag. 1483. He quotes the Academia Germ. Pictorum Joach. à Sandrart.

(17) Freherus ſhould have called him an Engraver, and not a Sculptor, and ſhould have ſaid, that he practiſed his trade at Haerlem, and not at Amſterdam.

(18) In December. 1566.

(19) It is the tranſlation of the Dutch title.

(20) Taken from the extracts, imparted to me, in Latin, out of the Dutch Life of Theodore Koornhert.

himſelf by his old trade of Engraving; that, the States of Holland having firmly reſolved to maintain their liberty againſt the Spaniſh tyranny, he returned into his country, and was honoured with the poſt of ſecretary to the States of the province; that endeavouring to oppoſe the diſorders committed by the ſoldiery, and being deputed to take information of them, he became ſo odious to the commanders of thoſe inſolent troops [H], that, to ſave his life, he thought fit to exile himſelf; that, having written to the prince of Orange, and to the States of Holland, the reaſons of his retreat, he took refuge at Embden; that, after things were reſtored to a better ſtate, he returned to Haerlem; that he engaged in diſputes, wherein he was oppoſed by the moſt zealous miniſters; that he publiſhed ſeveral pieces in defence of his cauſe, and maintained it by word of mouth, at Leyden, and at the Hague; that, to be the more ready to enter the liſts, he went and lived at the Hague; that, theſe verbal diſputes having been prohibited by authority [I], he often intreated the States, and the miniſters, and particularly at the ſynod

[H] Being deputed to take information of the diſorders committed by the ſoldiery, he became ſo odious to the commanders of thoſe inſolent troops.] The captains, who were conſcious of many extortions, bethought themſelves of a very effectual expedient, to prevent a diſcovery; which was to cry down Koornhert, as a dangerous Papiſt, and thereby expoſe him to a thouſand dangers. They found a very ſpecious pretence for it; for he was continually ſaying, that it was juſt, and for the intereſt of Holland, not to perſecute the Catholics, but to obſerve the promiſe, which the prince of Orange had made them concerning the free exerciſe of their religon, &c. The count de Lumei, who commanded the troops in Holland, was far from ſtanding to this promiſe. Koornhert very boldly condemned this conduct; whereupon he was diffamed, as a moſt accurſed favourer of Popery. The count de Lumei, to whom he had been repreſented in black colours, ſwore his deſtruction and gave orders to kill him. There was no ſafety for him in the highways of the country, nor in the ſtreets of the town: he had recourſe to the protection of the prince of Orange; but that was not ſufficient to ballance the great credit this count had with the ſoldiery. Wherefore Koornhert was obliged to retire into the country of Cleves (21). This happened in the year 1572. Note, that he favoured ſo little the cauſe of the Spaniards, that he was expreſsly excepted in the Amneſty, which Lewis de Requeſens cauſed to be publiſhed at Bruſſels, in the year 1574, for all thoſe who ſhould in two months time receive abſolution in the confeſſional of the prieſts (22). Here follows a paſſage, which ſhews, that he did not love the church of Rome, and yet was for granting the Papiſts liberty of conſcience.

The private exerciſe of their religion was forbidden in Holland, in 1581. Some among them employed Koornhert to draw up a petition addreſſed to the prince of Orange, by which they deſired to be maintained in the exerciſe of their religion, in the monaſteries of Haerlem, and in the temple, which the Proteſtants had quitted, after they became maſters of the great church. Koornhert, being obliged to appear before the burgomaſters of Haerlem, on account of that writing, delivered it into their hands, according to the order he had received, and declared, that he did not undertake the defence of it, any more than that of Popery, which he conſidered as a den of murder; but that, neverthelеſs,he was perſuaded, that it was a piece of injuſtice to break one's word with the Roman Catholics, and to force their conſcience. The burgomaſters gave this petition to the prince of Orange, who ſent it back to the States; theſe ſent for the burghers of Haerlem, who had ſigned it, and ordered them to cancel their names. They ordered alſo Koornhert to tear the draught of it; all which was executed (23).

[I] Theſe verbal diſputes having been prohibited by authority.] Here are ſome circumſtances of thoſe diſputes. They began at Delft, in the year 1578; and what occaſioned them was, that a certain perſon, who quitted the church of Rome, to embrace the Reformed, alledged ſuch reaſons for his change, as ſhewed he underſtood neither of them very well. Koonhert tells him very freely, what remains to be examined, is, whether you have choſen a religion better than that you have left. He was called to an account for this diſcourſe; for a clamour was raiſed about it, and it was odiouſly repreſented: which occaſioned the conference betwixt Koornhert, and two miniſters of Delft, which turned upon the notes of the true church. He undertook to prove, that the churches, which followed the doctrines of John Calvin, and Theodore Beza, were falſe; and he grounded himſelf upon three points; predeſtination, juſtification, and the puniſhment of Heretics. The conference was ſcarce begun, when the States of the province put an end to it: it was renewed by their order, and in the preſence of their commiſſioners, at Leyden, the fourteenth of April; but it laſted only a day and a half; Koornhert complaining, that his adverſaries made an ill uſe of the ſecular authority againſt him, retired. He boaſted, that he had reduced the two miniſters to their laſt ſhifts, though he was not permitted to attack them upon the third point (24); he pretended that his naming Calvin and Beza ſerved as a ſubterfuge to his adverſaries, becauſe the commiſſioners ſaid, that he knew very well, the States would not ſuffer the names of thoſe two Geneva miniſters to come into the diſpute, and that therefore he ought to expect their indignation. Finding himſelf thus threatened, he declared, he would not return to a conference, where he had not an entire liberty of ſpeech. The miniſters and commiſſioners failed not to appear at the place, where the diſpute began. They ſtaid for Koornhert, ſent to his lodgings, and took his abſence for a flight, and an undoubted proof of his defeat. The States of Holland cauſed the magiſtracy of Haerlem to forbid him to write any thing concerning that diſpute (25).

